Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has been generous in giving way. A wish is not the same as a requirement for energy companies to put in that money for vulnerable households. What will the Government do to monitor the position? Will they introduce a requirement? It has been reported that there was an argument in the Cabinet about whether there should be a requirement. I would be interested to know the Secretary of State's position on that.

Hilary Benn: I will happily tell my hon. Friend what my view and the Government's view is. We think it is now time to tackle the issue and we are looking to Ofgem and the suppliers to bring forward proposals for treating prepayment meter customers more fairly. However—this is the answer to his question—if sufficient progress is not made by next winter, the Government are prepared to use statutory powers to reduce the differential between prepayment and other forms of payment.

In the meantime, as my hon. Friend and the House will be aware, we are providing immediate help to pensioners who face pressures from higher energy bills this year, by raising the winter fuel payment for the over 60s from £200 to £250 and for the over 80s from £300 to £400. Some 9 million pensioner households will be better off as a result. I simply remind the House that before 1997 there was no winter fuel payment at all.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Hilary Benn: I am going to bring my remarks to a conclusion, as I have been very generous in giving way.

One the reasons why today's debate is welcome is that it gives us the chance to discuss the change that is to come. In the rest of this century, debating and deciding on our carbon budget will be as important as doing so on traditional financial budgets, and arguably even more so. The measures that I have set out in my speech have shown the practical steps that the Government are taking to enable the country to reduce its carbon emissions. It is for that reason that we have a strong record on the environment; but I recognise, as does the House, that we will all need to do more to help build a low-carbon Britain. The Budget shows exactly how and why we are determined to do that.

5.1 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I have to take issue with the Secretary of State's final sentence. He barely spoke about the Budget in his remarks and the Budget hardly deals with the pressing environment challenges that we face at all. On the other hand, I do not doubt for a moment his integrity and sincerity on such matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) and I heard him speak at the Chemistry Club last week. He gave a passionate and committed speech about the environment and the importance of living within natural limits, which is a lesson that the whole of humanity has to learn. He said:

"We are living beyond our means", which is true in respect of the environment, but unfortunately it is true of the Chancellor, too, in respect of the economy. That is one of the dilemmas that we face.

The Budget was supposed to be the great green Budget. The headline in The Guardian on 10 March ran "Darling plans greenest budget yet". We expected it, we wanted it and we were all prepared for it. Indeed, the Chancellor warmed us up for it last December, when he said:

"Sustainability will be at the heart of the next Budget. This is not an optional extra, it is essential to all our futures."

In his Budget speech, the Chancellor cranked up the excitement further, saying:

"our greatest obligation to the future must be to tackle climate change."—[Official Report, 12 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 295.]

I agree, so I was looking forward to the greenest Budget yet. We needed the greenest Budget yet, because carbon pollution in this country is higher than it was in 1997. On that most fundamental of measures, the Government have failed.

To say that I was disappointed by the Budget is a huge understatement, but I was not alone in being disappointed. The director of Friends of the Earth said:

"He has merely tinkered at the edges", continuing,

"the overall package falls a long way short of what is required. We urgently need real political leadership on this issue".

The executive director of Greenpeace said:

"His measures have failed to match the scale of the challenge we face".

Perhaps the headline from the Green Alliance summed it up best: "Green Budget? What Green Budget?"

I am happy to take as my text for this debate the press release issued by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on Budget day. It is headed "Benn welcomes Budget 2008" and sets out the Department's response to the measures announced by the Chancellor last Wednesday. I suspect that it was issued through gritted teeth. The opening paragraph of the press release appears to be have been drafted before the Department knew what was in the Budget, and reads:

"The Chancellor today set out the 2008 Budget which includes measures to tackle climate change, the most serious and pressing environmental challenge the world faces. Setting out new policies to reduce emissions across all major sectors of the economy, this Budget will ensure the UK continues to lead the climate change agenda internationally while the government continues to take action to protect the UK's natural environment."

There are no policies in the Budget to "reduce emissions across all major sectors of the economy".

Or, if there are, I would be grateful if the Secretary of State could tell us what they are. If there had been any, he might have been able to tell us by how much he expected carbon emissions to be reduced as a result of the Budget measures, but he was unable to do so.

The next paragraph of the press release has a faltering tone and conveys a sense of putting on a brave face. It states:

"Following the Budget statement, Hilary Benn said: 'This Budget demonstrates how seriously the Government takes the environment, with clear incentives for action, for example the new vehicle excise duty bands and charges for plastic bags, and measures to reduce emissions, for example zero carbon new commercial buildings.'"

I shall say more in a moment on the new vehicle excise duty bands, charges for plastic bags, and zero-carbon new commercial buildings, but let us first reflect on that list of highlights. It reveals just how pathetic the Chancellor's measures are in response to "the most serious and pressing environmental challenge the world faces".

It contains only a car tax, a charge on plastic bags—perhaps—and a promise to do something about commercial property in 2019.

Let us move on from the headlines to the nitty-gritty, such as it is. Most of it comprises familiar, heated-up re-announcements, or has been borrowed by Conservative party policy—we are always pleased when the Government do that—or will merely have a marginal impact on climate change. The press release continues:

"The Green finance measures in the Budget include: Laying the ground work for the introduction of five-year carbon budgets".

That is an achievement not of the Budget but of the Climate Change Bill, which was introduced only after a concerted campaign by green groups, the Conservative party, and other Opposition parties. We support the Climate Change Bill, and I am pleased to say that those in another place have introduced some important amendments, which I trust the Government will not seek to overturn when the Bill comes to our House.

A report entitled "UK greenhouse gas emissions: measurement and reporting", published by the National Audit Office at the weekend, has thrown some worrying light on the way in which the Government measure the carbon that we produce. It seems that we might be using dodgy data. The NAO report raises profound questions about the credibility of the Government's approach to reducing carbon emissions, which threatens to send its climate change strategy off course. If the measurement of carbon and other greenhouse gases is flawed, the whole process of setting targets for cutting emissions is undermined.

To make matters worse, there has been an extraordinary degree of ambiguity about the targets that the Government have set themselves. They repeatedly boast that the one target that they have met is the unambitious Kyoto target, but even that is now being called into question. It all depends on the system of measurement used. It is unclear whether the confusion is accidental or whether there has been a deliberate attempt to create wriggle room. The Lib Dem spokesman was right to draw attention to this earlier, and to point out that, on one basis of measurement, we have not reduced our greenhouse gas emissions at all since 1990. The existence of two quite separate carbon accounting systems would do credit to Enron.

There is an urgent need to rationalise the reporting system, so as to make it coherent and consistent. The NAO report reveals not only that different Government Departments use different methods to measure their carbon emissions, but that it is possible, within Departments, for two separate systems to be used to make different points.

It is all very well for the Chancellor to announce in the Budget that next year will see the establishment of the first carbon Budget, but he might also have pointed out that there is at present no true or fair means of validating it.

Hilary Benn: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm to the House that the figures that we report to the United Nations framework convention on climate change follow the guidelines that are set down by the intergovernmental panel on climate change, and that we do that in the way in which the panel has requested?

Mr. Ainsworth: I accept that. However, this becomes more difficult when that method of measurement is applied to UK emissions, as aviation and shipping are excluded. As a result, it does not give a true and fair picture of our emissions. In the absence of reliable and honest reporting, nobody will have confidence in the system. In view of the seriousness of the issue, the Secretary of State should address it as a matter of urgency when he responds, as no doubt he will, to the National Audit Office report.

Beyond the problems of accounting for domestic carbon emissions is the revelation that the Government are planning to allow up to half of our progress towards meeting our carbon reduction targets by 2020 to be met by buying our way out of the problem with overseas credits. No mention was made of that in the Budget and Ministers have not mentioned it at all. We now know, thanks to the NAO's work, that the Office for National Statistics does not have enough faith in the reporting standards of the overseas carbon credit market to include international credits in the official national statistics. Any problems with the accuracy of measuring our own domestic carbon pollution are magnified when we try to apply measurement on a global scale.

I know that this may seem rather nerdy, but it is fundamental to the Government's credibility on the whole climate change agenda—an agenda that, in the words of the Chancellor, is "essential" to "all our futures". Do the Government plan to buy their way out of dealing with climate change; will they put a cap on the indulgences that we can buy from abroad; or have they instead a plan for a dynamic transformation of our country's economy towards low-carbon, prosperous, greener and safer industries that will be truly essential to all our futures and truly essential to the well-being of our children and grandchildren? It is essential if their carbon budgets are to have proper credibility that the Government act urgently to clear up the questions now being raised about dodgy data and the purchase of foreign indulgences.

The next line in the DEFRA press release refers to "reform of car vehicle excise duty rates and bandings including the introduction of new bands from 2009 to reward drivers of the cleanest cars, and higher first year rates in 2010-11 to influence purchasing choices".

We can agree that, in principle, it is better to influence choices at the point of purchase—at the point of choice—than to penalise people for decisions that they have already taken, but there is a world of difference between genuine green taxation and stealth taxation. It is a difference that the Government do not seem to get and, as a result, a difference that the public do not get either.

As an Ipsos MORI report suggested last year,

"the public appear far from convinced that measures announced under the banner of climate change are actually intended to benefit the environment...Trust is a key factor impacting on the ability of government to make the case to its electorate about any particular policy measure, and eco-taxation... suffers from the stigma of 'stealth' taxation".

We need to shift the burden of tax away from good things such as families and work and on to bad things such as pollution, especially carbon pollution.

The key point is not to raise the overall burden of taxation, so what does the Chancellor do in his Budget? He proposes increasing car taxes to generate an additional £735 million in revenues while the tax cut on low-carbon cars will give back to us £15 million. To put it another way, the Chancellor is raising 50 times more tax than he is cutting. In the light of that fact, it is extraordinary for the Chancellor to claim that an average family will be no worse off as a result of those changes, when seven in 10 motorists will pay more in vehicle excise duty.

Stewart Hosie: Is not the position actually worse than that? In the next two years, the take on the vehicle excise duty change will be £1.2 billion. Given that amount of extra yield, does it not indicate to the hon. Gentleman that the Government are not planning for any behavioural change? It is indeed just a tax.

Mr. Ainsworth: I think that the hon. Gentleman makes an extremely good point. That is one of the reasons why the Secretary of State had such difficulty answering my questions earlier.

What will all the extra tax do for the environment? That is what we need to know. According to The Guardian, it will help reduce CO_2 emissions from the transport sector by less than 1 per cent. So, it is not a green tax; it is not a meaningful part of the solution to the greatest challenge that we face. It is a stealth tax. I cannot think of a better way to alienate the public from the whole green agenda than dressing up stealth taxes as green.

Steve Webb: Clearly, there are two points here: what happens to the money and the structure of the tax. If all the money raised through the increased tiered VED had gone on some other tax cut, would the hon. Gentleman have considered that, as a package, a good thing? Does he support VED being tiered, particularly for new cars, provided that the money is spent cutting other taxes?

Mr. Ainsworth: We have supported the banding, and I have said that we support the principle that if we are to have green taxation, it should apply at the point of choice, not retrospectively. So, if I have understood the hon. Gentleman's question correctly, I think the answer is yes. However, the important caveat that we have made clear is that any revenues from additional green taxes should not just disappear into the Exchequer, but should be used to cut taxation on families and on other things that help society and help to make the country a better place.

I believe that people, by and large, are genuinely anxious about climate change and keen to be part of the solution. A responsible Government would provide leadership and encouragement, not use the cover of eco-taxation simply to raise funds because they have been spending beyond their means. Cynicism of that kind is deeply damaging to the green cause.

The next announcement is the plan to support auctioning 100 per cent. of allowances for large electricity producers in phase 3 of the EU emissions trading scheme. We support that in fact, we have been calling for it for quite a while—but what do the Government intend to do with the proceeds of the auction, which are likely to run into billions of pounds? Will they be earmarked for investment in green technologies or simply be pocketed by the Chancellor? Perhaps a Treasury Minister will answer that question now, or, if they prefer, when they speak later in the debate. Later, then.

Next is the setting up of the new green homes service. I say that it is new, but we had already heard about it last year—from the Secretary of State, I think, and from the Prime Minister himself. The £26 million allocated to the green homes service, spread across the country, would mean each household receiving £1-worth of advice on how to green their home. Is there not already advice available on a multitude of websites and from a multitude of Government-sponsored agencies and supported organisations, from the Energy Saving Trust to Warm Front and Warm Zone, which I had the pleasure of visiting up in Newcastle at the weekend.

Then we have this:

"Incentivising only the most sustainable biofuels, by shifting support away from the duty differential to the Renewable Transport Fuel Obligation in future years".

As the Secretary of State knows, there is absolutely no benefit to the task of dealing with climate change if renewable fuels are grown at the expense of the rain forest.

We on the Conservative Benches have a serious objection to the renewable transport fuel obligation in its current form because we believe that there is a real danger that it will do more harm than good—damaging some of the most important and fragile habitats on the planet, endangering already-threatened species such as the orang-utan and enhancing the risk of food shortages.

DEFRA's own chief scientist has warned that "the way we are currently producing biofuels is not the way to go".

The implication in the Budget that axing the duty differential on biofuels and placing all our hopes on the renewable transport fuel obligation will solve our problems altogether is naive or even deceitful. The truth is that, by cutting the duty differential, the Chancellor will save some £550 million in 2010-11. It has nothing to do with the environment and everything to do with the fact that the Chancellor is living beyond his means.

Here is the next item in this sad litany:

"Increasing climate change levy rates in line with inflation".

That is okay, as far as it goes, but the truth is that the climate change levy does not do the job—it does not do what it says on the tin. It does not even live up to its own name. It is a tax on industry's use of energy, and a largely ineffective one as well. We have been saying that for some time.

Only the other week, the Select Committee on Environmental Audit found that the climate change levy has had "relatively little effect on business emissions".

The way in which the Prime Minister clings to the climate change levy as if it is some kind of lifeline to save his green credentials is increasingly pathetic and desperate.

Next is the re-announcement of aviation duty to replace air passenger duty. That is not new, but I have no problem with the measure since it was a Conservative proposal in the first place. Then there is "an ambition for all new non-domestic buildings to be zero carbon from 2019".

I applaud that ambition. However, there is a yawning chasm between the Government's ambitious rhetoric and the reality of delivery. It will take a Conservative Government to ensure that that particular ambition is turned into a reality.

Next there is

"extending the Stamp Duty Land Tax exemption from zero carbon homes to new flats, retrospectively from 1 October 2007".

There is some extending to do here, because by the end of 2007, the number of homes throughout the country claiming zero stamp duty on the basis of being zero-carbon was six.

The final item in DEFRA's highlights of Labour's greenest Budget yet is an increase in the aggregates levy from 1 April 2009, which is unexceptional. However, slipped in before the news about that levy is:

"Government legislation and the imposition of charges if retailers do not take voluntary action to eliminate single-use carrier bags".

That was the thing that was designed to grab the headlines and to act as a smokescreen to cover the rest of a limp, half-hearted, piecemeal, unambitious and disappointing set of rehashed and boring announcements.

The DEFRA press release does not tell the whole story, however. This eye-catching initiative proposes the possibility of legislation if "sufficient progress" to reduce the use of plastic bags is not made voluntarily. What do the Government mean by "sufficient progress"? Is it a reduction from the present number of plastic bags—about 13 billion—to 12 billion, to 10 billion, or to 5 billion? We have no idea what "sufficient progress" is. Industry has no idea. How can the Government expect it to deliver voluntarily when it is not being told what it is expected to deliver? The DEFRA press release talks about action "to eliminate" the use of plastic bags. It is up to the Government to clarify the target for which the industry should be aiming voluntarily to avoid legislation. The big highlight of Labour's greenest Budget yet was a vague threat about plastic bags, which has nothing to do with the Budget or the Chancellor anyway. This was a serious missed opportunity.

While I accept, and welcome the fact, that there are hopeful signs that Ministers are executing a U-turn on our proposal to introduce electricity feed-in tariffs, which could transform the economics of renewable energy in this country and create a huge number of new jobs, where are the green individual savings accounts to encourage people to invest in technologies that will help to combat climate change? Where is the plan for a new market exchange for environmentally responsible companies? Where is the proposal for an effective replacement for the climate change levy that can play a proper part in helping to price carbon across the economy? Where is there any sign that the Government recognise the need to create incentives to capture and use waste heat from power generation? Where is the vision? Where are the ideas that will propel Britain to the forefront of the huge commercial opportunity for low carbon growth that is opening up across the world? That opportunity is being exploited by France, Germany, Japan and the United States, but Britain is being left behind. The answer is not in this Budget and not in this Government.

We have an environment Department that cannot even control its own budget. When it is not cutting support for environmental schemes, it spends its time losing arguments with other Departments. We have a Government who are tinkering at the margins, fiddling about with unpopular stealth taxes, and failing either to deliver properly joined-up policies on climate change, or to protect the environment.

Faced with our greatest obligation to future generations and the most serious and pressing challenge that the world faces, it is pathetic to wag a finger at plastic bags while simultaneously waving through plans to build a new generation of coal-fired power stations without carbon capture and storage. It is pathetic to scowl at people with Mondeos and people carriers while simultaneously ushering in a huge increase in aviation capacity. It is a betrayal of trust to dress up stealth taxes as green taxes and it does not fool anyone. This was a pathetic, boring and unambitious Budget from a Government who have run out of ideas, run out of money, and overstayed their welcome.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): I would normally try to make my contribution to the Budget debate on the day on which the Chancellor delivered his statement, but unfortunately I was laid low by a bug from which I am still struggling to recover. If I think that I have had a difficult week, however, it must be said that the world outside has had a dramatically catastrophic week in comparison with mine.

Perhaps it will prove helpful to me to make my speech today rather than last week, as I had planned. It is certainly nice to be able to do so on a day on which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is present. He is very kind in putting up with being pestered by me on climate change issues. I hope he will forgive me if I add to that today, and pester him as though he were Chancellor for the day. I do not think it sufficient for us to hold the Government to account on climate change issues. We must recognise that we face a challenge from an unholy trinity: climate change, peak oil and market meltdown.

This bad week for me has been a wretched week for Bear Stearns, the fifth largest United States investment bank. Last year its shares were trading at $176 each; over the weekend it was sold for $2 a share, and the markets are saying that they see no end to the prospects of meltdown. The Fed has intervened, and for the first time since the great depression has extended its lending rights to companies that are not banks or investment banks. Such is the level of concern about the extent to which conventional money markets have been creating funny money and a bubble economy that is now bursting all around us, and shows no sign of coming to an immediate end. It seems to me that we cannot have this Budget debate without seeking to engage with the fact that we may have to think about systems failure on a global scale, and about what the United Kingdom must do to manage what is within our grasp in the context of that failure.

Kelvin Hopkins: This may be a trivial point, but is my hon. Friend saying that bankers have learned nothing since the south sea bubble and the Wall street crash?

Alan Simpson: Sadly, that is precisely what I am saying. We are going back to the days of the south sea bubble, when money in the private sector could be created without constraints on a scale that led the world in pursuit of follies for which we all paid a phenomenally high price. What makes the present position harder is the fact that it comes at the same time as other developments. Today oil hit a record price of $111.80 a barrel, from which it has just slipped back. The oil companies are beginning to say to us openly that the world will face an oil crunch by 2015. That means they understand that the last four years, in which oil production has never really exceeded 85 million barrels per day, have nailed the lie that there are vast untapped reserves that will just cope with the burgeoning demands on oil from India and China and from developing nations. We live in an era of declining quantities of available oil and escalating oil prices, and even according to the oil industry's calculations, that will hit us by 2015. Furthermore, over the weekend scientists told us that glaciers were melting faster than even they predicted.

The challenges of climate change, peak oil and economic meltdown redefine the parameters within which national Governments must construct their budgets. I think that it is time for us to be bold, and say that it is impossible to run conventional budgets in unconventional times. That requires us to think outside the box and to think in much more dynamic terms.

It is right that hon. Members on both sides of the House have thrown into question the purpose of green taxation. If it is no more than a form of stealth taxation, we as politicians will kill the public support for green taxation. It has to be transparent that the purpose of green taxation is to change behaviour: it is not to fill the Chancellor's pockets, but to change the mechanisms through which the markets work in the United Kingdom, and the ethical basis on which those markets work. Perhaps it is a good time to cut out the Chancellor as the middleman in that process. Easy and available mechanisms are on offer to us today, if only we had the willingness and the vision to reach out beyond our shores, or beyond the Treasury mindset, to see how those might work.

I want to focus on five aspects of the challenges that the Budget should have addressed and all future Budgets will have to address: energy security, food security, water management, sustainable transport and financial accountability. I begin with financial accountability. There are no easy solutions to paper over the mess that has been created within the international financial systems, but we should be saying that the UK will place two principal requirements on how our financial systems work. First, we should introduce legislation that says that directors will be made personally liable for anything not reported in their annual accounts. That would bring to an end the off balance sheet accounting and securitisation of assets that have allowed the creation of Mickey Mouse money on a colossal scale.

Mr. Redwood: Would the hon. Gentleman also apply that to the Government, who are the biggest offender in not putting huge off balance sheet private finance initiative, public-private partnership and Network Rail obligations on their balance sheet, unlike the directors of Northern Rock, who put the whole of Granite on the balance sheet?

Alan Simpson: I would include the Government. In fact that was my second point. The second rule that I would bring in would say that no public contracts should go to any company that was registering its activities in an offshore tax haven. As an adjunct to that, it should be a precondition of all public sector contracts that they would not include any entitlement to shift the company or the assets offshore for the duration of the PFI contract. It seems that large numbers of contracts are shifted offshore to make them more tax-advantageous to the companies that have been getting them. It is wrong for us in government to preach one set of ethics if we practise another, so we should set that as our own requirement and set those preconditions for all other companies.

Moving on from that, I want to look at ways in which we should as a Government and as a House be requiring markets to be the drivers of their own transformation. The best example of how to do that is in Germany and it is in the context of energy. Opposition Members and a number of Members on the Government Benches have tried over a number of years to get the Government to do precisely what the Secretary of State has now said they will do, which is to look at feed-in tariff legislation and the way in which it works in Germany. However, it is not enough to say that we will be looking at that. That system has a proven record of delivery. How it works is simple. Germany introduced market rules that gave citizens the right to supply clean energy. In addition, the Government placed a requirement on the energy sector, saying, "You will pay your customers four times the market rate on 20-year guarantee periods, reducing at 5 per cent. per year, for the clean energy that you supply to the system." Yes, other customers within the energy system have to pay for that. It worked out at an average of £12 to £14 per year per household energy bill.

When I tried to raise that with Government civil servants in the Department for Business, as Usual, they said, "It is an interventionist measure, which we do not support." I said to them, "You do support interventionist measures; it is just that you support only incompetent ones." We have the renewables obligation, climate change agreements, the climate change levy and commitments to carbon emissions trading. They all add costs to people's bills, amounting to £140 a year on the average household bill. For that we get one tenth of the carbon savings that people get in Germany for their £12 a year. This is not about market intervention; it is about shaking off the shackles of our own incompetent intervention. I hope that amendments—supported by Members of all parties—will be tabled to the Energy Bill that say at the very least, "Yes, by all means look at feed-in tariffs, but we should be under a statutory obligation to bring in a scheme of feed-in tariffs within one year of the passing of the Bill". There should also be a commitment to extend that not only to electricity, but to gas. We must look into that; I know that the Secretary of State has looked into it in terms of his own Department.

There are some rules that we must change. Green energy electricity suppliers have been queuing up in the UK for up to 10 years to get access to the system. They cannot do so because the existing suppliers have first call on access to the system and the rules are that only if they cannot meet the energy demands of the day are new suppliers to be drawn in. Therefore, as Kingsnorth comes from an existing supplier, it will take precedence over a green energy supplier that has been in the queue to get access to the system for 10 years. We must give green energy suppliers preferential access to the system.

In terms of renewable gas, we currently have problems with the disposal of waste, and they will become even greater when the EU waste directive comes into effect in 2010. Germany, however, has been putting decayable waste not into landfill or incineration, but into anaerobic digesters. It therefore turns the waste into energy and puts the gas back into the system, and it does so at the locations—the communities, towns and villages—that the waste was collected from. The waste is used there in combined heat and power plants to deliver a local energy system. We cannot do that because our current system of renewables obligations applies only if the gas is converted into energy at the anaerobic digester plant, as a consequence of which there would be the huge cost of ducting heat for many miles, which would be utterly uneconomic. We need, therefore, to change the market rules for our energy systems.

Mr. Bellingham: The hon. Gentleman is making a superb speech, and I congratulate him on having one of the six houses in the entire kingdom that achieve the target of total energy-efficiency.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that anaerobic digester technology is far preferable to the straightforward incinerators that many local authorities throughout the country are hoping to build?

Alan Simpson: I do agree, and I ought to say that I was the chair of a waste disposal company in Nottinghamshire that was responsible for the incinerator we have in Nottingham. At the time, we dramatically raised standards in filtering and emissions. I look back at that and think it was a half-good idea for the second half of the last century, but it is a hopeless idea for the beginning of this century. We ought not to be wasting a moment in going down that path now, when the true visionary steps take us outside such conventional boxes and into a different framework of thinking about, and delivering, sustainable energy from our own waste.

I have a confession to make. Over just this past week I have come to realise that I have become a Brownite. Unfortunately my political conversion is to the beliefs of, Lester Brown, whose book, "Plan B: Rescuing a Planet under Stress and a Civilization in Trouble", sets out how we can transform our economy to deliver 80 per cent. carbon reductions by 2020. Achieving that, however, requires us to give industry the responsibility of being, and the incentive to become, the driver of its own transformation.

Let me illustrate how that would work with transport. It is essential to say that we require something more than a raising of the vehicle excise duty on gas-guzzling vehicles, so what would be seen as transformational? Let us say that we extended the German energy model to our own approach to vehicles. The sensible approach would be to require the industry to impose a levy of, say, £3,000 on all gas-guzzling vehicles, but which can be a transfer payment to meet the cost of hybrid, low-carbon vehicles in a given manufacturer's own range. That way, our citizens face the prospect of a cash incentive to transfer to low-carbon impact modes of transport, rather than high-carbon, so it should be economically advantageous. For manufacturers who do not produce hybrid or low-carbon vehicles, the money should go into an industry-administered fund that pays for the retroconversion of vehicles to meet low-carbon emission standards. That way, the industry is made responsible for its own transformation.

I should point out that in 1998, the Government reached an agreement with the motor manufacturing industry that by 2008 it would have reduced carbon emissions from 190 g per kilometre to 140 g. My understanding is that there is not a cat in hell's chance of its doing that. As someone who has been somewhat sceptical about voluntary agreements, I say, let us take this one at its word. Let us say, "Fine—there will also be a levy of £1,000 on every vehicle you sell that does not meet the 140 g per kilometre standard. You keep that money in an industry fund to pay for conversion to low-carbon vehicles." People may say that that is somewhat draconian, but even if we wait for the oil industry's 2015 figure, we will face an oil price crunch that will lead to a crisis in terms of the unaffordability of the conventional ways in which we have tried to move around the country. We should anticipate this, live with it and engage with it. We should move towards transformational budgetary economics, rather than adopting the "steady as you go" approach, with the notion that, hopefully, someone else will dispose of the crisis for us.

We could do exactly the same with aviation. It would be really helpful if we did not put all our eggs in the presumptive basket of the carbon emissions trading scheme, which is a Mickey Mouse idea at best. All the nations that have begun that scheme cheat, and so do we. At the end of the day, it is the scope for dishonesty that will sink the scheme. The truth is that it is those who act as middlemen in the financial system, and the largest polluting industries, that have really made the money out of emissions trading. Even if all the permits were auctioned, that would still prompt the question whether that money would go directly into funding behavioural changes that would transform our approach to sustainable economics. I do not think that it would.

The simpler way, to pick up on a point made by the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) in a previous debate, is to say that not all aircraft are the same in terms of their carbon emitting standards, which is absolutely true. We could classify aircraft in the same way that we classify fridges. We could say to airports, "On the basis of your last year's journeys in and out, you will be allocated a carbon miles quota. Next year and for every year after that, that quota will reduce by 5 per cent., and it is up to you to work out how you manage the affordability and frequency of flights, the balance between long and short haul and the balance between passenger and freight. However, none of it escapes a direct and easily measurable quantum that establishes that the carbon mileage entitlement is being reduced by 5 per cent. per year. That is the way we have to go." Indeed, we could do exactly the same with shipping. That is a measurable, rather than speculative, approach to transforming the way in which the markets operate.

My final point concerns food. One point that has emerged from the changes in oil prices in the past year is the realisation that the impact kicks in in our shopping trolleys far sooner than it does at the petrol station. We will be faced with real problems about how people can survive, not only in the eating part of everyday life but in the heating part. Henceforth, all Governments will be required to produce budgets that address their own food security needs. We must refocus on that responsibility, because of the extent to which the UK has walked away from it on a presumption that globalised food trade will always provide an answer from somewhere. Whether we put it down to climate change, peak oil or economic collapse, that ain't gonna happen any more.

We need to relocalise our presumptions about food markets, in exactly the same way as other parts of Europe have maintained their strong, regionalised food systems. In many cases, they highlight the ecological virtue of those systems by pointing out where they lower carbon miles, reduce pollution and congestion, and strengthen the lines of food accountability from the local producer to the local consumer.

In my constituency, a quiet, unassuming man who has just taken over the catering responsibilities for the combined Nottingham University Hospitals NHS Trust has saved the hospitals at least £1 million a year just by throwing out the processed food caterers and replacing them with local food contracts. If that can be done on a simple scale locally, it can be done on a national scale. We need to do it because tomorrow's economics will not be a continuation from today of business as usual. Ministers need to be willing to step up to the plate and be visionary and bold in setting out transformational programmes that will change the whole character of how we live. I know that the Secretary of State can do that; I just wish that he could get his colleagues to join him.

5.47 pm

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): It is always refreshing to follow the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). Of the three contributions so far, his gave us the breadth of vision to match the scale of the problem. I come to the issue relatively fresh, having been the party spokesman only since Christmas. I have been astonished by the gap between the scale of the problem, as per the rhetoric in the Budget and the scientific evidence, and the time scale and scope of the proposed measures. The Budget is a classic example of the contrast between what is actually being done and what needed to be done. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) described the contrast between the "apocalyptic language" and the "minimal and deferred" changes, which summed up the situation nicely.

It is important to give the background to the Budget, as the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) did. It is timely that the National Audit Office produced over the weekend the report that he cited, because it gives us a different take on what has been going on—a take that does not reflect terribly well on successive Governments' approach to climate change. I think that it was the Minister for the Environment who at Thursday's oral questions gave us the figures for carbon dioxide cuts. The figures he gave were technically correct with regard to the Kyoto definitions, but he will know that they are narrow definitions, although I fully accept that they are internationally standardised.

In response to an intervention of mine, the Secretary of State said that aviation and shipping were a footnote to the international statistics. [Interruption.] As he says from a sedentary position, that is where they are—they are a footnote. He knows perfectly well, as we do, that in reality they are a huge and important issue. In judging how well this country is doing on this vital issue, surely we should look for the most comprehensive measures possible, not congratulate ourselves on progress against a narrow measure that simply excludes a whole set of carbon emissions that are just as damaging as the ones in the figures. That is not just a debating point or a claim that the Government pick the figures that look best and the Opposition pick the figures that look worst. We should be concerned about the real impact of CO_2 emissions, which are surely most relevantly measured against the broadest measure produced by the Office for National Statistics.

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Phil Woolas): I do not want to take up time, but I must say in response to a point that has been made in the debate and in national newspapers that the figures I gave, as I said at oral questions, related to greenhouse gases, not specifically to CO_2. The Government have always been clear about the difference.

Steve Webb: I fully accept the distinction, but given that CO_2 is the largest of the greenhouse gases by a long way, the Minister will surely be as disturbed as I am by the line in the NAO report that says:

"There have been no reductions in UK carbon dioxide emissions if measured on the basis of the environmental accounts."

The principal difference between the environmental accounts and the Kyoto figures is aviation and shipping. I accept there is an issue about British people overseas, but the exclusion of those factors is fundamental. On the more comprehensive definition from the Office for National Statistics, we have made no progress in 17 years, which is truly shocking. Against that backdrop, the Budget measures seem all the more timid.

There has been some discussion of what the hon. Member for East Surrey called indulgences—or the buying of credits. In a sense and at one level, the Secretary of State is right. What matters is that we get emissions down, and it could be argued that it does not matter so much where that happens, but in the long term buying credits puts off the day of transformation to the low-carbon economy that the hon. Member for Nottingham, South mentioned, while other countries make the necessary changes. If we believe that the situation is really urgent, what we do should be additional to what other countries are doing, as far as possible. We should not allow them to do it instead of us, because that just puts off the evil day.

Without the amendments in the other place, the 60 per cent. cuts proposed in the Climate Change Bill could have been entirely achieved by buying other people's CO_2 cuts. We would not have needed to cut our domestic emissions at all and we could still have satisfied the 60 per cent. target, and that is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Hurd: Do the Liberal Democrats therefore support a cap on the purchase of overseas credits, and if so what level would they put that at?

Steve Webb: I do support such a cap, and before the Bill reaches this House, I shall read the debates in the other place, in which their lordships agreed a figure of 30 per cent. I shall certainly oppose Government attempts to reverse that, but I have an open mind on whether it should be lower. The key point is that we need to lock into a low-carbon structural economy, and buying our way out simply defers that.

The other contextual point that I want to make is about the contrast between the bits and pieces—such as the plastic bags—and the fact that in almost the same week the Government encouraged expansion at Heathrow and Stansted. A whole new generation of coal-fired power plants, without carbon capture and storage, is likely to go ahead. Marginal changes are being made, but the whole thrust of policy in other areas, run by different Departments—that is a key point—is in completely the other direction. All hon. Members in their places today would probably wish more power to the Secretary of State's elbow. We wish that he had more influence on the Government, but so often his Department nibbles around the edges and does its best, but another Department comes trampling down the track and reverses that. That has to change.

I fully accept that green taxes are only one lever among many, but they work. I wish to cite—and I do not do this very often—a very successful Conservative initiative on green taxation in the 1980s: the switch to unleaded petrol. Actually, that was a green subsidy, not a green tax—a differential in favour of unleaded petrol. At the start of the 1980s, who would have thought that by the end of the decade cars that ran on leaded petrol would be oddities? It did not take long to change because the incentive structure was put in place. The same could happen with the vehicle excise duty tiering that we have heard about—

Kelvin Hopkins: Another example of a transformation that took place quickly and effectively was the switch from coal gas to natural gas. If there is a will, such things can be done.

Steve Webb: That is right, and such examples expose the timidity of the 2019 goals for various measures in the Budget. If we have drive and vision, these things can be achieved much more quickly, sometimes by mandate, as with the gas switchover, and sometimes by incentives.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for East Surrey about not using the cash from the VED change—the showroom tax—for other tax cuts, but my worry is that it stops. In other words, if I am thinking of buying a gas-guzzling luxury car, even a VED of £900—as opposed to one of £400—is neither here nor there if it lasts for only one year. Why not persist with it? Given that the purchase is the critical decision, why not keep the VED at that rate for the lifetime of the vehicle? That would send a strong signal and it would encourage manufacturers to start thinking about the new cars that they put on sale. That might lead to a much quicker transformation in what is offered.

The Secretary of State was right to point to the issue of best in class. There are very fuel efficient versions of almost every vehicle, be they rural 4x4s or family cars. It is not that people cannot have big family cars or 4x4s, but we need strong incentives for them to purchase the more fuel-efficient models. The incentive at the point of purchase would be much stronger if it were not a one-off hit, which is probably quite marginal to the cost of purchase.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman makes some interesting points. Is it Liberal Democrat policy to accept the levels that the Government propose but to make them annual, or does he think that the levels should also be raised?

Steve Webb: We certainly think that the increased VED should continue: it should not be a one-off hit. We also think that green tax, as broadly defined, should represent a significantly bigger share of the total tax take. As the hon. Member for East Surrey said, that should not be part of an overall tax increase, and green taxes should be used to cut other taxes. We have identified the standard rate of income tax that lower and middle earners pay.

This Budget takes the green tax share to 2.8 per cent. Ten years ago, it was 3.6 per cent. The share of green taxes has therefore fallen by about a third in 10 years. The proposed taxes are by no means swingeing new green taxes: they will not even fractionally reverse the decline in the past 10 years. Given that we have to raise a certain amount in taxation, surely it is common sense to raise that on pollution and the marginal choices that increase carbon emissions, rather than on income and the things that we want people to do. The present balance is wrong, and I do not understand why the Government do not address that. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South that the risk is that the Government will totally discredit the notion of green taxation, which is one of the key levers we have at our disposal.

How much green taxation was in the Budget? The Institute for Fiscal Studies says that by 2010 additional green taxation will be £1.8 billion a year. In the context of Treasury estimates of revenue, that is a rounding error. The Chancellor routinely revises his income and expenditure figures by far more than that every six months. The idea that the Budget contained some huge tax switch that will transform our battle against climate change is nonsense, and in his heart of hearts the Secretary of State knows that. The scale of what is proposed is simply not up to the scale of the problem.

We have heard of the endless deferral—to 2019—on new buildings. The schools programme has a target of 2016. The Department for Children, Schools and Families is rebuilding schools up and down the land, so for another eight years new schools, which will presumably stand the test of time for decades, will be built to inadequate standards, locking in sub-standard carbon performance. That should be dramatically improved—and quickly.

We have heard already about the small scale of the green homes service—£1 per household. The Secretary of State used to hold the same position at the Department for International Development. The British Government will clearly contribute worldwide to attempts to deal with the consequences of climate change, and we know that many of the poorest countries will be the first to suffer. Does he therefore share my view, and that of the leader of the Liberal Democrats, that our spending on alleviating the consequences of climate change should be additional to the 0.7 per cent. target and should not eat into it? Surely it would be a double penalty on the world's poorest people to say, "Actually, we were planning to spend money on clean water, education, disease protection and all those things, but we are not going to spend as much on them. Our actions of decades past are ruining your natural environment, so we will take a bit of the money that we were going to use to try to stop your children dying before the age of five to make sure that your earth doesn't flood." Surely, if 0.7 per cent. of GDP was a proper target for the humanitarian and infrastructure work that needs to be done anyway, the climate change mitigation work that we will do overseas should be additional. I hope that the Minister who responds to the debate will give us the Government's position on that.

I want to say a few things about the energy efficiency and fuel poverty aspects of the Budget. I intervened on the Secretary of State and queried some of the cuts in his departmental budget. Obviously, when it comes to energy efficiency, we have another example of that, which is the freeze on the Warm Front programme. The people who perform the home installations reckon that compared with the previous three-year period they will soon be able to do fewer houses. The cost is going up and the budget has been frozen in cash terms.

Warm Front is a highly impressive, highly effective programme. It is not without its flaws, but it is an excellent scheme. I am therefore concerned that cuts have been made. When we ask Ministers about that, they cite other schemes and initiatives, such as the carbon emissions reduction target—CERT—but that is not an adequate substitute. It is not as good, for a number of reasons. For example, it rewards a company for saving carbon emissions among its customers. However, a company gets a better return from saving carbon emissions for a big, wealthy customer with high carbon emissions than it does for a small consumer—perhaps a single pensioner living on their own. In other words, for a given amount of insulation, companies get more return by going for, in some cases, the more prosperous.

I know that there are minimum quotas, but they have gone down, too. I understand that the number who have to be in the target groups has gone from 50 to 40 per cent. and that the target groups have been broadened, which is crazy. We want the priority to be the fuel poor. The Government know who the fuel poor are, broadly defined—they certainly know who receives means-tested benefits. Companies in the CERT programme do not know which of their customers are on means-tested benefits, so they have to spend time, effort and money finding out or speculating about that, when the Department for Work and Pensions knows.

I hope that the Secretary of State's Department—[Interruption.] The Minister for the Environment says it is because of data protection. I quite understand that the Department for Work and Pensions cannot simply hand over benefit details, but why, for example, could not every recipient of pension credit receive a certificate, once a year, with their annual uprating statement? They used to get certificated housing benefit, entitling them to a rent rebate and to have their council tax paid. Why should they not receive a certificate of eligibility for Warm Front or CERT, or for whatever scheme happens to be running, that they take to their supplier? The supplier would not have to know which benefit they were on or what their income was. No databases would have to change hands. It is a relatively simple idea. The mailing is going out anyway. I am reassured that the Secretary of State is reaching for his fountain pen, and if it happens, I am happy to share the glory with him.

Hilary Benn: It is a felt tip.

Steve Webb: That will do.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): In fact, there is a precedent for a very simple system: the charitable gift aid process. Donors make a declaration based on their knowledge of their tax status without revealing their tax details to the charities. It works very well.

Steve Webb: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. There is probably a variety of ways of doing it, of which that is one. My central point is that expecting the fuel companies to try to identify their poor customers, when the Government already know—when one bit of government wants it done but another will not give that information—does not seem to be joined-up government.

I want to raise another point that might interest the Minister, about which something could be done quite quickly. We know that over the next 10 years or so the Government want everyone to have a smart meter. One of the key issues for me is the potential smart meters have to benefit the environment and tackle fuel poverty.

I have in mind what I would call a super-smart meter. The big worry about the domestic energy market is the alleged lack of competition. All sorts of investigations are going on, and consumers think that the companies all put their prices up together. Clearly, we want maximum switching and want people to go for the best tariff for them. We want energy efficiency tariffs and so on. If a smart meter records someone's actual consumption of gas and electricity, why should not the information be sent to a website such as moneysupermarket.com—it has to be a two-way flow of communication—so that it can look at all the tariffs and shop for the customer? The customer would not have to be online, web-savvy or anything like that. The smart meter would do it for them. It would come back and—it might have a Stephen Hawking-style voice—it would say, "It's EDF for you this quarter", or whatever else. In other words, it would match customers' circumstances with the optimum tariff and switch them to it.

The technology would probably be fairly straightforward. The company would need bank details—practical issues would have to be resolved—but instead of having managed methods of controlling the energy market and competition, it would almost be the economist's dream of perfect competition. We would have an almost infinite numbers of buyers, perfect information, negligible transaction costs and regular switching, which keeps companies on their toes. Fuel companies will hate it, because they will not have the stickiness that means customers stay with them when they should not. I say this to every Minister I meet, and I hope that at some point someone will take me seriously and adopt it. [Interruption.] I am pleased to hear the Minister for the Environment say that it is a good idea. I am grateful for that.

I have a couple of final observations. I listened with interest and a lot of sympathy to the hon. Member for East Surrey. I agreed with a great deal. I waited for the answer. He came up with some of the things that the shadow Chancellor has said, many of which are gimmicks. He asked where the green ISAs were. I travelled in by tube from Paddington to Westminster, and there is an advert that says, "Get your green ISA."

Gregory Barker: With respect, before the hon. Gentleman starts to criticise policy he ought at least to take time to understand it. A green ISA would be an extra amount in addition to the current ISA, which could be invested exclusively in companies at the forefront of green innovation and on course to meet our national CO_2 reduction targets. It is in addition to the existing ISA, not just another product. Perhaps he could take time to understand the idea before he attacks it.

Steve Webb: It clearly is a gimmicky idea, and I say that for a reason. There is a cost-benefit analysis for each measure, as we heard from the hon. Member for Nottingham, South. Each scheme has a cost and a return. The idea that the presumably higher rate tax relief for many investors delivers the best bang for the buck in delivering improved energy efficiency is extremely implausible. The investment will be made in tiny chunks. The scale of investment needed for such things is vast. A few thousand pounds will come in from, on average, relatively wealthy individuals at the cost of a hefty tax break. Essentially, such ISAs are tax breaks for the well-off. There are far better ways of spending that money that would benefit the fuel poor, such as home insulation. I put it to the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) that money spent insulating a poor pensioner's draughty house delivers a vastly better return for Government cash than tax breaks for high earners through additional ISAs.

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman does not grasp that we need to do all those things. Is he aware that there are 17 million ISA savers—albeit that most of them currently hold those accounts in cash because of the unfortunate economic situation? As there are 17 million ISA holders, they are not just the prerogative of the high-income few. This is about driving dynamic industrial change across our economy, making genuine change, driving capital markets and recognising excellence in British companies.

Steve Webb: There was an interesting elision—in fact, the hon. Gentleman corrected himself as he spoke. He knows full well that the majority of ISAs are cash ISAs. He is talking about a further tier of ISAs, so the savers who can make that additional contribution will, by definition, be the wealthiest. The poorest people cannot even reach the existing threshold. They would need thousands of pounds more. A relatively small proportion of ISAs are equity ISAs, and I will bet any money that a high proportion of the equity ISA holders tend, on average, to be higher income earners. This is potentially a highly regressive way of delivering marginal benefit. There are so many better and more efficient methods, but because the shadow Chancellor has no substantive policies, he goes for these grand gimmicks.

It was interesting to hear the hon. Member for East Surrey ask about the proceeds from the third round of emissions trading auctions. He posed the rhetorical question, "Where will the money go?" but he did not say what the Conservatives would do with it.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth rose—

Steve Webb: Can the hon. Gentleman tell me that the shadow Chancellor has said to him that the money can go on public spending? I should be very interested to hear a crystal clear answer to that question.

Mr. Ainsworth: I hesitate to intervene on the hon. Gentleman, because I sense that the House is getting rather tired of him. We have already said that we will use some of the proceeds from auctioning the permits to fund the feed-in tariff system.

Steve Webb: We are talking about a £9 billion windfall in the second round, and the third round of licences will presumably raise even more. Simply to say "some" when the amount could be between nought and £12 billion is far too vague for a party that has pretensions to government.

Kelvin Hopkins: I want to make a point in support of the hon. Gentleman. He says that investing in insulating poor people's houses is a much better way of spending money. There is an opportunity cost to both courses of action, but we should spend all the money on investing in poor people's home insulation, to the benefit of everybody.

Steve Webb: I certainly share the view that that is a priority, and it is an improvement that we can make now, rather than in 2019 or whenever. To draw together the threads of my speech, my priority is to stress the urgency of the situation. There is a mismatch between the grave tone of the rhetoric and the scale of the problem on the one hand, and the extreme modesty of the measures on the other.

I want to mention one other thing that can be done now. We know that even sober-suited organisations such as Ofgem have said that there is a £9 billion windfall for energy companies in the second round of EU emissions trading. It is a huge opportunity to spend money on the things that we have been talking about—home energy insulation and encouraging renewables—without increasing the tax burden. As the hon. Member for East Surrey says, we do not have to wait until the third round of EU emissions trading in 2012; the windfall in the current round could be used to encourage renewables through feed-in tariffs, which we support. The windfall could also be used for investment in carbon capture, which is another part of the mix. That would have been so much bolder, so much more effective, and so much more in line with the scale of the problem. We have had a huge disappointment. I hope that in years to come we do not rue the fact that we failed to take action now, and do not, as Nick Stern says, have to take much more expensive and dramatic action.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I want to speak about the Budget overall, but I shall start by giving my pennyworth on the environmental issues. First, I agree with the Secretary of State that the main tool the Government have is not the Budget but the Climate Change Bill, and I therefore look to him and the Government to agree to including much stronger carbon emission targets in the Bill.

Secondly, I welcome the 10 per cent. increase in air travel tax in the Budget; it is now the plane that is taxed, rather than the passenger, but we have to do more than that because air travel is a key source of carbon emissions, and we need to get a grip on the issue. The Government cannot increase the size of every airport, either. They have to curtail airport expansion as part of a proper climate change policy.

My third point is on traffic congestion. Again, the Chancellor was right to put a tax on the gas-guzzlers—the high-carbon vehicles—but the Government need to be more courageous on price, including petrol price, and on public transport. I know that there has been a big increase in public transport, and I welcome that, but more needs to be done. More investment is needed in green public transport; that is where the emphasis should be. We need to move away faster from oil-based fuels.

On energy efficiency, the priority must be that which the Government set in their early years in power—helping vulnerable people in their homes. We must go back to that target. I shall say a bit more about that in the main part of my speech. We should encourage combined heat and power schemes, the use of solar panels and microgeneration in new homes, and there should be lots of incentives for people to use those technologies in existing homes, too. We also need promotions encouraging people, in a sensible way, to use less energy. That is an important point, and we could start with public offices, where the lights are burned all day and night, unreasonably. They could set an example.

The final point I want to make in what I hope is a succinct summary of green issues concerns renewables. The emphasis has to be on renewables; I think that they are a national priority. They should be considered to be in the national interest, including when there are objections to them. Of course we will still need to give the issues proper hearings, but national interest should be a factor in decisions relating to renewables.

I now turn to my main comments on last week's Budget. The TUC called it

"a sensible Budget for the overall economy, but something of a missed opportunity to make real progress to a fairer society", and I agree with that assessment. When the Chancellor was interviewed on the radio the morning after the Budget, he said:

"We are where we are".

I now think of it as the "We are where we are" Budget. That was really an admission that he did not have a great deal of room for manoeuvre in the circumstances. Those circumstances include a possible world recession owing to the crises in the American finance and mortgage markets and very high oil prices. Maintaining economic stability in the UK in the face of that is essential, so it was a holding Budget, and in many ways I understand why.

However, when we consider where we are, we have to take into account the wasteful cost of the wars, including the war in Iraq, which contributed to high oil prices, and the unwise handouts given to private companies so that they can encroach on public services. That includes the almost £2 billion for the London underground that was wasted on Metronet. There has also been no proper check on the speculation by finance capitalists that engendered the current downturn. The horse has now bolted, but I still think there need to be controls on the credit and profits with which those finance capitalists can speculate.

To come back to the point about encroaching privatisation in the public sector, I would say that there is a heavy cost attached to private finance initiatives. There was a report in The Guardian online—I read it in my Library research fact sheet—headed "PFIs move offshore". It says:

"Billions of pounds of private finance initiative...including the refurbished Treasury headquarters in Whitehall and the new Home Office, have been moved off-shore by their City owners to avoid paying tax on their profits.

More than 50 PFI schemes have now been included in portfolios held in Channel Islands tax havens by three major PFI investment companies, HSBC Infrastructure, 3i Infrastructure and Babcock and Brown Public Partnerships"— not Prime Minister Brown, I presume. The article continues:

"Once the buildings have been completed, up to 90 per cent. of the ownership of the UK-registered company running the PFI is transferred to the companies which are based in the tax havens. This means that the income and profits from running the PFIs will be free of UK tax for up to 40 years, depending on the duration of the PFI."

If the people concerned are not to pay tax, that is a scandal that the Government must get to grips with. In addition, extortionate, exorbitant amounts are charged for any changes to PFI contracts, as was pointed out in a recent National Audit Office report. Millions are being charged. The contracts are not even being tendered; they go straight to the existing PFI contractor, and that has implications for the green agenda, because in time we will want to change the buildings concerned and make them more green-sensitive. The PFI contract owners will have us over a barrel and will charge what they like. The Treasury has to look at that aspect of PFI.

I started with the issue of fairness and I return to it now. I support a non-dom tax on the super-rich who turn up to make profits out of Britain without living here. Such a tax is reasonable. However, the Chancellor said that he would look to close the loopholes. I have been in the House a long time and I have heard that said in virtually every Budget. As the TUC points out, big companies and the super-rich use plenty of loopholes to avoid paying their proper taxes.

I refer the House to the booklet "The Missing Billions: The UK Tax Gap", which was written by the accountancy and tax specialist Richard Murphy. He looked at 50 top companies and says that their effective corporation tax rate is 22.5 per cent., not the 30 per cent. agreed by Parliament. He says:

"The fifty largest companies almost always pay 5 per cent. less tax on average than they declare in their accounts."

He goes on to say that in the seven years to 2006, those companies' effective tax rate fell by 0.5 per cent. each year. The leaflet shows how super-rich individuals avoid paying their fair share of tax and that £3.2 billion is lost by turning earned income into investment income, which is taxed more favourably, or by shifting the income to others, such as spouses, in lower or nil tax bands. Another £3.8 billion is lost because transactions are moved out of the UK; £0.5 billion is lost by turning income into a capital gain and £4.8 billion is lost from various kinds of tax planning.

The leaflet says that half the amount lost to tax avoidance could raise the level at which the higher rate tax starts being paid by £10,000 a year. That would offer significant help to those on middle incomes. The same amount could increase the state pension by 20 per cent., reduce income tax by 3p in the pound or build an extra 50 hospitals a year. Half the amount lost to tax avoidance could do one of those things. The leaflet goes on to call, as does the TUC, for the introduction of a new "general anti-avoidance principle" to make it easier to tax the super-rich and the large corporations. I certainly support that.

We have had a debate on energy companies, and I welcome the Secretary of State's response to my intervention about prepayment meters; I note that there is an iron fist in the glove on that issue. I certainly hope that there will be a requirement for energy companies to help vulnerable groups. Bearing in mind their high charges and high profits, those companies got off lightly in this Budget. One in six—more than 4 million—households in this country suffer from fuel poverty, and I am told that that number is going in the wrong direction.

I turn back to the issue of the rich getting richer. The Fair Pay Network has produced an interesting report that points out that half of poor British children live in a working household. The report states:

"Pay rates at the top of the labour market have become obscene. 54 billionaires who are based in Britain are estimated to have paid just £15 million in tax last year, on earnings of some £126 billion. Some 4,000 City employees were awarded bonuses of £1 million or more—and most will have found some way to shelter their riches from the 40 per cent. tax rate that should apply to them. YET: 1½ million children in poverty belong to households that pay full Council Tax."

The Government are right to use work as a way out of poverty, but

"57 per cent. of poor households are working households, up from under a half (47 per cent.) a decade ago."

The report also states that

"the public sector remains the largest employer of low-paid workers aged 25 or over...64 per cent. of low-paid workers in Britain are women...Poverty in the UK has a female face, and we have the largest gender pay gap in the EU...a woman in Britain has a 14 per cent. higher chance of being in poverty than a man."

It then makes the point that I mentioned earlier:

"the total number of poor children in working households has stayed exactly the same in the last 10 years: 1.4 million."

That record is not good enough for a progressive Labour Government.

Before I come to how taxes are spent, I should say that I support the increases for boozers and smokers, as there are good health reasons behind them. However, progressive measures should not necessarily—or solely—be paid for through taxes on boozers and smokers. Those who have got millions in City bonuses should be paying a fairer share.

There is much to be praised in the Budget: I like the £200 million in the next three years towards achieving the target that no school should have fewer than 30 per cent. of its pupils getting five A* to C grades at GCSE. That is a good measure that will help schools in my constituency of Leyton and Wanstead. I also welcome the boost to pensioner households from the rise in the winter fuel allowance. Furthermore, the pension credit rises to a guaranteed £124 for a single pensioner and £189 for a pensioner couple, and 6,000 pensioners are being taken out of income tax.

However, Age Concern's parliamentary briefing is worth reporting to the House. It states:

"there are still 1.8 million older people (17 per cent.) living in poverty in the UK...The Government have a target to end fuel poverty for all vulnerable households by 2010 which they have already had to acknowledge they will not reach. The trend is accelerating in the wrong direction: the number of older people in fuel poverty is likely to have more than doubled in the last 4 years alone."

The organisation calls for a reversal of "last year's damaging cuts in funding for the Warm Front scheme."

By the way, the Budget briefing for Labour MPs keeps stating, in addition to whatever is in the Budget, that there is free central heating for pensioners. There is no free central heating for pensioners. There is the Warm Front scheme, which is to be praised; however, that was cut back and people have to go through a lot of hoops to get it. Let us alter that briefing—or, better still, let us have free central heating for pensioners, if that is what we want. I do.

Age Concern goes on:

"Once again Council Tax Reform is notable by its absence. Council Tax has nearly doubled since 1997, whilst the Basic State Pension has only increased by 40 per cent."

It also states:

"The Government should act on Lyons' recommendations" that there should be automatic receipt of council tax benefit. That should be implemented as well.

The briefing points out that there should be "a firm and steady date for the restoration of the earnings link in the state pension."

I agree, and it should come sooner rather than later.

Kelvin Hopkins rose—

Harry Cohen: I shall give way in a moment.

As the briefing points out, if the Tories had not abolished the link in the 1980s and it was still in place, the basic pension would be £50 a week higher than it is today.

Age Concern's final point is as follows:

"The Government has promised to re-link the state pension to earnings by the end of the next parliament, but this is far too long to wait. Unless the Government intervenes, the real value of the basic state pension will fall to a dismal £81 (in 2007-08 earnings terms) by 2012."

I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins).

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend has made my point for me.

Harry Cohen: Okay.

I come to the last relevant issue, which is child poverty. This should have been the Budget to have made inroads into our target to eliminate child poverty. I welcome the £20 for the first child from April 2009, the rise in the child tax credit to £50, and the discounting of child benefit income in calculating eligibility for housing benefit and council tax benefit. The Chancellor said that that would take 250,000 children out of poverty. However, as the Work and Pensions Committee, on which I sit, has reported, 1 million children must be taken out of poverty to meet the 2010 target. That is pre-housing costs; after housing costs, there would be 1.5 million such children.

I welcome the discounting of child benefit for council tax benefit and housing benefit, but why was that not set for October 2009, not April 2009 like the other changes? That will have an administrative cost for local authorities, and it will engender some confusion. I ask the Government to rethink that and put it back to April 2009 with the other changes. I welcome the increase in tax credits. More needs to be done, but that is also the case as regards in-work benefits, equal pay, a London living wage, and targeted benefit increases for families with someone who is disabled.

This is a flawed Budget, although it has lots of good parts. It is a holding Budget for the economic situation in which we find ourselves, and a steady one in the circumstances. It is the best option on offer among the political parties. Interestingly, the Conservatives did not put forward a single proposal, and there is already talk of their leader flip-flopping on some of the commitments, or near-commitments, that he has made. Nevertheless, for Labour Members it still falls far short of what is required, while the money for war and handouts to private capital go unrestricted, with catastrophic and expensive consequences.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): It has been interesting to be present at this debate, which is a bit like "Groundhog Day". We had a themed debate rather like it as part of the European scrutiny process, and we will doubtless have a similar debate on Second Reading of the forthcoming Climate Change Bill.

We have seen the three Front-Bench spokesmen all tiptoeing towards the proposition that people should have to pay more for their energy but understanding, as politicians, that that is an extremely difficult thing to sell to them. We have three variants. The Government's view is that this is probably the least bad excuse to use for raising more money, because they are desperately short of money; Conservative Front Benchers are saying that green taxes should be entirely balanced by other tax cuts so that people would be able to afford them, assuming that the distribution was fair; and the Liberal Democrats are in their usual muddle saying that there is a bit of this and a bit of that, but undoubtedly wanting to tax people more—rather more, I suspect, than the Government.

The tragedy of all this is that those who want to redistribute income cannot guarantee to do it effectively by this particular route. People on low incomes need access to energy and transport just as people on high incomes do, so the Government are driven back on proposals in the Budget to have a one-year increase in the amount of fuel payment assistance for pensioners. That goes a little way towards helping, and other methods will need to be developed if the political classes decide to carry on with accelerating the progress of the market and having ever-dearer energy. We have already seen in recent months a huge energy price signal sent by the big increase in oil prices and the attendant changes in gas prices, coal prices and so forth. If the political classes want to accelerate that process even further by separate carbon levies, carbon trading with artificial prices and other regulatory and tax costs, more work will have to be done on how to do something about the fairness of distribution of those tax-rises and cost rises, and there will have to be ways of offsetting those so that people on low incomes do not feel that they are taking a disproportionate share of the burden and are the ones who are deprived of transport and home heating.

Kelvin Hopkins: The right hon. Gentleman seems to be putting forward a rather socialist message, which I welcome, in suggesting that tax should be progressive rather than regressive. What about taxing the rich a lot more and insulating poor people's houses?

Mr. Redwood: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows me well enough to be aware that that is not my view of the world. More people can be got out of poverty and into work by moving generally towards lower taxes than towards higher taxes. However, I was making a specific point on the content so far of today's Budget debate and reminding all those involved in policy formation that one cannot simply carry on with the idea that extra taxes, extra levies and extra regulatory costs can be heaped on to energy without having consequences not only on the rich but on the poor and without needing to have some kind of alternative package. If we are not careful, we just end up with massive administrative churn costs because of the imposition of a lot of administrative costs in raising the levy, the charge and the tax, and then a lot more administrative costs in giving money back to people so that they can afford the levy, the charge and the tax, and we do not achieve what we are trying to achieve. I rather like green promotion in the form of lower taxes for better behaviour. It is good that we have already heard that that worked, as it did very quickly, when we did it for unleaded petrol, which showed that people prefer an incentive to tax increases.

It is important that people listening to our debates, as I hope that some still do, understand that we know that a very big financial crisis is under way in the world and that that crisis has moved on at breakneck speed during the course of the Budget debates. We heard a few brief remarks from the Prime Minister in his statement earlier, but we have not yet had the benefit of Treasury Ministers explaining in this House how they responded to the Bear Stearns catastrophe and the rescue that has been mounted so quickly and successfully in the United States of America; nor have we had from them proper comment on the actions being taken to co-ordinate putting liquidity into markets and seeing the market through the crisis.

In the Budget speech, the Chancellor rightly had a paragraph or so of reference to the world financial background, explaining that it was bleak, but he claimed, with a hint of complacency, that the UK is uniquely best placed to deal with this crisis. We should try to ensure that the Chancellor and his colleagues have thought through the gravity of the world situation in which we find ourselves and the way in which, in some circumstances, the UK is not uniquely well placed but has its own home-grown problems, which we need to take very seriously. After all, it would be foolish to be complacent given that it was the United Kingdom that had the first run on a retail bank—and, I am pleased to say, the only run; let us hope that it turns out to remain so—whereby retail depositors were so worried that they were rapidly pulling out their deposits, which is what finally triggered the intervention and action over Northern Rock. Bear Stearns is a different kind of run by a different type of investor and depositor—equally lethal but not as telegenic and not affecting people on low incomes as the Northern Rock run visibly and clearly did.

We should ask why, over that long and difficult, and rather cold and wet summer, the British authorities were unable to take pre-emptive action of a kind that might have prevented the Northern Rock crisis from developing as rapidly as it did. I am not jogging backwards—I was writing and saying this at the time.

[Mr. Redwood]

It was clear to the markets in London in August, if not July, that there was not enough money in circulation, and clear to those watching the markets that there was the potential for a financial disaster or a banking problem. I did not write down the names of the banks that were being mentioned at the time, but Northern Rock was the one that people most feared for, and it was widely rumoured in the markets. It would have been crass to mention it because the last thing that one wants to do is to play any small part in helping to undermine an important institution, crucial as Northern Rock has been to the success of the north-eastern economy and crucial as it is to all the small shareholders and depositors particularly concentrated in the Newcastle and wider north-eastern region.

The Bank of England was placed in an extremely difficult position in August and September. The reforms of 1997 had left it ill-placed to understand the nature of such a banking crisis and to be able to respond positively to it. My first recommendation is that the Chancellor urgently look again at the regulatory and banking control framework that he inherited from the 1997 reforms and that he come to this House rapidly to introduce proposals for their improvement and updating.

A central bank is more than a regulator. A good central bank is more, even, than a hands-on referee in a free-flowing game. It is a player in the money markets that it has to supervise, and has to keep liquid, honest and successful. The problem for the Bank of England in August and September, when the money market participants could see that there were difficulties, was that, since 1997, it has lacked two important flows of information that most central banks regard as normal. First, a central bank needs to know everything that the Government are doing.

The Government are usually one of the biggest operators in the money market—particularly a heavily borrowing Government like the present one—and the timing and nature of debt that the Government issue is crucial to the functioning of the market. In 1997, the then Chancellor nationalised the function of running the Government's debt by taking it out of the Bank of England and putting it into the Treasury. The modern Bank does not have the same minute-by-minute detailed sight of or responsibility for Government business in the market that it had prior to 1997.

The second big problem that the Bank of England has is that prior to 1997; it was the day-by-day banking supervisor of all commercial banks, particularly the main credit-creating clearing banks that run our system. The Bank could see all of that business, and knew about it day by day, hour by hour and minute by minute. It had a close relationship with those banks—the famous Governor's eyebrows would rise wisely or angrily if anything went wrong. The Bank knew whether they were liquid enough, whether they had squared their positions early enough in the day and whether they were taking a sensible position in the markets, so the banking system worked well.

That responsibility was lifted from the Bank and given to the Financial Services Authority, and is now handled through a tripartite arrangement with the Chancellor and the Bank of England. When the crisis struck, it was always likely that it would be more difficult to control and resolve because the principal central bank player did not have all the regular information or history and knowledge of marketplace activity that a central bank should have. That is why I warned, in an economic policy report that I wrote for the Opposition, that we had a weak structure in Britain, and that when there was a financial difficulty—I did not forecast Northern Rock, but I had something like that in mind—things would go horribly wrong because the Bank no longer had those important powers.

The next curious matter is that just prior to the run on Northern Rock, the tripartite system clearly misread the situation very badly. Both the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank of England made fierce speeches in which they said that the banking system in Britain had made lots of mistakes by lending too much money to the wrong people, and that it had to meet the consequences of those mistakes—there would be no bail-outs. That would be a heroic thing to say at the best of times; in practice, no Government can allow a major bank to go bust in our global system because many poor and rich people would suffer badly, and there could be a systemic crash throughout the world. It was particularly odd, however, to make such statements when they must have known that they were on the verge of a difficult crisis over Northern Rock, with a possible run on the bank. They had to eat their words a matter of hours later when the run got out of control and the Chancellor said not only that he would guarantee all the deposits in Northern Rock—big though that task was—but the deposits of any bank found in a similar position, leading some to speculate who else in the markets he might have in mind. There was a worry that the run on Northern Rock would lead to a run on other institutions, which there is no need to name here. It is good that we are through that part of the crisis, that there is such a guarantee and that the tripartite system understands that it has to stand behind the banking system.

The guarantees, offers made and the nationalisation of Northern Rock now going ahead have not solved the problem, however. We are now in what some call the second leg of it. I do not think that the problem has legs; it is a continuing problem that will take some time to resolve, and we have just had another nasty chapter in the story—or drama, if you like—with the collapse of Bear Stearns on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. Bellingham: My right hon. Friend speaks with a great deal of expertise, but would he agree that one of the interesting features of the scenario is that the business models of Northern Rock and Bear Stearns had one item in common? The level of deposits in both were low compared with the amount of money lent out to customers and the wider market. However, in the American case, the Federal Reserve intervened incredibly quickly and expeditiously, without any fuss at all, which stands in stark contrast to what happened here. In this country, the taxpayer, as my right hon. Friend rightly points out, is still heavily exposed.

Mr. Redwood: The speed of reaction shows an important contrast. I am pleased that the Bear Stearns rescue took place as quickly as it did because the scope for further collapses and bear raids on other American banks was considerable, and it is good that the American authorities responded strongly and positively because there would have been knock-on effects across the Atlantic on British institutions.

The American authorities are behaving rather differently from those in the UK. The American authorities believe the crisis to be so serious that they need to do two things: first, they need to keep driving interest rates down, and secondly, they need to continue making large sums of money available to keep the banking system liquid. In the UK, the authorities seem reluctant to move interest rates down because of the persistent but historic inflation we have to live through because of past monetary excess and difficulty, and they are making little money available—although they do occasionally make a co-ordinated effort to help to keep the banking system a little more liquid, as we saw in recent days. We need to ask why the matter is being dealt with in different ways, and which is right.

Critics of the Americans say that it is crass to lower interest rates because there is still an inflationary problem, and they go on to say that lowering interest rates will not make any difference because it is not that kind of crisis. Of course lowering interest rates makes a difference; the crisis is due to the fact that some people cannot afford to pay the interest on their debt and repay their loans. If the cost of the loans is lowered through a lowering of the general interest rate—a lot of the loans are linked to that rate—the process would be a bit easier. Some people will not go bust and some will still be able to afford their homes.

It is a bit odd that people are down on sub-prime lending. I would have thought that some in this House would have been overjoyed that people had come up with a way of letting the poor buy a home. Is that not rather a good thing to have done? It is a great pity that the process was overdone and that those involved did not back off sooner and realise that they needed controls that were a bit tighter, but we do not want to bring the whole edifice down and say that poor people can never borrow money to buy a home. Surely it is good news if the lower interest policy in the United States can see some people through this difficult period.

Martin Horwood: Is not one of the problems with the sub-prime business model that it factors in the cost of debt recovery? In other words, it is based on an assumption that many of the people they are targeting will not be able to afford the repayments that they are being offered. Does that not border on the immoral at times?

Mr. Redwood: All banking factors in the probability that some people will not be able to repay. There is not one single sub-prime business model, but lots of different business models for those making loans to people who are a bit hard up. Of course making loans to those who are hard up is more difficult than making loans to those who are rich, but there are not enough rich people, and there are not enough rich people who want to borrow, so it is necessary to lend quite a lot of money to those who are hard up. The art of banking is in deciding how much one can offer and under what conditions. If the authorities can see more of those poor people through by making sensible interest rate adjustments, I say, "Thank goodness for that", rather than, "Serves them right—let's keep the interest rates high, push more of them under and put them back into the trailer park." That is not a particularly nice thing to do.

Will the policy be inflationary? I find it difficult to understand how people can say that the American authorities are irresponsible to cut interest rates because that will cause inflation, while at the same time they say that America is already in recession—a questionable proposition—and that it will have a hard landing in a very bad recession. If America is going into a bad recession, bankruptcy, unemployment and falling prices, not inflation will be the problem. The crash in house prices will extend to other goods and assets. I am therefore in favour of lowering interest rates in the conditions that we are considering to try to save something from the mess.

Should more money be made available to the banking system? The answer is simple: of course it should. Whatever people think of bankers—I know that several hon. Members are not best friends with bankers or have various political causes on which to fight them—one cannot live in a modern, sophisticated economy without them. We need people who assess risk, make loans and so on. If they get it catastrophically wrong and we push them all under, we simply make our lives worse, too. There must be moderation in the response, and understanding that we must see enough banks and lending through the crisis so that, if we handle it properly, normal life can be resumed and reasonable economic growth can continue. Money must therefore be made available to the banking system.

That brings me to my next policy recommendation to the Government. One reason why UK authorities cannot do much to make the system more liquid is that too many of the resources of the Bank of England and the Treasury have been expended on nationalising Northern Rock. The sooner the Northern Rock position is unwound, the better because our nation and our monetary authorities cannot afford to have so much tied up in a single, medium-sized—by international or even national standards—mortgage bank. Although the sum of money is small in world financial markets, it is large to the British taxpayer and the Government, and certainly to the Bank of England.

When the Bank of England mounted its rescue of Northern Rock, the former was only 40 per cent. of the size of the latter. It was therefore impossible for the Bank of England to mount a full rescue by itself and that is why—I presume—the Treasury got involved and there had to be proper Treasury guarantees and promises. Taking on something the size of even Northern Rock—a relatively small bank by international standards—required the whole weight of the consolidated fund of the UK and the Government's money-raising powers. The Government therefore need to accelerate the process of either running off the business or developing new business under whatever model the managers can devise so that we get the £25 billion back as quickly as possible. The Bank of England would thus have a better profile of assets and liabilities again, and more money with which to play in the markets.

In the meantime, perhaps the Government should consider the financing of the Bank of England money market operations, because I do not believe that it is playing with enough money, and it needs to have a bigger cash reserve available to keep the banking system more liquid during the difficult times. It will not be easy. I am an optimist and I believe that we can get to the other side, but it will require a more intelligent approach by the British authorities than they employed in August and September, and more weaponry in the form of lower interest rates and cash availability in the UK, just as enormous firepower is required in the United States as it, in the eye of the storm, tries to make its way through it more quickly.

The general problem is over-indebtedness worldwide, especially in the American, British and similar economies. The good times were a period of easy credit, when the authorities on both sides of the Atlantic kept interest rates a bit lower than was sensible and either encouraged or turned a blind eye to the most massive build-up of debt under new types of debt obligation and debt structure, which we had not previously experienced. In a way, the regulators fuelled much of that. The Basel rules of capital adequacy told all sensible banks that wanted to grow quickly and increase their profits, "Do so off balance sheet." The rules encouraged—in a way, forced—them to do that. Surprise, surprise, the banks went for massive off-balance-sheet financing.

Now, many in the Government and elsewhere have become critical and say that perhaps off balance sheet was overdone and not properly appraised and controlled. However, the Government are up to their neck in the off-balance-sheet operation because they are the biggest exponent by a mile of such financing in the UK. In the Red Book, the Government show roughly £500 billion of borrowing for the state in an economy of about £1,300 billion. The Government state that they are keeping their debt to around 40 per cent., which is the target that they set themselves.

When I last did the sums and considered the UK in the way in which a finance director would have to examine it to stay out of jail when reporting, rather than by using the Government's method, I concluded that the British state's true indebtedness is £1.3 trillion—£1,300 billion or 100 per cent. of GDP. I reached that conclusion because of the huge unfunded pension liabilities and the large pension deficits in the state sector, the private finance initiative and public-private partnership obligations, publicly owned companies, such as Network Rail, whose debt should be part of the state sector, and now, of course, the full consolidated sum for Northern Rock. Just as Northern Rock consolidated the whole of Granite, so the Government, having acquired Northern Rock, should consolidate the whole of it.

There is, therefore, a large debt on the state sector books, but much of it is suppressed from the general public gaze because of the accounting conventions that the Government deploy, which are so different from those that are required of the private trading sector. The Government need to start reducing their debt burden and demonstrating that they are serious about helping to unwind the debt crisis, taking a different attitude to PFI, PPP, off balance sheet and guarantees of trading companies, into which they entered so liberally in recent years. That would send a good signal and create a bit more financial capacity, which would help the state sector in all sorts of ways. It would help not least the money market, which would have a little more leeway if there are squalls ahead in the private banking sector, which need liquidity or financial instruments to be traded in open market operations.

The Budget was the most extraordinary non-event because it dealt with moving a few hundred millions around in a £1,300 billion economy. I am happy that the elderly will get a bit more help with their fuel bills. One would expect a Secretary of State or a Minister from the relevant Department to make such a statement. One would also expect it to be a good news item. However, Budgets are about influencing the general direction, shape and size of the British economy. If a Chancellor currently wishes to make a decisive impact, the Budget must move around £7 billion, £10 billion or £15 billion. Several billions must be involved if the Chancellor is to have any impact other than a nice warm glow and a few pence in the pockets of a target group that he may wish to woo on Budget day.

The Budget was pre-empted by the supplementary estimates that went through the House last autumn and, more recently, last Monday. From memory, the supplementaries added up to an astonishing £22,000 million of additional spending. Some of that may be good spending and a little of it may be policy change, but most is testament to the fact that the Government have lost control of their public spending. They tell us one thing on Budget day about what they will do and the balance between spending and revenue, then, towards the tail end of the year, in November and March, they set out colossal sums of money and say that, Department by Department, quango by quango, by big or little numbers, huge overruns have occurred. The figures go through automatically, without debate, yet they are far more significant—they will make an impact on the economy—than the measures mentioned in the Budget.

I therefore recommend to the Government that, to try to get the British economy through the extremely difficult period in world finance, we need proper expenditure controls, Department by Department. We also need the side of the Treasury that the Chief Secretary leads to have much more of a grip on and daily information flow about what is happening and what is going wrong in order to intercept the overspends earlier, emphasise that they are unacceptable when it is still possible to do something about them and redouble the efforts, which are stated to be part of the Government's policy in the Budget, to root out the abundant waste, inefficiency and incompetence.

We are now at the point where over-borrowing and indebtedness in the public finances are so gross that we need a complete staff freeze at the administrative grades. That should not apply to teachers, nurses and doctors, of course; indeed, we need to continue recruiting as many as we can afford. The general civil service and the quangocracy, however, is now extremely bloated. We need a control on numbers and we need to start slimming them down by natural wastage. I do not want to fire people—that is expensive and unpleasant, and not a nice thing to have to do—but I want to start shrinking the numbers on the public payroll quickly.

We need pension reform for new people coming into the public sector at all levels, because the gap between public and private pension costs is extremely in favour of high-cost public sector provision. Above all, public sector pensions will be difficult to afford in the years ahead and are swelling the big deficit on any accurate and honest balance sheet, if we were ever to get one from the Government.

We also need proper control over the use of management consultants and outside advisers of all kinds, which has got completely out of control. We need proper controls over the use of property. It would be a good idea to spend to save on energy, which is topical, given the theme of this debate. We just need professional management, Department by Department, which can start to flush out the excess billions of waste, incompetence and overrun, which the supplementary estimates pick up year after year, but which get so little debate or reporting.

That is a series of positive proposals for a nation battling with a world financial crisis, elements of which are made in Britain, and where parts of the British predicament make responding that much more difficult. I hope that the Government will listen seriously on the need to reform their handling of money markets before there is another disaster or mess. We cannot afford another one, and it was a very expensive rescue that had to be mounted. I hope that the Government will start to tidy up Northern Rock lending as quickly as possible, because that is money that we could not afford to have outstanding, and there are easy and simple ways of getting quite a lot of that money back more quickly.

I hope that the Government will realise that every penny in those supplementary estimates will be borrowed, because nobody came to the House and said, "We've had £22 billion of supplementary estimates, so we need £22 billion of extra taxation." We should at least be thankful for that, but there should not have been £22 billion of extra spending. We need to get to grips with that and start rolling back unnecessary spending, so that we can have the Government under some control again.

Above all, we need the Government to understand that although there is too much borrowing and some of it has to be squeezed, that means doing something at home, in the Government account, as well as just blaming private sector banks in America. It is partly the Government, by going along with the over-borrowing, the off-balance-sheet routes and the clever financing, who have helped to fuel the very crisis that they now say we can ride out more successfully.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I am delighted to take part in this debate on the Budget resolutions. I am pleased, too, to follow the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who entered the House when I did, in 1987. We have both aged gracefully together and we have both acquired spectacles, although he has kept some of his hair. I am afraid that mine has disappeared. Perhaps he spent a little longer in government than me, and perhaps that is why he was able to survive.

I want to praise the Chancellor, because I thought that the Budget was excellent. I am not one of those who feel that he ought to be more of a fun character. There was some press speculation after the Budget asking why he is so careful, and some people even suggested that he may be boring. However, I would much rather have a Chancellor like that than one who walks around with his face painted and a balloon attached to his lapel, ruining the Government.

The Chancellor gave us the right Budget for the right time. This is a time of great instability, as the right hon. Gentleman correctly said. Goodness knows what is happening to the global markets or the economies of other countries. It is right that we should have a carefully measured Budget to deal with the situation that we face.

The Chancellor was right to take the stance that he did in protecting and preserving Northern Rock. The right hon. Members for Wokingham and for Ross, Skye and Lochaber (Mr. Kennedy) will remember the closure of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, the sixth largest private bank in the world, on 1 July 1991. The then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Governor of the Bank of England and Prime Minister—I am not sure whether the right hon. Member for Wokingham was in the Cabinet at that stage—made the decision to close BCCI.

The bank is still in liquidation, 17 years later. People lost a great deal of money, because in the aftermath of BCCI's closure, the then Prime Minister, John Major, told everybody that it was completely bankrupt and that there was no money left. However, 87 per cent. of the money has been found and the depositors have been paid back most of what they had, although many have suffered greatly because it took so long to pay them back. The bankers—the employees—have found it difficult to find employment. A repetition of the catastrophe that was the closure of BCCI was avoided by the Government. The Chancellor was right to do what he did on Northern Rock, and I am glad that he took that action.

Kelvin Hopkins: May I strongly reinforce what my right hon. Friend is saying? I have a constituent who was an employee of BCCI who lost not only his job and his income, but his home, because he had a mortgage with the bank. He had a terrible time with ill health after that and the whole family suffered because a rescue was not put in place. Had he been even partially recompensed, he would have had a much better life.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In fact, he wrote to me about the case and I suggested that he write to the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, because the Insolvency Service was part of the old Department. In raising BCCI, I simply point out that the Government adopted the right approach this time. Of course it has cost the taxpayer a lot of money, but the alternative would have been catastrophic.

Mr. Cox: Surely the right hon. Gentleman is not comparing BCCI to Northern Rock. BCCI was riven with fraud from top to bottom, but Northern Rock is not in that situation at all. There was no option but to close BCCI, but there should have been swifter action to deal with Northern Rock.

Keith Vaz: The hon. and learned Gentleman is new in coming to the House and is therefore unaware of the campaigns that were prosecuted for two decades. BCCI was not full of fraud. If it had been full of fraud, the money would have disappeared. If he would listen to me, I just said that 87 per cent. of the money was in the bank. If he recalls the time—he is younger than I am, so he was probably at school—

Mr. Cox: I defended some of the people who were responsible.

Keith Vaz: Yes, there were some people involved, but that applies to any bank. However, the bank as a whole was not full of fraud, because 87 per cent. of the money has been found. The rest of the money found its way into the pockets of liquidators, who still proceed to liquidate the bank. That was the right approach. Whether there was some element of unsavoury activity—the hon. and learned Gentleman had clients at BCCI whom he defended—the fact remains that if Northern Rock had been closed, the consequences for those employed and those with mortgages would have terrible, and we would be hearing about what was happening to them year after year. Indeed, if Northern Rock was called "Southern Rock", the attitude of right hon. and hon. Members on the Conservative Benches would have been quite different.

I am pleased that the Chancellor put 4p on a pint of beer, 3p on a pint of cider, 14p on a bottle of wine and 55p on a bottle of spirits. That is partly because I do not drink alcohol, so the increases do not have a direct effect on me, but also because that was the right approach to take if we are to be serious about the health of the nation, as was the decision to put up tax on cigarettes and cigars. As the House knows, 50 per cent. of crimes in this country are alcohol-related. The Select Committee on Home Affairs has just begun an inquiry into the number of crimes committed by those under the influence of alcohol. What has shocked us in the evidence that we have received so far is the universal wish of the victims of such crimes for the Government to do more to tackle the availability of alcohol.

Kelvin Hopkins: I strongly agree with my right hon. Friend. Would he like to see an even stricter regime, perhaps involving a minimum retail price for alcohol based on its alcoholic content, and stricter measures to control the flood of cheap alcohol coming in from the continent of Europe?

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend again anticipates me; he is absolutely right. I shall talk in a few moments about supermarkets and about what happens on the other side of the channel.

Alcohol consumption has been rising steadily for the past 15 years. Figures suggest that one third of men and one fifth of women drink more than the recommended level each week, and alcohol-related deaths have more than doubled since 1991 to over 8,700 a year. The British Medical Association has stated that a 10 per cent. rise in price could cut such deaths by up to 30 per cent. Evidence from Finland suggests that that could be right. A 33 per cent. cut in excise duty there in 2004, introduced to deal with cheap imports, led to a 17 per cent. rise in alcohol-related mortality. We therefore welcome the Chancellor's decision not to reduce the price of alcohol.

Martin Horwood: Would the right hon. Gentleman have liked the Chancellor to differentiate more between beer—on which it is quite difficult to get drunk very fast—and spirits such as vodka and rum, which are used in the mixer drinks that seem to be causing a lot of the problems? I suspect that the same would have been true in Finland.

Keith Vaz: As I have said, I am not an expert on beer drinking, but I have seen many people get very drunk on beer. People can get drunk on beer, although I have never had the pleasure—perhaps I should not call it a pleasure—of being in that position. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. The Chancellor has not differentiated in that way, however; he has put the price up on all of them.

One of the witnesses to appear before our Committee will be Helen Newlove, whose husband was murdered in an horrific attack by youths who had been drinking heavily. Only last week, while launching a campaign called "Mothers in Arms" in The Sun, she urged the Government to do more to stop people drinking to excess. The British crime survey of 2006-07 revealed that 46 per cent.—nearly half—of all violent crimes were believed to have been committed under the influence of alcohol. That figure rose to 58 per cent. in cases of attacks by people unknown to the victim. In more than 1 million violent attacks, the aggressors were believed to be drunk. I therefore very much welcome what the Chancellor has done.

There is, however, an area in which the Chancellor could do more. I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) on the Front Bench. I believe that her title is Economic Secretary to the Treasury.

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): Exchequer.

Keith Vaz: The Economic Secretary to the Exchequer?

Angela Eagle: No, I am the Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury.

Keith Vaz: Great! I am glad that I have now caught up with the recent changes to the Government's lists.

The Government should do more in respect of what my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), as well as the chief executives of Tesco and Asda, have said. I am not normally in agreement with the chief executive of Tesco, bearing in mind the huge Tesco store that was created on the north-west side of my constituency and the fact that it does not always collect its trolleys on a Friday. However, he, and the chief executive of Asda, were right to say that the availability of cheap alcohol—which is virtually given away in supermarkets, although it is not entirely free—means that young people can either go in and buy it, or get other people to go in and buy it for them. I am afraid that the number of prosecutions of people involved in such activity has been very small. It is not just a question of putting up the tax on alcoholic beverages; we must also look at the role of supermarkets and other retailers.

I commend the Chancellor's proposals on pensions. The decision several years ago to raise the state pension by, I think, either 1p or 10p remains a blot on the history of this Government. That was a terrible error of judgment. The measures in this Budget are the right thing to do, however. It is right to raise the winter fuel allowance from £200 to £250, and from £300 to £400 for those over the age of 80. That is exactly the right approach to dealing with spiralling energy costs. It was right, too, to increase child benefit to £20 a week and to bring that forward by a year.

I shall not spend much time dwelling on the environmental aspects of the Budget, partly because the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs made such an eloquent speech that there is no need for me to repeat everything that he said. I very much agree with what he said, and I am glad that he had the opportunity to put forward those views. Like all hon. Members, I am deeply concerned about climate change, and about what Governments such as ours can do on their own without the support of economies such as India and China. My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) is the chairman of the all-party British India group. It is all very well to say to the Indian and the Chinese people, through their Governments, that they have to control their growth, while we—and the United States in particular—continue to do what we are doing and to make the ozone layer even thinner and the hole in it even bigger.

This Government are taking the right approach to climate change. I drive a Toyota Prius. I have done so for the last eight months, and I am glad that I bought it before all the Budget changes. I am sure that many people will now be rushing to buy these green cars. It also saves me a lot of money because I do not have to pay the congestion charge. I am not a walking advertisement for Toyota, but I believe that it is important that other car manufacturers follow its lead. The choice of such vehicles on offer at the moment is not that great, as we can see when the ministerial cars rush into Speaker's Court. Unfortunately, I have got into the wrong car once or twice, believing it to be my own, and surprising the Minister sitting in the front seat. The choice of such vehicles should increase greatly, to allow more opportunity for people to buy them.

This is an excellent Budget. It is the right Budget at the right time, given by the right Chancellor, and I wish the Government well in ensuring that it passes through the House without difficulty.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) got into the wrong car. His story reminds me of ministerial retirements, when the former Minister gets into the car but nothing happens. At least the right hon. Gentleman got into his own car eventually and drove off. It is always a pleasure to follow him in a debate. I listened to his maiden speech, and he has always been an assiduous campaigner on a number of issues. He touched on many different aspects of the Budget today.

I want to focus on two subjects that affect my constituency deeply. One is small businesses; the other is the plight of pensioners. As many of my colleagues have pointed out, this Budget was memorable for being very boring, and for having a great deal hidden away. For example, one of the most significant parts of the Budget was not even mentioned by the Chancellor in his Budget speech. That was the raising of the earnings ceiling for national insurance by £100 to £770 a week, which will mean that anyone earning more than £40,000 will pay an extra £520 a year. That stealth tax has been hidden away, and I wonder how many other horrors are lurking in the fine print. Perhaps this is not surprising, however, given that this country has the largest budget deficit in western Europe.

It is tough out there for small businesses at the moment. The report produced by the British Chambers of Commerce in March 2008 stated on page 5:

> "Small firms will be particularly vulnerable in an environment in which lenders become more risk averse. Even if official interest rates fall, small firms may find it harder and more expensive than in previous years to borrow. If you add these factors to the UK's growing regulatory burden—the cumulative cost of new regulation to business since 1998 is now nearly £66 billion—then SMEs are going to find it tougher to grow in the coming year."

The most recent quarterly survey of the small business trust looked into the barriers to growth, which are consistently cited by small businesses as taxation, employment regulations and business rates. It states:

> "For small micro-businesses, taxation is clearly the priority, followed by increased concern over late payment and bad debt. The small businesses employment regulations remain the main barrier to growth, then taxation."

Unfortunately, although on examination the Budget contains some small plus points for small businesses, at a time when those businesses are facing many serious challenges those plus points are not nearly beneficial enough to wipe out the minus points.

Of course we welcome the further £60 million allocated to the small firms loan guarantee scheme—an excellent scheme, brought in under the previous Conservative Government—which will support a 20 per cent. increase in lending. We also welcome the £12.5 million from the Treasury for a venture capital fund to back women-owned businesses. Furthermore, there is a new £30 million enterprise capital fund to help provide debt and equity finance for small and fast-growing businesses. The Chancellor, in common with previous Chancellors over the last 10 years, has said that the Government are now going to make a real effort to bear down on regulation. Well, we have heard that before. We are also to have a review of Whitehall procurement to see how the 30 per cent. procurement figure can be reached by small businesses.

All that is positive news, and although we are talking about a few tens of millions of pounds here and there—I do not begrudge it—those measures pale into insignificance when compared with the £1 billion hit that small firms will have to take as a consequence of the increase of 21 per cent. in the small firms corporation tax rate. We also need to compare any positive changes with what is happening on the capital gains tax front. CGT on business assets, as announced last year, is going up by 80 per cent. to 18 per cent. Despite the new entrepreneurs relief scheme announced by the Government, that is still very bad news indeed.

Small firms also have bearing down on them like an express train the Government's plans to hit income shifting or income splitting. Of course I welcome the delay until next year and the fact that there will be further consultation, but surely after all the Government have done to try and encourage husband and wife businesses and small businesses to incorporate, that is exactly what the Government should not be doing.

I am also very concerned, as is the whole small business community, about the plans announced in the Budget fine print to give tax inspectors the right to turn up unannounced to demand records at a premises without an official warrant. I find that very disturbing. I know that the Government are very keen to give tax inspectors the same powers as customs officials, but they perform very different roles. Customs officials can, quite rightly, bug telephones to intercept letters and e-mails in the fight against drugs and gun crime. I believe that giving tax inspectors this power of entry without an official warrant will undermine trust and confidence in the small firms sector. When combined with the Government's other plans to require banks, building societies and other third party operations to hand over customer records, we clearly have a recipe for the destruction of confidence in this sector and a worsening of its relationship with the Government.

Small businesses face many particular and difficult challenges in rural areas, so will this Budget help them at all? It may provide a small amount of help at the margin, but it certainly will not help those post offices whose closures are due to be announced later this week. In my constituency, there may be 17, 18, 19 or 20 small post offices closing, in addition to the dozens that have already closed in such areas and in addition to those already closed in towns under the Post Office urban renewal scheme.

We now hear in today's press that sub-postmasters will not get compensation if they offer within one year lottery or bill payment services or set up private mail or courier services. If they offer those services, they will not receive the compensation, which I find quite disgraceful. I am sure that Opposition Members who represent rural constituencies will feel the same—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Why are the Government restricting the trade of sub-postmasters when all they have left is their village shops and of course they want to offer other services?

I feel very strongly that it is not just post offices, but other businesses in rural areas that are suffering. Let us consider pubs or public houses, which are so often the focal point in villages. Up and down the country, 56 pubs are closing every month. They are being sold off for housing or for development and they are faced with many problems arising from the smoking ban, the availability of cheap drink in supermarkets, the impact of the breathalyser and so on. I am not saying that we should not have had some of those changes, but now is not a good time for the Budget's increases on beer, wines and spirits, which will hit pubs disproportionately and put extra pressure on public house trade.

If I look around my own constituency, I can find umpteen examples of pubs that have closed over the last few years. The Hogshead in King's Lynn high street closed recently, and in today's press, the Woolpack in the same town is reported as saying that trade is down by a third. There are many other examples of pubs threatened with closure, although there are one or two brighter lights. I opened a new refurbished pub last Friday—the Crown in Middleton, which has been bought by an entrepreneurially inclined publican who has three gastro-pubs. He has done a complete refurbishment in that pub and I was extremely impressed by the work he put in. I have no doubt that, with his determination and the staff's commitment, that pub will be a great success. On the other hand, the outlook is bleak and it will only get worse, thanks to the changes announced by the Chancellor in the Budget.

What about the elderly and pensioners in our constituencies? The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) made an excellent speech on that subject and his arguments were reinforced by the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen). Much of the very good work done by the Warm Front initiative has now been undone—so much so that 4 million households now face fuel poverty.

Many pensioners in my constituency—and in the constituencies of my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox)—are trying to budget more efficiently with pre-paid meters, but are penalised for doing so. That needs to be looked into further. I certainly agreed with the hon. Member for Nottingham, South when he said that the winter fuel payment increases were welcome, but were certainly not likely to make up for the continuing increases in fuel prices.

There is one other measure in the Budget that many pensioners in my constituency will find very difficult to understand—the abolition of the 10 per cent. income tax band, which will have a serious impact. Many pensioners who retired before 65 and are on modest incomes of between £5,700 and £16,500 will be seriously disadvantaged. On an income of £10,000 in 2007-08, they would pay £782 in tax, but the abolition of the 10 per cent. tax band will mean such a pensioner having to pay about £150 more. That is a lot of money for people on fixed incomes. Those are the same people who have been subjected to year-on-year inflation-busting increases in their council tax bills.

I do not blame Norfolk county council, the main precept raiser in Norfolk, as it has been asked to provide many more services and functions with less Government grant. It has been asked to take on those commitments and it is providing those services, but it has been faced with the invidious choice of either cutting services or putting up the council tax. It has gone for modest council tax increases, but year on year, those are inflation-busting. Of course, the increases will hit hardest of all those people on fixed incomes.

In my constituency, those people—the pensioners in particular—will also be hit by the closure of post offices. They have been hit, too, by the increase in motoring costs. Often, their one luxury is going down the pub. That is also being penalised, so their quality of life is deteriorating, but we heard nothing in the Budget that will put their minds at rest, certainly as far as the council tax is concerned. Therefore, I urge Ministers and the Secretary of State to consider devising a scheme to give pensioners a discount on their council tax. That is what my party offered at the last election, and indeed at the election before that. We offered a straightforward non-means-tested discount to pensioners, because we felt the council tax was simply far too great a burden for many millions of people up and down the country.

This has been an interesting debate so far, and it goes on, but as a number of my hon. Friends and Labour Members have pointed out, we live in frightening times. A characteristic of the 2008 Budget is giving with one hand and taking away with the other. Yes, the Government have tried to be green, but the hon. Member for Nottingham, South demolished their green credentials. I hope that I have shown that their small business credentials do not add up to a row of beans. Furthermore, there is little joy for pensioners.

Earlier today, the Prime Minister talked about regulating sovereign funds. Is it not ironic that this country does not have a sovereign fund? Norway has one, as do many other countries around the world. We cannot afford one. It is a sad indictment of the Government and their economic policies over the past 10 years that the fiscal, trade and budgetary positions are at such low ebb just when the sub-prime credit crunch and the worldwide recession are starting to bite.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the leader of my party, was quite right when he said that this Budget is characterised, above all else, by the general perception of the markets out there that the Government have no room for manoeuvre because they did not put money aside when times were good. Unfortunately, it is our constituents who will suffer, and they will do so because there is not that room for manoeuvre, not least to implement those green policies, which the Government promised us on so many occasions.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow so many good speeches. There are too many to mention, although I shall refer to one in particular: the superb contribution—someone else's description—from my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson). His mastery of the world situation and of the energy world is unparalleled in the Chamber. I am sure that no one feels uncomfortable about my saying that.

I was, 27 years ago, the joint author of a substantial booklet entitled "Energy—A Planned Policy" for the National and Local Government Officers Association. We wrote a lot about renewable energy, and one could read out chapters of that book now and they would sound current, because the things we are saying now we were saying then, all that time ago. We were beginning to become aware of the problems of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, and we knew that we had to change the way we produced and used our energy. We said all sorts of things at that time.

Depressingly, the money spent by the Government on renewable energy research was tiny at that time, and it was cut just after we published our pamphlet. All these years later, it is not so surprising that Germany has 360 times more installed solar capacity than we have—so much more capacity for a country that is not much bigger than ours—and 10 times more installed wind capacity. Those staggering figures showed that the Germans looked ahead, whereas we did not. We now realise that we are way behind and are trying to catch up.

We are an island surrounded by waves, so we have the potential for tidal power on the Severn and elsewhere—indeed, possibly on the Thames. We have wind power and all sorts of possibilities. This country is not that sunny compared with Africa or even southern Europe, but we have sufficient sun for solar energy to make a major contribution. However, we have not done that and we are trying to catch up.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has come back to the Chamber to listen to my speech, although he is perhaps here not specifically for that purpose and just happens to have returned while I am speaking. I hope that he will use his influence in the Cabinet to argue for much more radical renewable energy measures, to ensure that we start to make progress and try to catch up with Germany and the others who are so far ahead of us. We need to do so.

I want to talk more broadly about the Budget. Like others, I think it is a "wait and see" Budget. I think that the Chancellor looked over a chasm and thought, "I am not going to do anything too radical today, because tomorrow there may be all sorts of problems, depending on what happens in the American economy in particular." So, he has made relatively marginal changes—some of them welcome, and I applaud him for that—but done nothing very radical.

If, as seems likely, recession takes hold in America, spreads to the rest of the world and has some effect on us as well, the Chancellor may need to take more radical measures to deal with it, but if we have a recession of any kind, one should expect a spending deficit, because that is what happens in recessions. One does not want a tightening of fiscal policy at the beginning or in the middle of a recession. We should be relaxing fiscal policy, and we may need to do so.

We are now realising that we must re-establish the importance of all the levers of macro-economic policy and put them in the hands of the Government. Interest rates—in theory at least—are with the Bank of England, but it is unthinkable that the Bank would look at just the inflation rate and decide interest rate policies on that basis. It must consider the performance of the economy as a whole. Unusually, I agree with the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who said that the last thing one wants to do in a recession is raise interest rates to deal with inflation. Inflation will be ironed out by the recession.

Much more dangerous than inflation at such times is deflation, as the Japanese found in the 1990s. Falling prices and people abstaining from spending because they anticipate price falls can create a vortex that causes terrible damage to an economy. That must be resisted at all times. Apparently, the Japanese have as a national characteristic a compulsion to save all the time. In recessions, we want people to spend, not save. The Japanese Government apparently gave tokens to poor people to get them to spend—they would not spend money—but they started to save the tokens, so there was a serious problem. Deflation is much more worrying than inflation and the Government should ensure that the Bank of England does not start tightening interest rates at this moment. In my view, interest rates should indeed be considerably more relaxed.

One recent benefit that we have had is, at last, the beginnings of a fall in the exchange rate. I have argued for years that we should manage the exchange rate down to a much more competitive rate. Looking at the state of the balance of trade, it is clear that we have a structural problem, not a temporary problem. The exchange rate was too high and a permanent structural trade deficit was the result.

The exchange rate falling is naturally good for us, but that ought to be a deliberate instrument of Government policy, not just something that happens. I hope that the Government will welcome that fall in the exchange rate and press the Bank of England not to raise interest rates. If anything, they should press the Bank to reduce them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way to a former NALGO member. He talks about the need for a fall in the value of the pound, but in recent months it has fallen by about 15 per cent. against the euro. He suggests it should fall even further. Does not all that point up the correctness of the policy of the former Chancellor, who is now Prime Minister, to keep us out of the euro currency zone at any cost, by means of his five tests? Was he not right in that and proved correct in the face of all the new Labour opposition that he had to put up with?

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend, as he often does, anticipates one of the major aspects of my speech: to applaud the Prime Minister for keeping us out of the euro. It is unlikely that we will go into it now, but had we been stuck in the euro, we would not have depreciated and we would have been in much more serious economic trouble, so my hon. Friend is right.

The third lever of economic power is fiscal policy. People seem to be exercised a great deal by not only the fiscal stance—the balance between expenditure and income—but whether we should run a debt. One certainly should not tighten fiscal policy during a recession or difficult times—during a downturn in demand—but there are ways in which one can maintain a reasonable balance if one is prepared to tax in the right way. Rich people tend to save most of their money by putting it in banks—

David Taylor: Offshore.

Kelvin Hopkins: Sometimes they put their money offshore. Those people have a low propensity to consume, as it is called in the jargon, so taking a little bit more money away from very rich people does not damage demand in the economy a great deal. If that money is handed to pensioners, poor people and families with children, who tend to spend every penny that they get to live on, that helps to sustain demand in the economy. That is a simple way of keeping the economy going while not having too big a spending deficit.

We can deal with the situation, provided we are prepared to collect the money. My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) cited an excellent book produced by the TUC, "The Missing Billions: The UK Tax Gap", which sets out the amounts that could be collected, but are not. It estimates Treasury losses due to tax avoidance at about £25 billion a year, £13 billion of which is from individuals and £12 billion from the largest corporations. This tax avoidance is not illegal, although, as Denis Healey said:

> "The difference between tax avoidance and tax evasion is the thickness of a prison wall".

I will not pursue that, but some tax avoidance comes pretty close to tax evasion. If the existing rules were strictly enforced and there were sufficient tax inspectors to collect all the tax, we would rake in many more billions.

That is the situation without looking at indirect taxes. "Measuring Indirect Tax Losses—2007", a fine book produced in October by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, draws attention to the vast amounts of revenue lost, especially through VAT fraud. The VAT tax gap is about £13 billion. The book also examines tobacco and alcohol duties. Tobacco smuggling alone accounts for a loss of about £3.5 billion a year.

Large sums could thus be collected without changing tax rates at all. I have done a quick calculation, and although it might involve some double-counting, it shows that £56 billion a year is lost. Let us talk about a third of that sum: £20 billion a year, which would be extremely useful. We could use it to help pensioners and children more. We could spend more on investing in energy conservation and alternative energy. We could even close the budget gap a little more and reduce Government debt. If we collected that money, we could choose to do those things.

Harry Cohen: I also have a NALGO connection. My hon. Friend and I—he, like me, is an old class warrior—would like to see resources going to the working class. Will he comment on the link between the ultra-rich and the middle class? Given that there are so many loopholes and tax fiddles, the ultra-rich are virtually paying less than the strata just below them: the middle classes. The middle classes are picking up the burden.

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Many hon. Members will have read the "Green Budget" report by the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which points out that the bottom two deciles of the population have benefited slightly under our Government and the top two deciles have benefited fairly considerably. However, those in the middle have lost out, and one of the reasons is the gradual creeping down of the higher rate tax threshold. If that threshold had been raised—indexed, effectively—over time, many people who are paying 40 per cent. tax would not be doing so and would be better off. There are other factors that explain why those middle-of-the-road people—the very people whom all parties want to reward, because they tend to vote and to be the sort of people whom we want to persuade to vote for us—are not doing very well at the moment.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend talks about the very rich. Does he recall that the former right hon. Member for Hartlepool—now a European Commissioner—talked about new Labour being "intensely relaxed" about people becoming filthy rich? We heard an echo of that just a few days ago from the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform. Is my hon. Friend intensely relaxed about such comments from people at the top of our party?

Kelvin Hopkins: I am not at all relaxed about that. I have no envy in my nature at all, but I believe in justice. Social justice requires that the rich should pay a little bit more—a lot more, in fact—and that the poor should benefit from that extra taxation on the rich.

I remind Conservative Members of the tax regime that operated when Mrs. Thatcher won power.

Mr. Bellingham: Ninety-eight per cent.

Kelvin Hopkins: Under Denis Healey, the top marginal rate was 83 per cent. and there was a 15 per cent. surcharge for unearned income on top of that, so some people were paying 98 per cent. That was possibly a bit extreme—[Interruption.] They were difficult times. However, 40 per cent. is considerably lower than that. Nudging up the rate for the very rich would not be a bad thing.

David Taylor: Would my hon. Friend be surprised to learn that in the 11.5 years—those halcyon years, as Conservative Members often refer to them—when Mrs. Thatcher was Prime Minister, the proportion of gross domestic product taken by taxation was a full four points higher than it has been in the first 11 years of this Labour Administration, who, of course, have many years to run?

Kelvin Hopkins: I am surprised and disappointed. There is a lot of talk about child poverty. The proportion of children living in poverty in 1979 was considerably lower than it is now. We could deal with child poverty immediately, but it would take an act of great political will to redistribute income massively from the rich to the poor. However, that is not impossible. In Sweden, child poverty is a fraction of that in Britain. I ask the Ministers present, especially those from the Treasury, to think about that. I do not expect it to happen overnight. However, we should aim to achieve it quickly, hopefully before the next election, because I am sure that we would be rewarded electorally for such action.

I want to say a little about the income tax regime. I was unhappy that we abolished the bottom 10 per cent. income tax band. Additionally, the threshold for the 40 per cent. band reaches down too low. I suggest that we put back the 10 per cent. rate, have a 20 per cent. band, and introduce a 30 per cent. rate for those on the lower part of the 40 per cent. band to reflect where the 40 per cent. band should really start. To compensate for that, we should have higher tax bands beyond that. My simple rule of thumb—I think that I suggested this last year—is that there should be a 50 per cent. rate for taxable incomes over about £60,000, and a 60 per cent. rate for those over £100,000. I do not think that anyone would find that unjust.

I remember attending a meeting some 15 or 18 years ago with people from the City. They said that they had been watching the 1988 Budget, at which time Nigel Lawson was the Conservative Chancellor. As we all remember, Nigel Lawson reduced the top rate of tax from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent. Those people who worked in the City had looked aghast at the television screen and said "But we do not need the money!" That is the spirit that I want to see now. A small number of fading pop singers might emigrate because we had raised their taxes slightly, but I think the great majority of people would accept such a measure if they felt that it was fair and just and would help get rid of child poverty, raise pensioners' living standards and deal with energy problems. I believe that, ultimately, people are fair and just.

My final point is about pensions. The Chancellor rightly raised the winter fuel allowance, but I do not think it has been raised enough, and I should like it to be paid differently. I think that it should be paid as part of the basic state pension, but that people should be given double payments before and after Christmas. It would be easy to administer, everyone would receive it, and it would be taxed. The rich would not receive a tax-free lump sum at Christmas, which is what happens at present. If the sum were built into the basic state pension and taxed, it could be recycled to make a larger winter fuel allowance for those at the bottom of the income scale who pay little or no tax. I believe that that would be a much fairer and more sensible system that would be welcomed all round.

It would be possible to speak at greater length about all the matters that I have raised, but I think that I have had my time.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): We are all aware of the constraints within which the Chancellor operated this year. We are also aware of the sense of a gathering international storm which we hope will not engulf our own economy and others across Europe: the credit crunch and all the rest. But despite the massive considerations that clearly conditioned so much of what the Chancellor could do or was prevented from doing, when some of the headline announcements in the Budget are set not in the immediate context or the context that has developed internationally since last summer but in the context of the last decade, we see that very little in the Budget does any more to redress the growing sense of social imbalance that has been such a feature of this Labour decade.

Until now, the economic situation both domestically and internationally has been benign. We should give credit where credit is due, although the Government ought perhaps to acknowledge responsibility where responsibility is due. A good deal of the domestic situation has to do with the stewardship of the former Chancellor, now the Prime Minister of the country. The sad fact is, however, that despite the undoubted greater wealth generated in the country, the social division between those at the bottom end of the income and opportunities spectrum and those at the top end has both widened and deepened, and the Budget has not redressed that. Because of the circumstances it was probably not possible for it to do so, but I think that in the context of fundamental social justice it is worth repeating that point.

I want to discuss, specifically and briefly, three aspects of the Budget from the point of view of my constituency and my part of the country in the highlands of Scotland. They are the impact of fuel duties, the policy on post offices and the issue of housing debt. On fuel duties, I want to deal not with decisions and announcements in the Budget—that is a side argument for another day—but with the absence of something for which I and others have called for many years: a fairer approach to fuel duties, given that, as the Chancellor himself has acknowledged, they are being levied on this occasion with not just the environmental agenda but the revenue-taking agenda in mind.

As I have said, the campaign in which I and others have been involved goes back many years. I first raised the issue in Brussels, along with my friend Jim Wallace, who was then Member of Parliament for Orkney and Shetland and who went on to become a Member of the Scottish Parliament and Deputy First Minister of Scotland. Jim and I worked closely on the issue in the 1980s and beyond, and spent a great deal of time exploring how other European Union member states were able to deliver derogations on fuel duties if their geography involved, for instance, islands or considerable areas of peripherality, if their Governments were enthusiastic about the idea, and if fuel costs had a disproportionate impact on fragile, socially remote areas.

Throughout the subsequent years—indeed, decades—the Treasury in Britain has set its face against that like flint. Civil servants and Ministers do not like derogations: they do not like them in Whitehall, and if truth be told they are none too keen on them in Brussels either. But where there is a political will there is a way. We have seen the system delivered in other EU member states, although it has never been delivered here.

Let us take one vulnerable example in my constituency, a very small, remote community on a peninsula on the west coast called Applecross. From time to time, Applecross has a petrol station. I use the words "from time to time" advisedly, because the petrol station tends to come and go depending on community initiatives of one kind or another, on the existence of a willing supplier, and on general concerns related to viability. Travelling from Applecross to the nearest permanent petrol station involves a round trip of 35 miles, and the price paid at the pump in Applecross compared with that paid in the metropolis called Inverness—let alone in the central belt of Scotland or the south-east of England—is gigantic in terms of mark-up. In a community where there is very little in the way of viable or regular public transport to meet people's needs, the motor vehicle is in no sense a luxury; it is an absolute necessity. Such communities would benefit from a derogation which the Treasury could pursue at Brussels level, and which would deliver a fairer distribution of the fuel tax take. It is very sad that the Chancellor did not visit that issue in the Budget.

The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) raised the subject of post offices in what I thought was a very good speech, particularly in relation to that issue. In the last week, we have seen the result of the "consultation"—I think that word should be in inverted commas—that the Post Office carried out in my part of the country on its proposed closure programme. The consultation received more than 1,000 responses, which is a lot in the context of the Scottish highlands. Of the 29 proposed closures, 28 will now take place; one post office has been reprieved.

I cast no aspersions on that reprieved post office, which happens to be in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso), but it does seem remarkable that a so-called genuine consultation exercise should result in only a single alteration to the original blueprint. To me that does not smack of genuine consultation. My other parliamentary neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander), is to open an Adjournment debate on the issue in Westminster Hall at lunch-time tomorrow, and he will go into more details. I will say now, however, that the Budget contains nothing at all that shows, against that backdrop—particularly in fragile rural areas—a commitment to making the surviving post office network genuinely sustainable. That is the bigger long-term worry. This is not by any means the end of the story: it is the second round of Government closures. If the Government persist in office, I will not be surprised if they are back for a third and subsequent rounds of closures. That must give rise to great concern about the underpinning of the rural economy.

Mr. Cox: Has the right hon. Gentleman heard, as I have during the process of network change, as it is called, that some of the smaller, most fragile and vulnerable post offices, which one would think were the easiest candidates to pick off, are being left intact, and that some of the profitable ones are being closed? The suspicion is that the vulnerable and small ones are being left intact so that they can be picked off later.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for that helpful contribution. He makes a telling point, which many of us in our respective areas have heard expressed, not least by those who are most knowledgeable about the operation of the post office network and who know only too well how the management and leadership of the network tend to go about their business in getting the ducks lined up steadily over a number of years and proceeding with the original blueprint, albeit perhaps with a slightly extended time scale.

To complement the point that the hon. and learned Gentleman has made, I would point out that, apart from the formal consultation that has taken place on the hit list, or the checklist, of likely casualties, other closures are already taking place, under the radar, under the guise of temporary closures. The sub-postmaster or postmistress, for whatever personal reasons it may be—retirement, or moving on to something else— gives up the tenancy and the professional contract to provide those Post Office services. That outlet then undergoes a period of temporary closure, but all too often that temporary closure slips into permanent closure. That does not appear necessarily on the radar as part of the formal consultation, but the impact in many of these communities is every bit as real because the net conclusion is identical. Therefore, not least in rural Britain, there is disappointment that the Budget is not taking more cognisance of the effects of other Government policies. Most of the measures in the Budget are certainly not seeking to ameliorate those effects.

The third point concerns housing debt. Obviously, post-devolution, responsibility for housing policy generally in the Scottish context is transferred to Holyrood and to the Scottish Parliament, which is right and proper. However, I have been in correspondence with the Treasury because there is still a reserved aspect to that, and UK Treasury reserved powers are involved.

I requested of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury earlier this year a meeting with colleagues from the Scottish highlands to press our particular concerns about what has happened there. They are particular to the Scottish highlands, but they are not unique in the UK by any means. Housing debt there, running at approximately £160 million, remains with the councils after tenants locally, in a highlands-wide referendum, rejected the stock transfer proposals. The difficulty is that councils in that position need to be given an option by the Treasury to help them to address the existing maintenance backlog as well as to expand affordable housing stock. At the moment, they are caught in the middle. They can do neither, because of the position they find themselves in. In an area such as our own, it is especially pressing owing to the enormous difficulties in meeting energy efficiency and fuel poverty standards—in many areas there is an absence of domestic gas supply—against a backdrop of soaring fuel bills. I hope that the Minister or the Whips who are listening will be able to encourage a positive response from the Treasury to our request. There is a genuine desire to have a serious and constructive discussion about that matter because it is a pressing one.

Despite the constraints that I touched on at the outset of my speech, which are obvious and unavoidable at the moment, and therefore the somewhat non-event nature of quite a lot of this Budget, perhaps we shall look back in a year or two and say that the most significant aspect of the non-event Budget was that it flagged up the fact that the main event will be pushed back to 2010, rather than 2009, by which I mean a general election. However, within those constraints and against that backdrop, I think that on those three areas in particular—fuel duties, the future of post offices and the Post Office network, and housing debt—for large swathes of Britain and for my own part of the country in the highlands, there is much disappointment that there is nothing at all in the Budget to address them. For that reason, among others, I will oppose it in the Division Lobby tomorrow night.

8.6 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): I do not propose to take long.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Please do.

Mr. Cox: I am very grateful. I thank my hon. Friend.

The position that I have found myself adopting as I listened to the debate is one of considerable surprise, because there appears to be an emerging consensus. My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) advanced the proposition that there was a lack of coherence and vision in the way the Government, and particularly the Chancellor, initiated their environmental measures. It was somewhat surprising that perhaps the majority of Labour Back Benchers agreed with my hon. Friend. In an excellent speech, the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) put his finger on the problem: what is lacking in the Budget is a sense of vision and a coherent understanding of the necessity not for a few piecemeal and fragmented measures but for a coherent policy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said that Budgets should be about grand orientations. This Budget was not a grand orientation towards environmental policy as a driving factor in economic strategy. It was about a number of tax-raising measures that seemed to have the cloak and disguise of being green, but did not have a centre and a heart. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South put it well when he said that behind the Budget there did not seem to be any central vision.

I have been asking myself as I have been listening to the debate why it is that the constituents whom I represent, in the largely rural areas for which I have the honour to be the Member of Parliament, should feel so cynical about the Budget that was introduced by the Chancellor last week. I think the answer is that, when they hear the Chancellor and the Secretary of State, they do not believe that the Government have a grasp of the integral elements that they will require to put through a genuinely environmental and green agenda.

In my constituency, we are—to use the word "threatened" is perhaps to prejudge and prejudice the issue, but I will say it anyway—threatened by many applications for gigantic commercial wind turbines. The response, as the Secretary of State would expect in the area of west Devon that I represent, is almost universal hostility. These are not unreasonable people; if they were convinced of the urgent necessity, in the interests of our country and of the world, for renewable energy to have an adverse and unwelcome impact not only on the quality of their lives as they see it but on their businesses, their bed and breakfasts, their restaurants, their tourism industry, their tranquillity—because I have the honour to represent one of the last areas of rural tranquillity in England—

Martin Horwood: Do the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituents not recognise that their tranquillity, well-being and economic success are threatened by climate change in the long term, which is a far more serious threat than a wind turbine, and that wind energy is an essential part of tackling that problem?

Mr. Cox: If the hon. Gentleman will simply listen, he will hear what I am about to say—and I should add that several Liberal Democrat MPs support the resistance to the wind turbine developments.

There is now a proliferation of applications for gigantic wind turbines in the rural area I represent, and they are being greeted with consternation and dismay by the inhabitants of the places to which they shall come. The thesis I offer to the Secretary of State is not about whether they are right or wrong; it is, rather, that if we are to convert people to a belief in the need for this type of renewable energy, we must harness their popular assent, but people will not believe in the need for such intrusive forms of technology unless they believe that the Government have a coherent underlying vision and unless the Government convince them of the urgent need for them. That has not been done in the run-up to the Budget.

If there is a coherent vision uniting all the relevant aspects of government, why has a feed-in tariff not been adopted before now to encourage microgeneration? I am a member of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee. We looked into this last year, and we considered that it represented a powerful means of encouraging microgeneration, but why is it that only now do we have a commitment—even though it appears to be only lukewarm—to look into a feed-in tariff?

The respective benefits of a feed-in tariff and the current low-carbon buildings programme simply do not match up; I think that the Secretary of State agrees with that. Frankly, the low-carbon buildings programme has been a failure. It has produced solar voltaic panels in 270 houses. In Germany, 130,000 households took up such panels in the last year alone. That situation is reflected across all the diverse range of renewable energies. The low-carbon buildings programme is bureaucratic, it has too many conditions and it is not worth it. I recently had solar thermal panels installed in my home. I looked into the low-carbon buildings programme, but it was too much hassle, there was too much bureaucracy, and there was too little money because the grants simply are not high enough. Therefore, I agree with the Secretary of State that the way forward is a feed-in tariff. If it is set correctly, it is likely that there will be an explosion of interest in microgeneration. There are hundreds of thousands of such households in Germany. It is becoming standard in some German states for there to be some form of renewable energy in a household, but not in this country.

If my constituents see that there is a comprehensive and coherent Government policy that deals with all aspects of renewable energy and allows them not only to be taxed but to gain from renewable energy by a sensible feed-in policy, they will be much more likely to give their assent to intrusive technologies as part of an overall package of measures. However, they are likely to become cynical if they see only a Klondike-style gold rush of large-scale commercial wind companies coming to their villages and communities to erect 400-ft tall wind turbines and nothing else—no way they personally can become engaged in the battle to fight climate change, but simply the profits disappearing a long way from their communities. Similarly, when they see the Budget measures for green taxation, they are likely to become cynical because they do not sense that the Budget has introduced its environmental measures in the service of some coherent grasp of what is necessary. They sense only that it is another stealth tax-raising measure.

Martin Horwood: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cox: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not as I wish to make progress.

There is a problem of credibility and belief. Only if people see an underlying profound sense of purpose in Government policy will they give their assent to the unpleasant bits. Only if they also see that the policy is not all unpleasant bits—not all stick, but that there is carrot, too, as part of a subtle, comprehensive policy of the type I describe—will they give their assent, and their enthusiasm, to it.

I passionately believe that we need to harness the will and popular support of the people of this country. We cannot preach to them. We cannot simply expect them to accept having foisted on them unwelcome and intrusive technologies such as wind turbines that frequently damage the communities they are sited in—for instance, in terms of the effect on tourism and the perception at least of an effect on the quality of life of the communities. We cannot expect them to take those measures and to take the taxation as well.

I remind the Secretary of State that across my constituency, which as he knows is extremely rural, there are many hundreds of farming communities and farming people have little option but to use a strong 4x4 vehicle to perform many of the intensive tasks that are required to be done on often remote land. Yet those who go to buy a new Land Rover after the relevant change comes into force—tomorrow or next month or whenever it will be—will find that they have to pay an extra £950 or £1,000, and they will feel that they are simply on the receiving end of repeated blows from the Government. The only way they would accept that is if they felt that behind it there was a coherent vision and purpose, and a sense that the Government were sincere in what they were doing in these Budget measures.

However, people do not feel that. They might be wrong; it might very well be that the Secretary of State and the Chancellor are sincere in introducing these measures and really believe that they will have a benevolent effect on carbon emissions in this country. I accept that entirely, but we will not win the assent of the people of this country if we do not show them that we are bringing forward policies with a profound sense of purpose, such as that which the hon. Member for Nottingham, South so ably demonstrated in his speech.

That is why I ask this question: if there is a coherent vision, why over the past decade or so since this Government came to power has a feed-in tariff not been examined and brought forward? If there is a coherent vision driving the Government's policy on the environment, why only now in the Energy Bill is the banding of the renewables obligation certificate being introduced? A criticism that has been made for many years is that because renewable energy technologies are in different states of evolution, and particularly because onshore wind is in an advanced state of evolution—it is ready now—the renewable energy obligation favours the established technologies. I welcome the proposals to band the renewables obligation, but why is it being done 11 years after this Government came to power? Why was it not done much earlier?

If the country communities I represent had seen those kinds of measures brought forward some years ago, it might have been easier to win them over to the cause of renewable energy generally, and to get them to accept the intrusive and often unwelcome installation of gigantic wind turbines with which they are now threatened.

It is a serious criticism of this Budget and of the Government's entire environmental policy that it seems to be fragmented and piecemeal and not to be driven from the heart by a profound underlying purpose that is able to win over and convince the people of this country. If it is not done in that way, there is a danger that people will be alienated from the cause of addressing climate change. The danger is that we will make them cynical and play into the hands of those who doubt even whether there is something that mankind can and must do. I firmly believe that there is something that mankind can and must do to resolve this important, nay, most pressing problem.

I have the great honour of having James Lovelock, with whom I have had many conversations on these subjects, as both a neighbour and a constituent. He is a convincing exponent, as the Secretary of State will know, of the important and urgent need for action. I endorse and support what the hon. Member for Nottingham, South said. If this issue is indeed as serious as the Government say they believe it is, it will require an adjustment of our national policy in many fields, and food security is most certainly one of them.

I should point out to the Secretary of State that the criticisms of the Budget are not intended as suggestions that there is not commitment to this cause on a personal level on the Government side. However, unless the Government can get their act together, bring the disparate elements of environmental policy together and go forward to convince people with the same passion and purpose as the hon. Member for Nottingham, South, this policy will fail to win the critical and crucial assent of the people of this country. Simply imposing taxation measures such as those in this Budget will do more than anything else to harm the cause of winning the battle of hearts and minds regarding climate change.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): My main concern today is addressing environmental issues, but I shall begin by addressing another issue that is important to some of my constituents. Cheltenham is known to like a flutter or two, and Denman's breathtaking win in Friday's Gold cup certainly cost me a bit of pocket money, as I backed Kauto Star. If you will indulge me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will seize this opportunity to put on the record my congratulations to Edward Gillespie and everyone involved in the festival in Cheltenham for having put on such a wonderful show this week, despite extremely challenging circumstances at the beginning of it.

The bookies certainly looked pleased at the end of their week, despite having lost a day of racing due to the high winds—but at least they are taxed only once. Bingo clubs, like clubs at The Brewery, in my constituency, pay both VAT at 17.5 per cent. and gross profits tax of 15 per cent. They feel that this is not a level playing field. Not only was this issue not tackled in the Budget; the Chancellor took the opportunity to increase amusement machine licence duty above the rate of inflation, thereby adding to the pressure on an industry that is already suffering.

I am not arguing that bingo clubs are on a par with post offices in their value to the community, but they do seem to be closing at a similar rate. Having visited clubs in Cheltenham, I am satisfied that they perform an important social function, particularly for some of the less well-off communities and older members of society. I am also convinced that patrons generally bet only what they can afford. Therefore I hope that future Budgets will look more kindly on the bingo industry.

We were promised a green Budget. That would have been timely, as the United Nations environment programme has just reported that the rate of glacier shrinkage appears to have doubled in less than a decade—a grim addition to the already worrying body of scientific evidence about climate change. Yet actually, the Chancellor was three quarters of the way through his speech before he even mentioned the environment or climate change. We then had the traditional series of re-announcements. Amazingly, there was the re-announcement of the Climate Change Bill, which I thought we all knew about, and there was more about the Bali conference and more about low-carbon buildings by 2016. At one stage, the Chancellor even seemed to be taking credit for the European emissions trading scheme.

We had the usual complacent restatement of the Government's meeting their Kyoto targets. My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) has already pointed out quite how dangerously complacent that is, given that, according to the National Audit Office, simply using another accounting method that properly accounts for aviation and shipping shows that we have seen an increase in greenhouse gases under this Government. In fact, if we look at the figures since 2002, it does not matter which of the methodologies we use—the situation is getting worse. Of course, we all know that this great claim of the Government's to have met the Kyoto target is really only a result of the original dash for gas, which took us down below the Kyoto target many years ago.

Then we had the announcement of the possible plastic bag tax, which I and many others have been calling for for what feels like years, but even that was not definite. We had the launch of an which I guess was an attempt to resurrect the shambles of the low-carbon building programme. On that, if not on much else, I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox), who criticised the way in which that scheme worked in practice.

Then we had the non-announcement on vehicle excise duty, which will have no impact whatsoever until the financial year 2010-11. Among all this, strangely, there was no mention of the savage budget cuts to green projects such as the National Industrial Symbiosis Programme and the Waste and Resources Action Programme. Such cuts make it highly unlikely that business will be able to continue to improve its performance on waste reduction, in the way that it was able to do with the assistance of those two organisations.

Of course, the Budget cuts across Departments—we cannot put the environmental bits in one box marked "DEFRA/Treasury". Other Departments are critically involved in terms of their impact on the environment. When challenged earlier, the Secretary of State dodged a question on carbon capture and storage by saying that it is a matter for the Minister for Energy. Well, it is relevant to an economic debate. As the Treasury document that accompanies the Budget, entitled "The UK economy: analysis of long-term performance and strategic challenges" makes clear, climate change, energy policy and the future performance of the UK economy are inextricably linked. That document states:

[Martin Horwood]

"The Government will also seek to ensure that the UK makes the most of the potential economic benefits of the transition to a low carbon economy...It will...develop a low-carbon energy technology strategy to maximise the cost-effective potential for cutting emissions in the UK and internationally."

However, nowhere in that document does it actually say how.

During recent consideration in Committee of the Energy Bill, the Minister for Energy resisted a whole series of amendments that would have helped us move toward a low-carbon energy strategy. He even resisted enabling powers to introduce feed-in tariffs, which have already been mentioned today. He resisted amendments to lock carbon capture and storage into the development of a new generation of coal-fired power stations, led by Kingsnorth. He even resisted amendments that would have allowed him to broaden out the current competition launched by the Government for carbon capture and storage technology, which has been widely criticised as being too narrow and slow and has actually precipitated the truncation of an important carbon capture and storage project by BP at Peterhead. BP had already spent tens of millions of pounds of its own money on the project, which would have been on line ahead of the Government's competition project. All such amendments were rejected in Committee.

The same Budget document to which I referred also extols the virtues of the shadow price of carbon—a measure that will be used to reflect the future cost of climate change in deciding on projects that are outside the carbon trading system. It states:

"the Government will use the new Shadow Price of Carbon to ensure that the carbon impacts of policies—whether negative or positive—are taken into account systematically and consistently across Government".

There is no dodging this—it was developed by DEFRA. However, this is the same shadow price of carbon that the Environmental Audit Committee recently concluded reflected serious flaws in DEFRA thinking. Our recent report on the 2007 pre-Budget report and comprehensive spending review concluded that "the Shadow Price of Carbon is set considerably lower than the level which Stern set for a 'business as usual' trajectory of emissions. In other words, by assuming that action will be taken to ensure that the effects of climate change will be relatively mild, the paper"—

DEFRA's policy paper—

"concludes that the costs of climate change are relatively low. In doing this, however, it is setting a relatively low carbon price...The risk is"—

I hope that Ministers are following this argument—

"that this will fail to discourage the approval of policies and projects that will lead to a growth in carbon emissions—and thus help to make it more difficult to achieve the stabilisation target that the paper assumes will be met."

Friends of the Earth put it even more succinctly, saying that the Government

"are using this lower figure, which has the effect of making carbon emissions go up, which means that they do not meet the targets that they are assuming are being met through the use of the shadow price...It is almost Orwellian".

I would quibble only with the word "almost". This is surely the most perfect example ever seen of a self-defeating policy. Sure enough, it made all the difference in the decision to give the go-ahead to the third runway at Heathrow. Astonishingly, the Chancellor mentioned that decision approvingly in the same breath as stating that

"aviation must meet its environmental costs".—[Official Report, 12 March 2008; Vol. 297, c. 473.]

In practice, DEFRA's optimism about the future ability of nations to tackle climate change and about meeting targets has been wrongly used to create a number that makes it more likely that we will miss those targets. You could not make it up.

Just before the Chancellor mentioned climate change for the first time in his long statement, he made another statement with serious environmental consequences. On house prices, he said:

"The best way to improve long-term affordability and stability is to build more houses".—[Official Report, 12 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 295.]

Many hon. Members would agree, but the Select Committee on Communities and Local Government, the Campaign to Protect Rural England and others have repeatedly cast doubt on whether the Government's numbers really add up to housing affordability anyway. On purely environmental grounds, however, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the growth assumptions in the Budget:

"UK GDP growth is forecast to slow from 3 per cent in 2007 to 1¾ to 2¼ per cent in 2008, before picking up to 2¼ to 2¾ per cent in 2009 and 2½ to 3 per cent in 2010."

Only the last of those numbers is at the level of growth that housing models are using to justify imposing huge numbers of extra houses on areas such as Gloucestershire; 56,000 extra houses are now slated for that county alone. The housing model numbers for Gloucestershire assume a growth rate of 2.8 to 3.2 per cent. sustained consistently for 20 years.

The phrase "In your dreams" springs to mind, especially in the light of the developing global economic crisis. In fact, Northern Rock and the credit crunch have demonstrated the truth of what the Communities and Local Government Committee tried to tell the Treasury two years ago: many other factors in addition to the supply of land influence house prices, including the availability of credit, interest rates and so on. That is particularly true at national level, but there are myriad other factors locally. In my constituency of Cheltenham and the neighbouring borough of Tewkesbury, quite a large quantity of land has been released for housing over the past few decades, adding significantly to the total size of the town, yet we still experience relatively high house prices. That is the case because Cheltenham is still a wonderful place to live; it still has good schools and 98.5 per cent. employment, whereas other areas in the same travel-to-work area do not have such unaffordable housing. The housing market is very complex.

I would be less worried if the Government were sticking to their promise to prioritise brownfield sites in this new housing development, but instead we have the acceleration and promotion of so-called growth points, which have been identified—this is certainly the case in Gloucestershire—in green-belt areas around already relatively affluent towns such as Cheltenham, despite the fact that other areas need and want such development more. The Budget did nothing to prioritise brownfield sites over greenfield where the new housing is needed.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): On the point about brownfield and greenfield land, does my hon. Friend agree that it would help if the taxation system were amended to establish a level playing field whereby VAT was levied on new dwellings and was brought down on conversions and modernisations? Does he also agree that the Government should be introducing policies whereby they look to bring back into use the thousands of empty houses?

Martin Horwood: My hon. Friend has got it exactly right. Clearly, the Government need to do more about empty homes, and he is right about using fiscal or other measures to prioritise brownfield sites over greenfield sites. The importance of the issue in the context of growth assumptions and the Budget's gloomy growth forecasts is that, if the growth points are established, they will become the only areas that are targeted by developers; if there is a general downturn, developers will end up going to those profitable greenfield sites first, under the growth point policy. We will see development on the green belt first, further damaging biodiversity and the natural environment, and yet again hindering the battle against climate change.

Hon. Members need have no fear, however: help in the battle against climate change is at hand. On Friday, The Guardian announced "Blair to lead campaign on climate change", stating:

> "Tony Blair is to lead a new international team to tackle the intractable problem of securing a global deal on climate change which would have the backing of China and America."

Presumably, the former Prime Minister is going to do that using the same successful technique that he has used to bring peace to the middle east and unity to Europe—in which case, I think we should be very afraid.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood), who was right to say that the dash for gas was the reason why the Government have hit their Kyoto targets. Apart from the two Front-Bench speeches, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) and the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) both made excellent speeches, and it was a pleasure to listen to them.

One of the most important tests of whether a Government are acting in an environmentally friendly manner and taking climate change seriously is the way in which they are using their fiscal measures to encourage greener behaviour and developments. On that test, the Government have failed miserably. On transport, we heard in Question Time last week that the Prime Minister appeared keen to alter the carbon reduction target to 80 per cent. by 2050. A significant part of the problem that needs to be tackled is the emissions from transport. They account for about 29 per cent. of the United Kingdom's total carbon emissions.

When it comes to promoting greener forms of transportation, however, the Government are strangling development rather than promoting it. Much play has been made of the so-called showroom tax—a one-year only discourager that would, as it happens, target my constituents who need four-wheel-drive vehicles, as well as large-engined sports cars as are favoured by footballers and such—and the apparent first-year exemption for vehicle excise duty for cars emitting less than 130 g per kilometre, which is the EU standard. Just as the 2p income tax reduction was exposed last year as a tax con because of the removal of the 10p tax rate, those changes will hit families hard and result in a stealthy tax gain for the Government.

Pretending to be green and using the so-called green taxes to try to fill the massive Government debt black hole will ultimately be damaging to the economy and the environment. Moreover, when it comes to promoting existing greener fuels, the Government are penalising those who are doing the right thing and making the choices that promote sustainable transport use.

In fact, my complaint against Labour's Mayor and his new congestion charge is that it removes the incentive for alternative-fuel vehicles. That is a great loss, especially for families who need to be able to use cars but cannot bear to use traditional fuel because of its carbon pollution: they now have no choice at all. I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his offer, but sadly there are no family cars emitting less than 120 g per kilometre.

I recently had the privilege of test driving the Vectrix electric scooter, or motorbike. It does not require petrol. It just needs to be topped up with electricity from a socket, although few public electric recharging points are available nationwide. Despite the cleaner technology, the Budget contained no commitments that would encourage the growth of this sector, drive demand and help to make this type of product more affordable. The scooter currently costs just under £6,000, which is about three times more than a similarly performing petrol equivalent, and not much less than a Harley Davidson. We need to do more to encourage that type of technology.

I declare an interest as an owner of a vehicle powered by liquefied petroleum gas. The fuel duty on that greener, cleaner and more efficient fuel has spiralled in recent years, and the proposed increase in the Budget—to come into effect from October—will give little comfort to owners of LPG vehicles or the industry. In 2005, the duty on LPG stood at 9p per kilogramme. The 2006 Budget increased that by 3.21p, or 36 per cent., to 12.21p. Last year's Budget increased that by another 4.28p to 16.49p—a rise of 35 per cent. And this year's Budget points to a further increase of 4.28p, which is a rise of 26 per cent. That means that owners of LPG vehicles will, from October, have to pay 20.77p per kilogramme, which is 11.77p more than just three years ago, or an increase of 130 per cent. Similarly, the duty paid on compressed natural gas will soar by 52 per cent. as a result of this Budget, from 9p per kilogramme in 2005 to 13.7p.

Those duty increases are significantly higher in amount and proportion than the 2p increase on petrol, diesel, and bioethanol. There are more than 115,000 owners of LPG vehicles in the UK and the Government will penalise them by more than doubling the amount of fuel duty that they have to pay. That is not a particularly sustainable approach to take.

The Government's policy appears to be to increase taxes on an area of green growth, instead of encouraging and promoting its expansion. That would also appear to go against the spirit and recommendations of the King review of low carbon cars, which was published on the same day as the Budget. Professor King highlighted four key challenges for reducing carbon dioxide from road transport. These included reducing CO_2 through fuel efficiency and enabling an expansion of low carbon fuels. LPG and compressed natural gas fulfil those functions. The King review comments that there should be an:

"increased use of alternative fossil fuels such as LPG and CNG which can both offer small but significant life-cycle CO_2 savings over petrol and diesel. Cars capable of using LPG or CNG currently represent less than 1 per cent of the total car stock but there is scope to expand their use."

The Chancellor in his speech on Wednesday said:

"Professor King found that simply by switching to the cleanest cars on offer, motorists could save 25 per cent. of their fuel costs"—[Official Report, 12 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 297.]

but by trying to cash in on the growth in LPG and CNG use, that 25 per cent. saving may not be as great, and the Government run the risk of failing to promote the cleaner fuels that more people need to use to achieve significant reductions in the carbon footprint of transport. The Government have their hands around the necks of LPG and CNG users, and are getting ready to throttle them. This was not a green Budget, but a green stealth tax Budget.

Turning to the issue of biofuel and its environmental potential, the Budget has again failed to address the inherent weaknesses in Government policy towards this fuel. In spite of widespread criticism, the Government are pursuing the renewable transport fuel obligation to increase biofuel use, but, because the sustainability criteria have not been produced—if indeed they are developed at all—the relentless growth in biofuels may continue in an irresponsible way. We have seen the push for biofuels, particularly in the USA, leading to significant increases in food prices. In the last year alone, the price of corn has risen by 31 per cent., of soya by 87 per cent. and of wheat by 130 per cent. That has a knock-on effect right the way down the food chain. The consumer is hit with higher prices, and the rise in prices is also forcing domestic farmers into financial difficulties. Pig farmers are being especially squeezed, with the cost of feed doubling in the last year alone. If the industry does collapse, cheaper imports of animals reared—this is very important—to lower welfare standards will flood the domestic market adding to shoppers' carbon footprints.

The problems associated with the unsustainable growth of biofuel extend beyond food prices in the farming sector. The demand for palm oil for use in biofuels as well as in food and cosmetics is leading to the destruction of the rainforests of Borneo and Sumatra. As much as 10 million hectares of habitat could be lost, and that is having a devastating impact on orang-utan populations, which might be as low as 7,000 in Sumatra. They could face extinction within five years.

I must take this opportunity to pay tribute to the roundtable on sustainable palm oil, which is a fantastic initiative designed to ensure that the palm oil that we buy is from sustainable sources that also live up to the standards on issues such as human rights and exploitation that we would expect from our major retailers.

However, despite my warm words, things need to move faster. I am warned that it might be only five years before we lose our sustainable population of orang-utans in the wild. It may take that much time to get sustainable palm oil on to our shop shelves. I fear that if palm oil comes into our fuel tanks without awareness among the general public, an explosion in the demand for that palm oil would quickly lead to the loss of those great apes. Sime Darby, a major palm oil producer that seeks to ensure that it can deliver sustainable palm oil, has invited me to visit Malaysia and Borneo to see what is being done to preserve the habitats of those great apes. I also congratulate those firms that have already changed their buying policies to include palm oil from sustainable sources.

We hear many pronouncements about globalisation and the Budget in terms of the financial markets and economic impacts, but the Budget also has an important role to play in contributing to the sustainability of world resources, rather than their over-exploitation. I note the review into the wider environmental and economic impacts that has been announced, but that piece of work should have commenced earlier. Moreover, it remains unclear whether sustainability standards and targets will be in place or when they will become applicable.

Back in October, during the debate in Committee on the Renewable Transport Fuel Obligations Order 2007, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick), stated that the date for sustainability targets was 2011 and that that was just an aspiration. The Budget has thus far failed to elucidate any further on that quasi-commitment. We need to be clear that biofuels can be a positive step forward in the fight against climate change if they are sourced in a responsible and sustainable manner.

It is not just in the area of fuel duty and biofuels where a more sensitive and targeted approach could have been beneficial to the environment and consumers. As chairman of the all-party cider group, and someone who represents a constituency in England's cider-producing heartland, I have followed with interest and sadness the rise in duty on cider. It is disappointing to see that the Government have decided to clobber all cider drinkers and producers when they could have taken a more targeted approach.

I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members are familiar with the problems of binge drinking. We all see the disruption and antisocial behaviour that a minority of reckless and irresponsible drinkers cause in our town centres. However, instead of using the Budget to take action against the minority who cause the problems and raising duties on the higher strength alcoholic products, which are among the cheapest and most affordable, the Government are hitting everyone. The Opposition have put forward proposals on alcohol taxes that would take effective action against the irresponsible minority and make higher strength ciders and other similar alcoholic drinks more costly to buy, but would not impact on the majority of the country's 37 million responsible drinkers who consume medium and low-strength alcoholic beverages.

The Government might not have realised it, but their approach to alcohol taxation, which is to penalise all types of cider and mass-scale cider producers, such as Bulmers and Westons in my constituency, has a negative impact on the environment. Cider is a domestic success story with more than 1 billion pints now sold each year. That success through rising demand has lead to widespread investment in sustainable environmental practices. Cider producers take great pride in ensuring that their chemical, water and energy uses are kept to a minimum.

In Herefordshire, Bulmers is a lead partner in delivering the county's biodiversity action plan. Two million cider apple trees have been planted in more than 5,000 acres of land in recent years. Green, environmental and sustainable practices are awarded through industry-led initiatives such as the golden apple awards. Instead of using the Budget to support medium and lower-strength ciders, and recognising the benefit that cider producers bring to our environment, the Government are treating a British success story like a piggy-bank that they intend to raid.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): My hon. Friend is defending the cider industry, a great British industry that is based in his constituency, but will he defend another great British industry, the British pub, which sells that product? As a result of the blunderbuss approach that has been taken to taxation, all alcohol has been hit, as my hon. Friend says. Pubs are closing at a rate of four a day, and the changes announced in the Budget will be the death knell for yet more of them.

Bill Wiggin: I absolutely agree, and I know that my hon. Friend has worked extremely hard with the pub trade to ensure that people in the House understand the problems that publicans and brewers face. It is fair to say that almost everything that I have said about cider applies to beer. A huge amount of hops are grown in my constituency and contribute to the beer industry. What he says about the lack of targeting absolutely chimes with the message of my speech. The Government had a unique opportunity to tackle the antisocial behaviour agenda, which I know they care about, but they missed a trick, which is a great shame.

At a time when fuel and food imports are rising and the cost of living is increasing, when British taxpayers and families are facing record burdens of taxation, and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer is more concerned with protecting the Prime Minister's disastrous handling of the nation's finances than improving the national economic outlook, we, as a country and as individuals, may not be best placed to put this country in the leading position that it needs to be in to tackle climate change and promote the environment.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): It is a pleasure to wind up the debate on behalf of the Opposition, particularly on a topic as important as this year's Budget and the environment. This has certainly been an interesting debate about a Budget that probably shows the Government at their worst—ham-fisted, misguided and deeply cynical—and that damages the electorate's trust in them.

We have heard many interesting contributions, and I shall come to them shortly, but first it is worth reflecting on what we heard about the Budget from the Secretary of State. The reality is that whatever his warm words, and however good his intentions, the Government have put forward a Budget that was more about eco-spin and raising revenues than doing anything meaningful to protect the environment. The Secretary of State may think that I am being uncharitable, but my concerns are mirrored by many outside the House.

In fact, it seems that virtually nobody was happy with this year's Budget. Both the business community and environmental lobby groups saw it as deeply inadequate. Chris Sanger of the accounting company Ernst & Young described it as "a hotchpotch of measures which is indicative of a Budget without a key theme."

Tony Juniper of Friends of the Earth said:

"The chancellor promised to put sustainability at the heart of today's announcement, but he has merely tinkered in the margins."

John Sauven of Greenpeace talked about the Chancellor

"dropping the ball on climate change" and went on to say:

"his measures have failed to match the scale of the challenge we face."

The Institute of Chartered Accountants said that the Budget

"does nothing to address the failing competitiveness of the UK nor to restore confidence overseas in the UK as a place to invest and do business."

Those are damning assessments—and unfortunately for the British public, they are right.

Make no mistake: the two major planks of the Government's Budget—hiking up taxes on motorists and raising alcohol duties—are nothing more than stealth taxes. This year's Budget is what I would call eco-spin of the most cynical kind. Environmental taxes generated £35 billion for the Government in 2006. That might sound like a lot of money, but despite all that tax, the Office for National Statistics tells us that environmental tax receipts as a percentage of gross domestic product have actually fallen from 3.6 per cent. in 1999 to just 2.7 per cent. in 2006. Moreover, environmental taxes as a percentage of total taxes and social contributions have decreased from 9.7 per cent. in 1999 to just 7.3 per cent. in 2006. We are going in the wrong direction. That is because green tax rises have been dwarfed by the Government's wider stealth-tax agenda over the past 10 years.

Steve Webb: I very much share the hon. Lady's analysis that green taxes should form a substantially higher share of total taxes. She suggests a big increase in that share. Can she identify some of the green taxes that she would like to increase so that other taxes could be cut?

Justine Greening: We have talked about a whole range of green taxes that we would like to see. We set out the increase in the banding on vehicle excise duty and we talked about the feed-in tariff; we raised the issue of the carbon levy and changing from the climate change levy. We have set out a whole range of policies. Moreover, we have talked about how we would handle them. Unlike the Government, we see green taxes not as stealth taxes but as replacement taxes. When we increase green taxes in one area, we will reduce other taxes in another. The fact that the Government have not handled the issue in that way is one of the main reasons why people have so little trust in Labour's green tax agenda.

Putting aside for a moment the issue of green tax revenues, we have to ask whether the agenda has had a positive impact. Many of the figures suggest that it has not. Since 1997, UK carbon dioxide emissions have risen. If we are to meet the UK's 2010 target, we will have to reduce CO_2 emissions by about 87 million tonnes. Such figures show the utter failure of the Government's green agenda.

Many speakers tonight have talked about the Government's lack of vision, and I totally agree. [Interruption.] Government Ministers sat on the Front Bench are shaking their heads—saying, I presume, that the taxes that I have mentioned are not stealth taxes. I hope that when she gets to her feet, the Exchequer Secretary can talk about the changes in behaviour that she is expecting as a result of the vehicle excise duty tax changes, for example. Is she prepared to publish the Treasury's assessment of how many cars there will be in each of the vehicle excise duty bands over the next three years—the assessment that led to the Government's calculation in the Red Book on the vehicle excise duty tax take?

Will the Exchequer Secretary publish the Treasury's assessment of the number of new cars that will sell in the bands that have the first-year charge? For example, how many does she expect to be in the top band, M? If the Government will not publish those figures, we will be left with the conclusion that the figures are not there and that the calculations were about increasing tax more than anything else. I give the Exchequer Secretary's officials, who have been sitting there diligently, the chance to prepare those details; I hope that I shall be pleasantly surprised in a few minutes.

I come to the contributions made in this debate, which was wide-ranging. I particularly enjoyed the speech made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson), who had lots of interesting ideas and showed some sort of vision of how he would like the green tax agenda to be carried forward. He raised not only the issue of climate change, but the peak oil challenge, the current stock market and the credit crunch. He underlined the need for successful action in the coming years.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) talked about the lack of joined-up government, about which a number of us have been extremely worried. However committed the Ministers at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs are, what they are trying to achieve is being fundamentally undermined by their colleagues in other Departments—especially the Treasury and the Department for Transport, which seems to be producing many plans that will have a serious CO_2 emissions impact. It is failing to set out the ultimate climate change impact of its plans when it presents them to the public.

I move on to the contribution made by the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen); I have happy memories of serving with him on the Work and Pensions Committee. His was a robust and—I will not dress it up—characteristically anti-capitalist speech. He wants us to clamp down on capitalism, non-doms and all sorts of things. I do not agree. His arguments are slightly yesteryear for me, although I appreciate that they are still important to him.

We then moved on to an absolutely fantastic contribution by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who pulled together the strands of the various challenges that we face, not only with the climate change agenda but particularly acutely with the problems in the world stock markets. I thoroughly agreed with him when he described the Chancellor as complacent. The issues that we face in the world financial markets are certainly not ones to be complacent about. He contrasted very well the US Government's speed and effectiveness in handling the issues of Bear Stearns in recent days with our own Government's handling of the terrible problems at Northern Rock, which still continue to play out.

The right hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) spoke about alcohol taxation. I look forward to his Select Committee's report on binge drinking. What is needed is an informed debate, and when that takes place we will see that imposing swingeing tax rises across the whole alcohol budget is probably not the right way to go about tackling binge drinking and that we should have targeted measures instead.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) gave us a completely different slant on today's debate when he talked passionately about the issues faced in the rural area that he represents. He covered the problems of small businesses, for whom there certainly was not much in the Budget. He discussed the closure of post offices, which are themselves small businesses, and the plight that they are facing. He spoke about pubs—another form of small business that was just mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). He clearly set out the challenges that many of our pensioners face—not only in meeting rising fuel bills but, given their inability to switch to lower-emitting vehicles overnight, as a result of the Government's measures on vehicle excise duty.

The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) made an interesting speech about the issues that he picked up on some time ago when he worked with the union, NALGO. He said that he would have liked to see a relaxing of fiscal policy at this point in the economic cycle. It is concerning that we are not in a position to do that because of the way in which the Government squandered so much of the economic growth that we have had over the past 15 years. I hope that that does not mean that we are constrained in how we handle the difficult times that may be ahead.

The right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Lochaber (Mr. Kennedy), who is not in his seat—I am not sure where he will be at this point in the evening—mentioned a lovely-sounding place called Applecross and the problems with petrol prices and the 2p increase in fuel duty. He also talked about post office closures.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) made a powerful contribution in which he spoke about the lack of vision to which many Members are still referring and the fact that there is no overall coherent logic to what the Government propose in their Budget. He recognised the need to pull together climate change and a whole range of other areas—not only green taxation but renewable energy and even food security.

The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) initially talked about matters that had nothing to do with climate change, including bingo and double taxation, but went on to discuss his concerns about the low-carbon energy strategy and the shadow price of carbon. There are some serious debates to be had about the shadow price of carbon, which is a vital piece of any calculation for understanding the impact of carbon emissions on the environment and, specifically, alternative policy options. If that carbon price is not set correctly, not just today but as it changes over the longer term, we will get bad decision making by Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) made an impassioned speech in favour of low-carbon transport, which I thoroughly agree with. He mentioned the electric bikes that he has ridden. One of that company's competitors turned up in my surgery a couple of Saturdays ago. All the companies involved are keen for that market to expand and be opened up so that people are able to do the right thing and start to use bikes and motorbikes that emit less than the ones that they have to use today. Finally, he talked about something close to his heart: cider. It is important to him and many hon. Members, and he was quite right to say that the Government's approach to alcohol taxation was a blunderbuss approach.

Moving away from Members' contributions to return to the Budget itself, there is no doubt that transport played a large part in it. Emissions from transport have risen by just under 6 million tonnes of carbon between 1997 and 2005, and 21 per cent. of the UK's total CO_2 emissions now come from transport. We all know that there are those who are wedded to their cars, and however hard we try, we just cannot get them to take any other form of transport, even for the shortest journey.

I understand from the paper that the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families recently chose to have his chauffeur drive him 450 yd to a Labour fundraising event and back again. Perhaps the key to success in good environmental tax policy might be for the Exchequer Secretary to have a chat with her friend the Secretary of State and see what policies could be introduced to get him out of his car. It is lucky for us that most other people in this country do not follow his example—who knows what CO_2 emissions would be if they did?

There is no doubt that this Budget hits car owners in particular, and although the vehicle excise duty was meant to be a green tax to support those who had done the right thing, it does not do so. Perhaps more than 80 per cent. of car owners will pay more as a result of the changes to taxes on motorists. Many will be penalised for doing nothing more than owning a car in which to drive their family around. Those are the same families who face rising mortgages, energy bills and food bills. At the very time that they are experiencing more pressures on their disposable income—what is left at the end of the month—the Chancellor comes along, kicks them when they are down and says, "Thanks very much. I'll have even more tax off you from your disposable income to pay for your car." Although the cost of living is going up, Labour is making it worse for those families. Families with a Ford Galaxy or Volvo V50, or those in an entirely different situation, such as black cab drivers, will face a £100-a-year increase in vehicle excise duty.

As was said, although there are tax cuts for cleaner cars, they total £15 million. That pales into insignificance when compared with the tax rise for polluting cars, which the Red Book shows comes to a massive £750 million. Again, I ask the Exchequer Secretary if she could provide more details of the behaviour that the tax change is meant to drive. Otherwise, many of us in this House and the public outside will have no alternative other than to conclude that it is a stealth tax, designed to get the Government out of their public finance hole. It is not just we who are concerned. Edmund King, president of the Automobile Association, has warned that the new bands could be a green smokescreen. Sheila Rainger of the Royal Automobile Club stated that many ordinary families will end up paying hundreds of pounds more.

Mr. Evans: Does my hon. Friend accept that cars and 4x4s in rural areas are not a luxury, but working farming vehicles? They are a necessity where rural transport is rather inadequate.

Justine Greening: My hon. Friend raises a good point. Not everyone is able to change to a lower-carbon car. Even if they pick a car that is best in class, it may still be found higher up the band, because it is a particular sort of model.

I was about to move on to plastic bags. We saw yet another build-up—it was in the papers that we were going to have a plastic bag tax. What happens when we get to Budget day? We "may" have a plastic bag policy or tax. The irony is that it is very much, "Do as I say, not as I do" from the Government. It turns out that last year, the Government bought 1.2 million plastic bags to help raise the profile of various Whitehall bodies at a cost of about £90,000. I wonder whether any of them had the words, "Act on CO_2" printed on them. Perhaps we will never know.

I cannot end my speech without mentioning zero-carbon buildings. That initiative was much vaunted, and the way in which it would kick-start the market was trumpeted. The Government's aspiration—I assume I can call it that because they may no longer be able to describe it as a full pledge—is for all new domestic homes to be zero-carbon by 2016, which is only eight years away.

The Budget's move to extend the stamp duty relief on zero-carbon homes to zero-carbon flats comes only six months after the original regulations, which specifically excluded flats and maisonettes, passed through Parliament. When the Government introduced those regulations, Ministers told me that the relief would kick-start the market. My hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) told us that, at the end of 2007, six homes had qualified. I can update the figure, which has risen. I am sure that he will be pleased to hear that, at the end of February, nine homes had qualified. [Interruption.] Labour Members say that that is a 30 per cent. increase, but the bad news is that the rate is reducing. Before the final quarter of last year, the Government were getting two a month, but now the figure is just under two—I admit that February was a short month.

[Justine Greening]

I can only imagine the party in the Treasury when the tenth zero-carbon home qualifies for stamp duty relief. Doubtless, there will be a cake with 10 little candles and officials will run in and say, "Minister, Minister, Minister, at last we're into double figures, so only 99.9999999"—hon. Members get the picture—"per cent. of the new build market to go."

Page 105 of the Red Book deals with the reasons for the current position. It refers to the Government having a plan to finish defining a zero-carbon home by the end of the year. It is amazing that any homes managed to qualify, given that the definition has not been established. Perhaps we should congratulate the Government on getting as many as nine homes through when they have not managed to work out what constitutes a zero-carbon home. Nevertheless, we will see how they get on.

The Government are not content with new domestic build—the policy is being extended to Government buildings, public buildings and, by 2019, all non-domestic buildings. I am sure that the building industry will be keen to find out what zero-carbon means by the end of the year when the Government have finally managed to devise a definition.

Whereas the Government perceive green taxes as stealth taxes, the Conservative approach is more balanced. We perceive green taxes as replacement taxes. When there are tax rises in one sphere, we need to ensure that they are offset by tax reductions elsewhere. The Government do not understand that concept. For the Prime Minister and the Chancellor, green tax is not about changing behaviour; it is simply another way to raise money.

Friends of the Earth director, Tony Juniper, said:

"We urgently need real political leadership on this issue", but it is clear that we have none. The threat to the environment exists now. We need firm action, decisive policies and innovative thinking to make a difference now. In the Budget, the Chancellor gave us nothing but half measures, token gestures and a total lack of vision and direction. Is that what he means by stability? He should have called it inaction. The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs told us that the Budget demonstrates how seriously the Government take the environment. Quite. They do not take it seriously at all.

The Exchequer Secretary to the Treasury (Angela Eagle): The debate has been interesting. Last week's Budget was delivered against the background of the most uncertain period in the global economy for some time. The problems in the world's credit markets, which first manifested themselves in the American sub-prime mortgage market, have continued to reverberate around the world, not least over the weekend. That is the sombre background to our debates.

As we contemplate the events in the credit markets, however, it is crucial that we keep a sense of perspective. Clearly, we must tackle the current position, but we must also prepare our economy for the medium and long-term challenges that we will also face. Far from failing to fix the roof while the sun was shining, as the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has repeatedly claimed, we have attended to the necessary roof repairs. We have also renewed the rotten foundations that we found when we took over responsibility for the lease and have completely modernised the inside of the house. After the years of neglect and decline that went before, the Government have ensured that we can all inhabit a more secure and dependable family home. There is clear evidence of the progress that this Labour Government have been able to make in the 10 years during which we have been responsible for the lease of the building.

In 1997, Britain was the least stable economy in the G7. After 10 years of Labour stewardship, we are now the most stable economy. If we compare the record of our first 10 years of economic stewardship with the last 10 years of the Conservative Government, we begin to see why. Labour has achieved inflation rates that are on average half what they were when the Opposition were in government. Interest rates have been half what they were under the Tories, too, yet growth has been double what they managed to achieve. Employment rates are now at record highs, with the creation of 3 million extra jobs, and there are nearly 2 million extra homeowners. Household net income has increased by 25 per cent. since 1997 and net wealth has increased by 72 per cent.

Mr. Bellingham: What about the trade deficit, which I gather is the worst since records began? Am I right in saying that Britain has fallen in the World Economic Forum competitiveness rankings, from fourth in 1998 to 11th today?

Angela Eagle: We had the highest rate of growth in the G7 last year, at 3 per cent. The hon. Gentleman fails to talk about the figures that demonstrate the strength of our economy and he makes a partial case. The UK has been the fastest or the second fastest growing economy in the G7 for six of the past seven years and has achieved the fastest growth in income per head among all G7 countries in the past 10 years.

That record of success and stability means that, despite the global economic turbulence that we now face, the forecast evidence points to a slowdown, but not the end of growth in the UK economy. Our economy is strong, stable and resilient. In the testing conditions that we now face, that flexibility will stand us in good stead. Therefore, in last week's Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had to consider what action he needed to take in the short term to assist with the challenges that we face due to global conditions. He also had to look through the short-term turbulence and uncertainty to prepare our country for the challenges that undoubtedly lie ahead. It is that longer-term challenge to which I want to turn.

Justine Greening: At Treasury questions the week before last, I asked whether the sustainable investment rule would be breached or whether the Government could guarantee that it would not be. Can the Exchequer Secretary give the House a guarantee that the sustainable investment rule will not be breached over the next three years?

Angela Eagle: The Budget forecasts deal with that issue. I refer the hon. Lady to the appropriate pages of the Red Book. The point of the sustainable investment rule is to decouple much-needed investment in infrastructure from the ups and downs of the economic cycle.

Mr. Cox: Will the Exchequer Secretary give way on that point?

Angela Eagle: No, let me finish.

When we came into government, we inherited a wrecked public infrastructure, in which there had at points been lows of 0.6 per cent. of GDP of investment. We have since had 10 years of stable public investment and have got that figure up to 2 per cent. That is why, when I walk past schools and hospitals in my constituency, they are no longer falling down; they are in new buildings of which we can all be proud. It is because of the sustainable investment rule, which was created to ensure that we can invest in our public infrastructure as we need to, that we have enjoyed the success that I am talking about.

Bob Russell: Has the Minister noticed, while on her walkabouts, that the gap between the rich and the poor has widened under 10 years of new Labour, that child poverty has increased, and that social housing is the worst it has been in about 20 years?

Angela Eagle: I notice with great pride that this Government have ended the connection between age and poverty for the first time ever. There is now no longer a correlation between a person's age and the likelihood of their living in poverty. We have taken 2 million pensioners out of poverty, and 600,000 children out of relative poverty. This Budget will take us further forward.

In the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had to consider what action to take in the short term to assist with the challenges that we are facing due to global conditions. He also needed to look ahead. Perhaps the most serious and demanding issue facing us is the question of how to tackle catastrophic climate change. We are in the forefront of the efforts to meet what Lord Stern has referred to as the "greatest market failure" the world has ever seen. Internationally, we are leading action aiming for a post-Kyoto agreement next year in Copenhagen.

Domestically, too, we are creating a robust new framework to meet the challenge. The Climate Change Bill will make us the first country in the world to legislate for carbon budgets, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced last week that the first carbon budgets would be delivered alongside next year's Budget. The Energy Bill and the Planning Bill will enable us to begin the work of decarbonising our own economy and ensuring that we are able to meet the extremely challenging targets for renewable energy generation that we have been set by the European Union.

We also have to price carbon and create scarcity by capping emissions so that we can trade them. This will allow market mechanisms to help us to drive the innovation and technical development that we need to continue economic development for all the people in the world, without destroying the eco-systems on which all life on earth depends. The European Union emissions trading system is the most advanced in the world, and London is at the centre of the rapidly expanding carbon market. The Budget maintains our engagement and ensures that, via the clean development mechanism, developing countries can rely on the cleanest technology while harmful emissions are minimised.

At home, fuel duty will increase, albeit later than originally planned, in recognition of the short-term economic conditions in the oil market. The restructuring of vehicle excise duty will incentivise motorists to buy more fuel-efficient cars and manufacturers to drive engine technology in even cleaner directions.

Mr. Redwood: I do not know whether the Minister is going to respond to the debate, but it would be useful to have an answer to the points that I made about the need to strengthen the Bank of England's monetary authority in order to avoid future problems.

Angelal Eagle: The hon. Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "Right honourable."] The right hon. Gentleman—my apologies—made an interesting speech commenting on some of the differences between the way in which the American authorities are dealing with the issue of Bear Stearns and the way in which Northern Rock was dealt with here. He will be aware, as will all hon. Members, that a consultation document on the future structure of the tripartite arrangement was issued on 30 January, and I hope that he will respond to it. He will also know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been dealing with his counterparts in the EU and the G7 to determine what lessons need to be learned from the new threats and issues that global financial markets face as a result of the huge increase in globally mobile capital, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred in his speech. There are lessons for everybody to learn, but we know that the problems in the global markets cannot be solved in the UK alone. They have to be solved by international co-operation and agreement.

As I said, fuel duty will increase, but the restructuring of vehicle excise duty will incentivise motorists to buy more fuel-efficient cars and manufacturers to drive engine technology in even cleaner directions. Increases in aviation duty will further price in the environmental cost of flying, as well as contributing to the funding of our public services.

What is the Conservative party saying on the environment? Conservative Members always assert that people should vote blue to go green. In his contribution to the Budget debate last Thursday, the shadow Chancellor berated the Government for changing vehicle excise duty rates at all to incorporate environmental signals, arguing that motorists were being unfairly hit—and we have heard a lot more of that kind of attitude tonight. The shadow Chancellor also argued that all green tax revenues should be used to cut taxes elsewhere. Again, we have heard plenty more comments about that in tonight's debate. Yet this weekend, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), the shadow Chief Secretary, was pronouncing that there should be no new tax cuts during the first term of any future Tory Government. That must mean that there will be no green taxes either, so what does that say about voting blue to go green?

What about aviation? As we recognise its contribution to the UK economy, the Government support the expansion of Heathrow, subject to the outcome of the current consultation, but what about the Conservative party? In his policy commission report on economic competitiveness, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) pronounced that the Tory party was in favour of airport expansion. At the very same time, however, in his policy commission report on the environment, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) pronounced the Tory party against future airport expansion. Which is it? To clarify that embarrassing policy model, the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) declared himself in favour of airport expansion on Channel 4 news, while his Front-Bench colleague, the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) pronounced himself against it in a letter to The Times.

Justine Greening rose—

Angela Eagle: A pattern seems to be emerging from these facts. The Conservative party hopes that nice new eco-friendly logos and well publicised husky rides will be enough to give the impression that it has coherent policies on the environment. I have listened to hours of debate tonight and I have not heard a single policy idea from the Conservatives.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: Will the Minister give way?

Angela Eagle: If I am going to get a policy idea, I will give way.

Mr. Ainsworth: Let me make a further attempt to get the answer to a very simple question. How much carbon will be reduced as a result of the measures introduced by last week's Budget?

Angela Eagle: I am disappointed, as I thought we were going to hear the Conservative Front-Bench position on airport expansion, but there we are. It serves me right for thinking that there might be an answer to that question.

Angela Eagle: Perhaps we are still going to get an answer!

Justine Greening: I assume that the Minister is aware that her colleague, the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education, the hon. Member for Harlow (Bill Rammell), has come out against Stansted expansion, but may I ask her to clarify what she believes the calculation of CO_2 emissions from airport expansions should be? Should it include all flights generated by the extra capacity, for example?

Angela Eagle: We still have no answer, to whether Conservative Front Benchers are in favour or against airport expansion at Heathrow. Individual MPs may have particular views, but we are talking about Conservative Front Benchers here. Their environment people go off and tell everyone how they are against airport expansion, while their economic people go off and say that they are in favour of it. They hope that no one will notice the inconsistency. They tell people what they think they want to hear in order to be popular, in the hope that those people will not actually talk to each other, compare notes and realise that Conservative Front-Bench policy is a complete mess.

The hon. Member for East Surrey mentioned green ISAs in passing during a speech that seemed to declare a policy-free zone for most of the time. How much is that policy going to cost? How much will it cost in higher rate tax relief to have extra green ISAs? How much will it cost in total tax relief? Once again, Mr. Deputy Speaker, answer was there none.

The hon. Member for East Surrey talked about the purchasing of what he called "foreign indulgences", by which he meant that the UK should somehow not be allowed to purchase emissions from abroad to meet any post-Kyoto targets. Is he against carbon trading? Does he believe that, somehow, 1 tonne of carbon abated over London is worth more than 1 tonne of carbon abated over India? As we are moving towards a lower-carbon economy and battling the threat of climate change, does he feel that that is best done by not allowing any trading between the advanced economies and the economies of the developing world? If people believe that, we will never succeed in the battle that we must have against the threat of catastrophic climate change.

Labour Members believe that social justice and economic success go arm in arm. The Budget allows us to continue to invest in our public services. Investment here has trebled as a share of national income since 1997. We have replaced the shabby and dilapidated infrastructure that we inherited from the Conservative party with one that we can all be proud of in the public service. We continue to invest in our education system and the training of our work force so that we can compete effectively in the developing global economy and ensure that no child is left behind and every adult can make the most of their talent.

Even in these difficult times, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been able to find money to make further advances in the battle to eradicate child poverty. The Budget will help to lift a further 250,000 children out of poverty and the spending review will continue the funding of Sure Start children's centres, which are transforming the life chances of a generation of less-advantaged kids. What a contrast with the Conservative party, which is still intent on slamming shut the door of opportunity by destroying Sure Start.

My right hon. Friend was also able to consolidate the gains that pensioners have made under Labour. For the first time in our history, the Government have broken the link between poverty and old age, getting 2 million pensioners out of poverty, and 9 million households will benefit from the additional payment of £50 for the over-60s and £100 for the over-80s this winter. From April, all bus travel will be free for pensioners.

This Budget will steer us through uncertain times and equip our country for the challenges ahead. I commend it to the House.

Debate adjourned.—[Mr. David.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

COMMITTEES

JUSTICE

Ordered,

That Rosie Cooper be discharged from the Justice Committee and Mrs Linda Riordan be added. —[Tony Cunningham, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITIONS

Post Office Closures (Cumbria)

9.32 pm

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): I present to the House a petition on post office closures in Cumbria.

The petitioners declare:

The Petition of those concerned about Post Office closures in Cumbria,

Declares that they give their full support to Flookburgh, Hallgarth, Heathwaite, Grasmere, Endmoor, Burneside, Beetham, Dent, Backbarrow, Burton-in-Kendal, Rinkfield, Lindale, Levens, Kents Bank, Storth, Hawkshead and Hutton Roof, as these are an integral part of the local community and to lose them would be a loss to all of them.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for Business Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, to instruct the Post Office Ltd as it conducts its review of Post Office branches, to keep these Post Offices open; and further urges the Government to stop the unnecessary Post Office closure programme, and instead free business from restrictive regulation, invest in the future of the network and stop removing government business to safeguard our Post Offices.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

[P000141]

Wirral Hospital NHS Trust

9.33 pm

Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): I present this petition on behalf of 1,541 signatories, who are seriously concerned about dermatology care provision in Wirral, South with regard to it being delivered by GPs rather than a dermatology department, and, for example, the detrimental effect on research and development.

The prayer of the petitioners is as follows:

The Petition of patients, families and friends of the Department of Dermatology in Wirral Hospital NHS Trust, Declares that the petitioners have most serious concerns about the proposed changes to the care of people with dermatological disease regarding managing their conditions in the community. The Petitioners believe that such changes to services without due consideration and discussion of the effects will be detrimental to the health and wellbeing of the patients involved.

The Petitioners further declare that moving the majority of skin care management to the community has the consequence of reducing funding to hospital-based services. This potentially risks the loss of specialist treatments (both in- and out-patient based), diagnostic skills, opportunities for multidisciplinary clinics and valuable training for nurses and doctors.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Government to reconsider its decision and further urges the Secretary of State for Health to use his powers to reverse the continued scaling back of the aforementioned services at Wirral Hospital NHS Trust and to visit the Wirral Trust at his earliest opportunity in order to assess the views and opinions of the dermatology service users.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

Winter Fuel Payments

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David.]

9.35 pm

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak about the winter fuel allowance, especially at such an appropriate time, given that the Government set out their policy on it in last week's Budget. As we have extra time, I am happy for my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) to take part in the debate. The winter fuel allowance administration centre is in his constituency.

Context is all-important when discussing the payment. Account must be taken of factors such as energy prices, inflation and the history of the allowance, and some of the criticisms of last week's Budget show a lack of appreciation of that. As I am sure my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will emphasise, there would be no winter fuel allowance if it had not been introduced by the Labour Government in 1997. When it was introduced it was £20, but from next winter the basic rate will be £250 and the higher rate will be up to £400. In the light of that, some criticisms that I have read are reminiscent of the People's Front of Judea—or should I say the Judean People's Front?—wondering what the Romans, or in this case the Government, have ever done for us.

It is important to recognise the Government's efforts to tackle fuel poverty. I welcome the recent increases in the winter fuel allowance. The Opposition talk about a revenue-neutral Budget—incidentally, when that is coupled with deterrent taxation, it inevitably means cuts to services—and the shadow Chancellor will not commit to even a one-off increase in the winter fuel allowance, so I know that people in my constituency are far better off under this Labour Government.

The payment operates against the backdrop of the cost of energy. It is interesting to note that this year's increases have taken prices in real terms to the levels of the 1980s. There was no hint of assistance at that time from the incumbent Conservatives, which was no doubt one reason why 6.5 million households were in fuel poverty when Labour came to power in 1997. Furthermore, that situation had come about after a fall in energy prices that was more than three times the size of the reduction between 1997 and 2004. In the light of that, the Opposition's claim that progress on eliminating fuel poverty has been down to even cheaper prices beggars belief. In Scotland, the Scottish National party is failing vulnerable groups, such as disabled children, and, with its planning policy it is tying Scotland's future to the fluctuation of carbon prices, so my comments on the winter fuel allowance are made in recognition of the fact that the Government have done more than any other party on this front.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

John Robertson: No, I will not. I am sorry.

Of course, we are in Parliament and in government not simply to be better than the alternative, but to improve people's lives, meet their aspirations and bring about our vision of a fairer society. One aspect of that is our target to end fuel poverty among vulnerable groups by 2010, and completely by 2016.

Before 1997, fuel poverty—which is defined as when a person pays more than 10 per cent. of their income on heating their home—had deliberately not been identified as something the Government should be worried about. In 2004, owing to a combination of declining retail prices and substantial Government assistance, 4.5 million homes had been lifted out of fuel poverty. However, with the winter fuel allowance remaining static and with steep increases in energy prices, the trend has unfortunately been reversed. By the end of last year, about 2 million households had fallen back into fuel poverty, taking the total to 4 million before the recent rises.

Since December last year, all but one of the six major energy providers have imposed double-digit increases averaging about 15 per cent. The starting gun was fired by npower with a 17 per cent. increase in the price of gas, the main source of heating in the United Kingdom. It was followed by EDF and British Gas, within three days of each other, and by Scottish Power and E.ON within a week of each other. I echo the concern of Energywatch, which has observed that while citing different rises in wholesale costs, with a £1,000 energy bill the major players come within £13 of each other. What a remarkable coincidence. Inquiries into the market by both Ofgem and the Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Committee are welcome, and I look forward to the results.

It is important to note that while the energy companies have blamed increasing wholesale prices for the price rises, their own profits have rocketed. British Gas recently announced that its profits had risen by 500 per cent. That, in my view, reflects the fact that the motivation behind companies' actions is profit. They are a front for investment, and they are not in business with a moral mission. We need to ask why they have nevertheless been given a free rein with customers. I hope that the lesson from this is not lost on the Government, given the Chancellor's threat of legislation if energy providers fail to increase spending on social tariffs.

As for this year's price increases, the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform estimates that for every 1 per cent. rise, 40,000 people are pushed into fuel poverty. The recent price hikes will therefore have pushed at least half a million more homes into fuel poverty, which means that the figure was about 4.5 million before last week's Budget.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the prime reasons for the excessive price increases of recent months is that the market has moved on from the post-privatisation position, when the number of companies was in the teens? As a result of mergers and acquisitions, a mere handful now operate in an oligopolistic fashion, driving prices up to a higher level than the market would generate. Does my hon. Friend hope that our hon. and learned Friend the Minister will ask the Minister for Energy for an investigation of the apparent market failure?

John Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. During the Committee stage of the Energy Bill we took evidence from the various companies, and I posed a similar question to them. They assured me that that could not possibly happen, and that the increases were due to external forces and nothing to do with profits. That was at the time they were telling us about the 500 per cent. increase in profits. I am sure that that will not have been lost on the Minister for Energy, because he was present during the evidence sessions, and I think that some of the things the Chancellor said last week might have something to do with it. It is important for us to keep tabs on those companies. They seem to be getting their money awfully easily nowadays, and they are certainly not contributing enough to look after those who need to be looked after the most.

I must ask you to excuse my bad throat, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was at a football match yesterday, and I did a bit more shouting than usual.

I wrote to the Chancellor in February asking for double the increase that he eventually announced. I want to focus on the current amount of the payment, and also to take this opportunity to urge the Chancellor, and the Minister, to consolidate the additions and not to leave them as a one-off with an uncertain future.

The basic rate for 60 to 79-year-olds was raised by £50, from £200 to £250, while the payment for those over 80 was raised from £300 to £400. Those increases were the first since the introduction of the higher rate in 2003 and the first change in the £200 rate since 2001. As a proportion of the payment, they represent an additional 25 and 33 per cent. respectively. One immediate question I wish to ask the Minister is why there is that discrepancy, with the majority of claimants, at a ratio of 3:1, being paid at the lower rate.

Over the same period that saw increases of 25 and 33 per cent. in the allowance, based on figures from both the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform and British Gas, energy bills in real terms have gone up by 50 per cent. That would mean a significant shortfall of itself, but there is a far greater deficit. The retail prices index, against which energy bills are measured, shows inflation of around 18 per cent. since 2001, and 14 per cent. since 2003. That would mean real-terms increases of around 7 per cent. and 19 per cent. for the winter fuel allowance against 50 per cent. for energy bills. Perhaps the Minister could confirm that the calculations that I have done are correct.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend refers to the desirability of consolidation of the basic allowances, rather than a one-off payment. I think that most people would agree with that, but others might argue that it would be better still to incorporate the amounts into the basic pension entitlement, so that payment becomes part of that from here on in. Half the amount could be paid at the start of winter, on 1 December, and half the amount at the end of winter, the end of February. That approach would commend itself, and indeed higher amounts could be paid to recognise the fact that better-off pensioners would pay tax on the sums that they receive.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I will touch on that matter at the end of my speech. I do not necessarily come to the same conclusion, but I do come to a conclusion, and I hope that the Minister will comment on my suggestion.

By the measure that I have outlined, the Government have a long way to go simply to get back to the stage we were at four years ago when 2 million homes were in fuel poverty. Roughly 600,000 of those were pensioners and I believe that, on the figures I have outlined, a far greater number will be in fuel poverty next winter.

I have no doubt that the Minister will rightly want to point out that the winter fuel allowance is not the only tool the Government use to tackle fuel poverty. Warm Deal, for instance, or Warm Front for those living in England, has helped more than 1 million homes at a cost of £1.4 billion. As he will be aware, however, that is available to more numerous groups than the winter fuel payment, such as those on certain income-related benefits or disability living allowance. Therefore, it is not directly comparable to the allowance figures. I ask the Minister, if he does cite Warm Deal as helping in that regard, how many of those it has helped are pensioners.

In answer to a written question from the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on the proportion of a pensioner's bills which the payment would cover, the Minister said in Hansard on 6 December 2007, at column 1512W, that pensioners' incomes had grown by 29 per cent. in real terms between 1996 and 2005. If we take the state pension from 2001 and 2003, the more significant dates in examining the recent Budget increase, they have increased by 21 and 25 per cent. respectively, so only 3 and 11 per cent. in real terms. That, once again, means that there is a large deficit in the rate at which pensioners' incomes have increased, even with the winter fuel payment, in comparison with the 50 per cent. rise in energy bills.

As with the Warm Deal scheme, I should point out that any comparison between the state pension and the allowance will be inexact because entitlements to them are not co-extensive. Moreover, with food prices—another staple for pensioners—having increased by 6 per cent. this year, energy bills are not the only burgeoning demand on their finances.

The trend in fuel poverty has been going in the wrong direction for the past few years and because the payment has remained static, for the next winter pensioners will be far worse off than seven years ago. If we are serious about eradicating fuel poverty, there is clearly a need for the winter fuel allowance to be directly linked to fuel prices by some mechanism. The tragedy of the situation is summed up by the fact that we collate a statistic entitled "the excess winter death figure", which stood at just under 24,000 for 2006. If the Government can afford to double the allowance for inheritance tax, I humbly submit that we can find the money to prevent pensioners from freezing in their own home.

The final issue I wish to discuss is entitlement to the allowance. All people over 60 are entitled to receive the payment and need specifically to claim to do so. The need to claim the allowance—rather than, for instance, it being an addition to the state pension or paid directly to energy companies—significantly reduces the chance of the targeted group receiving it. From my surgeries, I know that perceived entitlement to financial help does not go hand in hand with actual entitlement to it. In particular, many pensioners I meet do not want to claim for assistance, believing that they can get by without it and should make do with what they have, or feeling that it is charity. In this context, Help the Aged estimates that about £4.5 billion in various benefits goes unclaimed by pensioners each year. All the calculations I have outlined are predicated on the assumption that there is full take-up of the allowance, so the situation is likely to be even worse than I fear.

Perhaps the rationale behind requiring a claim to be made is that that will deter those who are perfectly well off from applying for the payment simply to supplement their finances. If that is the case, will the Minister assure me that the relevant segment of the unclaimed £4.5 billion comes from the over-60s who are not in need of the allowance failing to claim it, rather than those in fuel poverty and in dire need of assistance towards their bills? Has any assessment of this been made?

This issue also highlights the fact that the winter fuel payment is indiscriminate, given that all those over 60, regardless of whether they are still in work and regardless of their resources or incomes, are entitled to receive the payment. It is bizarre that the payment is used as a blanket income supplement across the board for over-60s alone, when many vulnerable groups such as children and the disabled are equally susceptible to fuel poverty and receive no assistance at all from the allowance.

David Taylor: I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that the scheme could be improved in numerous ways without great cost being incurred. One way would certainly be for those who reach the pension age of 60—or 80 for the higher level—during the winter period to be entitled to the amount, rather than having to have reached that age by the fixed date in September. In some of the correspondence I receive, that is identified as an anomaly. Does my hon. Friend get similar correspondence from pensioners?

John Robertson: I do, but at the end of the day we must ensure that the money goes as far as possible; I believe we have to look after all our pensioners, but that we also have to look after those with the greatest needs, and that is where I would like the money to go.

The point about identifying those whom we need to support also applies to social tariffs. In a briefing from British Gas, the company mentioned for their scheme. The Government, however, collect such data for tax purposes and I suggest that a more targeted approach would save money and help those most in need, and, if operated in conjunction with energy providers, this identification could be carried out and they could be engaged with social tariffs. I see no reason why the cost of this should not be met out of their incredible earnings and obscene profits.

"the huge wasted effort from searching for eligible customers"

One further change that I urge the Minister to consider is the direct payment of the allowance to the provider as part of that, so as to remove the problem of unclaimed funds. While I recognise the need to be flexible and respond to how individuals want to receive the support, the issue of unclaimed benefits can undermine all of our efforts.

These proposals involve a recasting of the winter fuel allowance into something that lives up to its name. At the moment, there is no link to fuel prices, the allowance is limited to the over-60s and there is a blanket entitlement to receive it, so a more appropriate description would be the over-60s income supplement—a point alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire. Although there is no problem with having such a measure, if the purpose is to alleviate fuel poverty, a far more nuanced and targeted approach is surely called for.

At this point, I shall mention vulnerable groups such as the disabled and children, many of whom live in fuel poverty. I receive a great deal of correspondence about their plight, and I urge the Minister to expand the allowance as part of the overall drive to eradicate poverty.

I conclude by declaring a vested interest. My constituency has one of the highest percentages of pensioners in the country. It is one of the colder areas of the UK, and more than 15,000 of my constituents claim the winter fuel allowance. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will take on board the points that I have made on their behalf. I reiterate that we can discuss increasing, extending and modifying the payment, and discuss fuel poverty's being an issue, only because of a Labour Government. I recognise the steps that we have taken, but with people set to die from cold-related illnesses next winter and energy companies pocketing billions of pounds in profits, this is clearly an issue on which we must do more.

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) on initiating this debate. This is an enormously important issue for hundreds of thousands of pensioners throughout the country—in my constituency, as well as his.

The Government have done more for older people than any other. In the past 10 years, we have lifted more than 1 million pensioners out of relative poverty. Relative pensioner poverty has fallen by a third since 1997, and we have broken the adage that being old means being poor. These days, people are no more likely to be poor if they are old than if they belong to another social category. We have banished the memories of the previous Conservative Government, under whom the poorest scraped a living on—imagine this—under £69 a week. By way of contrast, this year the poorest third of pensioners will, on average, be £2,100 better off than if we had continued with the previous Conservative policies.

We have achieved this through targeted support to provide security in retirement. This amounts to £11.5 billion a year more than was spent on pensioners in 1997. We are right to be proud of our achievements, but there is more that we need to do. We want to ensure that pensioners claim all the benefits to which they are entitled. I wrote to Members of this House three weeks ago outlining some of the measures that we are taking to simplify application procedures, and informing them how they can get their older constituents to claim the various benefits available to them. A lot of pensioners are still not claiming sufficient benefits. The money is there, we are waiting to pay it and we need those applications to come in.

John Robertson: Does my hon. and learned Friend not accept that in the days when we had pension books, every pensioner knew that they had to have such a book, and so we could get information to them? Nowadays, we do not have such a facility, but there has to be a way that we can contact every pensioner; otherwise, we will have the same problem with a lack of uptake.

Mr. O'Brien: We can actually get to every pensioner; the problem is getting those pensioners to whom we can get to recognise that if they are on a low income, they can apply for further benefits. In the past 18 months, we have written in some instances up to four times to people whom we think may be entitled to claim the pension credit, help with their council tax and perhaps housing benefit in respect of their social housing rent. Many of them are not responding. We know their addresses and can write to pensioners, but it is getting the response that is sometimes the problem. We are trying to encourage working with partner organisations and the Pension Service to get more pensioners to claim the benefits. Tackling broad poverty is crucial, but, as my hon. Friend says, we must go further.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David.]

Mr. O'Brien: It is vital that pensioners can keep their heating on, secure in the knowledge that they can pay their fuel bills. The key to dealing with pensioner fuel poverty is therefore ensuring that pensioners have sufficient money to pay those bills. That was why we introduced the winter fuel payment in 1997—the first ever support targeted to help pensioners with their heating costs. It currently helps more than 8.5 million households, and nearly 12 million people. It has taken us away from the cold, dark days of the last Conservative Government, when freezing pensioners were offered minimal support to stay warm. Instead, Health Ministers went around telling pensioners to buy long johns and woolly nightcaps if they wanted to stay warm in winter.

We have moved on since then. Back in 1995, just £65 million was spent on cold weather payments for the vulnerable. Last winter we spent more than £2 billion on winter fuel payments. Today, the debate is not about whether we should give pensioners help with heating costs, but about how much more help we should give. In the past decade the winter fuel payment has risen tenfold, and stood at £200 for the over-60s and £300 for those over 80 last winter.

But we are not complacent. Last year we launched a cross-Government strategy to target the most vulnerable and to ensure that everyone can keep warm and keep well in winter. It brings together the priorities of my Department with those of the Department of Health, the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, and other agencies to provide a one-stop shop for help and advice on keeping warm and obtaining benefits. Schemes such as Warm Front, which my hon. Friend mentioned, have helped more than 2 million low-income households to improve their energy efficiency, through better heating or insulation. In fact, every minute of the working day, a home receives a new heating system as a result of the scheme.

As the Chancellor announced last week, we expect energy companies to increase their support to the vulnerable. In particular, we want a fairer deal for the 5 million customers on prepayment meters. Energy companies currently spend about £50 million a year on social tariffs. We want to see that treble to at least £150 million a year in the period ahead. We want to work with the energy companies, but we will take any necessary steps—I say this very clearly—to ensure that that happens.

I welcome the announcement last week by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that we will provide an additional payment of £50 for the over-60s and £100 for the over-80s, to sit alongside the winter fuel payment. That vital extra support underlines our commitment to tackling pensioner fuel poverty. It shows that the Government can react quickly to changing fuel prices, and it will ensure that the winter fuel payment continues to provide a significant contribution to winter fuel bills, providing an extra £575 million and benefiting nearly 12 million individuals. Pensioners can therefore heat their homes with more confidence next winter. It sits alongside measures announced last year that will take a further 600,000 pensioners out of paying income tax. I hope that those positive measures will be widely welcomed in the House. They provide significant extra support to our older citizens.

The generous payments that we have already put in place have, to some extent, been affected by increasing fuel prices. Back in 1997, we were getting the benefits of North sea oil and gas, and there were quite considerable beneficial changes in the world energy market. The result was that during the late '90s and the early part of this century, fuel prices were lower than earlier in the '90s. The benefits from the winter fuel payments were therefore considerable.

In the past two or three years, we have seen that some of the benefits from North sea oil have been eroded, because much of the energy it supplies has been used. It will be around for many years to come, but the easily accessible oil and gas reserves in the North sea have now been exploited. Some of the new areas will be more difficult, and therefore more expensive, to access.

We have also seen changes in the international fuel market, with extra demand coming from China, India and several other sources. The world price of energy has therefore risen, just at the point when we have to import more energy than ever before. I well remember that, when I was the Minister with responsibility for energy, I signed the agreement with Norway that would bring about a fifth of our gas from the Norwegian gas fields into Scotland through the Langeled pipeline. That is very beneficial, but we are now much more subject to world fuel prices than we were only seven or eight years ago. The result is that our fuel prices are rising, and that is having an impact on pensioners' budgets.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend and parliamentary neighbour agree with those observers who remark that it is easier for a smaller number—now five—of major energy companies to form an unofficial cartel to hold prices at higher levels than they should be, or to push them to levels that the market does not dictate? Would not that be worth investigating? Many observers think that it should be investigated.

Mr. O'Brien: Ofgem is there precisely to ensure that such a situation does not arise. The aim of setting up a regulator such as Ofgem is so that it can ensure that the market is operating properly and the interests of the consumer are paid due attention. My hon. Friend suggests that the consumer comes off worst, but Ofgem—an independent regulator proud of its independence—is aware that, especially at a time of fast-rising fuel prices, we need to ensure that energy companies are responding to the concerns of their customers and operating the best competitive market. We rely to some extent on Ofgem to carry out its regulatory and policing activities to ensure that the consumer is protected.

John Robertson: To back up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire, the difference in price between the dearest and cheapest energy suppliers is only 1.3 per cent. Is that likely to happen if we are in a competitive market?

Mr. O'Brien: That depends on whether they are competing at the lowest possible price. If they are, that might well happen. It does not necessarily mean that the market is not working effectively. It is possible that several companies are competing with each other and offering similar low price levels. However, if the prices were not low, but were agreed in some way, that would be improper and a matter that we would expect the regulators to address. Certainly, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy has indicated that we are keeping a close eye on these issues, to ensure that the energy companies are operating fairly within the market. The extra payment promised by the Chancellor will mean that the winter fuel payment for those over 60, including the £50 top-up, will total £250 next winter. That is a 25 per cent. rise on last year. For those over 80, the winter fuel payment and the £100 additional payment will total £400, a rise of one third on last year.

Last year, the winter fuel payment covered more than half of the average winter fuel bill. Next year, with rises of £50 and £100, the winter fuel payment will continue to make a significant contribution to pensioners' winter fuel bills. It is difficult to give a precise figure because we do not know precisely what the winter fuel bills will be. These measures will, I hope, ensure that many more pensioners can keep their homes warm, safe in the knowledge that they can meet their fuel bills.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, North-West suggested that we should extend the winter fuel payment to other groups. We provide a range of benefits to meet different people's needs and we have a series of benefits in place that are designed to help people who are terminally ill, cannot work or are in need of further help from the state. Older people are particularly vulnerable to the effects of cold weather during winter months. That is why we created the winter fuel payments. They give pensioners the reassurance that they can afford to heat their homes.

Other groups also have issues, such as the disabled. However, 60 per cent. of those who receive disability living allowance or attendance allowance are over 60 and already receive winter fuel payments automatically. The extra heating needs of children with disabilities arise throughout the year, not just in the winter months. The disability living allowance is worth £109.50 and will increase to £113.75 from April this year, while the poorest are entitled to some extra help through the disability premium in income-related benefits.

My hon. Friend wanted to know whether it would be possible to reconsider the issue of having two bands, one for those over 60 and one for those over 80. He suggested that it might be possible to have a more targeted, nuanced payment system and drew attention to the fact that some people on relatively high incomes also receive the supplement. We could do various things to change all that. For example, we could take the view that those on higher incomes would be taxed on their winter fuel payment. We could take the view that people on higher incomes would not receive a winter fuel payment and that we would only perhaps allocate it to those who were on pension credit.

There are all sorts of things that the Government could do to change, alter and redirect the payments. We considered all that and took the view that there was an expectation among pensioners that we would make winter fuel payments to them as we did in the past and as the Government had committed to do in their election manifestos, and that we ought to continue to do that. If there needs to be a debate about changes to the system, let us have a debate by all means. At the moment, the Government's view is that we have made commitments on winter fuel payments and we want to keep to them.

The two age-related bands make the system easier for people to understand and help older people plan ahead secure in the knowledge of the contribution they will receive towards their winter fuel bill. The current age split takes account of the fact that older pensioners over 80 are more likely to live alone or in less energy efficient homes. They are more likely to have a lower income than recently retired people. People over 80 are less likely to have well-paying final salary pension schemes. Many of those who are retiring now will have good quality final salary pension schemes, although not all of them will. People over 80 tend to spend a higher proportion of their income on fuel. Our view has been that there is a strong argument for making payments to those over 80. Of course, those older pensioners are also likely to be most vulnerable to not sensing that they are getting cold and are the most likely to fall victim to hypothermia. There is an argument for ensuring that we keep things simple while recognising that the over-80s deserve an extra payment.

My hon. Friend has made a powerful argument, and I congratulate him on raising the issues, which do call for a wider debate. The Government are committed to tackling pensioner poverty, including fuel poverty. We have made considerable progress in the past decade, with pensioner poverty falling significantly. The winter fuel payment is an important part of our strategy; we know that our cold winters affect older people more than the rest of the population. The winter fuel payment provides a guaranteed payment to all older people. It is an important contribution towards household fuel bills.

The extra money announced by the Chancellor last week will ensure that the winter fuel payment continues to make a significant contribution to pensioners' winter fuel bills next year; it is a generous extra payment, keeping pace with changes in the market. That will give older people the confidence to continue to keep their home warm, and hopefully it will keep many more of them alive. We hope that that will be the outcome of the changes that we have made.

It can always be argued that the Government could pay more and do more, but of course they have to ensure that they balance the various demands for public expenditure. However, pensioners were rightly a high priority in the Budget last week. As Minister with responsibility for pensions, I am pleased that the Chancellor listened to representations, not only from me but from people such as my hon. Friends the Members for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) and for Glasgow, North-West, on the need to consider, and respond to, the issue of rising winter fuel bills. The Chancellor did so by increasing the amounts that will be paid next winter. I am glad that that was done, and I hope that pensioners will feel the benefit of it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Ten o'clock.

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Breast and Cervical Screenings

1. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): What steps the Government is taking to encourage women to attend breast and cervical screenings regularly. [194621]

The Secretary of State for Health (Alan Johnson): Our cancer screening programmes are renowned as being among the best in the world, with some of the highest uptake levels. It is estimated that the breast and cervical screening programmes save around 6,000 lives every year. The cancer reform strategy, published last December, set out improvements to the programmes so that more women will be included and more women will be made aware of the benefits of screening, particularly in poorer communities.

Andrew Rosindell: Does the Secretary of State accept that despite the good work that is being carried out, only 70 per cent. of women between 50 and 70 are regularly being screened—once every three years—and there are huge discrepancies across the country? Have not the Government failed to meet their targets on this and, in so doing, are they not letting the women of this country down?

Alan Johnson: No, we are not, but the hon. Gentleman identifies a problem that was contained in the cancer strategy. There are variations around the country. I am sure that he will join me in congratulating his own PCT in Havering, where 79 per cent. of eligible women have been screened in the last five years. He is right about the disparities, which is why the cancer strategy asked all strategic health authorities to work with PCTs to identify how they can have more consistency and, in particular, how to get to those poorer communities. Even in the areas covered by institutions such as King's College hospital in London, which has a wide reach, there are still pockets of communities that those institutions are not getting to. That is a very important part of the cancer strategy.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend comment on this matter? Where screening detects the existence of cancer and where women are forced to have mastectomies, medical advice suggests that it is far better to have reconstructive surgery at the same time as the removal of the breast, but this is not routinely offered in all circumstances. Will he ensure that that is now part of the routine exchange between doctors and their patients?

Alan Johnson: I am happy to look into the point that my hon. Friend raises. It has not been particularly registered with me yet, but it is an important area and I will look into it.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that most NHS oncology units now offer a range of complementary services in support of their work with cancer? Is he further aware that many of those links were developed at the Royal London Homeopathic hospital, in particular the use of acupuncture, and that PCTs have been withdrawing their support for that world-famous hospital? Will he now issue guidelines to PCTs, stressing that the Royal London Homeopathic and the other hospitals, such as Tunbridge Wells, threatened with closure offer a wide range of services, in line with Government policy?

Alan Johnson: I understand the hon. Gentleman's interest in this area, but it is for PCTs to contract the right care for patients and for them to make decisions. There are many who do contract in respect of homeopathic medicines and it is important that we leave them free to decide what is best for their communities.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): According to The Lancet, the five-year survival rates for cancer sufferers in Britain are among the worst in Europe. Detecting cancer early is vital for improving the survival rate, so why are some women waiting up to 12 weeks to receive the results of their cervical smear?

Alan Johnson: We have screened 3.4 million women since 2006-07 and we are reducing the number of deaths from cancer by about 2 per cent. a year. We started off well behind the rest of Europe, but as the cancer strategy is pointing out, we are now catching up, although we need to do much more. Much of that is about early diagnosis, but I accept the problem of women being called back within a proper time if their screening determines that there is a problem to resolve. We have made enormous strides on that and we believe that we have a record of which we can be proud in this country.

Drug Addicts

2. John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): What steps he is taking to ensure that drug addicts referred for out-of-area treatment have a fully developed care plan and that the referring agency retains responsibility for the client through subsequent stages of their treatment and rehabilitation. [194622]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Dawn Primarolo): Following the issuing of guidance in 2007, the National Treatment Agency has been working closely with the local partnership in Weston-super-Mare, and the National Offender Management Service is working closely with the relevant probation service to resolve the difficulties identified by the hon. Gentleman.

John Penrose: I thank the Minister for that reply, but outside the probation service—in terms of medical referrals for addicts going for treatment in places such as Weston-super-Mare—will she commit here and now to the principle that the referring agency sending the addict for treatment retains responsibility for that addict throughout their programme of treatment and rehabilitation, rather than just allowing them to be abandoned into the care of local services after one or more of the initial steps in their treatment has been completed?

Dawn Primarolo: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman on his important point, particularly with regard to the experiences of communities in Weston-super-Mare. I intend to follow this through, because treatment plans are an important part of the process and of supporting individuals. First, I will speak to my colleagues in the Ministry of Justice, specifically about referrals through probation services. Secondly, we will work with the NTA, the local authority and the local partnership to ensure that we address other referrals to the area in the way he suggests, because that is the only way to ensure that the treatment plans are delivered and work. I commend him for working so hard on this issue for so long.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): The January National Audit Office report on community sentences drew attention to the shortage of alcohol misuse treatment courses. Should not the NHS be working with the probation services locally to make sure that rehabilitation for alcohol misusers is available everywhere in the country?

Dawn Primarolo: We expect the local area partnerships, including probation services, local authorities and the primary care trusts, to develop the relevant strategies, treatment and support for their communities, including treatments in residential places for those with alcohol misuse problems. If my hon. Friend has specific issues concerning his area that he wants to draw to my attention, I will be happy for him to do so, and I will follow them through.

Anne Milton (Guildford) (Con): According to the Government's own figures, since 1997 deaths due to misuse of drugs have increased by almost a quarter and we have also seen the street price of class A drugs almost double. Is the Minister concerned that the fully developed care plans are not really happening and that the lack of integration is causing some of those deaths, and what will she do about that?

Dawn Primarolo: As I am sure the hon. Lady knows, there has been a 13 per cent. fall in drug-related deaths since 2001, and the number of people in treatment is now at record levels. I am sure that she would also like to congratulate the Government on the extra resources they are putting into drug treatment, and in particular into ensuring the delivery of effective treatment. Ten years ago, there was no treatment, but there is treatment now, and we must ensure that it is effective and co-ordinated. That is the Government's objective.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that people from as far afield as Bournemouth are being referred to private drug clinics in my constituency, causing concern to both local police and the drug action team? What action does she intend to take to ensure that there is proper supervision and regulation of such clinics and a constant, proper treatment plan for individuals?

Dawn Primarolo: If there is a referral from a probation service outside my hon. Friend's area, the guidance is clear: that probation service needs to refer to the relevant probation service with a care plan. On treatment centres, the Commission for Social Care Inspection is responsible for registered care homes and making sure they are properly provided for; the Healthcare Commission is responsible for making sure that registered hospitals come up to standard; and her local authority is responsible for all other registered treatment centres. If my hon. Friend is concerned about these matters and feels that the local partnership is unable to deliver that co-ordination, I will be happy to receive representations from her and put them to the NTA.

Social Care Users

3. Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): By what means individual budgets will be allocated to social care users over the next three years. [194624]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Local authorities will receive an annual social care reform grant in addition to mainstream resources over the next three years to support the radical transformation of social care in every area. Personal budgets for the vast majority of those receiving public funding are at the heart of that vision.

Mr. Anderson: What can be done to ensure that the organisations that deliver these services for vulnerable people are properly trained and have knowledge of health and safety, that police records are checked and that the organisations are capable of doing the job that we are going to pay them to do?

Mr. Lewis: My hon. Friend is right to raise those issues. Personal budgets put maximum power and control in the hands of people using services and their families, recognising that they are best placed to make choices about where they want to get care from and allowing them to control their own care and support. Of course, we also must ensure the right balance between giving people that power and control, and appropriate protection in terms of the quality of the support that people receive.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The Minister will be aware that it is much more expensive to deliver these services in rural areas. What assessment has his Department made of the impact on delivering this social care policy of the 2p extra per litre from this autumn? I understand that it will have a big impact on those making visits and delivering these care services, particularly in rural areas.

Mr. Lewis: Of course, this matter relates to how local authorities receive their finance from the Department for Communities and Local Government. Account is taken of a variety of factors when deciding about the allocation of those resources. When local authorities commission services from care agencies or organise services through them they must make adequate resources available so that domiciliary care agencies, or residential and nursing homes, can offer the quality care that people have a right to expect.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): We congratulate the Minister on the pilot schemes that have been conducted whereby disabled people in particular have had personalised budgets. Can he assure the House that older people, some of whom have mild difficulties and experience some confusion, will not be disadvantaged by what I see partly as an atomisation of these funds to people who may not have the power of advocacy shared by everyone, which means that they may not do particularly well and could be overlooked completely in the new scheme of things that he has planned?

Mr. Lewis: Of course, my hon. Friend raises an important point. First, the principle is that we should assume that individuals have the ability to make choices and exercise self-determination about their lives. Where someone clearly has difficulty making such choices because of disability or their health, family members are often better placed to make decisions about care and support than professionals ever will be. If family support is not available, what matters is that we put in place professionals and advocates who can ensure that money is spent in the best interests of the person. All the evidence from the individual budget pilots suggests, first, that where people have more control, they get better quality of life outcomes in terms of what they want in order to live an independent life and, secondly, that we get much better value for public money.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Many of these social care users are either in residential or nursing care homes, many of which are under extreme financial pressure. What can the Minister do to speed up payments to the homes?

Mr. Lewis: I say to the hon. Gentleman that, with all due respect, we cannot have a set of policies that aim to provide maximum devolution, localism and control located in local communities, rather than top-down diktats from Westminster and Whitehall, and then ask Ministers to interfere in decisions that properly belong with local authorities. We want local authorities to use their commissioning responsibilities to ensure that they incentivise and encourage high-quality care that puts dignity and respect at its heart, particularly for older people, and that they close down homes that cannot offer that quality and dignity to older people. It is important that local authorities treat providers fairly, but those decisions have to be taken at local level.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): What guidance is given to local authorities to ensure that maximum flexibility is allowed to those in receipt of individual budgets? The Minister will know from correspondence that when people have moved from the part of my constituency in the Lancashire county council area into the Blackpool council area they have found that the budgets that they have been allocated cannot be transferred and that some of the care that they have purchased is not the sort that the other local authority will allow. We need uniformity around the country.

Mr. Lewis: My hon. Friend has been a champion for older people and for social care generally since she was elected to this place and was a distinguished chairman of her local authority social services committee, and she raises an important issue. It is one of the reasons why we are conducting a fundamental review of the eligibility criteria—we know that people's entitlement to services can be very different depending on where they live—and why we are committed this year to a fundamental consultation involving people throughout the country on the nature of the future care and support system for older people, disabled people and people with mental health problems. We face significant demographic pressures—an aging society—and different expectations, in that people want to live in their own homes and have independent lives, so we need to have a debate and then a new funding settlement on care and support in the future.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): When direct payments were introduced, my local authority drew up a service level agreement with the Shaw Trust to act as a management agency, supporting people with learning disabilities to manage their care packages. Does my hon. Friend agree that such a management agency will be vital for local authorities to help vulnerable older people manage the money to manage their care?

Mr. Lewis: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The encouraging news is that in 2004, 20,000 people were using direct payments, but by 2006 nearly 60,000 people were using them. So, contrary to the myth, the system is incredibly popular when people are given a genuine choice. Having said that, when personal budgets and payments become the norm and part of the mainstream of the social care system, we will have to build systems in every locality that enable people to exercise that choice and control. One of the issues that we will have to address is minimising the bureaucracy and the red tape, including payroll, human resources and employment law.

Waiting Times

4. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What the average waiting time for hospital treatment was at the end of April 1997, and on the most recent date for which figures are available. [194625]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The average waiting time for hospital treatment has fallen from 13 weeks in March 1997 to less than five weeks at the end of January 2008. By December this year, no one should have to wait for longer than 18 weeks from the time of GP referral to treatment. By contrast, in 1997 it was not uncommon to wait for more than two years and people died languishing on waiting lists.

Mr. Bone: I thank the Minister for that answer, but it was not an answer to the question that I asked. Since 1997, the average waiting time for hospital treatment has increased by 20 per cent. Why does it take 20 per cent. longer under this Government to receive treatment than it did under the Conservatives?

Mr. Bradshaw: I did answer the question that the hon. Gentleman asked. He has made the mistake of not analysing a recent misrepresentation of a particular statistic on the BBC website that took the median weight for people who had actually had their treatment. The reason—[Interruption.] Wait for it: I can explain it to the hon. Gentleman. The reason why the median increased up to 2004-05 was that all the people who had been waiting for an extremely long time under the previous Government were now getting their treatment. Previously, those people were not even included in the figures. So it is entirely misleading for the hon. Gentleman or anyone else to suggest that average waiting times have increased under this Government. Of course they have not, and it is complete nonsense.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Waiting lists will, to a large extent, depend on the configuration of services, and the Minister will know that in north Oxfordshire we are anxiously waiting to discover what is going to happen to proposals for the Oxford Radcliffe NHS Trust and the configuration of services at the Horton hospital. Can any Minister explain to me why it was not possible for the independent reconfiguration panel to publish its proposals today, when we have health questions, instead of on Thursday, just before the House rises for the Easter recess? If they had been published today, Ministers could have been held accountable, but as it is we will not be able to ask Ministers questions about those proposals for more than a month.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman appears to suggest that the independent reconfiguration panel should set its timetable for the convenience of Ministers. I would have thought that that was exactly what he would not want. He will have to be a little more patient, because it is an independent panel and we do not set its timetable. I am sure that he would be very critical of us if we were to do so.

Organ Donation (Devolved Administrations)

5. Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): What discussions he has had with counterparts in devolved administrations on promoting organ donation. [194626]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): All four UK Health Ministers have accepted the 14 recommendations of the organ donation taskforce and will work together to promote organ donation. The taskforce believes that implementation of the recommendations will increase donor rates by 50 per cent. over five years and enable around 1,200 additional transplants each year.

Gordon Banks: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. As we await the organ donation task force report, which is expected later in the summer, I urge the Minister to ensure that the organ shortage in the UK is tackled and solved on a UK-wide basis and not on one that is decided by regional assemblies and Parliaments.

Mr. Lewis: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We have worked closely so far in partnership with devolved Administrations. I want us to move to a UK-wide approach to these issues. We should remember the human nature of the issue. People all over the UK are waiting to have transplants right now. We need more organs. It is important for both people's lives and their quality of life that we significantly increase the availability of organs in the future. It is about people's quality of life.

Elderly People (Care)

6. Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): What steps he is taking to improve provision of care to the elderly. [194627]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): A number of steps are being taken to improve the provision of care to the elderly, including a three-year social care transformation programme, the first ever national dementia strategy, the new deal for carers, the extension of our dignity and care campaign, CSCI's review of social care eligibility criteria, the introduction of star ratings for care providers, the review of the adult protection framework, Lord Darzi's NHS next stage final report and public consultation that will lead to a Green Paper on the future of care and support.

Mr. Willis: I compliment the Minister on producing a series of policy documents. The sadness is that there is a huge disconnect between the policy and its delivery. An elderly lady in North Yorkshire was discharged from hospital last week into the care of North Yorkshire social services. She was not able to make a cup of tea, to eat or to get to the toilet. Five days later, she is back in hospital with a broken wrist and dehydration. When will the Minister make two clear criteria for care of the elderly? First, nobody should be discharged from hospital unless they have 24-hour access to support. Secondly, the elderly in particular should receive rehabilitation before they are discharged into their own homes without any support at all.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. Gentleman raises a serious point. I take personal responsibility for ensuring that he is well looked after in his retirement. The serious point is that the experience of that elderly lady in North Yorkshire is entirely unacceptable. The relevant local authority and health services need to get their acts together. There is no excuse whatsoever for older people being discharged from hospital and left without appropriate care in their homes. That is why we are reviewing the eligibility criteria and why, from April, we will radically transform the way in which social care is carried out in every part of the country, including Yorkshire. We are reviewing the eligibility criteria, as they mean that far too many older people are left alone without adequate care and support. The hon. Gentleman is right. Of course, we need to ensure that national policy supports an improvement in people's experiences. Equally we need better local leadership to take responsibility for closing the gap between health and social services.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): As my hon. Friend knows, most elderly people want to stop in their own homes. We want to support them. Given that we are going to have individualised budgets, does he not realise that he has to come to a decision and make it a duty on every local authority that provides social care to maintain a list of the providers of services so that elderly people have the information to make a confident decision about whom they will purchase their services from?

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Older people and their families tell us time and again that they do not have high-quality, easy-to-access information that enables them to make very difficult choices about their care or the care of a vulnerable relative. That is why at the heart of the transformation of the social care programme in every local authority area will be a new approach to information, advice and, where necessary, advocacy. That need for high-quality information and advice must apply to people who fund their own care as well as those who receive public funding.

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): A big issue in the care sector is the staff turnover rate, which is as high as 25 per cent. in domiciliary care, with as many as half those leaving the profession, or possibly more, doing so for good. As well as the severe implications for continuity of care, which the Government acknowledge is very important, there is a clear cost implication. Training costs £980 per person and in 2004-05 local authorities spent £20 million on advertising for vacancies and £151 million on agency staff. This is a problem: what does he intend to do about it?

Mr. Lewis: May I say to my good friend that he raises a really important issue, because we need to address the status and value of people working in social care? The work force tend to be low-paid and low-skilled, and that is one reason why the Government are investing a large amount in training. It is important that some of that money gets through to the private sector, as 75 per cent. of social care is provided by organisations in the private and voluntary sectors rather than by local authorities. Moreover, in the new care and support system that we will need in the future, it is vital that we get right the leadership, management and commissioning of the work force.

We must also have the right front-line staff. Last night, I was fortunate enough to give out awards to the heroes who, every day of the week, make a massive difference for the most vulnerable people in our society. However, we do not have enough such people, and we need to do better with our work force.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that Northamptonshire county council is withholding the extra funds provided by the Government to pay for increased care for older people, and not passing the money on to care homes? Is that happening elsewhere? What will the Government do to ensure that the funds that they provide to pay for old people's care are not withheld by local authorities and used instead on internal bureaucracy?

Mr. Lewis: It is for local authorities to decide the level of fees that they are willing to pay to providers, but it is difficult to justify zero per cent. increases when everyone knows that, at the minimum, care providers must take account of inflation. Increasingly, we want local authorities to use their commissioning power to reward with premium rates those homes and domiciliary care agencies that offer quality and dignity, and to be much tougher on those services that achieve only the minimum standards and that do not offer the dignity and respect that older people in particular deserve.

General Practitioners (Opening Hours)

7. Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): What representations he has received from general practitioners on extended opening hours. [194628]

The Secretary of State for Health (Alan Johnson): I have received representations from GPs and the British Medical Association, as well as from patients and patient groups. I am pleased that the BMA has agreed new arrangements for GP practices to be open in the evenings and at weekends. The new arrangements will benefit patients, the NHS and GPs.

Annette Brooke: I thank the Secretary of State for his answer. Do the Government have any plans to force GPs to open for a set number of hours? Does he agree that forcing them to open for extended hours in the evening when there is no demonstrable need would have a knock-on impact on the general quality of primary care services?

Alan Johnson: The answers are no and yes: no, we will not force any GPs to open longer; and yes, there would be an adverse effect if we were to do what the hon. Lady suggests. Our negotiations with the BMA were based on getting GPs to open for an extra half an hour for every 1,000 patients on their books, which would mean that an average-sized practice would be open for an extra three hours a week. A much smaller practice would not be open for so many extra hours, while a much bigger one would be open for more. Our formula takes into account the fact that in many areas—rural areas, for instance—there is no need or demand for GPs to be open longer.

In the ballot that was held, 92 per cent. of GPs who voted accepted a system that will not force them to do anything that they do not wish to do. However, the system will ensure that the taxpayer's money that is there to incentivise GPs will, among other things, give them an incentive to open for longer. That is what the patients in the vast majority of our communities want.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the flexibility to which he has referred should reflect the fact that a town may have a walk-in centre that also provides health services? In his discussions with the BMA and GPs, has he been able to make it clear that there will be no financial disincentive for GP practices in areas where such walk-in centres exist? Sometimes, as is the case in my area, a GP practice and a walk-in centre are located in almost exactly the same premises.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Along with the BMA, we will be implementing the process. The BMA has made it clear that now that it has the ballot result it will work with us. Our ambition will be to ensure that there are no unintended consequences. My hon. Friend is probably right to say that the availability and accessibility of walk-in centres are fine as they are. As a result of the process, we expect about 50 per cent. of GP practices across the country to be open for longer. That will get the balance right and probably, with the 250 new GP practices that we are introducing across the country, which will be open from 8 am to 8 pm—150 of them, seven days a week—it will give the required choice to customers who want to visit their GP later in the evening or on Saturday mornings.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): May I confirm what the Secretary of State has already said? Many GPs in my constituency have contacted me to say that most of their patients are either the elderly retired or mums with young children and there is simply no demand to open practices until 8 o'clock at night. I encourage the Secretary of State not to impose a one-size-fits-all solution on areas such as mine in South-West Devon.

Alan Johnson: I do not accept the argument that patients who are mainly older people and young mothers do not want surgeries to be open for longer. To me, that is in the same category as the comment of a BMA representative, who said that accountants did not open more than five days a week so why should GPs. The evidence is that where surgeries are open for longer—for example, in Tower Hamlets, where they recently opened on Saturday mornings, or Kingston, where there has been such a service for much longer—the people who visit them on Saturday mornings are indeed elderly people and mothers with young children, who welcome the choice of going there either in the week or on Saturday mornings. I really think we shall find that there has been a bit of a myth, although I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about rural areas, which relates to my original answer.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): It is now accepted that the Government originally mismanaged the GP contract negotiations, leading to an overspend of £1.76 billion. To address that imprudent miscalculation, the Government have reneged on agreements, including renegotiating the GP contract and unlawfully capping GP pensions. GPs are demoralised and disengaged; 97 per cent. of GPs have no confidence in the Government's handling of the NHS—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make a speech. He should ask a question, but he has not asked one so far. Perhaps the Secretary of State could try to answer, because I have to get down the Order Paper and I am getting rather fed up with Front Benchers taking too long.

Alan Johnson: I think Opposition Members are on the wrong side of the argument about GP access. They are also wrong to say that the new contract in 2004 was an error—[Hon. Members: "Oh."] Or erroneous? That contract was designed to address a situation in which GPs were largely leaving the service and no medical graduates wanted to be GPs. We were facing a huge shortage and, incidentally, under the old arrangements, GPs were disgracefully underpaid and worked for too long. I think we did exactly the right thing. Yes, one of the consequences is—

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Would you do the same again?

Alan Johnson: Yes, because now GPs work 17 per cent. less—the number of hours they work has fallen by 17 per cent.—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am going to be even-handed. I call Mr. Hollobone.

NHS Dentistry

8. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): If he will make a statement on access to NHS dentistry in (a) the area covered by Northamptonshire teaching primary care trust and (b) England. [194629]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): There was an increase of 7 per cent. in the number of dentists in Northamptonshire in the year to March 2007. In Kettering itself, there were 44 per cent. more dentists in 2006 than in 1997. Nationally, there are 4,000 more dentists than in 1997, and investment in NHS dentistry has more than doubled.

Mr. Hollobone: According to the NHS information centre, the number of patients in Northamptonshire seen by their dentist has fallen by 13,000 since the new dental contracts were introduced. Given that Northamptonshire is among the one third of primary care trusts that have yet to undertake a needs assessment of children's orthodontics, what measures will the Minister take to ensure that children in Northamptonshire who need orthodontic treatment will get it?

Mr. Bradshaw: I certainly urge the hon. Gentleman's primary care trust to get on with that work. There is no excuse now for any primary care trust in the country not to do so, given the increased investment in dentistry: there is an 11 per cent. increase this year and in the next comprehensive spending review period. There is a requirement in the current operating framework for all PCTs to increase, year on year, public access to NHS dentists. There is no excuse for any PCT, including the hon. Gentleman's, not to improve its results.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Plymouth PCT, which only a short time ago had 12,000 patients outstanding on its waiting list, who had to wait anything up to 18 months? It has turned things around, and before Christmas—the situation may have further improved by now—it had about 500 patients on its waiting list who were waiting only up to 12 weeks. Does he share my hope that the Peninsula dental school, which in a couple of years' time will be doing—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am happy to congratulate Plymouth PCT, and I also congratulate my local PCT, which has halved the number of people waiting for NHS dentistry in the past 12 months. The south-west is one part of the country that historically has had problems, but they have been addressed, partly by the Government's creation of new dental schools, including one in Plymouth, for the first time in more than 40 years.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Yet again we have heard a Minister deny that there is a crisis in NHS dentistry. However, the Patients Association recently published a report entitled "The New Dental Contract—Full of Holes and Causing Pain?" Whom should we believe: the Government or the Patients Association, which tells us that there is a crisis in NHS dentistry?

Mr. Bradshaw: I would rather listen to the testimony of hon. Members of this House, speaking from experience of their constituency, and to the facts. Given the introduction of the new contract, and the new investment that is now coming on stream in dentistry, I am afraid I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that not for much longer will he be able to say in the House that NHS dentistry is in crisis.

Procurement Targets

10. Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): How many targets he has set on the procurement of services. [194631]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I understand that the hon. Gentleman's question relates to primary care. There are a number of national requirements, such as being able to see a GP in 48 hours and book appointments ahead. There are also new requirements this year for new GP-led health centres, new GP practices in the areas with the greatest need, and more convenient opening times for the public.

Andrew George: On 4 July last year, the Secretary of State told the House that he would give the NHS a "sustained period of organisational and financial stability" and said that

"there will be no further centrally dictated, top-down restructuring"—[Official Report, 4 July 2007; Vol. 462, c. 962.]

Does the Minister not accept that there is a centrally dictated, top-down method of procurement for the alternative providers of medical services—GP practices? That contradicts the Secretary of State's welcome words. Why does the Minister not accept that PCTs are in the best position to decide how best to expand capacity and choice in primary care?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman is wrong: there is no top-down diktat from Whitehall on how the new health centres should be procured. That is up to primary care trusts in each area. In his own area, the primary care trust is at the moment out to consultation on where best to put the new health centre. He talks about stability in the system; his own primary care trust has seen a 20.1 per cent. increase in its funding in the last two years, and it is getting a 5.5 per cent. increase in the next financial year.

Polyclinics (Rural Areas)

11. Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): What assessment he has made of the impact of his Department's proposals for polyclinics on the provision of general practitioner services in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [194632]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Local primary care trusts are responsible for organising services in their area. They are currently talking to local people and NHS staff about how the new GP-led health centres can best be provided to meet local needs.

Miss Kirkbride: I have to say that the Minister's answer gives me only very modest reassurance about the intentions of the Department of Health. I implore him not to allow PCTs to have a one-size-fits-all answer, because although polyclinics may be very worth while in some parts of the country, in other more rural parts the local GP service—the smaller service, which perhaps does not offer all the services that are available at the polyclinic—is much more welcome, and much more appreciated by the people who use it, than a polyclinic at much greater distance would be.

Mr. Bradshaw: I entirely agree that there should not be a one-size-fits-all diktat from Whitehall, and that is exactly why we are leaving it up to local primary care trusts to decide, at the local level, what is the best model for them to use in providing the new services to which we are committed. However, a health centre or polyclinic, or whatever people want to call it, opened recently in a rural area in Devon, near my constituency, and it is very popular. It offers complementary medicine—the hon. Member for Bosworth (David Tredinnick) is no longer in the Chamber—and a number of other services that patients welcome and benefit from. In some cases, such centres can reduce hugely the number of unnecessary admissions to local acute hospitals, which eases pressure on them.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): If the Minister comes up to my large rural constituency, he will be able to see how best to introduce polyclinics. Will he allow us to keep the title "health centre" rather than "polyclinic" for both Warsop and Harworth?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes. We should not get hung up on definitions. One person's health centre is another person's polyclinic is another person's community hospital. I am aware that there is a good one in my hon. Friend's constituency. It is not my area, but I am sure that one of my hon. Friends will be delighted to come and visit it.

Topical Questions

T1. [194611] Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his departmental responsibilities.

The Secretary of State for Health (Alan Johnson): The responsibilities of my Department embrace the whole range of NHS, social care, mental health and public health service delivery, all of which are of equal importance.

Ben Chapman: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is widespread concern in the Wirral that the decentralisation of dermatology services will result in a deterioration in the quality of the treatment provided, a loss of critical mass, a loss of specialism, a loss of resource and a generally poorer service? Does he have plans to review the policy?

Alan Johnson: I do not agree with my hon. Friend, who wrote to me about the matter in June. What has happened in the Wirral is that some dermatology services are moving to local community-based services. That does not detract at all from the specialist dermatology units in hospitals in the Wirral, and I can give him the assurance that that will enhance dermatology services and not detract from them.

T2. [194612] Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): It is only just over a year ago now that the Government produced their consultation paper on community hospitals, giving broad support for hospitals, despite which Kennett and North Wiltshire primary care trust announced deep and damaging cuts in Chippenham hospital in my constituency. It announced that the number of beds in Chippenham hospital would go down from 43 to 30, which we all opposed. Will the Minister explain why the PCT announced today that there would be not even 30 beds but 10, which is not viable from an economic or a medical standpoint?

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Our understanding is that the local PCT has decided to reduce the number of medical beds not to 10 but to 20 at Chippenham hospital, because it has cut delayed discharges by half and successfully introduced district nursing teams. The maternity unit at Chippenham is being expanded. The proposals have been backed by the Conservative Wiltshire county council overview and scrutiny committee. As the hon. Gentleman knows, because he has had a good briefing from the local PCT chief executive, the PCT is bidding for capital funding from the Department for a massive expansion of facilities at Chippenham hospital.

T3. [194613] Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Is the Minister aware that there is a problem with prescription drugs being ordered on the internet from overseas and imported into the United Kingdom through the post? That is fuelling a growing trend, particularly in sleeping pill addiction, sometimes with fatal consequences. Will she consider speaking to the Foreign Office and the Home Office to set up a special unit to address this dangerous trade?

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Dawn Primarolo): I am aware of the trends that the hon. Gentleman describes and I have had discussions with the relevant authorities. As he knows, there are strict controls on imported drugs, but we are speaking primarily about internet and mail order for personal use. The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency is taking steps to monitor that and working with Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, international authorities, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry and the British Medical Association. I will certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's point about taking that further through co-operation in Europe.

T6. [194616] Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend describe what he is doing to ensure that there are opportunities for young people, and particularly for older women eager to start work after having children, to take up apprenticeships in his Department and the wider health service?

Alan Johnson: I can tell my hon. Friend, who is a great champion of apprenticeships, that 5,000 apprentices are registered with the Learning and Skills Council in health-related apprenticeships, for example in dental nursing or as pharmacy assistants. We plan to treble that to 15,000 by 2010. I will look into the possibility of designing apprenticeships so that more women who wish to return to work can do an apprenticeship in the national health service.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): May I draw the Secretary of State's attention to a document obtained by Remedy UK? It is a survey of hospital trusts around the country, and it shows massive problems in recruitment—particularly at senior house officer level. It also shows a national shortage of doctors able to do locums. All that appears to be putting patient safety at risk: in Surrey, an NHS trust says:

"we had to run the service on several occasions without the required number of doctors".

On top of all the problems last year, is that not more evidence of a failure of work force management and planning? What will the Government do about it, particularly given the risks to patient safety and patient care?

Alan Johnson: We are aware of the issue; the problem has been circulating anecdotally for some time. We do take it seriously; that is why at the beginning of February we asked the strategic health authorities to help us understand its extent and nature. It is worth bearing in mind the fact that we employ 120,000 doctors in England, and although some trusts have reported such issues, many have not.

There have always been problems in staffing some rotas in shortage specialties. The issue for us has been whether the nature and scale of the problem are different this year. The survey has given us a clearer idea of how to tackle the issue. On the point made by Remedy UK, I should say that this year we will move to three different starting points for junior doctors, rather than the single system that may well have had an effect on the figures cited by the hon. Gentleman.

T7. [194617] Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): One of the undoubted successes of the past 10 years has been the flow of money into areas such as mine, where medical need is higher than in other parts of the country. However, do my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench accept that we still have some way to go to make sure that patient need is what determines funding—not simply historical patterns, particularly those imposed for grossly partisan political reasons by a previous Conservative Government?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend will know that the funding for his primary care trust, which covers some deprived areas in Manchester, has increased by 25 per cent. in the past few years. Our aim is to ensure that that process continues without taking away money from areas without those levels of deprivation. All areas must receive an increase in funding; those with specific health needs—they are usually in the areas of greatest deprivation—should receive more.

We have made an across-the-board allocation of 5.5 per cent. this year, because the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation, the organisation that does the statistics for us, requested an extension before it could give us its new formula. We have made an across-the-board increase this year; next year, however, we will return to ensuring that issues such as deprivation are fully taken into account.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree with me that it would be unacceptable if a junior doctor who had been working in the national health service for several years post-registration could not complete their specialty training simply because of the lack of training places?

Alan Johnson: I would like to know the specific details. We would like all doctors in training to have a job at the end of that training. There is no absolute certainty that people training for any profession—to be architects, lawyers or even postal workers—will have a job at the end of their training. However, we want to ensure that people do have a job at the end of their training, which is why we try to get the statistics and figures right. If the hon. Gentleman has a particular concern about a specific doctor, I shall be happy to look into the matter.

Mr. Lansley: As we have the Secretary of State here, may I ask him about the Budget? Last week in his Budget statement, the Chancellor did not say anything about the national health service, but according to the Red Book the future provision for NHS expenditure over the next three years was cut by £3.2 billion—that is, there will be £3.2 billion less in provision for the NHS in the next three years. Can the Secretary of State explain why?

Alan Johnson: The Chancellor was able to report record levels of investment in the national health service, rising to £110 billion at the end of this comprehensive spending review period. I am fascinated to learn that the hon. Gentleman is going to put another £28 billion into the NHS, as well as make the £10 billion in tax cuts to which his party is already committed.

Mr. Khalid Mahmood (Birmingham, Perry Barr) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Heart of Birmingham primary care trust on building a brand new primary care health centre in my constituency? Will he find time to come to the opening in the near future?

Alan Johnson: I would very much like to come to see my hon. Friend's new health centre. [Interruption.] It may well be a polyclinic. The Conservative party spelled polyclinic "pollyclinic" in a recent press release. We are not building health centres for parrots, and my advice to the Opposition is that they should not criticise a policy they cannot spell.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Do the Government accept that people in rural areas already have to travel considerable distances to a GP practice, and the cost of getting there will increase in the near future? Does the Secretary of State accept that rural GP practices are particularly important and that the Government should place special emphasis on their survival? The role that they play in rural areas is important and we must not deprive those areas of facilities any further.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman is right about the importance of GP services in rural areas, not least because, if we expand the services available in GP practices in rural areas, patients would not have to travel long distances to hospital. I am meeting the Government's rural adviser shortly to discuss GP services in rural areas.

T8. [194618] Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Last September, the Prime Minister announced that all hospitals would receive a deep clean to help to tackle the scourge of superbugs such as MRSA. My hospital trust—the Heart of England NHS Foundation Trust—has estimated that it will cost between £600,000 and £700,000 to deliver the deep clean. Why is the cost having to be met from front-line services when the Government asserted that that should be done with new money?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Lady has been misinformed. We have provided the funding to each strategic health authority to meet the cost of the deep clean. They are not expected to divert money from other resources to it. We provided the money from the centre.

T4. [194614] Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Three out of 10 pregnant women carry the group B streptococcal bacterium, which is the most common form of life-threatening condition in new-born babies. Will the Minister with responsibility for public health agree to meet me and Group B Strep Support, which campaigns for routine screening for that condition?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman has raised the matter with me. If he speaks to me at the end of Question Time, we will make arrangements for a meeting.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State aware that the all-party social care group recently completed an inquiry into the challenges that face the social care work force? Will he ensure that, when social care staff work in multidisciplinary teams, they are accorded due status and that the voice of social work is heard on behalf of their clients?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): My hon. Friend is right to make that point. If we consider that more and more people stay in their homes, that we are moving care out of hospital and closer to home, and that we are keeping people out of institutionalised care, the contribution of social care is increasingly essential and every bit as important as that of the NHS. The professionals who work in those different agencies should be afforded the same value and respect. We need to start blurring some of the professional titles and focus on the needs of individual patients and families.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): The Secretary of State knows that everyone in my constituency anxiously awaits his decision to approve the new PFI hospital at Pembury. Will he reassure me that we will have that decision, as planned, by the end of the month?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has today given final approval for the scheme to reach financial close. He expects the formal contract for the new hospital to be signed shortly. Construction of the new facilities is due to begin in late March and the first patients are scheduled to be admitted in early 2011, with the project completed by 2012.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): Self-harm is a key indicator that someone may go on to take their own life. What steps are the Government taking to provide counselling and support for self-harmers?

Mr. Lewis: My hon. Friend raises an important point. As she is aware, we have a national suicide strategy in this country that has been effective in reducing suicides. We have made significant progress. She is absolutely right to raise the particular problem in her constituency and to demand action to deal with it. The number of young people who have died in a relatively short period of time in her constituency is frightening. It is very important that the relevant authorities in that area respond in a positive and collaborative way. We certainly have to take self-harm far more seriously than perhaps we have in the past.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This morning you will have noticed news coverage of the Secretary of State for Defence trying to gag coroners by taking legal action. Have you had a request from the Secretary of State to come to the Dispatch Box and make a statement on this important matter?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to table parliamentary questions to the Minister concerned, he is welcome to do so.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In fairness to you and the House, I simply observe that my office was told by the independent reconfiguration panel that it is publishing its report on Thursday rather than today at the behest of the office of the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising that matter.

Land Use (Garden Protection)

3.31 pm

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for the protection of gardens and urban green spaces; and for connected purposes.

Hon. Members may recall that last year I sought to close a loophole in planning law that has led to gardens up and down the country being prioritised for building. My private Member's Bill last year followed the extensive work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark). I am delighted that he is a sponsor of my current Bill. Despite having support from hon. Members from all parties in the House, my Bill last year was talked out by the Government, who have so far failed to solve the problem. How I wish that they had listened more carefully to the impassioned, eloquent contributions from Government Members on the subject.

In my current Bill, I am once again asking for a simple provision to be made in planning law so that local councils can, where they feel it appropriate, protect gardens from being built on. Ministers claim that such a power already exists in changes that they have made to planning guidance, but the evidence from my constituency since the introduction of that and other guidance shows that the problem continues. In my constituency, 43 per cent. of all applications made have been to build on a garden site. In other areas, the situation is even worse. A survey of six local authorities—Bradford, Chelmsford, Guildford, Nottingham, Oxford and Tunbridge Wells—found that 72 per cent. of all brownfield site development was on gardens.

The impact on the environment, infrastructure and people's quality of life has been disastrous. Gardens are a valuable source of biodiversity. They are a haven for wildlife and play a critical role in getting the balance right between the built and the natural environments. The gardens being concreted over are leaving a malign environmental legacy.

Just a few weeks ago, Sir Michael Pitt, who led the Government's review of last summer's floods, told the BBC that the garden grabbing surge had increased the risk of further flooding. He said:

"If it was just one house and one garden, this would not be an issue. It's the cumulative effect over time of many, many properties".

It would be a mistake for the Government to ignore Sir Michael and an even greater one to underestimate the strength of public feeling on the issue.

I ask colleagues simply to Google "garden grabbing" and see the fury that the issue is creating. Garden Organic has a powerful online campaign, to which people have sent their pictures and testimonials about the damage that has been wrought by current planning policy. The people contributing are not mindless nimbies; they are raising concerns about the environment and infrastructure, which is plain common sense. Neighbourhoods with roads, parking spaces and drainage systems originally designed to serve a handful of properties are buckling under the unsustainable number of flats being built in back gardens.

[Mrs. Caroline Spelman]

In my constituency, there is an application to demolish two family homes on Elmdon lane in Marston Green and to replace them with 71 new dwellings. Just think about the impact of that development. I am talking about a narrow, tree-lined avenue with a hump-backed bridge, where garden grabbing could lead to traffic levels increasing by 3,400 per cent.

Ironically, the changes that Ministers have made to planning legislation actually favour garden development. The combination of centrally imposed housing and density targets has left elected, accountable local authorities with little scope to defend their refusal at appeal. The Government repeatedly point to a "brownfield first" policy but, ironically, they themselves define "brownfield" for planning purposes, rather than for statistical purposes only, as they did originally. That has meant that the correct preference for genuine brownfield land to be given priority in the planning system is fatally undermined, because gardens are rich pickings for developers, who will favour gardens over a gasworks any day. This is borne out by the words of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), who memorably told the House of developers flying over the back gardens of Sunderland in helicopters, looking for sites to develop and neglecting the genuine brownfield sites in the process.

The logic for developers is that garden sites tend to be in areas of higher real-estate value. The end result is that two-bedroom flats are created at a price that is way beyond the pocket of first-time buyers. Also, small developments built in back gardens frequently fall below the threshold for providing affordable homes. The preference for blocks of flats on garden sites has meant that the genuine need for affordable family homes is simply not being met.

Propertyfinder.com, a major property search engine, states that

"there is a large oversupply of two bedroom flats, many of which are lying empty and unsold...The lack of availability of larger homes has in turn affected their affordability as excess demand and insufficient supply has increased the gap between the price of a two-bed and a three-bed home."

So why are the Government repeatedly turning a deaf ear to this issue? Are they unaware of the environmental legacy that we are leaving? Do they have an innate wish to see gardens and green spaces being built on? Or is it simply that defining gardens as brownfield land was a drafting error that has given rise to an unintended consequence? I am a generous-minded sort of person, and I would like to believe that this last explanation is the correct one. If it is not, those involved in this planning legislation are guilty of environmental vandalism on a vast scale.

I implore the Minister—on behalf of the 179 MPs on both sides of the House who signed early-day motion 2130 in the last Session, and on behalf of all those living in the shadow of inappropriate garden development—to add a minor provision to the planning guidance that would simply allow councils to give a garden protection against development where they felt that it had a particular value or function in a neighbourhood. That would be a proportionate and reasonable way of addressing the growing problem. It would rely on the Government's trust in elected councillors correctly to judge where and when it was in the interests of a particular neighbourhood to safeguard certain gardens. It would not be a blanket veto on garden development. If an application were appropriate, there would be no reason for it to be declined. If, however, it were inappropriate or detrimental to a neighbourhood, the council would be empowered to stop it.

At the moment, councils are enfeebled when it comes to planning. The revised planning guidance in planning policy statement 3 has not given the protection that we hoped for. It focuses on gardens for new build, rather than conserving existing gardens. Any discretion that councils have over development is so compromised by the hierarchy of housing and density targets as to be meaningless. I asked the chief planning officer of my own local authority why the new planning guidance was so ineffective, and he made it quite plain that, in the hierarchy of different planning considerations, the absolutes of the number of homes needing to be built and the need to increase density had priority over the more subjective consideration of appropriateness. That is the fundamental reason why the new guidance is so ineffective.

Surely we have to do better. Ministers cannot bury their heads in the sand on this issue. All over the country—in places like Derby, Stockton, Crawley, Cheltenham and Eastleigh, for example—powerful local campaigns against inappropriate garden development are being mobilised, and the London mayoral candidate, Boris Johnson has promised to take the issue up in his campaign. I know that legislators in the House of Commons will show similar strength by amending the planning guidance so that local authorities can exercise a right to protect gardens from development, where it is inappropriate. If they refuse, they will be judged very harshly. I support the Bill.

3.40 pm

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): The hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) made her case in the way we have come to appreciate when she speaks moderately to a well-argued case, with statistics and facts marshalled in support. As she rightly said, this is a cross-party issue, and I have discussed it with my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), who is one of her supporters. I believe, however, that the hon. Lady is profoundly mistaken and that behind her modest Bill lies a very serious rejection of our obligation to provide new homes for the new generation.

I genuinely ask the hon. Lady to reflect on what Harold Macmillan, who built 300,000 houses a year in the 1950s, would have thought to be told that what was built then on gardens, green fields and people's private land—he was right to build up British housing after the war—should be blocked by legislation such as this. [Interruption.] I hear from a sedentary intervention on the Opposition side that some Conservative Members seem to think that nothing had been built on a garden—in the sense of the land behind a house—until the last few years. They really need to examine the facts.

The key figure is very simple. Since the 1970s, there has been a 30 per cent. increase in the number of households, but a 50 per cent. drop in house building. Current figures suggest that we will see 210,000 new households in Britain each year over the next 20 years, but we are not building more than 150,000 to 180,000 new homes a year. The main blockage remains land and the refusal of planners to allocate it for housing. I regret to say that the arguments in the Bill will make matters worse.

All or most of our homes were built on what was once someone's garden or field and filled up a very pleasant view. In my own constituency of Rotherham, the house I live in was built under Harold Macmillan in the 1950s in what was previously someone's back garden. I can think of many other areas that used to be someone's big back garden, but that now provide homes for the people of Rotherham. Furthermore, if we look at any map of Victorian or Edwardian—or even early Elizabethan, by which I mean Elizabeth II—London, we will find that it used to be covered with gardens and fields, but people now live there. In the 1930s, when the population of Britain was half what it is today, those opposed to immigrants or asylum seekers said that we were full up, just as the racists in the BNP and Migration Watch say today, yet 90 per cent. of the surface land in the UK has no building on it at all.

We use land in a far less efficient way than other countries. In Greater Paris, for example, there are 8,649 people living in each square kilometre compared to close to half that number—4,779—in Greater London. If we compare Manhattan and inner London, we see three times as many people living in New York as in London—28,000 in each square kilometre in Manhattan as opposed to 9,000 in the same space in inner London.

Indeed, we have actually seen a decline in building on gardens—the hon. Member for Meriden did not refer to it—as new dwellings on previously developed residential land fell from 20 per cent. in 1990 to 15 per cent. today. In other words, it was the last Conservative Administration who permitted more garden grabbing—not the slogan used at the time—because Mrs. Thatcher understood that a property-owning democracy was good for Britain. Now we seem to want a garden protectionist oligarchy, which will deny to our children a right that all hon. Members have long taken for granted—the right to own our own home.

I think that it is also a matter of equity. As the famous jurist, Sir Edward Coke said,

"The house of every one is to him as his castle", but part of our freedom as a property-owning democracy is also to be a property-selling democracy.

An owner might wish to sell his or her house and garden, or part thereof, for many reasons. Money must be released from being tied up in property for all sorts of reasons, one of which, as we all live longer, is the cost of care. The Bill will deny to many of our constituents the freedom to buy and sell their land as they think best.

The Bill is also centralising, making a Whitehall-Westminster diktat out of what should be a decision taken locally by local planners and democratically elected local councillors, who are much closer to the needs of their constituents than the ladies and gentleman of Whitehall. They will know better than us whether this or that garden, or other greenfield site, is suitable for housing.

I fully accept that not every claim to build in a garden is justified. Although, as a whole, I have made it a rule as an MP to stay out of planning rows and disputes, there may be a time when I side with constituents on a proposed development. But it is not right to tie the hands of local councillors, home and garden owners, other landowners and house builders with this over-regulation. If we are honest, we all know that the pressure to stop development is huge, as today's generation wants to kick away the housing ladder that we have climbed up and lessen the chance of our children to live in their own home.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Caroline Spelman, Greg Clark, Michael Fabricant, Mr. Frank Field, Andrew George, Stephen Hammond, Mr. Greg Hands, Mr. Jeremy Hunt, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mrs. Eleanor Laing, Ms Gisela Stuart and Ms Dari Taylor.

Land Use (Garden Protection)

Mrs. Caroline Spelman accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for the protection of gardens and urban green spaces; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 13 June, and to be printed [Bill 88].

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [12 March.]

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation,

(b) for refunding an amount of tax,

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.—[Mr. Darling.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

3.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (Mr. John Hutton): I am pleased to have the opportunity to open our last day's debate on my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget, which deals with the very important issues of business and enterprise.

The Budget will help the United Kingdom tackle some of the biggest economic issues that we now face: uncertainty in international financial markets; intensified global competition; and the need to promote and support Britain's strong pro-enterprise culture. To steer the right course, Governments must listen and respond to the needs of British businesses. That is what we are doing.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has brought forward a Budget designed to ensure that Britain's economy remains strong in uncertain economic times. These are such times. In every respect, the Budget also stands in stark contrast to the measures that others have proposed, which would weaken our economy by compromising economic stability, threatening the public finances in the process. That would be a real double whammy for our country.

My argument today is that we should take no risks with our hard-earned stability. That is why this Budget sets a course for continued macro-economic stability, rather than putting it at risk with the unfunded spending pledges and tax cuts proposed by the Opposition parties. It promotes enterprise across the economy, rather than undermining key sectors such as manufacturing with huge cuts in capital allowances for investors, which the Conservative party has also proposed. That change would penalise investment at a time when we should instead support it. The Budget will help to deliver sustainable economic growth through greater business certainty, rather than confusing businesses with half-baked policy initiatives designed merely to last as long as it takes to generate a headline or two.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Given that money market conditions are very tense and tight on both sides of the Atlantic, will the Secretary of State comment on why the United States authorities are cutting interest rates, taking the position very seriously and pumping money in, while the United Kingdom authorities are not?

Mr. Hutton: Every country must respond in a way that is appropriate to its own market conditions, and I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the Governor of the Bank of England have taken appropriate action to support the United Kingdom economy as it enters an uncertain period.

The Budget's foundations, and indeed its ambitions, lie in the UK's strong and stable economic record since 1997. In the past 10 years, we have achieved unmatched economic growth. The UK is the only country among the G7 to have experienced no quarters of negative GDP growth since 1997. There have been 62 quarters of unbroken GDP growth in the UK, which constitutes the longest economic expansion on record in this country.

We have helped more people to progress through work. The UK's employment rate at the end of 2007 was also the highest in the G7. A record 29.39 million people are in employment, over 2.7 million more than in 1997. We have also kept inflation and interest rates low. In case we have all forgotten, I remind the House that before 1997 the UK had one of the worst inflation records in the G7. Now we have one of the best. As a result, interest rates have averaged 5.4 per cent. since 1997, about half the rate between 1979 and 1997, which has helped home owners and businesses to plan for the long term in a much more sensible way. So we enter this period of uncertainty, caused by upheavals in international financial markets, with our economy performing strongly and with growth forecast for each of the next three years.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Is the Secretary of State concerned about our trade deficit, which is the worst since records began, and about our worsening competitive position? Am I right in saying that we have fallen in the World Economic Forum chart from fourth in 1998 to about 11th now? Will he comment on those two very concerning factors?

Mr. Hutton: I think that the UK remains a very competitive economy. That is borne out by the record levels of foreign direct investment in what is one of the most preferred locations for inward investment, which I think tells its own story. We have worked to provide a positive climate for business investment, raising national and international investment in our economy. Business investment has grown in nine of the last 10 years, averaging 5.3 per cent. since 1997—compared, I am afraid, with an average of just 3.5 per cent. between 1979 and 1996.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): The Secretary of State talks of encouraging investment. Will not the swingeing increases in duty on Scotch whisky deter investment in what has been a Scottish success story? Whisky is already charged a higher rate of duty per unit of alcohol than other drinks. If the Government want to tackle binge drinking, surely they should target the drinks that are responsible for it rather than targeting whisky.

Mr. Hutton: No doubt the hon. Gentleman has made a very strong constituency point. He takes a close interest in all such matters, not unreasonably given the constituency that he represents. It should be borne in mind, however, that 90 per cent. of Scotch whisky is exported, and that changes in duty relating to the UK will not affect the strong position of the Scotch whisky industry in international markets.

As I said in response to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), the UK—thank goodness—remains a magnet for overseas investment. There was a stock of over a trillion dollars of foreign direct investment in 2006 and, in the same year, a flow of $140 billion of foreign direct investment. In that regard, we were second only to the United States. I do not believe that any of those things would have happened if Britain were still locked into the cycle of short-termism that had begun to characterise much of British economic policy in the 20 years before the Government came to office. If there is one thing on which Members on both sides of the House should be able to agree, it is that we should not return to those times.

That economic success, and a powerful commitment to attracting and developing the best in global talent, have helped to make Britain one of the best places in the world in which to do business, but in today's global age no one can afford to be complacent. Everything that we seek to achieve as a country must have its foundations rooted first and foremost in greater enterprise and higher investment.

This Budget sets a course that will help Britain become, I hope, the most entrepreneurial economy in an increasingly competitive global marketplace, creating an enterprise framework that responds to the aspirations of so many of our people to start and grow a business of their own. That aspiration is evident in a record 4.5 million businesses already operating in the UK, or in the growing number of young people who say they want to form their own businesses.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Given his remarks just then, will the Secretary of State explain how a company such as Land Rover, which is adjacent to my constituency, will be helped by the Budget in comparison with other car companies not based in the UK that will clearly have an advantage as a result of the green taxes that the Government are proposing?

Mr. Hutton: Those issues have been debated extensively already—[Interruption.] If any of the hon. Members want to say something on the record, let them come up to the Dispatch Box and make their comment instead of chuntering like a lot of hopeless parrots, which they are, I am afraid, beginning increasingly to resemble.

If the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) wants to support investment in manufacturing why does she support the halving of the capital allowances, which her party is proposing, for investment in new plant and machinery and equipment? At some point in the debate, she and others who would want to argue from her position will have to justify that.

Our commitment to Britain's entrepreneurs is reflected in the business environment that we have helped to develop, delivering higher business survival rates than a decade ago. We have overtaken many of our competitors in the EU, but we need to make more progress when we compare ourselves with the United States, the world's most enterprising economy. The US still has more businesses per head than the UK and more of them achieve quicker and higher growth than is often the case in the UK.

A range of new measures launched as part of the Budget aims to bridge that gap, creating opportunities for every section of our society, every region of our country and every sector of our economy. It is an "innovative package of measures designed to promote enterprise."

Those are not my words, but those of Martin Temple, the chairman of the Engineering Employers Federation, who has said that the initiatives will

"tick many of the boxes for manufacturers"— including, we hope, Jaguar and Land Rover.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the Secretary for State for being so generous in giving way. Are the proposals in the Budget to give tax inspectors the power to enter small business premises unannounced and without an official warrant a good way of building confidence between the SME sector and the Government and regulatory bodies?

Mr. Hutton: Of course there have to be proper safeguards, and a proper judicial framework and the rule of law within which all such activity takes place—that will remain so—but the hon. Gentleman and others will have to answer some important questions about how we deal with tax evasion. It is important that Revenue and Customs inspectors have the right powers to do that. If the hon. Gentleman has an alternative set of proposals that would avoid the need for the measures that we have set out, we should hear from him. We can then look at them in turn. Those who criticise should always have an alternative and, so far, I am afraid that I have not heard one.

We should compare the record with the business reaction to the Tories' flagship proposals on corporation tax—I am sure that the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) will want to explain them to the House shortly—which the CBI has warned will damage manufacturing in Britain by cutting capital allowances to the tune of more than £3 billion, according even to the Tories' figures. On 19 March, Richard Lambert said in The Guardian:

"there are dangers that the removal of these tax reliefs will have potentially wider consequences, particularly on business investment in manufacturing and by introducing volatility into the taxation of capital gains."

I am a fair-minded and, I think, reasonable person and I always try to be fair to the Conservative party. In one sense, I must congratulate the Conservatives on the tax proposal, which is clearly enterprising and innovative. In fact, they have given a whole new meaning to the term "creative economy". They have come up with a host of new spending pledges that can be met only if one were to design a new mechanism that allows the Government to spend the same pound several times over. No such mechanism exists. Creative economics is not an approach to inspire business or public confidence. The Conservatives' £10 billion black hole is a recipe for risk and instability, but companies look to Government to do all they can to minimise instability in uncertain times such as now.

The Government want everyone with entrepreneurial talent in the UK, regardless of their circumstances or background, to be able to turn their ideas into reality, creating new jobs, businesses and wealth for our country. [Interruption.] An Opposition Member, who does not wish to stand up to make his point, is arguing from a sedentary position about the tax burden. It is worth reminding ourselves that the tax to GDP ratio is well below the peak set by previous Tory Governments and continues to rank below the EU 15 average.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): The Secretary of State was referring to me when he mentioned a Member who was talking about tax rises. He is talking about his enterprise White Paper, which I am sure he finds exciting, but if he is so keen to encourage small firms, why is he going to add £1,000 million to small firms' tax bills? What is the economic case for doing that?

Mr. Hutton: I shall come on to that later in my speech. [Interruption.] No, I will come on to it when I am ready to do so, not when the hon. Gentleman pops up with a question on it. What I would say, however, is—[Interruption.] I will answer the question, but let me say this now: the hon. Gentleman has described this package of enterprise measures as of interest to me, but he should get out more and read what people are saying about the measures. [Interruption.] He is saying that they are exciting, and they are; that was the view of the CBI, the Institute of Directors, the Federation of Small Businesses and other employers' organisations. He needs to respond to that.

To achieve what I have set out, we must do everything we can to strengthen the culture of enterprise in Britain today. Taking the stigma out of failure and properly rewarding risk are two essential ingredients in helping move our economy forward. By the end of 2009, insolvency officials will be able to decide on whether publicity, in addition to a notice in the London Gazette, is appropriate in every case and, if so, the right medium to use. Currently, all insolvency advertisements appear in local newspapers, so such a change would help reduce the perceived level of stigma associated with bankruptcy and benefit creditors by lowering the costs of administration.

We will also ensure that British businesses have the support of a modern tax regime that balances sustainability and fairness with opportunity and competitiveness. In the pre-Budget report, a package of simplifications was announced that will save British business up to £100 million a year. The Budget will help increase those savings with a new consultation to simplify tax calculations and returns for small companies. That will enable companies to spend less time on tax and more time on business growth. From April, the main rate of corporation tax will be cut from 30p to 28p, the lowest rate in the G7. With the introduction of a new annual investment allowance from April, more than 95 per cent. of small and medium-sized enterprises will be able to write off all their capital expenditure on plant and machinery in the period in which it is incurred. That has been warmly welcomed by business organisations, but it is opposed by the Conservative party.

Following consultation with business on our changes to capital gains tax, the introduction of the new entrepreneurs relief will ensure that 80,000 business owners and investors annually will have their entire gains taxed at 10 per cent. The enterprise investment scheme has raised more than £6.1 billion, which is now invested in more than 14,000 smaller, higher-risk companies. To help even more businesses prosper, we will now increase the investor limit from £400,000 in one tax year to £500,000 from April, and we will consult on the simplification of that scheme. Those changes will all ensure greater simplicity, fairness and growth for more businesses, rewarding entrepreneurs and risk takers and rightly recognising the importance of wealth creation.

We are also bringing forward new ideas and investment to deepen the culture of enterprise in the UK. We are committed to spending a further £30 million to extend enterprise education into primary schools and tertiary colleges, bringing the total spending in this area to more than £200 million over the comprehensive spending review period.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): The Secretary of State refers to the greater simplification that the Budget provides to small businesses, saying that it will mean business men taking less time to prepare their tax affairs. Has he assessed how much time it will take them to read through the 107 new tax notes included as part of this Budget?

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a lot of respect, has argued with me before about the extensive administrative burdens reduction programme that the Government have been pursuing for the past two years. It will produce significant benefits in the round to small businesses' dealings with regulation and tax matters. The Government are seized of the importance of trying to reduce all compliance costs associated with these matters.

We are also working on the launch of global entrepreneurship week, and our work with the premier league of football clubs will open up the idea of entrepreneurship to many individuals and families who never thought it could be for them. I hope that hon. Members from all parts of the House will support that work. Those and other measures will, as Sally Low from the British Chambers of Commerce recently said,

"increase the level of enterprise education...Sowing the seeds for a new generation of entrepreneurs and business people" —in our country.

If we are to succeed as an enterprising nation, we must remove barriers to success and, most importantly, we must redouble our efforts to support more women in starting and growing their own businesses. Despite a 17 per cent. increase in the number of self-employed women in the UK since 2000, women remain the largest under-represented group when it comes to enterprise. If women started businesses at the same rate as men, there would be 150,000 extra business start-ups each year in the United Kingdom. If we matched US levels of female entrepreneurship, there would be 900,000 more businesses in the UK, employing millions more people. The social, as well as the economic, benefits to Britain are obvious.

We are therefore implementing a package of measures to improve knowledge, skills, finance and support for enterprise among women. We are investing £12.5 million in a co-investment fund with the aim of securing £25 million of new investment, to be invested primarily in women-led businesses. Ken Olisa, a member of the Women's Enterprise Task Force, describes the fund as "an opportunity to create a bridge between aspiring entrepreneurs and capital."

We will also work with regional development agencies to pilot new women's business centres, building on the very successful programme that has operated in the United States for more than 20 years and creating the right culture, environment and support network to enable more women to build their own business. Regional development agencies in the east of England, the east midlands, the north-west and the south-east have all agreed to participate in the programme, and I hope that all RDAs will join that new drive to support more women in business.

We will also test how we can make enterprise information and advice available in the family-friendly environment of children's centres to help build the confidence, skills and knowledge of potential entrepreneurs, investing in our public services, not withdrawing funding from them as the Conservative party is committed to doing, as we all know. We are supporting the establishment of a new national centre of expertise to help build the economic case for women's enterprise, encouraging the financial services, private and corporate sectors to see women-led businesses as key suppliers of products and services.

Miss Kirkbride: The Secretary of State is being generous with his time. Although I commend any efforts to get more women to launch their own businesses, is he not concerned that the number of women in board rooms has decreased over the past few years? Although we want women to set up their own businesses, we also want them fully represented at the top level in the board room. Why does he think things are going backwards?

Mr. Hutton: Like everyone, I am concerned about that issue, but it does not lend itself to more Government regulation in order to resolve it. [Interruption.] The hon. Lady might not agree with me, but perhaps one or two others on the Conservative Benches do agree. That deeply centred cultural issue must be tackled, and we should do all we can to support companies in trying to tackle it, but I do not think it lends itself either to regulation or legislation.

All the initiatives on women's enterprise that I have described are modelled on the successful implementation of the programmes in the United States. We always know when the Conservatives do not like a policy, because rather than say that they do not like it, they start sniggering—in this case about the importance of and the need to support more women in business. [Interruption.] They deny the sniggering, but we heard it. Whether or not they support these initiatives is an important test of their credibility. It would be good to hear from the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton whether he supports those initiatives.

To help bridge the enterprise gap faced by other under-represented groups in more deprived regions, we are also providing more financial assistance to the Prince's Trust, which I hope will raise awareness of enterprise among some of our most disadvantaged young people. Support for community development finance institutions will also help businesses in poorer areas to access finance. Improvements to the operation of community investment tax relief will increase flexibility and confidence. We have also committed up to £10 million to establish a risk capital fund for social enterprises, the first fund of its kind, which will help social enterprises during their start-up and early growth stages.

Well-targeted regulation can help us to achieve vital social goals and ensure that markets work properly for the benefit of consumers and business, but regulation has a cumulative cost and a consequence for the businesses, third sector organisations, public sector organisations and citizens who operate in our economy. Ensuring smarter, proportionate regulation will be critical to the UK's future competitive position. So it is important that the Government do everything that they can to prioritise and simplify the regulation that really matters and remove unnecessary regulatory burdens wherever they exist.

In March 2005, following a request from this Government, the Better Regulation Task Force and Sir Philip Hampton published recommendations on how the public sector could better regulate, and we have made significant progress in implementing those recommendations. We are on our way to meeting the 2010 target to cut administrative burdens faced by companies by 25 per cent. More than £1.5 billion of cost savings have already been delivered to the economy through that mechanism. We have reformed the impact assessment process and continued to embed the Hampton principles in the work of local authorities and national regulators.

In this Budget, we are taking further steps to ensure that the impact of regulation on small and medium enterprises remains proportionate. We will strengthen our "think small first" policy so that Departments more rigorously assess whether SMEs can be exempted from new regulations or would benefit from simpler enforcement procedures. To help further reduce compliance costs, I have also asked Sarah Anderson to lead an independent review of ways to increase clarity and certainty for forms and official guidance.

Those are important new steps, but we need to go further. We need a new discipline across Whitehall, one that forces Departments to prioritise individual regulations within an overall budget and one that makes more transparent the true cost and impact of regulation on businesses. We will now consult on how we can best introduce a new system of regulatory budgets across Whitehall. Those budgets would set out the cost to business of new regulation that can be introduced within a given period and the Government will operate for the first time within an overall ceiling on new regulations.

That proposal is radical and innovative, and we will be the first country in the world to implement such an ambitious system. It will fundamentally change the creation, development and implementation of regulation in the United Kingdom and it has already been welcomed by the CBI and the Institute of Directors as a measure that could make a real and lasting difference to businesses.

Mr. Redwood: I welcome the intent behind this measure and it is a very good idea. Can the Secretary of State give us any indication of the early Budget runs in terms of relief to business in total cost?

Mr. Hutton: I shall not put a figure on that today, because it would be silly to try to do so. What we will do over the next few weeks is set out the methodology that we will deploy, and the figures will have to be put in the public domain and we will consult on them. However, it is important to recognise that the significant challenges that we face as a country include climate change, which must be dealt with sensibly and proportionately. For example, it would not make sense for us to say that we can make progress on climate change only if we scrap all the health and safety laws, or opt out of the social chapter—as the right hon. Gentleman would probably propose. We have to strike a balance, but it is important that the Government have decided that we should have regulatory budgets, and this is not a consultation on whether but on how. I hope that those budgets will come into effect in the financial year starting April 2009. All Departments and relevant regulators will be covered, and the new system will give a powerful boost to our aim of making the UK the best place in the world to do business.

Let us compare that credible action with the Opposition's incoherence on regulation. The Leader of the Opposition has a track record of proposing significant new regulation when he wants to appear family-friendly. I am sure that that has not escaped the attention of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). When the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton talks tough to businesses, he proposes a one in, two out policy for all new regulations. Perhaps today he will tell the House which two regulations he will scrap in order to introduce the new right for fathers of newborn children to take time off at the same time as mothers. Which two regulations would go to make way for the mandatory pay audits for businesses that the Leader of the Opposition has also proposed?

I am sure that the right hon. Member for Wokingham would be able to give the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton some tips on the right way forward. It might be helpful to read out what the right hon. Gentleman has already said about the UK's framework of employment regulation, which is, I think, his starter for 10:

"we should seek opt outs from the areas of regulation that we think are most damaging...This would include all employment and social regulation."

One thing is certain: a party that tells each audience what it wants to hear will ultimately not find favour with any audience at all. Those least impressed will be British businesses looking for a clear direction from their Government to steer the UK through uncertain times in the world economy.

We want to ensure that every entrepreneur and business in the UK can access the finance that they need for business creation and growth. We will work to remove any remaining barriers in one of the world's most dynamic and flexible finance markets. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) is chuntering away. I suspect that he will have the opportunity to make his own speech. We always look forward to his contributions. He has mentioned the small companies rate of corporation tax—

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): No, capital gains tax.

Mr. Hutton: Well, I will also come to the small companies rate of corporation tax, because the hon. Gentleman has mentioned that, too.

We have made significant changes on capital gains tax in response to what business has said to us. The hon. Gentleman would be hard pushed—he is a decent and fair man—to find any example from the G7 or from any of the developed nations of relief for entrepreneurs as generous as the 10 per cent. entrepreneurs relief announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the first £1 million of lifetime gains from business. That is a significant improvement to the current provisions on retirement relief, on which I am sure the hon. Gentleman is an expert, and will address many of the concerns that have been raised.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the small companies rate of corporation tax is part of a range of measures that have to be taken to deal with the serious issue of tax-motivated incorporation. Even with those changes to the small companies rate it is important for us all to remind ourselves of one rather important fact that has escaped all the chanting of Opposition Front Benchers. Even with the phased increases, the small companies rate of corporation tax will still be lower than it was at any time when the Conservative party was in office.

We want to ensure that every entrepreneur and business in the UK can access the finance that they need for business creation and growth. We will work to remove any remaining barriers in one of the world's most dynamic and flexible finance markets. With the support of small firms loan guarantee lenders, new measures include £60 million to the small firms loan guarantee scheme and the extension of the scheme to small and medium-sized businesses that are more than five years old. We are also providing an extra £30 million through enterprise capital funds to stimulate the provision of mezzanine finance alongside the launch of the third round of those funds on 1 April.

The public services industry is also an increasingly dynamic part of our economy. We want to increase the opportunity available for small and medium-sized enterprises to work and innovate in the sector, too. Anne Glover of Amadeus will lead a review of the barriers to SMEs winning the greater share of public contracts and consider the practicality of a 30 per cent. SME target for Government procurement. We will amend the public sector procurement clause to enable organisations that use factoring and invoice discounting to compete for this business.

We have, I believe, listened to businesses and responded to their needs. I believe that the Budget will help the UK economy to continue to grow at a time of turmoil in international finance markets.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Secretary of State has just announced yet another review. Can he tell the House how many reviews his Department is undertaking at the present moment?

Mr. Hutton: The Department is not undertaking very many reviews. We are looking at a number of important issues, and many people have asked us to instigate the sort of review and investigation that I have described. We are prepared to look again at some of the issues involved.

One thing that I have learned in government—and I am glad to say that few Opposition Members have had the chance to do so—is that it is often a good thing to ask people from outside Government to take a fresh look at policies. That approach has proven beneficial for both the Government and business.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that representatives of small business, including a delegation from Coventry, lobbied Parliament last week. The review should look at the process by which bids are submitted for contracts with local authorities that are worth less than £10,000. For small businesses employing two or three people, the ability to tender for those contracts is vital.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and glad to get o[illegible] supportive intervention.

Mr. Philip Hammond: I seek clarification on a point of detail. The Secretary of State mentioned that the prohibition on invoice factoring would be abolished. It is one of the features of his enterprise White Paper, but I have here a letter from his colleague the Exchequer Secretary, dated 13 January 2008. In it, she assures me that the standard terms and conditions used by Government Departments "do not prohibit the assignment of a debt between suppliers and third parties".

Is she wrong, or is this a non-announcement?

Mr. Hutton: I am sure that there is a perfectly sensible explanation and that, given a bit of time, I will be able to respond appropriately to the hon. Gentleman. For now, however, the right answer must be that the approach taken by that Treasury Minister was obviously correct.

The Budget will genuinely help to release the talents of more of our people. It will harness the untapped potential and rising aspirations in our society to create businesses, jobs and wealth for our country's future. It should help remove the financial, regulatory and personal barriers that still hold too many of our businesses and citizens back from achieving their ambitions and success. It is a Budget that will help boost enterprise and innovation throughout the economy. It will build on the strong and stable framework of the past decade to enable this country to tackle the challenges of the decade ahead effectively, and to seize the opportunities that it presents.

Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): The House has listened to the Secretary of State for well over half an hour, but I am not sure that we have learned very much. What we are debating today is less a Budget than a Government confession of all the accumulated consequences of their misbehaviour in the past.

I call the Prime Minister's first Budget a "confession" because hidden away in the back of the Red Book is all the evidence of his wasted decade as Chancellor. We had 10 years of profligacy that are now costing families in higher bills every year; 10 years of incompetent management at the heart of Government that are now to cost business £1.7 billion extra over the next three years; and 10 years of the right hon. Gentleman bragging and boasting about how much he was spending, with no appreciation of the consequences.

The Chancellor did his best to talk us into submission last week, but the rhetoric has unravelled and exposed us to some very uncomfortable home truths. For all that the Prime Minister used to bang on about prudence, the cruel truth is that prudence has turned out to be not such a pretty lass.

The UK has the largest budget deficit in western Europe, and there has been a massive rise in Government borrowing. We have a consumer economy fuelled by unrestrained and certainly unprecedented levels of domestic debt, so it is no wonder that the Chancellor has been forced to downgrade his growth forecasts.

But what is the Government's response? Is it to do nothing, and to be the very definition of soporific but sensible stability? If only it was: instead, the Government's instinct is to raise taxes and spend even more, and to hit the wealth creators and entrepreneurs who are the very people who can expand our economy and help wean us off our addiction to borrowing.

In case Labour Members have forgotten, I can tell them that the wasted decade was built on the strongest economic foundations, and that it was sustained by 15 years of global growth. We have had high levels of liquidity in the market and low prices—until recently—of crude oil, with optimism remaining stable. We had all that, even despite the Asian crisis in the late 1990s, the bursting of the dotcom bubble or the tremors of 11 September.

Ultimately, all economics is cyclical. Long periods of economic growth invariably end some time and a downturn follows. No matter how successful a country's, or company's, economic management may be, the good times always have a turning point. Nobody has yet managed to abolish the business cycle. It is the most enduring economic phenomenon. Its existence is the one thing for which we cannot blame the Government, but their refusal to admit that one day the cycle would turn is something for which they are utterly culpable.

The surest sign that problems are looming and that the dreaded turning point is just around the corner is when bankers, institutions and countries convince themselves that they have entered a new period of history in which economic gravity can somehow be defied. As the Chancellor and the Prime Minister have both said to anyone who would listen, the disintegration of sub-prime debt did indeed light the fuse that led to the explosion of Northern Rock and the fireworks that we are witnessing in today's markets. Institutions are indeed partly to blame for allowing their judgment on the quality of lending to become polluted. For some, the music has stopped and market liquidity has evaporated.

Much of this has indeed been caused by an irresponsible United States Government deficit, but the reason that the UK Government are now undeniably culpable is that they did not use that decade to prepare for the years that would inevitably follow. Especially with globalisation's pressure on competitiveness, the Prime Minister should have recalibrated the economy so as to reinforce it for more difficult times later. He did the opposite.

At the end of the right hon. Gentleman's decade as Chancellor, we should have had lower taxes, less borrowing, better funded pensions and higher savings. Instead, all those variables have been moving in the wrong direction. Taxes are right up to their limits, debt—public and personal—is right up against the buffers, savings have evaporated and pensions have been raided to destruction by the Chancellor's unforgivable economic vandalism. He has squandered a decade of economic prosperity. He has disguised growing structural problems and deferred decisions that could easily have been taken when things were going well. He used the decade to support his political ambitions over and above the long-term interests of the country. Now, thanks to him, the economy has no slack to cope with a downturn. It is unduly reliant on the City, and housing transaction costs are likely to prove an exaggerated downward force on the housing market. He has not even managed the public finances sufficient to support inflation-based increases in public sector pay.

The Prime Minister while Chancellor should have recalibrated the British economy not just to withstand the pressures of a cyclical downturn but also to equip it to contend with the new forces of global competition from the likes of India and China. While talking of doing so, in practice he did not. In other words, thanks to the Prime Minister, the condition of the economy is ill equipped to cope with the problems posed by events in world financial markets and it contains elements that are likely to exacerbate the problems.

United Kingdom conditions are not prepared for the turn in the cycle. We have nothing set aside for a rainy day, so the pain people will face stands to be greater than it would otherwise have been. We can perhaps, therefore, rustle up a little dose of sympathy for the poor hapless creatures who have to follow in the wake of this bludgeoning Prime Minister. There is the poor, poor Chancellor who has had to succeed the Prime Minister's decade as Chancellor. He is like a poor malnourished orphan equipped with a bucket and shovel following a cart horse with bad digestion. Then we have the Secretary of State for the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, whose words about our current Prime Minister were famously read into the record.

Mr. Bellingham: What did he say?

Alan Duncan: It would be inappropriate for me to repeat the words. I will steer my hon. Friend to the comment to which I am referring later. Some of the people who most wish that the Prime Minister would change his ways are people in business—people working in the thick of the economy. Those same people were left battered and bruised by the Government's election gambits in the pre-Budget report last autumn. Business confidence in the Government has eroded very fast since then.

Last week's Budget should have been an offering that restored the trust that the Government have lost, but it turned out to be more of a fig leaf to disguise the defectiveness of the British economy. It is no surprise that 92 per cent. of business leaders do not think that the Budget will restore consumer confidence. Some 65 per cent. say that it will be bad for their business, while an astonishing 73 per cent. believe that the Budget will actually contribute to the economic downturn in the UK—and no wonder, considering that the Government will take £1.7 billion in extra revenue from business over the next three years. That is in addition to the disastrous capital gains tax hike announced last August, and the small companies tax rise that was announced in last year's Budget but is coming into effect now. For small businesses in particular, it is a disturbing trend at the very moment when their pockets are feeling the pinch.

It is clear that the Secretary of State, who has been an eloquent, albeit lone, voice for business in Whitehall over the past year, may have won some important concessions, but in other ways he has not been that successful. The dreadful changes to capital gains tax—Lord Jones's words, not mine—remain pretty much the same. Income shifting has merely been deferred, with the pain being stored up for next year, not removed altogether. The same goes for fuel duty, with a sting in the tail being included for 2011. Small businesses will still be hit by the rise in their corporation tax. Recent data from one business organisation indicate that on average small companies spend £8,700 and 50 hours annually just on complying with basic tax regulations.

The enterprise White Paper, on which it is important to focus today, had some welcome news. I am glad that the Government have finally come round to our proposal that a percentage of state contracts be offered to small and medium-sized enterprises. I hope that they will go further than merely reviewing it, as the Chancellor said he would. The proposal was of course first announced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the Conservative party leader, back in October 2006, so it has taken a little longer for the Government to copy the idea than it took them to "borrow" our inheritance tax proposals, but it represents progress none the less.

Similarly, we welcome the Government's new commitment to regulatory budgets, something that I called for at our party conference last October. If properly implemented and operated, they will be a significant step forward, but I fear that business is not holding its breath. It is the Government's fourth major initiative on regulation since 1997. Just two years ago, we were promised a year of delivery, but instead of cuts to the regulatory burden, all that was delivered to us was £16 billion-worth of additional regulations. Those measures aside, the White Paper is terribly thin on substance and bears all the hallmarks of a Government who have run out of not just ideas, but wriggle-room. There is a plethora of small policies and initiatives, including some very minor changes to the financing regime for SMEs, but they are certainly not the key to "unlocking the UK's talent", as advertised on the document's front cover.

The most depressing part of the White Paper is a classic eye-catching initiative—a high media campaign—entitled "spark an idea", with a corresponding £12 million capital fund for female entrepreneurs. The Secretary of State mentioned that in his comments. Of course we welcome the focus on women in business, because one of the Government's biggest failures has been the failure to encourage women to establish businesses, resulting in the UK having one of the lowest rates of female entrepreneurship in the world. However, we are not convinced that the £12 million will create the growth that the Government want. Also, as the fund is being distributed through Business Link, we will need convincing that the money will find its way to women, rather than just be lost in administration.

The problem for the Government is that 10 years after they promised to be the party of business, we are seeing clear evidence of enterprise being held back by the actions of Government. Our competitiveness rating has dropped seven places in the international league table since 1997. We are falling behind other European countries in investment and research. While other countries have been developing a competitive business tax code, the UK has the unique distinction of creating a tax code that is longer than India's. The Chancellor has compounded that by adding a further 107 new technical tax changes in the Budget alone, which brings a certain Kafkaesque logic to the Government's pledge to simplify the system.

Another part of the problem is that the Department that is supposed to represent the long-term interests of business has not shown, in a decade of Labour rule, any long-term thinking that we find comprehensible.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Secretary of State has another problem to deal with—the bizarre decision by the Prime Minister last July to close the Defence Export Services Organisation, a body that was responsible for assisting British business to create £5 billion of inward investment every year? That decision has caused great dismay across a key sector of many of our constituencies. Does my hon. Friend agree that we must change that decision when we get into power?

Alan Duncan: My hon. Friend makes a serious point. The attempt to sanitise the process has probably gone a long way to undermining it seriously. There was a fudge between the Ministry of Defence and DBERR, as it is so ridiculously called. I call upon the Secretary of State, if not on this occasion, at least later to defend that fudge, because many of the phones have gone dead in our attempts to sell important equipment abroad.

The Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presides has had 38 Ministers since 1997. It has even had seven Secretaries of State. The Minister with responsibility for small firms has changed, on average, once every 18 months. The churn at the top is creating a churn elsewhere, so while the number of small and medium-sized enterprises in the UK has increased, the start-up rate has fallen.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): "You churn if you want to".

Alan Duncan: Indeed. That is exactly what is happening.

While the number of female-run businesses has increased, the latest small business survey found that those businesses are replacing, not adding to, the existing stock of male-run businesses. The Government do not seem to understand that one cannot create enterprise through the distribution of little pots of money. Fundamentally, it is a cultural phenomenon, and the Government do not appear to understand that culture.

The Government have mishandled the overall economic picture, they have mishandled the business sector and they have squandered a decade of growth. Their legacy is a big bill for all of us to pay, and the Budget is a sad reflection on the plight that they have put us in. It is the Prime Minister's legacy and he will not be thanked for it.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): I first heard news of last week's Budget when I was in outer Mongolia, where I had been dispatched with the Foreign Office, well out of harm's way, along with my noble Friend Lord Malloch-Brown. Given that I am chairman of the all-party beer group, perhaps it was the best place for me, in view of the 4p rise in beer duty. In my brief remarks, I shall reflect on alcohol policy and the alcohol industry—an important industry in our country—the energy sector, the gambling industry, and non-domiciles.

There was a significant change in the policy on alcohol duty last week. All alcohol duty—on wine, spirits, beer or cider—was increased by a similar percentage. A promise was made that in forthcoming years there would be increases of inflation plus 2 per cent. on all alcohol. It is worth exploring the reasons for that. Up to now, the Treasury has said that alcohol duty is a revenue raiser, rather than an aspect of health policy. Indeed, last week my right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred to increased alcohol duty giving additional support for families and lifting more children out of poverty. He also mentioned in his remarks, which were backed up by the Treasury press release, that as incomes have risen, alcohol has become increasingly affordable. He spoke about ensuring that alcohol duties keep up with rising incomes. For the first time, there was a hint that alcohol duties were being raised for health as well as revenue reasons. I would be interested in any clarification from Ministers on that point.

I want to explore whether the measures will be an effective way of raising revenue and promoting health. What are the implications for the pub industry, in particular? It employs 500,000 people and generates more than £20 billion—it is as big as the airline, retail clothing or media sectors. How much revenue are the increases likely to raise? The Treasury forecast in the

[Mr. John Grogan]

Red Book suggests that £8.6 billion will be raised in the forthcoming year, up from £8 billion this year—a significant rise, particularly from wine duties, which will apparently raise more than £400 million extra. At the moment, our beer duty is the highest among those of comparable European Union countries, at nearly 40p a pint.

In the past few years, beer duty has gone up a lot more than other alcohol duties: by 26.7 per cent. since 1997, compared with a 3 per cent. rise for spirits, an 11 per cent. rise for cider and a 16 per cent. rise for wine. However, as beer duty has increased, the tax take has not increased to any extent at all. In 2004, £3.1 billion was raised through beer duty; that has now decreased to £3.05 billion for the current financial year. The actual amounts raised through beer duty undershot Treasury estimates by £130 million last year and £160 million the year before.

As beer duty has risen—considerably—since 1997, the gap between the price of beer in a pub and its price in supermarkets has widened. A pint of Carling in a managed pub cost £1.65 on average 10 years ago, but it is now £2.32. The average price of a pint of premium lager in a multiple grocer was £1.14 10 years ago but is now down to £1.05. There has been a shift.

Tony Baldry: Is not the hon. Gentleman's point that the increase in beer duty will not have much of an impact on off-sales, but will have an impact on village pubs? All the village post offices in constituencies such as mine have been closed by this Government. What next? It will be pubs. It is disingenuous to suggest that any increases in beer duty will have an impact on binge drinking; they are just another way of collecting more revenue, which will also hit a valuable service—the village pub.

Mr. Grogan: The hon. Gentleman is ahead of me. Unless other measures are taken, the rises will reinforce the trend of the past 10 years of more off-sales and fewer on-sales. Ten years ago, the on-trade accounted for nearly 80 per cent. of beer sales; that has gone down considerably to just over 60 per cent. The measures will reinforce the trend from drinking in community pubs and towards more sales in supermarkets.

I shall come to the impact on health, but I shall first address the impact on tax, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned that. It is important to remember that pubs and the beer industry pay not only excise duty, but VAT and employment taxes. In fact, Ernst and Young suggested that the entire pub and beer industry contributed a total of £9 billion to Government revenue. The more that is drunk in pubs, as opposed to at home, the greater the Government revenue. The Government receive £1.14 in taxes from a pint of beer in a pub, compared with 55p for every pint drunk in the off-trade. In themselves, the measures will, as the hon. Gentleman points out, damage drinking in community pubs and favour supermarkets.

Tesco said something interesting a few weeks ago. For the first time, it admitted that it sells alcohol below cost. It hinted that that was a problem socially and suggested to the Government that it would be prepared no longer to sell it below cost if the Government changed the law to deal with the competition requirements that might be infringed if the supermarket moved alone. My fear is that, unless the Government move quickly to deal with supermarket prices, the impact of the excise duty changes will be, as the hon. Member for Banbury suggested, that the supermarkets continue to loss-lead, treat alcohol like baked beans and not raise prices in line with excise duty.

Indeed, I have a letter from a major retailer and wholesaler to a brewer. It states:

"As you know the aggressive market that we're all trading in continues".

It suggests that the brewer does not raise the price of beer following excise duty and that:

"Given the discount pricing strategies adopted in the past few years by the multiple grocers we are not confident that the budget will result in material increases in retail prices."

The Government's review of the impact of alcohol pricing on health is due in a couple of months. The Government must act urgently and take Tesco at its word. I referred to Sir Terence Leahy before Christmas as the godfather of British binge drinking, and there is no greater joy in heaven than when a sinner repenteth. However, as St. Augustine said, "Lord, make me virtuous but not yet." That is Tesco's position and the Government need to encourage it to take the further step. I believe that that will require a change in the law.

The all-party parliamentary beer group is now considering reference pricing— minimum pricing for alcohol—which is prevalent in Canada. In Canadian supermarkets, the minimum reference price of a bottle of beer is around 50p. We will hold a seminar, to which we hope to invite the supermarkets, the Treasury and the health lobby to ascertain whether we can reach a consensus. Without that, the increase in excise duty over the next few years will accelerate closures of village pubs—we have reached more than 20 a week on some counts. The community pub will also decline, and that is where drinking is supervised and managed, and where people generally drink socially. Such decline could have bad implications for one of the industries that make one proud to be British. I therefore hope that the Government will act on supermarket pricing and stand up to the supermarkets, given that they are going down a specific road on alcohol duty.

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Gentleman mentions small pubs, and he is right, but is he aware of the impact of the measures that he mentioned on small breweries? I am thinking of McMullen in Hertford and Sharp's, an excellent brewery in north Cornwall. Both told me that their costs have risen by 60 per cent., and now the Government are slapping on an additional charge. Has his group considered the impact on such excellent small breweries?

Mr. Grogan: We have indeed. To be fair to the Chancellor, and especially the previous Chancellor, the relief to small breweries on excise duty has led to an expansion in micro breweries in recent times. However, the brewers who are just above the level of micro brewers, some of whom have closed in recent years, will be especially badly affected by the increase in duty, as the hon. Gentleman says.

Three measures in the Budget affected fuel poverty: the winter fuel allowance, the action on pre-payment meters and the proposed increase in social tariffs paid by the energy companies from the current figure of £50 million to £150 million. The Government will enter into negotiations about that increase.

Let me press Ministers about the voluntary versus statutory debate. On pre-payment meters, the Chancellor referred to the possibility of legislation if the Government did not get what they wanted from the energy companies. However, possible legislation on social tariffs was not mentioned. I am not sure about the reason for that inconsistency, especially now, when some of the major energy companies are calling for statutory social tariffs. They say that it would be much easier if there were a level playing field. Let me cite two brief examples. After the Budget, EDF Energy stated:

"Our own proposal—which we have supported for some time—is for mandatory social tariffs in the form of a discount or relief against published tariffs.

This would ensure a level playing field for suppliers and sufficient funding since it would require statutory mechanisms by which money was redirected for this purpose.

It should also be possible—in a statutory framework—to solve the issue of identifying objectively the customers who should benefit."

Npower wrote to the regulator, Ofgem, just before Christmas, saying:

"At present, government is encouraging the delivery of a social action solution within a voluntary framework. It is doubtful whether this is the most efficient approach and it is also seemingly inconsistent with a market framework. We believe that the interest of the fuel poor is best served by a mandatory social tariff".

I ask Ministers to be open in their discussions with the energy companies to the possibility of a mandatory social tariff, in the interests not only of the fuel poor, but of a competitive energy market, so that all the energy companies know exactly where they stand and what they have to fulfil. If they want to go beyond that for competitive advantage, it is surely up to them to do so.

There was no reference in the Budget to energy prices as such. I was pleased that, following the Chancellor's discussions with Alistair Buchanan, the chief executive of Ofgem, there will be an inquiry into energy prices. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) mentioned the impact of the Budget on manufacturing industry, and energy prices are a major issue that the sector faces.

When he met the Chancellor, Alistair Buchanan said that there was no need for such an inquiry and that the market was operating efficiently. He changed his mind within three or four weeks, but I fear that his inquiry will be a little like the Princess Di inquiry with Mohamed al-Fayed as the judge rather than a witness. It would be better if Ofgem gave evidence to the Competition Commission in a full-scale inquiry into energy views, so that its views could be put against those of Energywatch, the consumer champion, which will sadly be abolished in a few months, and so that there could be a proper test. Unless there is a proper test, many small businesses and energy consumers will not have confidence in the Ofgem inquiry.

That brings me to a broader point, which concerns the relationship between the Government and business, which those on the Opposition Front Bench mentioned. I am proud that I was a small business man before I entered the House. It gave me an appreciation of cash flow, and what it means to employ people and so on. We have done a good job over two decades of getting rid of the idea that Labour is anti-business. We are a party that supports entrepreneurs, but we have also lost the progressive critique of business oligopoly and big businesses acting against the interests of small businesses.

There is a much greater willingness on the left of the American political debate, as well as among Republicans, to criticise markets in which there is self-interest and no competitive framework, rather than having markets working in the public interest. It is at least arguable that our energy sector is dominated by a number of very large companies that not only produce but retail electricity and gas. It is not clear to me that those companies are operating in the competitive interests of small businesses and consumers. It would be much better to give the issue to the Competition Commission.

The Secretary of State mentioned regulation. One of the Competition Commission's critiques of Government policy is that the Government do not refer nearly enough sectors to the commission for investigation. It is in the self-interest of regulators not to make such references, because they risk being criticised or admitting that they do not have enough powers to regulate different sectors of the economy. It will be interesting to see what Ofgem comes up with, but I hope that the Government will not rule out making a full-scale reference to the Competition Commission before next winter, when who knows what will happen to energy prices.

Finally, I congratulate the Chancellor and the Government on sticking to their guns with respect to imposing modest charges on non-domiciles. Again, it is a question of being bold and arguing the language of fairness. It is fair and right that some of the richest people in our society who enjoy many of the fruits of our society should make a contribution. Incidentally, I am disappointed that our candidate for Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone, whom I very much support, does not strongly back the proposal. Indeed, he has criticised it.

The Wall Street Journal was more correct when it said in a headline at the weekend, "New U.K. tax rules don't vex 'non-doms'". The paper gave a number of quotations from various prominent business people. One of them, a CEO of a hedge fund in "London's plush Mayfair district", said that he was still being inundated with foreign citizens who want to come and work in the City of London. The paper also cites several prep schools that are doing very well as a result of the presence of the sons and daughters of such foreigners. I believe that the so-called harm to the City of London that this measure would bring has been massively exaggerated.

I congratulate the Chancellor on the measures to ensure that non-domiciles make a fair contribution to our society, and I hope that he will look at other tax measures similar to those suggested in the TUC's report on tax avoidance and tax evasion measures. We need to ensure that we can live in a fair society in which everyone, rich and poor, makes a contribution to the public services that the Government have improved over recent years.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I am grateful to have this opportunity to speak on behalf of my party on the Budget on the final day of our deliberations on that subject. This was a Budget with a big hole in the middle—a Polo mint Budget. Its central feature, which will be experienced by all our constituents from next month, was the proposal to cut the basic rate of income tax by 2p in the pound and to double, rather than abolish, the 10p rate. That will have a profound effect on many of our constituents when it comes into effect next month. It is overwhelmingly the biggest change that people will experience.

The Prime Minister, in his characteristically uncollegiate way, took the central feature of this year's Budget and announced it as the central feature of his final Budget as Chancellor of the Exchequer last year, thereby leaving his successor with a relatively small number of measures to pad out the 50 or so minutes that he managed to spend on his Budget speech last week.

The central feature—the doubling of the 10p rate and the reduction in the basic rate—is a hugely regressive measure that will impact adversely on more than 5 million households across the United Kingdom. They will be worse off as a result of the proposals, announced by the then Chancellor last year, that will come into effect next month. It is simply unbelievable that a Labour Government should choose to alter the income tax structure in a way that is most disadvantageous to people on low and middle incomes.

That feature was announced in last year's Budget, however, so let us look at what was announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last Wednesday. I think that it was Barack Obama, in the presidential contest in the United States, who observed that the tragedy of politics at the moment is that just as the issues are getting bigger—he was referring to issues such as climate change and globalisation—the political discourse seems to be getting smaller. I was reminded of that observation as I listened to the Chancellor on Wednesday, because his proposals were so timid, so meek and so lacking in purpose.

I cast my mind back to the genuinely formidable Chancellors whom I can recall. Nigel Lawson, for example, was second only to Margaret Thatcher as the politician who shaped the 1980s. Many would argue that the present Prime Minister was not second in stature to, but parallel with, Tony Blair in shaping the politics of the past decade. These were politicians who, for good or for ill, had a big view of the kind of society that they wished to mould. They painted on a broad canvas. It was therefore somewhat demeaning to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer of one of the world's largest economies rising to his full height to announce not only that he was minded to introduce a policy on plastic carrier bags, but that if the supermarkets did not implement it in two years' time, at that point he would really, really do something.

We can look back at those considerable figures, but I also see one in the Chamber now. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) was the last Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer—possibly the last ever, certainly the last for the time being. He was undoubtedly a big political figure, and he remains one today. I cannot believe that he would have wished his legacy to be a threatened plastic bag levy two years in the future. This Budget reminded me of a 1950s Budget. It was full of good housekeeping, reminiscent of the days when Chancellors of the Exchequer often dealt in millions rather than billions of pounds.

Let us go through some of the measures mentioned when the Chancellor spoke about his priorities for our country. We should remember that this Government are spending £1,700 million every day; that is the scale of public spending nowadays. When the Chancellor rose on his annual opportunity to speak for three quarters of an hour, he found time and space to accommodate the following announcements into his Budget: £10 million over five years for science; £26 million—slightly less than a pound per UK household by my calculations—for home insulation; and £12.5 million for women entrepreneurs, which we have discussed this afternoon. I have never before heard a Chancellor announcing in his main Budget statement items of expenditure to the nearest £500,000. Those are all laudable objectives, but the scale is so small and humiliating that it is indicative of a Chancellor and a Government who have lost the ability to shape the bigger picture.

Tony Baldry: But was it not the intention behind all those pages of Budget coverage with lots of little boxes for various initiatives to detract from the main story of the collapse of the Chancellor's overall financial competence?

Mr. Browne: The implication of that intervention is that financial competence existed in the first place, so in that respect the hon. Gentleman displays his characteristic generosity. He is clearly more of a details man than I if he went through all those little boxes in the Budget supplements, which go on for page after page. I am not sure, however, that they win as many votes for the Government as people would like to think when they cook up these ideas in the Treasury.

What, then, of the alternatives put before us? I was intrigued and bewildered over the weekend to read the centrepiece of the new tax policy by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), the Conservative shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury. As far as I understood it, it said that there was a possibility of the Conservative party cutting taxes by 2015. That, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is seven years away—[Interruption.] We fought and won the whole second world war more quickly than the hon. Gentleman believes he might be able to introduce some modest tax proposals. I think it was Harold Wilson who said—although perhaps not in these exact words—that seven days was a long time in politics. I do not know how long the Conservatives think seven years is, but it seems an awfully long time to be thinking up some ideas for tax cuts.

The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge expanded on his policy by saying in a very touching way—I am pleased to see him in his place to hear this—that the Conservatives were going to create a pot of money to fund tax cuts. When his Back Benchers display their thirst for Thatcherite economics, my assumption has always been that they did not want to return to the household budgeting of the Roberts family between the wars, but desired something a little more robust. Instead, we have the worst savings scheme in history—a pot of money tied up for seven years with a 0 per cent. return in interest and requiring two Conservative election victories before people get their money back. That makes Northern Rock look like a model of realistic business practice!

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman really ought to give proper credit to the Tory party and put its long-term thinking on taxation in perspective. The Conservatives were, after all, the party that introduced income tax as a temporary measure.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful for that intervention, which brings me neatly on to my next point.

I have been trying to work out what the Conservative critique of the Budget really is. As far as I can work out, the Conservatives have two policies: the first is that taxes and spending are much too high under Labour; and the second is that taxes and spending will be identical under the Conservative party. We are left in a very strange position: we know that the Conservatives oppose every tax rise that the Chancellor announced last Wednesday, so they must have secret mystery alternative tax rises to make up the difference. We have not yet heard what secret taxes they propose to put in place instead, but we look forward to hearing about them later in our debate.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): Is it inconceivable that a future Conservative Government would follow policies, which have been followed in many other countries, to restrain public spending a bit and keep taxes lower, but bring in tax revenues that were actually higher? Tax rates would be lower, but revenues for the public services would be higher, reflecting higher economic growth as a consequence. Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that the steep increases in public spending and taxation are beginning to suppress the rate of economic growth, so that tax revenues consistently come in below forecast, as they have over the past seven years?

Mr. Browne: There were so many "highers" and "lowers" in that contribution that I will call it the Bruce Forsyth doctrine. I shall recommend it to the hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues.

So far, I have come up with four Conservative suggestions on tax. Let us consider them, as they might inform the Chancellor's next Budget. The first was a supermarket car parking tax—a policy dreamt up by an adviser to the Conservative party whose chauffeur drives around the block while he is inside the supermarket not collecting any plastic bags. That proposal appears to have been dropped.

As far as I can work out, the second policy is that "normal people" should be allowed only one short-haul flight a year. I have not heard whether that was confirmed by the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) in connection with his recent holiday in South Africa, but no doubt those on the Conservative Front Bench will enlighten us on that subject.

The third policy of which I am aware—which ties in with the previous speech— is that the price of a pint of beer should be increased by 7p over and above the Budget proposals. It says something about the career of the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) that that is considered his finest achievement in politics—to have put forward a policy that is universally unpopular in my constituency.

As for the final area, public spending, the Conservative health spokesman made the big announcement a couple of weeks ago that NHS expenditure would increase massively under the Conservative party. I was as intrigued by that proposal as many other right hon. and hon. Members must have been. I read the blog of the political editor of the Daily Mail, and under the headline "From Untouchable to Unmentionable", he described how the proposal had gone down in the ranks of the Conservative party:

> "I'm told that in the days following Mr Lansley's reckless assertion about health spending, Mr Osborne hit the roof and one Shad Cab heavyweight"— that narrows the field, unless we include the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles)—

> "even put Mr Lansley against a wall and pummelled him verbally into admitting his crime", which was to envisage extra spending on the national health service. It is no wonder that The Daily Telegraph, the newspaper generally considered sympathetic to the Conservative party, ran the headline yesterday, "Tories mired in confusion over policy on tax cuts". No doubt we will have some clarification later.

To assist the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan), let me make one modest proposal for how he might reduce public spending to fund some of his reckless plans. In recent months, the Conservative party has been shedding Members of Parliament at an alarming rate. As I understand it, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling), the hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) and, just last week, the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) have all left the Conservative ranks, which were already smaller than those that Michael Foot managed to achieve during his electoral triumph in 1983. I venture that there must be some substantial savings to be made from reviewing the Short money claimed by the remainder of the Conservative party. That could go into funding some of the exciting new proposals on which I have touched.

The truth is that the Budget took place against an extremely worrying economic backdrop. An explosion of consumer debt has been secured on the rising value of house prices. The bubble, if it has not burst, is certainly deflating rapidly. As the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton pointed out, the Government's growth forecasts have been revised downwards and public finances are struggling. In the next financial year, the Government will borrow £7 billion more than they envisaged only last year.

No one in my constituency or elsewhere recognises the rosy picture of the economy that the Government are painting. The measure of inflation, for example, is totally detached from reality. It is possible that the price of the iPod that the Prime Minister uses to listen to the Arctic Monkeys in the gym in the mornings has fallen in recent months, but pensioners in my constituency see rising fuel costs and soaring shopping bills, and their biggest outlay of all, the council tax bill—about which the Chancellor had nothing at all to say in his Budget statement—has virtually doubled since Labour came to power. Replacing the council tax could have been the great centrepiece of a Budget dedicated to a fairer and greener Britain, but there was no urgency and no big-picture analysis.

According to a United Nations report published at the weekend, glaciers are melting at an unprecedented rate. The signs are all around us, but the Chancellor fiddles while the world gets closer to burning. My party believes that we need a proper green tax switch with serious measures to combat pollution, but—and it is a crucial but—that every pound raised in environmental taxation should be returned, in the form of income tax cuts, to the people on low and middle incomes who are struggling the most in the current difficult economic circumstances. It is simply not good enough to give green taxes a bad name and a bad reputation by using them to introduce, through the back door, extra revenue-raising measures to plug black holes in the Treasury's own finances.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Will the hon. Gentleman be supporting the £1.2 billion tax take resulting from changes in vehicle excise duty, which are clearly predicated on no behavioural change, given that the money is not to be returned to the hard-pressed taxpayer?

Mr. Browne: We have made our policies entirely clear. Let me be uncharacteristically boastful, and point out that the whole drive for differential vehicle excise duties was a Liberal Democrat policy. Like many of our good policies, it has found its way into the wider body politic and become more universally popular. We will continue to present popular policies for others to consider in the future.

We proposed that the council tax should be replaced by a fairer system. We could have had a Budget that painted a big picture of a fairer, greener, better Britain—a Budget that really went for the issue of climate change and global warming, took it seriously and understood the urgency of the system. The Budget could have replaced the council tax with a fairer system for our constituents, a system that reduced the basic rate of income tax further as a consequence of environmental taxation, but instead we are piling extra tax on the households that are feeling the squeeze most.

As for child poverty, on which the Government are asking to be judged, the biggest single announcement in the Budget statement told us that only a quarter of the money needed to meet the Government's own target had been found. Unless there is a dramatic change in next year's Budget, they will fail to meet that target.

I looked far and wide for a respected impartial figure who supported the Budget, and found only one. It is a sign of the smallness of politics, which I described earlier, that that commentator was the BBC's new Budget commentator, Jade Goody. Never let it be said that public service broadcasting is failing to make a unique contribution to our national life, for the insights of Jade Goody can be found on the BBC website. We know of her antipathy to Indians, but on this occasion she was the only respected economic observer to endorse the cowboys in Government. She said:

"I'm fed up with boozy Britain, so I'd like the Chancellor to increase taxes on cheap booze and clamp down on most people selling cheap alcohol to underage children".

That was her policy, which was as close as I could find to an endorsement of any of the proposals made by the Chancellor on Wednesday. It might have been a Budget for Goody, but it was not a good Budget. Where there should have been vision, there was a black hole. Where there should have been drive and direction, there was a soporific lack of ambition. It made one wonder why the Chancellor and the Prime Minister ever bothered to get elected to Parliament in the first place. It was a Budget from a Government who have run out of ideas, and will soon be run out of office.

5.15 pm

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne), who let himself down slightly at the end, but made what was a very good speech that indicated that the "Orange Book" tendency is alive and well and thriving inside the Liberal Democrats. I will leave it to his hon. Friends to judge whether that is a good or bad thing.

It is also a great pleasure to follow my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, who today proved once again that he is what it says on the tin, so to speak—a champion for business and enterprise, not just inside the Government but in the wider world.

There are many things to welcome in the Budget, not least the extra help for pensioners and the further progress that the Government intend to make on tackling child poverty. Of course it is a truism that mid-term Budgets are never easy affairs. They have to contain difficult judgments without upsetting confidence either in markets or in politics. They have to show that the Government are sticking to a course without stealing the thunder of later, possibly pre-election, Budgets. They have to make the right long-term policy judgments and yet produce the necessary short-term corrections that the immediate circumstances demand.

On many of these grounds, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor got the balance about right and did so against the background of what all right hon. and hon. Members agree are perhaps the most difficult economic circumstances that we have faced in many years. That is a testimony to his calm approach and steady hand.

It is hard to be anything other than concerned about the current global economic situation and the turmoil in the global markets. As the recent turbulence demonstrates, it is all too easy for that concern to tip into panic. Fear in the markets will certainly not be helped if it is followed by pessimism in politics about the underlying state of the British economy. Of course the situation is serious, as we have seen during the last 24 hours, but I also believe that concern should not be allowed to crowd out confidence about what I believe at least to be the underlying resilience of the British economy.

It is true that worldwide inflation is rising and that growth is slowing. America may well already be in recession, a point acknowledged today by the US Treasury Secretary. For all of those who doubted that the credit crunch was going to be real some months ago, it is perfectly obvious that it is both real and biting. Yet most commentators believe, as reflected in the Red Book forecasts, that although growth will slow this year in Britain, it will rise again next year. I thought that my right hon. Friend was right to point to the fact that in every single quarter of every single year since 1997—despite the turbulence that there has been in global markets at different points during those 10 years—Britain is the only G7 country that has been able to avoid negative growth in any single quarter.

The macro-economic policy framework that was put in place in 1997 has stood the test of time and I believe that the continuation of that approach is the best safeguard against global economic uncertainty. I speak about confidence for another reason. Confidence about the underlying state of the British economy is important for another reason. Unless we are confident about it, the danger is that there will be a disproportionate response to what are currently serious problems. The danger is over-reaction, which is why I thought that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was right to resist the siren voices of those who are calling for, as the best response to global uncertainty, the return of economic protectionism.

When I look across the Atlantic at the United States, I think it is a tragedy that the ugly sound of economic protectionism has returned in that country above all others, which has been built on confidence about its place in the world and openness in its markets. Incidentally, protectionism has returned across the political spectrum—in both the Republican party and, sadly, the Democratic party.

In Europe, protectionism is as much a commodity of the right as of the left. It is striking that whereas Chancellor Merkel in Germany and President Sarkozy in France push full-steam ahead on other aspects of reform, when they speak about economic reform the message becomes somewhat blunted. For them, defence of the national economic interest comes first. That is why European Commission President Barroso was right when he said in a recent Financial Times interview that the two things to resist in the current climate are the return of both protectionism and over-the-top regulation.

Nobody doubts that the US sub-prime mortgage crisis, the Northern Rock collapse, the Société Générale scandal in France and the global credit crunch necessitate a re-examination of how financial institutions operate. A highly integrated global economy brings many benefits, but it brings big risks as well, as the current turmoil in the financial markets demonstrates. That is why we will need to hammer out a global agreement on ensuring greater transparency in the future. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was therefore right when he called yesterday for a re-examination of how global institutions, including the International Monetary Fund, operate, to ensure that global stability is maintained. In a world of global financial movements, more global co-operation is what is required, not less. That is why it is also right to resist the tide of anti-Americanism and the wave of Euroscepticism, both of which are all too prevalent in sections of our society.

Let me proffer one word of advice to the Conservative party. If it is serious about becoming a moderate, mainstream, outward-looking party, which is what it professes to want to be, instead of always standing against Europe, now is the time to embrace Europe, because a key lesson to be drawn from the events of the past few months is that no country is now able to stand alone. Nor should we seek to do so because, notwithstanding the self-evident risks, open markets and free trade are the best way to deliver results. The economies that have done best in recent times are those that have been most open. To see that, we need only compare the performances of Thailand and Burma or, even more graphically, North Korea and South Korea; we need only look at the experiences of the countries of Asia or Latin America, which by opening their markets—if not yet always their politics—have produced the biggest reduction in poverty that the world has ever seen.

It is not only developing nations that are benefiting from a more open and globalised economy. Notwithstanding the noise about protectionism and the threat of competition from India and China, over recent years the EU managed to increase its proportion of world exports, and over the past 10 years Europe has created some 18 million new jobs.

I am particularly proud that over the past decade the British Government have championed that pro-globalisation approach. The message has been that wealth creators can be sure of a warm welcome here. That message, and the framework of policy that lies beneath it, has helped the City of London become a world leader in financial services.

Tony Baldry: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the £500 million that will be raised through the non-dom tax will help to send out a signal that the City of London will still be a magnet for those coming from overseas to do business here?

Mr. Milburn: I should say two things to the hon. Gentleman. First, that is a good question to put not only to Labour Members but to his Conservative Front-Bench colleagues—let us remember that the Conservative party also made a non-dom proposal. Secondly, as we seek to maintain economic prosperity and stability in the future, it is important that our policy formulation on not only regulation but taxation sends the message to global investors and institutions that Britain is open for business, rather than closed. Opposition and Government alike have a responsibility to ensure that that is not put at risk.

If I were being candid, I would say that it is perfectly obvious that during the past few months the relationship between the Government and the business community has been sorely tested. I hope that the Budget draws a line under those tensions and that our future policy programme will build on the key lesson that we have surely learnt over the past 10 years—that the economy thrives best when the Government focus primarily on helping to create wealth rather than penalise it.

Stewart Hosie: I agree with a great deal of what is being said, particularly the critique of protectionism, but we have an £87 billion deficit in our trade in goods. I want to avoid protectionism, but we need to help manufacturing and, therefore, the whole economy. Is it right for the Government to have taken so much from business in last year's Budget, the pre-Budget report and this Budget? Last year, the CBI was talking about £5 billion, and another couple of billion has been taken this year. Is that not the wrong thing to do at this time?

Mr. Milburn: Of course it is right that we help business. The hon. Gentleman was talking about manufacturing in particular, and I have no problem with that. The best way to help manufacturing is not artificially protecting it. We learnt a lot of lessons during the 1970s and 1980s, when Governments tended to develop a pretty poor record of picking winners, but people could be certain that losers developed a pretty consistent habit of picking Governments. We should bear that lesson in mind. Open markets and free trade are the best way of delivering results. Of course there are limits to the role of free markets and Governments have a responsibility to ensure that markets operate both efficiently and fairly, but equally, we must recognise that there is a limit to the role of Government and the centralised state.

The second area about which I wish briefly to speak is the Government's role in tackling poverty and inequality. For me and, I suspect, for all Labour Members, it is a matter of great pride that a Labour Government have presided over the biggest falls in child and pensioner poverty that this country has ever seen, but we must also be candid about the fact that, despite rises in living standards and falls in poverty, a big inequality gap still scars our country. The ossification of British society— the slowing down of social mobility—that set in over many decades will clearly take more than one decade to unfreeze. Unfreezing it means recognising, as Amartya Sen, the Nobel prize winner for economics has rightly put it, that families and communities can suffer not only economic disadvantage but cultural, social, housing and educational disadvantage.

The Budget's proposals to lift many more children out of poverty are welcome, but if we are not only to raise the glass ceiling but break through it, we must do more to empower individual citizens, especially the poorest, to exercise more choice and power in the way that better off people nowadays take for granted. Social mobility will not advance if we think that only wealth is unevenly distributed in our society. Power is also unevenly distributed. Equity demands empowerment. Never mind its succeeding economically, if Britain is to get moving again socially, people need more than just support from the tax and benefits system and they need more than just help getting a job, a house, training or child care. They need to enjoy far greater control and to have a bigger say in how they lead their lives. That is why I welcome what the Prime Minister calls "a new politics that places power…in the hands of people themselves."

Although many of the Budget's measures are welcome, it could have done a lot more to make the notion of a state that empowers, not controls, the defining idea of the next phase of my party in government. For example, it could have allowed individual citizens, especially the poorest, to take control of their own budgets, not just in training, as the Red Book suggests, but in health, in old age and particularly in education. In those aspects of the public service where it is less easy for the individual to exercise direct control—most of us are hardly in a position to choose our own police officers, for example—the Budget could have set out how power could be relocated to local communities.

I would have liked to have seen the Budget be far more ambitious in seeking to make Britain more of an asset-owning democracy. We know that asset owning works. Those with assets tend to spend less time unemployed, and they enjoy better health and greater independence in their lives. Indeed, evidence from the US suggests that home owners are far more likely to engage in local politics and local neighbourhood organisations. As Larry Summers once famously said, "No one ever washed a rental car." Why? Because ownership encourages people to act responsibly and independently.

Spreading asset ownership is crucial to tackling inequality and speeding mobility. That is because the most substantial inequities in today's society are no longer between income groups but between those people who own shares or have a pension or own a home, and the people who rely purely on wages and benefits. That is why I welcome the Government's efforts to increase housing supply in general, and the Budget's proposals to make homes more affordable through new equity loan schemes in particular.

Of course Britain needs more social housing, of that there is no doubt. But given a choice, most people would prefer to buy rather than to rent. The US sub-prime mortgage problem should not be allowed to derail the ambitious Government plans to extend home ownership to far more people. More than 1.5 million social tenants aspire to own their own home, and it is progress that 95,000 households have been helped into home ownership through shared equity schemes, but far more needs to be done. With fewer people able to afford to buy outright, and more young people dependent on their parents for financial help to get on the housing ladder, further reforms are clearly needed.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Given a choice, most people want to buy their own home. We do—I doubt whether there is a single Member of Parliament who does not own their own home. But does my right hon. Friend accept that many people, certainly in my constituency, would struggle to get a mortgage—even in better circumstances—and therefore need to rent? Does he agree that we therefore need a substantial number of new social rented properties to be built?

Mr. Milburn: Of course we need more social housing, and the Chief Secretary, when she was Minister for Housing, will have argued strongly with the Treasury for more money for housing. Now she is in a position to put her wallet where her heart is, and I am sure that she will tell us later that she is going to do that.

Frank Dobson: Handbagged.

Mr. Milburn: As my right hon. Friend suggests, I will be at risk of being handbagged if I continue.

Many people want to fulfil their aspirations to own their home. The idea that they have to be able to pay 100 per cent. of the cost is unrealistic for many people, which is why we must have flexibility in how these shared ownership schemes work.

To put the issue in perspective, the Government spent £38,000 million on income-related social security benefits last year. Spending on tax credits amounted to an additional £17,000 million. Of course, that total of £55,000 million of expenditure makes a real difference to families struggling to make ends meet. But that sum dwarfs the £400 million that the Government spend on helping people to buy their own home. I believe that it is time to shift the balance. It is not dependence that we should seek to foster, but independence. The welfare system would enjoy far greater popular support if people thought that that was what it was doing.

Social mobility cannot be bought through social security payments and an old-fashioned safety net welfare state system. It can happen only if people are helped on to the ladder of opportunity and independence. To secure a Britain that is genuinely socially mobile, we have to do more than tackle poverty. We have to unleash aspiration. That requires not less of a state—as Opposition right hon. and hon. Members believe all too often—but a state that is prepared to empower and not to control. If we do that and open our country to aspiration and effort by fundamentally changing the distribution of power in our society, I believe that the progress that we have been able to make in the past 10 years will be complemented by even more progress in the next 10.

5.35 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): I refer hon. Members to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests in case they are not familiar with my business interests or wrongly believe that they will influence what I say.

It is a pleasure to take part in the Budget debate and to follow the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), who has just given us a remarkable and interesting speech. He does not need to persuade me of the virtues of the free market and an open economy and of the evils of protectionism. I agree entirely about the importance of a sense of ownership to the stability of a society and I quite agree that we will not restore the social mobility that we require in this country simply by building up welfare payments and welfare safety nets.

The right hon. Gentleman did not need to address me; he was addressing a small selection of his Back Benchers. I hope that he will allow me to indulge myself, as a long-serving Member, by saying that I enjoyed the expressions on the faces of the right hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) and for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), whom I remember as distinguished spokesmen of their party over many years. They would have regarded most of the sentiments in his speech as anathema; I suspect that, to a certain extent, they still do so. He might address more of those remarks to his colleagues.

To be fair, like his right hon. Friends, the right hon. Gentleman has chosen the luxury of the Back Benches and the freedom to discuss such subjects. He has recently been given to producing very interesting articles in the newspapers about the next election being up for grabs. He said that he believes that his party will not win that election unless it demonstrates some vision of what society wants. He then started to use words about supporting aspiration, which were entirely taken from the Conservative lexicon and were never those of the Labour party.

With the greatest of respect, the right hon. Gentleman has chosen the wrong debate. I assume that he wished to support a Budget that showed some vision of a society where people can be empowered to improve themselves, and that he wanted to hear, with a new Prime Minister, statements made by a new Chancellor that showed a grasp of the great issues facing this country. He cannot conceivably claim that we are discussing a Budget that does any such thing.

We all realise, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) and the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) said and as others will reflect, that this was a mini-Budget. It was absolutely devoid of vision and almost empty of any particular measures of any great consequence or significance. The Chancellor appeared to be the victim of events and not in control of any of them. I find that alarming.

Let me be fair to the Chancellor, as I belong to the trade union of Chancellors of the Exchequer. He did some good things; I am glad that he got out the old Gladstonian red box. His predecessor so hated any hint of tradition that I feared it had been lost. The Chancellor—unlike the Secretary of State for Business and whatever—takes scrupulous care when describing the evils of the past to talk about the problems of the early 1990s and has not slipped into that irritating habit of describing past problems as though the Government were in any way an inheritor of what they talk about when they go back to the 1980s and early 1990s.

I shall not even criticise the Chancellor for being boring, although he obviously was; I shall credit him for trying to minimise interest in the Budget that he was announcing, and to reduce the prominence of his own role in what is going on. Unfortunately, he does have a prominent role, and so far he has not responded to events.

In his Budget statement, the Chancellor repeated the word "stability" over and over again, with an almost soporific rhythm. The same word was repeated a fair number of times today by the Secretary of State, the name of whose Department I honestly cannot remember yet. It used to be called the Department of Trade and Industry, and no doubt it will be called that again one day.

Less than a week has passed since the Chancellor's speech about stability, but the economic environment in which business is trying to earn its living does not look very stable. Seismic events have taken place in the markets, and the future uncertainty is very difficult to read. The credit squeeze is becoming serious on both sides of the Atlantic, and it is clear that we are in the middle of a quite unprecedented financial crisis. Everyone agrees that there will be a marked slow-down in economic growth, but no one knows the extent to which the financial crisis will have a knock-on effect on the real economy. There will be a slow-down, but how many jobs will be lost and how many businesses will fail? Will the financial crisis even lead to the recession—that dreaded word—which, although not with us yet, is certainly on the horizon?

At times like these, the business community needs to have a reasonable level of confidence in the ability of the Administration, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Treasury and the Governor of the Bank of England to handle events. The Chancellor sounded remarkably complacent as he made his Budget statement. The one message that he wished to give was that the British economy was the global slow-down. He stated that with an air of complacent confidence, but the biggest question marks of all hang over the inheritance left by the Prime Minister to his successor as Chancellor, and over the Chancellor's ability to produce measures to deal with the problems that have arisen.

"better placed than other economies to withstand"—[Official Report, 12 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 285.]—

The events of the past day or two throw into stark contrast the reactions to events, and the decisions that have been taken, on either side of the Atlantic. There has been another bank failure, although I accept that the analogies between Bear Stearns and Northern Rock cannot be stretched too far. However, when the crisis finally came, the decision taken on the other side of the Atlantic was dramatic and rapid. Within a matter of hours—and certainly within a very few days—steps were taken for the US Government to intervene and reassure the many organisations that are creditors or counterparties to Bear Stearns. A private sector partner was found after only a couple of days and, with the business transferred into new private sector ownership, the risk to the American economy and taxpayer was minimised.

On this side of the Atlantic, we had the much smaller problem of Northern Rock. In contrast with what happened in the US, decisions were taken here that were followed by several months of indecision. Ultimately, a bank that the Chancellor had said that the Government did not wish to nationalise was taken into complete public ownership. That was followed by the preposterous statement that it would be business as usual while a strategy about where to go from here was devised.

I shall comment about Northern Rock only to the extent that it is relevant to the economic problems that we face, but it appears that the strategy for the bank's future will cost jobs in the north-east as the mortgage book is reduced. However, it was still possible to read in the newspapers—certainly at the weekend—that Government-owned and backed Northern Rock was offering the leading savings rates in the market to any depositor who wanted to buy the equivalent of gilts with no risk to capital value, and receiving a rather greater return, so we have some way to go.

In the Budget, the Chancellor produced nothing to add to any air of authority. He gave no indication that he thought that serious global problems might be about to have a serious impact on the UK, and he did nothing to regain the confidence of the business community that he was either the person to do anything about it or in a position to do so. It is not as though there were no warnings. The Chancellor has had an awful lot of bad luck since he took over—for which he has considerable sympathy from me. One bit of bad luck was taking over from the predecessor who is now his boss and who, certainly at the time of the pre-Budget report, gave every indication of not allowing the Chancellor to produce any scintilla of a measure of his own to deal with matters. Subsequently, the Chancellor hit a lot of serious economic problems, but they were not unforeseen.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton said, the economic cycle was bound to come to an end and preparations for that should have been made long ago. The nature of the end of the cycle became clear a long time ago. To make sure that I would not be giving too many hostages to fortune, I looked back to what I said in the debate on the Prime Minister's last Budget. I found that I had been talking about the risks to the American economy because of what was already happening in the American housing market.

By the summer it was clear that the American housing market was in a state of collapse and the beginnings of the credit squeeze were coming. Throughout the autumn, it was obvious that the impact of the credit squeeze on the British economy was becoming pronounced and that slow-down was imminent, so it cannot be said that the Chancellor had no time to prepare a strategy and that there was no opportunity to give us a greater description of how he would help to ensure that the British economy would not be too badly affected by the inevitable consequences of what is now happening.

The content of the Budget was trite. The Chancellor followed the party line set out by his predecessor for the previous 10 years. Almost all the phrases, apart from the missing word "prudence", were taken from the standard lexicon of the previous Chancellor since he took office in 1997. I have been trying to work out how they arrived at that modest package of measures. It seems to me that above all else, the authors—who probably included the Chancellor, but more importantly, included the Prime Minister—were dominated by the absolute determination to try to show that they would still comply with the previous Chancellor's fiscal rules. My advice to the present Chancellor is to stop doing that.

Nobody left on God's earth still believes in the previous Chancellor's fiscal rules, apart from him and such loyal acolytes as he still has in the Treasury helping to produce such things. The rules are completely incredible. The movement of the date of the cycles has been utterly ridiculous. Not only has the calculation of the national debt always excluded Railtrack and significant parts of the private finance initiative, which were due to come on to the books this year but for an accounting change that has been mysteriously delayed for 12 months because it cannot yet be accomplished, but it now calmly leaves out Northern Rock. Of course, the Government always intended to leave out Northern Rock. About three weeks ago, I received an answer to a parliamentary question saying that Northern Rock was contingent debt so it would not have to be counted. Given the danger that the Government may have made the statisticians slightly more independent than they were a year or two ago, there has been a change, but the Government are still coolly ignoring the debt as though it will be only temporary. We all hope that it will be, but we do not yet know how much will be called in.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for giving an excellent and informative speech. Can he tell us whether the public sector pension deficits are included on the balance sheet?

Mr. Clarke: To be fair, they never have been, but my hon. Friend raises an extremely valuable point: if anybody is looking to the future of the national finances, as they should do, they will see that the extent of the unfunded, public sector pension obligations that will start to hit the next generation is extremely alarming. The Government's failure to get on with any serious reform of public sector pensions will be paid for by future Governments of every colour—and by future taxpayers, but that is another matter. Things that should be in the rules have been left out, and keeping to the fiscal rules is a bit of an illusion.

It was obviously decided that this is no year to raise a lot of taxation, and I agree with that decision. Every Budget for some time now has raised taxation, as carefully and as stealthily as possible. If the rules were to be complied with properly, it would be necessary to raise billions of pounds in taxation—the Institute for Fiscal Studies suggested £8 billion—but it would have been most unwise to do so, given the extent of the economic slow-down that we will face. However, small or smallish amounts of taxation—a couple of billion of pounds-worth or so—have been raised to bring us just within the fiscal rules, taking us to just below 40 per cent. of gross domestic product, if the other forecasts are right. Again, that is a quite ridiculous guide to policy, and I do not think that it will work.

The Treasury's borrowing forecasts have been totally and utterly unreliable for years now. I see no reason for believing that the forecasts in this year's Red Book are any more likely to be achieved than those in the Red Books for several years past, or even than those in the Chancellor's first attempt at a pre-Budget report last year. We will have a sharp economic slow-down. The figures in the Red Book for the likely take from corporation tax and value added tax are almost incredible. The practice of producing, for our delectation, a set of tables showing yet again an unfortunate and unforeseen rise in public borrowing next year, followed by a happy recovery two or three years later, has lost all credibility. If that was the core of Budget policy making, as it seems to have been, it was not rising to the urgency of events; it was not even a very sensible way of tackling the problem of the public finances, which should always be the first duty of a Chancellor presenting a Budget.

So where have we turned to for taxation this year? As the hon. Member for Taunton said, we have largely turned to the tax revenue-raising measures that the previous Chancellor put in last year's Budget and postponed for a year. Aside from that, a very old-fashioned approach has been taken. Labour Chancellors used to be more reluctant to go for fags and booze, but they did so this year. They have also turned to large cars. The mood has changed. The British have always had a puritan spirit, and that spirit is alive and well in the British media and among the British public. Although the British indulge in sin on a considerable scale, they always feel that they should pay tax on it, which is why we have always raised a disproportionate amount of our revenues from excise duties of one kind or another; that has been a popular feature of the British fiscal system for 200 years.

One problem was clearly described by the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan): parts of the industries affected—the beer and pub industry—are not in a great state to raise much more revenue. However, to be fair to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he did not pretend that the rises were to do with binge drinking and pleasing the Daily Mail, as I thought he would. I heard him give an interview, and he did say that the measures were intended to raise money. The problem with taxes on beer and alcohol is that they are somewhat regressive. They fall disproportionately on the households of the less well-off, when the proportion of total income is taken into account. That, coupled with last year's changes doing away with the lower rate of income tax, undoubtedly make it a slightly regressive Budget for the second year running. The taxes on large cars are not sufficient to change the behaviour of people who can afford to buy them, so it is really a rather unoriginal way of raising tax.

Of course, income is also raised through capital gains tax and the tax on non-doms. I do not have strong feelings about either of those. Capital gains tax should be made more simple. I am worried about having a capital gains tax rate that is below the marginal rate on income tax; I think that we will see many of our accountant friends back in the business of turning people's income into capital gains. That was the backbone of many people's practices 20 or 25 years ago.

I do not think that many non-doms will flee these shores, but I simply say that it is extremely unwise to consult on taxes. I do not understand why we have a pre-Budget report. We should have Budget purdah. I say: announce it on the day, and if the details are wrong, sort them out and correct them in the Finance Bill. I accidentally found myself in consultation on ending European duty-free travellers' allowances. I had to listen to accounts of the number of airports that would close, and the tens of thousands of airport workers' jobs that would be lost if I did not seek a derogation from the decision. I do not think that everybody will flee the City of London and go to live in boring islands overseas.

The capital gains tax change was unwisely made. It was wrong not only to break Budget purdah but to announce the measure in a pre-Budget speech that was really nothing more than a political extension of the exchanges in party conferences. It was wrong to announce, almost overnight, decisions on which no proper work had been done, and to do the work of getting the detail right—for retiring entrepreneurs and so on—in public, faced with a tremendous clamour.

To conclude, what the Budget lacked was any notion of how the Government would face impending economic problems if the situation worsened. The Chancellor looks like a rabbit transfixed by the headlights. He is a boy standing on the burning deck and whistling inconsequentially the old tunes of his predecessor. There are many similarities between the British and American economies: we have had a housing boom; financial services are a large part of our market; and there is a credit squeeze here. This is no time to raise the tax on small businesses. We will have inflation and public debt as problems next year for sure; I hope that we have no worse.

5.57 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): It seems to be a feature of our post-Budget debates that it is my lot to be called after my namesake, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), and I welcome the opportunity to speak after him today. We have our name in common, and perhaps one or two other things, too. I shall, if I may, confide in the House—if the right hon. and learned Gentleman objects I shall stop straight away—that occasionally we receive each other's mail. Not long ago I read a postcard that said, "Mr. Clarke, I will never vote for you again. You are a disgrace to the Tory party.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

You have betrayed us on the Common Market and on so many other issues." I took that as a compliment, not just to me but to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Perhaps I am being too kind to the right hon. and learned Gentleman today, but if I may say so, his post-Budget speeches are improving. I have been in the House long enough to remember his speeches as Chancellor, when he stood at the Dispatch Box, doing an impression of a poor man's Brian Rix, pulling up his trousers and checking his braces to make sure that they were still in place. More than that, I remember some of the policies with which he identified himself and those that he supported. I pay tribute to him as a former Chancellor for the improvement in his speeches. He did not go so far today as he has on previous occasions, predicting the "we're all doomed" scenario that we have heard so often. He has not quite reached, if I may say so seriously, the standing of Nigel Lawson who, to his credit, when pressed by others, particularly on "Newsnight", to help talk us into a recession and even worse, has resisted that temptation. The threat of recession is one of the issues that we must address in the Budget.

In last week's response to the Budget from the Leader of the Opposition we barely heard reference to the problems that we see occurring across the pond. Are we to believe that since the days when the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe was Chancellor, right up to this week, no Chancellor of the Exchequer has had to take on board the challenge of globalisation and, particularly in the past week, the backdrop of turbulence, credit crunch and so on, and pretend that those factors do not exist?

I spent a great deal of time with my constituents at the weekend, and they are fully aware that times are difficult in the international context. They saw the Budget as well balanced and one that addressed the problems that we face in the United Kingdom, against the international backdrop that I mentioned. Yes, the Budget speech mentioned stability. Oddly enough, stability is important to people in my constituency, where employment matters, where we recall unemployment at 3 million, where we recall negative equity, and where we remember very high interest rates, not only on Black Wednesday but for many years around that time.

I asked people whether they preferred the economic policies being pursued by the Government—the low unemployment, the low interest rates, the low inflation and the rest—and despite criticisms that they might have, which I hope to reflect in my speech, about some elements of the Budget, I know the choice that my constituents will continue to make.

The Budget rightly focused on hard-working families and children living below the poverty line. The priorities were correct. I have some reservations, as I said, but I am a realist and I acknowledge the grim realities of the global economic slowdown signalled by the sub-prime mortgage crisis on the other side of the Atlantic. I hope, like my colleagues, to be constructive in the debate.

Rather late on Friday evening I was invited by BBC Scotland to take part in an early morning programme. Given the lateness of the hour, it was not possible, but I listened carefully when the programme was broadcast. Apparently, somewhere in the long documents that are produced as part of the Budget presentation, there was a reference to the fact that people with learning disabilities are obliged to fill in great long forms in order to find jobs. As co-chair of the all-party group on learning disabilities, I know that 65 per cent. of people with learning disabilities have made it clear that they want to work. If there are impediments to those people finding and keeping jobs, I am sure the Government, and especially the Department for Work and Pensions, will employ the sensitivity that that situation invites. Advocacy, which I have long supported in the House, especially when I was fortunate enough to get an Act of Parliament on the statute books, might apply in that situation and in others, as the Government rightly pursue their policy of making employment opportunities available to the great majority of our people, including those who experience disability.

There were many good points in the Budget. First, the high-profile restatement of the ambitious targets concerning child poverty will help galvanise the cause. The increase in child tax credit and the substantial increase in first-child benefit will help us towards the target and will help many of my constituents. Secondly, the plan to take more pensioners out of income tax, alongside the rise in pensioners' minimum income to £124, is welcomed by many. I am delighted to deliver that and other good news to my constituents in Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill. I would welcome Opposition Members joining me in that task.

Mr. Prisk: The right hon. Gentleman has a strong record of helping the more vulnerable in society. Does he therefore share my concern that the net effect of the tax changes that the Government are planning is that those just over the £5,000 personal allowance see a marginal tax rate of 60 to 70 per cent.? Surely his Government should do better than that.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman makes his point well. I hope that if he serves on the Committee considering the Finance Bill, or if he gets the opportunity to express that view on the Floor of the House, he will do so. I hope we can discuss his comments rationally.

In an excellent speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) made an important point about the Budget's influence on an issue that is raised again and again in my constituency—antisocial behaviour. Some people might think that that is an odd thing to relate to a Budget speech, but my constituents identify the availability of cheap alcohol as a direct cause of many of the problems that they face day in, day out.

On Saturday, during the annual St. Patrick's day celebration that we have in my town, Coatbridge—a great cultural event—I met many people and discussed antisocial behaviour, which is not all that amusing in my constituency. I was accompanied by Superintendent Henry Campbell, who does an excellent job, and a man called Jackie Charlton, who is probably well known in all parts of the House and who graced us with his presence. We met many people who raised the issue of antisocial behaviour and alcohol misuse.

Alcohol misuse is estimated to cost £7.3 billion in crime and antisocial behaviour. We know that about 17 million working days are lost each year through alcohol-related absence from work. I welcome the fact that the Chancellor recognised that and, as I said, I found constituents who thought the same way. I am beginning to think that Budgets are a little like football matches. We see a match, then read a report of it in the newspaper, and it is not quite what we thought we had experienced.

From an industrial constituency like mine that is suffering the effects of antisocial behaviour, I warmly welcome what the Chancellor has done, together with the measures taken by the Scottish Executive, in fairness both to the present Executive and the previous one, as well as the alcohol harm reduction strategy for England. Those measures are having some success and progress is being made.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) is not in his place at the moment. I welcome the increases—which, frankly, I thought rather modest—in duty on alcohol, including spirits. The scotch whisky industry has not done too badly of late. Spirits make up many of the ingredients of the flavoured drinks that appeal to young people and cause mayhem. If we are to address the problem of spirits, we cannot ignore the fact that whisky is one of them. Not only were the rises right, but the revenues are being fed back into fighting poverty. We Labour Members welcome that aspect of the Budget; we recognise that the issue remains a challenge.

As for my personal reservations about the Budget, I cannot recall any Budget about which I did not have some. Again, my hon. Friend the Member for Selby raised points that I want to make. I welcome the increase in fuel allowance. It is right that people—especially the elderly—should have the benefit of that increase, given that energy prices are so high. However, I do not want our welfare policies to subsidise the big profits of energy companies, and that prospect remains a big worry for me.

I welcome what the Chancellor did on prepayment meters and social tariffs—the increase from £50 million to £150 million. However, although some companies said that they were practising a social tariffs policy, people thinking that they really meant it were cheated. We need to consider such matters much more carefully. In other words, I want to say to the Chancellor and our colleagues on the Front Bench that given the problems of energy companies and the policies that they are pursuing, and given the role of Ofgem, we have to have a much more robust approach. In January, we will again have price rises, followed by massive profits in April. There will be another bonanza for shareholders and executives, but another winter of discontent for the less fortunate.

Spring is now on the way; heaters will soon be turned down and sweaters will start to come off. However, before long we will face the same problem again. Incidentally, I would have encouraged the Chancellor to extend the provisions on the fuel allowance to families with disabled children and perhaps, in time, to other families with people who endure acute disabilities. Before we know it, it will be winter 2009, when winter fuel payments will be rolled back to the pre-Budge rate. I recognise that the commitment this year is a one-off, but I hope that each year the fuel allowance will be reviewed and a realistic payment will be delivered to those who very much deserve it.

I want a strategy for true social tariffs to come from the energy companies, Ofgem and the Government Departments that are responsible for energy issues and assessing the costs for people, especially the elderly, as they try to decide between heating and eating. The role of energy regulators needs to be reviewed. My hon. Friend the Member for Selby made a compelling case in saying that such matters should go before the Competition Commission; I certainly support that view. It is time that we made switching suppliers meaningful and not just a slogan. Let the companies that do not participate in a real sense be named and shamed and let the needs of our people, who have done so much—particularly in constituencies such as mine—to help us build our economy towards the stability that we now enjoy, be recognised.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe seemed to mock the word "stability", but I find it very welcome. On Sunday morning, I saw the Leader of the Opposition being interviewed in the north-east on the Andrew Marr programme; he did not feel that the use of that word was unacceptable. What I want is meaningful stability, not just slogans. We hear grim talk about the old fabled man in the street, and platitudes about Government competence being not about how they perform when things are going well, but how well prepared they are to cope when things get tough. That opinion was bandied about almost immediately after the Chancellor sat down.

I believe that we have built up our economy and seized the opportunities in Europe and the rest of the world. Some have mentioned India and China. There has, of course, been considerable growth in both those countries, but we still must maintain the approach that I am happy to say I have witnessed from the Dispatch Box: one that means that we do not have extreme wealth on the one hand and huge poverty on the other. The proposals in the Budget to continue with an excellent record on international development and overseas aid fit comfortably with the challenge of tackling poverty—a challenge taken up by those on the Labour Benches and one of the reasons why I joined the Labour party at a youthful age and continue to support it with great pride.

I conclude on this note. Employment, inflation, interest rates, public investment, making sure that we do our utmost for equality of opportunity in education, the health service and even culture and the creative industries—such things remain a priority today. It is right that at this stage of the millennium our Government should address themselves to such issues. In presenting his Budget, the Chancellor had every reason to feel proud. Although my constituents accept that we have much more progress to make, and will remind me that that is what they want, they recognise fairness when they see it—and this Budget was, above all, a fair one.

6.18 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke), who always addresses the House in a measured way on behalf of the least advantaged in society. What he says is, of course, true: credit squeezes are not new. It is also true that lady luck has not smiled on this Chancellor since the previous incumbent moved next door. We all know that.

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

The Chancellor has now presented himself as the steadfast helmsman steering us through the global economic storm, but I contend that in some key respects the Government's own navigation has contributed to the gathering gloom. To continue the nautical analogy, the squalls were apparent long before they hit us, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said, and perhaps the Government were tardy in reefing their mainsail in time.

The Chancellor said that his Budget is responsible and that it matches increased spending with vital reforms. We all share that concern for reform and I welcome the examples of change that I have seen in my role as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I always try to give credit where it is due. However, I have also witnessed too many examples of waste and inefficiency to share the Chancellor's supreme confidence in the certainty of savings that he promised us. I want to make that the gravamen of my contribution, which, I hope, will not be too long.

Spending on health has doubled and there are many more doctors and nurses, as we were reminded, but hon. Members will perhaps not be surprised to learn that the statistics in the Budget speech do not reveal the full picture. There was no acknowledgement that productivity in the health service has fallen in recent years. Hon. Members might not trust me implicitly on statistics, but, on this occasion, they can also rely on the Office for National Statistics. Its latest completed figures show an average 2 per cent. decrease in NHS productivity between 2001 and 2005, which is worrying.

Let me be clear: those who work in the NHS deserve to be paid a decent wage. We know that our lives and those of our constituents depend on them. They are not to blame for the inconsistency in outcomes. After all, the worst work on their behalf is often done with the best of intentions. For example, our Committee will shortly take evidence on the recent National Audit Office report on the new GP contract. There is the small matter that it cost £1.76 billion more than the Government expected, and that a 2.5 per cent. decrease in primary care productivity accompanied the first two years of the contract. Of course, the Government had predicated the entire reform on a productivity rise. The contract for NHS consultants was a similar story, and the predicted productivity rises have yet to happen. The cost of out-of-hours care was, again, higher than forecast, and delivery struggled to fulfil expectations. That is constantly repeated in public service delivery.

Tony Baldry: Is not the lack of accountability a genuine concern? By the time problems come to light, as with the chaos about the Bicester asylum centre, Ministers and permanent secretaries have moved on, so that when people appear before the Public Accounts Committee they can claim, "Not me, guv, it was the previous lot", and no one is accountable for the wastage.

Mr. Leigh: I agree and I want to suggest a modest reform in our procedures that might tackle the problem that my hon. Friend identifies. We have the best system in the world of post facto audit but one of the least effective Budget scrutiny systems. I shall deal with that in a little more detail before I sit down.

I do not take issue with the rosy portrait of reform that the Budget statement presented for the sake of blind opposition. There is no point in that. We all believe in reform and I welcome, for example, the proposal that long-term recipients of incapacity benefit should attend assessments of their fitness to work. That is good, but hon. Members listening to the Chancellor would be forgiven for thinking that his £30 billion of savings a year are already in the bank. They are not. We have prepared numerous reports on the existing efficiency programme. The record on reform to date shows that savings are easy to predict but harder to achieve in practice. My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), the shadow Chief Secretary, knows that well as he prepares for government.

There are many wise men and women in the House today, but another, John Locke, wrote that "an unerring mark of the love of truth is not entertaining any proposition with greater assurance than the proofs it is built upon will warrant".

To put it another way, experience tells us that the Budget is counting on chickens with a poor record of hatching. As a giver of candid advice, I therefore say to those on the Treasury Bench, as many of us have many times, that public faith in public services will not withstand public failures to deliver genuine reform, which is what we need and want.

The price of failure to deliver productivity gains and efficiency savings will be paid in higher taxes and higher borrowing. That price is paid by us all, but, as I said in last year's debate, the burden is felt most by those who can least afford to bear it—the poorest and most vulnerable members of society.

As hon. Members know, I believe that there is a strong moral case for lower taxation, especially for those least able to pay. Some hon. Members agree and others have yet to see the light. However, I believe that few hon. Members would dissent from the equally strong moral case for removing inefficiency and waste from public services. That is the case that we fought to further in our Committee.

To give them credit, those on the Treasury Bench accept more than 90 per cent. of our recommendations, and hundreds of millions of pounds are consequently saved. That is an example of what parliamentarians can achieve when we work together, especially when we are supported by the National Audit Office. However, our scrutiny of public spending happens only after the event, to revert to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) made. We can encourage those who come next to imitate the good and avoid the bad, but we cannot head the problem off at the pass. That is true of many issues.

Today, the non-doms issue was mentioned. Evidence on that is mixed. I have heard anecdotal evidence to suggest that many middle-income earners are leaving the country. I welcome the concessions in the Budget statement, but, in a sense, I disagree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe, who speaks with all the authority of a former Chancellor, because I believe that pre-Budget scrutiny would help resolve such issues.

We have debated the taxation of family cars. The public are only just waking up to the fact that their small family cars, not the large gas guzzlers, will be taxed. There was insufficient debate about the cost of the Iraq war and the Afghanistan operation. There is nothing more boring than listening to people saying, "I told you so", and my right hon. and learned Friend and I voted against the war. However, it has cost the Government £5 billion and it has cost the US Government $3 trillion. Another £2 billion is set aside for what will happen in Afghanistan and Iraq. All such issues need to be debated more often and in more detail in the House as the Budget goes through.

Let us consider what happens in Congress in the US. I believe that opportunities to unleash the collective wisdom of the House are far too limited compared with what happens in Congress, where the President proposes, but Congress disposes. There are literally hundreds of hours of line-by-line debate on the Budget. What emerges from Congress is different from the President's proposals. Our powers in the House are far too limited. It is true that we have the Budget debate and three days of debate on the Supply estimates. However, the Budget confirms spending plans that are set out in the comprehensive spending review, of which there is almost no systematic scrutiny. The estimates are debated only after the beginning of the year in which the spending takes place. There is therefore little opportunity to influence the Government, even if they are listening.

Hon. Members who serve on departmental Select Committees will also recognise the difficulties because they have so much more to do on policy issues. They have difficulty in consistently devoting sufficient time to spending proposals—indeed, they hardly consider them. Parliament was created hundreds of years ago primarily as a financial watchdog on the Government. It sat mainly during the whole Budget process. That power has atrophied and there is a huge scrutiny gap.

Let me suggest a modest solution. I believe that the House should establish a Select Committee on the Budget, with the normal powers of Select Committees—I ask for no more—but with the specific purpose of considering the Government's spending plans. To allow the good sense and good faith of Members to have the greatest influence, hearings should be held well before plans take on the formal force of estimates. After all, voting against the supply of funds is tantamount to bringing down the Government. I do not suggest that; there is no nuclear option here. We need far less than that. My proposal would not shake the foundations of the constitution, nor would it significantly inconvenience the Executive. The Government would need to produce spending reviews by the summer recess—a feat achieved in 2002 and 2004, and missed last year only because of the then Prime Minister's extended goodbye. Annual updates would not be difficult to provide. The NAO would be willing—I know, because I have asked—to assist the House by analysing the information and providing a commentary for the Committee to consider at hearings each autumn.

I hope that the Liaison Committee will shortly have the opportunity to consider my proposal. I hope that the Government's attitude will be welcoming. Two years ago, in the regular debate on the work of the Public Accounts Committee, which assimilates events that, sadly, too few hon. Members turn up for—I encourage them to do so—the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Member for Wentworth (John Healey), recognised that the scrutiny of public spending is fundamental to our democracy. He also said that "we need to introduce a more systematic and challenging parliamentary scrutiny of spending plans."—[Official Report, 18 July 2006; Vol. 449, c. 289.]

I hope that the commitment given by the Treasury then to work with Parliament holds good today. Indeed, I know that it does, because the Treasury is doing a lot of useful work.

Establishing a Budget Select Committee would reinforce the rights and privileges of this elected House. It would also reflect the truth in the words of Benjamin Disraeli, that "all power is a trust; that we are accountable for its exercise; that from the people, and for the people, all springs".

Establishing such a Committee might even help the Chancellor in his quest for those savings from the public purse on which the success of the Budget so obviously depends.

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): I can safely say that I have considerable sympathy for the points that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) made about the need for the House to reassert control over the raising and spending of tax. However, his was a somewhat unique contribution from the Conservative Benches. To listen to the criticisms that have been made of the Budget one would not realise that under this Government, with the stability that they have managed to achieve, we are close to almost any definition of full employment, and that we have the highest levels of employment ever, the highest ever living standards and record numbers of pensioners and children raised out of poverty, partly through the national minimum wage, which both opposition parties opposed, and tax credits.

I am always a bit reluctant to accept homilies from those on the Tory Benches about putting money by for a rainy day. After all, the previous Tory Government took in £70 billion in capital takings from privatisation over 18 years, treating that money as revenue, which would be regarded as dodgy by even the slackest accountants in the private sector.

I was struck by some of the earlier references to wealth creation. The definition of "wealth creators" that a lot of people use is a little narrow. A report was published yesterday outlining the cost to business in this country of sickness, which was estimated at about £100 billion a year. The people who reduce that level of sickness contribute hugely to wealth creation. Were those in the national health service not doing their job, a lot of the wealth being created could not be created.

Let me give just one example. Sir Harold Ridley, who died just after the millennium, having received what might be described as a belated knighthood in the millennium honours list, invented the artificial lens that has made cataract operations possible. I do not think that anybody in the City of London has ever made as big a contribution to wealth creation in this country as Sir Harold Ridley did.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible for regulatory reform, which I want to address. When people talk about regulatory reform, they normally want to reduce regulation, but I believe that we need massive regulatory reform of the banking system, which includes introducing tougher and more effective regulation, both nationally and internationally. The Government are trying to hang on to the stability that has made the improvements over the past decade possible, but that is being severely undermined by the current earthquake in international banking.

It is no good the Tories trying to blame the Government for the current earthquake in international banking. The international banking crisis has been created almost entirely—certainly 99 per cent.—by the people who operate the international banking system. The trouble with the bankers, and their useless auditors and even more useless risk assessors, is that the mess that they have created will affect everybody. In all probability it will affect people's mortgages, and it may affect their pensions, savings and jobs. I know that Conservative Members smile whenever I attack the banking industry, but I believe that most people in this country are disgusted by what has happened. All the achievements of the stability that the Government seek are at risk because of the banking crisis—a crisis brought on by the practice of the banks.

It was not long ago that bankers had an image of being a rather careful lot of people. They were careful with their own money and with our money—"prudent" or "conservative" were not the words for it. however, that has not been the case in recent times. A substantial number of people now involved in international banking have behaved more like a collection of wide boys, trying to con the others, who were idiots, but they have not been playing with their own money; they have been playing with other people's money and jobs. Those bankers have not been wealth creators; they have been wealth manipulators. As they were not risking their own money, their main objective was to maximise their bonuses and then leg it as quickly as possible, with little regard for anyone else.

That does not apply to everybody in international banking or everybody in the City. However, virtually all of them have become dedicated followers of fashion. They say, "Well, we've heard that A, B and C are on to a good thing, so we can't possibly not get on to that good thing ourselves." That is how so much of the British banking system joined the United States in being exposed to the famous sub-prime mortgage market, although the situation is not so bad here. It is usually said that the amount of money made available for mortgages in this country has increased to meet the increased cost of houses. However, I believe that the process has generally been the reverse—that prices have risen to meet the amount of money that the financial system has been willing to lend.

Again, it was not so long ago that building societies would lend people only 2.7 to three times their annual salaries. Lo and behold, most house prices were set at around 2.7 to three times people's annual salaries. However, then the fashionable lot took over in the financial services industries and offered people mortgages that were four, five and, extraordinarily, even six times their annual salary, with no deposit—and, knowingly, mortgages that were higher than the value of the property to be purchased. What has been the result? Prices have risen in line with the availability of the mortgages.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): While all those events were happening, the present Prime Minister—the former Chancellor—sat idly by. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that he should take some responsibility?

Frank Dobson: I certainly think that the regulatory authorities have some responsibility. Above all, however, it has to be the responsibility of the practitioners—or, in this case, what might be described as the malpractitioners. They were seeking to maximise the amount of money that flowed across their desks because they always got a percentage of that money. If the price of a house went up, say, from £100,000 to £150,000, they would get at least a 50 per cent. increase in their rake-off. I believe that we need further constraints and a much more powerful Financial Services Authority in order to constrain such practices.

Mr. Jeremy Browne: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Dobson: No, let me go on.

It is not only in the housing sphere that the financial services industry has developed a greater influence. For example, when people buy a washing machine or deal with a water company, it is a novel experience if their letterbox is not overwhelmed with brochures for insurance for their washing machine or insurance policies against the possibility of leaks developing. It gradually becomes clear to anyone with a grain of sense that these companies make more money out of the insurance than out of the washing machine, and that they make more money by insuring people against a risk that is unlikely to happen than by selling people water. Everything seems to be shifting towards financial services in that way.

Then we come to the dreaded US sub-prime mortgages and collateralised debt obligations, which were offering something for nothing. I understand that the Financial Services Authority said recently that the public needed financial education and that schools should be doing more to provide such education for young people. Above all, it said that we needed to get across the message that we cannot get something for nothing. Well, all I can say to the Financial Services Authority is, "Why don't you go and tell that to the bankers who got involved in the sub-prime mortgage scandal?" We have a worldwide system based on people trying to get something for nothing, promoting extravagant borrowing by hedge funds and private equity, and promoting a system of general speculation.

One of the most hopeful developments recently was the news that the International Energy Agency is going to look into the effect that these borrowing-financed speculators have on the world price of oil. It is not old-fashioned, old-Labour me who is saying that the speculators have been driving up the price of oil; it is Governments around the world, the International Energy Agency and the United Nations. It would appear that the speculators, not content with their ruinous lending policies, are now driving up the price of fuel.

Mr. MacNeil: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Dobson: I would rather get on, so that other people can get in.

If we are to avoid banking crises in the future, I do not believe that we can leave national or international regulation in their present enfeebled state. I do not believe that the banks can be left to their own decisions. These are the people who appear on television and on the radio and who are lauded on the business pages of newspapers. "Oh, he's the chap from Merrill Lynch. We'd better listen to him." Yet Merrill Lynch lost $22 billion on sub-prime mortgages. Or it might be someone from that great Swiss institution UBS, which lost $18.7 billion. I was also struck by the fact that, at least according to the latest list, Bear Stearns has lost $2.6 billion on sub-prime mortgages, yet its rescuer, JPMorgan Chase, has lost $2.9 billion on sub-prime mortgages. So the great heroic firm that bailed out Bear Stearns has actually lost more money than the bank it was bailing out. My submission is that we simply cannot leave these matters to people with such a dreadful record of ruining the economy.

Mr. MacNeil: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Frank Dobson: No, I need to get on.

Then we come to the people who have been doing the risk assessment. Standard & Poor's was asked by some of these people in the financial services industry to advise them on the packaging of their products. Then—surprise, surprise—it gave a treble-A rating to the products on which it had given advice. And what about the auditors? Did they not spot anything? Did they not see that risks were being taken? The large firms of auditors claim to be multinational, so one might assume that such firms in the United States and Britain would have learned from what was happening in other countries. Might not the companies with offices in Barcelona and Madrid as well as in New York and London have spotted the fact that under the Spanish banking system people were not allowed to get involved in sub-prime mortgages, because that was against the law in Spain? Did it not occur to them that there might be some merit in the Spanish law, and that it might offer some protection? Did they not realise, in other words, that the Spanish might be on to something?

Mr. Jeremy Browne rose—

Frank Dobson: I will not give way.

Mr. Browne: Go on, you've got lots of time.

Frank Dobson: Oh, all right, I will give way.

Mr. Browne: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. It is a constant source of wonder that Tony Blair found space for him in his Cabinet. I actually share some of his concerns about some of the practices in the banking sector, but I believe that his explanation for why house prices rose so dramatically is far too narrow. Were there not other factors involved, such as an increase in marital break-ups, people living longer, and rising population numbers? Another important reason is that more households have two incomes. All those factors contribute to driving up house prices. It is not just to do with malpractice in the banking sector, as the right hon. Gentleman suggests.

Frank Dobson: I do not think I said that the situation was caused exclusively by the stupidity of the banks' lending policies, but I believe that that has made a major contribution. I do not think that anyone could demonstrate that the increased amount of money available for mortgages rose to meet house prices, rather than house prices rising because of the increased availability of money for mortgages.

Perhaps I am very old Labour—I sometimes describe myself as heritage Labour; I am thinking of putting in a bid to the Heritage Lottery Fund to restore my façade at public expense—but I must emphasise that the people of this country will not tolerate this House failing to recognise the fact that these horrors are being visited upon us as a result of the stupidity, ignorance and greed of a large number of people in the financial services industry. That is why we need to reform the regulations, and to insist that all the international bodies of which we are a member do the same, so that the stupidities of the banking industry are not visited on ordinary decent people all over the world.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): It is always a joy to follow the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson)—a self-proclaimed member of heritage Labour. When he actually said that bankers could not be left to their own decisions, he wonderfully took us back to good old clause 4 old Labour, with public ownership of the means of production, distribution and exchange—the authentic voice of old Labour. Little wonder that when the right hon. Gentleman stood as the candidate for Mayor of London, he did not find much support in or among Londoners.

The right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke), who is no longer in his place, said that this was a Budget for hard-working families. He was absolutely right, but it is a Budget to hammer hard-working families. It is a bad-news Budget that adds £110 a year to the tax bill of every family; and the tax take will be £2.8 billion a year higher by 2010. It is a Budget for kicking families when they are down because new taxes announced for the next three years will put an extra £1.5 billion on all alcoholic drinks, hitting 43 million people; £1.6 billion extra on drivers, even with the delayed fuel tax rise; and £1.7 billion extra on businesses.

The background to the Budget is that during the years of plenty, the Government, whose economic management was then in the charge of the man who is currently Prime Minister, squandered the national riches rather than put them aside for the years of difficulty. Sadly, the poorest people are about to be stung by the Prime Minister's swan-song as Chancellor—the abolition of the 10 per cent. tax band.

There is, of course, growing uncertainty around the globe, and we have no protection here for a rainy day, let alone for the global economic storms that seem to be blowing across the Atlantic. Inflation is rising because the previous Chancellor chose for so long to debauch the currency by expanding the money supply at an unhealthy rate, and the present Chancellor admits to a rise in borrowing to the ugly level of £43 billion next year.

Mr. MacNeil: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that the present Prime Minister and former Chancellor was the man who said that he would put an end to boom and bust? Does he agree that those words seem very hollow at the present time?

Tony Baldry: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, but there are a number of phrases that the Prime Minister was wont to use on many occasions—"boom and bust" is one that no longer appears from his lips, as even he can see the irony of it—that no longer apply. I am not quite sure what has happened to Prudence. I am very concerned about Prudence, but she seems to have been debauched. She has disappeared and we now hear nothing more about her. She has gone and the new girl on the block is Stability. That is what we are in love with nowadays and I suspect that the irony of praying to the mantra of "stability" will be so evident in a few months' time that even the Prime Minister will not allow the word to cross his lips.

Economists have warned that voters face the equivalent of up to 3p more on income tax after the next general election. An analysis of last Wednesday's Budget by the Institute for Fiscal Studies showed that spending would have to be slashed by billions if the Chancellor does not want to break his economic rules. The IFS has said that it could mean Ministers having to plan tax increases to avoid cutting back on schools and hospitals if they should perchance win the next general election, which I think is increasingly unlikely.

The IFS added to the gloom around the Budget in pointing out that middle-income households have been hammered by rises in tax for drinkers and family car owners. Robert Chote, director of the IFS, has said that details hidden in the Budget report reveal that the annual growth in spending will be cut to 1.8 per cent. in 2012-13, meaning a reduction in spending by around £8 billion by 2013—which would be equivalent to an income tax rise of 3p in the pound. That will be the result of the very substantial cut of £8 billion in public spending. No wonder that polls since the Budget reveal that fears about rising prices in food, fuel and taxes are people's biggest worries. Soaring gas and petrol prices, higher council tax and bigger supermarket bills were among the recurring themes of those who commented on The Times online response to the Budget, to which 2,500 people contributed. People expressed concerns about the rise in energy and fuel costs, coupled with ever-increasing food prices.

Not surprisingly, when YouGov did a survey, it found the following responses to various propositions: 86 per cent. of those surveyed agreed that their bills were rising faster than the Government said they were; 84 per cent. agreed that energy firms ripped them off and should have been hit with a windfall tax; 78 per cent. agreed that the Government wasted huge amounts of taxpayers' money—a point made very effectively by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, and reflected in the concerns of many of our constituents; 66 per cent. agreed that the Government spent too much in the good times, so they were raising taxes now; and 74 per cent. agreed that green taxes were just an excuse to raise more money. It has not escaped the attention of most people that the Chancellor is not offsetting the green taxes raised in one place with taxes elsewhere; he is simply taking the green taxes as additional taxation.

The main cause, I suspect, of the swing in the opinion polls to the Conservatives is the collapse of faith in the Prime Minister's and the Chancellor's stewardship of the economy. Just 21 per cent. of voters say that they would trust the Government more than the Opposition to raise their families' living standards; the Conservatives have a decisive lead on that issue. The overwhelming majority—83 per cent.—believe that the economy will either grow more slowly over the next 12 months or slide into recession. There is no question of people having to talk about this; the fact of the matter is that our constituents are genuinely concerned about what is happening to the UK economy. They find it rather depressing when all that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor can do is simply repeat the mantra of "stability" in the hope that if they say it often enough, it might actually happen.

The Government's reputation for economic competence is now at its lowest since Jim Callaghan went cap in hand to the International Monetary Fund in 1976. At 28p in the pound, the UK has one of Europe's highest rates of corporation tax. This Government's spending binge has seen the size of the state balloon—from 37 per cent. to 45 per cent. of gross domestic product. Under this Government, the cack-handed expansion of means-testing has seen the savings ratio plummet from 11 to 3 per cent., with consumer debt now a staggering 156 per cent. of household income.

The reality is that after the recent years of strong global growth, other countries such as Germany now have a budget surplus. Yet when it comes to fiscal management, the UK's so-called prudent Government have been outclassed by the allegedly profligate Italians and French, as Britain's budget deficit at 3.2 per cent. of GDP is by far the biggest of any major economy. That is why last week's Budget imposed a net tax rise of £2.5 billion—the precise opposite of what is now needed.

It is important to understand the extent of the Government's borrowing. This time last year, when the Prime Minister delivered his final Budget as Chancellor, he said that the Government would borrow £30 billion during 2008-09—the fiscal year about to begin. Yet in his first pre-Budget report, the present Chancellor raised that estimate to £36 billion—an alarming increase. Last Wednesday, the Chancellor jacked that amount up even more, announcing that borrowing in 2008-09 would, in fact, be £43 billion. In other words, in just 12 months, the Government's borrowing estimate for next year has increased by no less than £13 billion, a jaw-dropping 43 per cent. rise.

Looking further into the future, the numbers barely improve. The Prime Minister told us last year that he would borrow £28 billion in 2009-10. The Chancellor has just raised that figure to £38 billion. During 2010-11, the UK will increase its liabilities by another £32 billion—way higher than the Prime Minister's £26 billion estimate last year. In sum, our borrowing totals for 2008-09 to 2011-12 have gone up by £20 billion since the Chancellor's pre-Budget report. That is a staggering sum of money, which has not hitherto been accounted for.

Mr. MacNeil: Listening to the Westminster Government's catalogue of disaster, I can only think of the oil fund that Norway put away in the good years, or perhaps of a lesson from the Old Testament about getting ready in the seven years of plenty in Pharaoh's time for the seven years of famine. Given the catalogue of disaster and mismanagement at Westminster, does the hon. Gentleman agree that Scotland would have been far better off in Norway's position, building an oil fund and, of course, being independent, while being a good friend of England's at the same time?

Tony Baldry: I am sure that the supporters of this Government will pay an electoral price in Scotland, as they will everywhere else in the United Kingdom, because every part of the United Kingdom has been hit by their inability properly to manage the economy.

In the quiet watches of the night, even Ministers realise how bad is the present state of the economy. If we look at the detail of the Red Book, we see that the Treasury expects house prices to fall in real terms in the coming year, causing the first fall in stamp duty revenues since 2001. It is stated that due to "sluggish or flat house price growth, receipts related to property such as stamp duty land tax, inheritance tax and capital gains tax, are expected to be £2.25 billion lower in 2008/09 than in the Pre-Budget Report."

The Treasury also expects to generate less from the City and business as the credit crunch and impending economic slowdown hit enterprise. What does the Chancellor do in response? He increases taxes and puts up the Government's borrowing to the highest rates for more than a decade.

As a consequence of the Budget, middle-income groups will be hit by a national insurance stealth tax. In every Budget that this Government introduce, various things are not apparent on the day. However long and soporifically the Chancellor drones on for, we often discover a lot of the nasties either in press releases issued by the Treasury afterwards or in the small print. This year was no exception. The Chancellor made no mention during the statement of the rise in the earnings ceiling for national insurance by £100 to £770 a week, but it was in the details of the Red Book. Analysts suggest that from 6 April next year, the 11 per cent. band will apply to earnings up to £40,040. Anyone on £41,000 or more will therefore pay about £500 a year more. That change will bring the Treasury additional revenue of almost £2 billion a year.

Instead of helping people out in the Budget, the Government have hit them again with big increases in alcohol prices, big increases in the purchase price of many family cars and big increases in taxes on business hidden in the small print of the Budget. Our constituents have to pay more for their drink and their cars. People are being kicked while they are down.

According to number crunching by the ever-vigilant Taxpayers' Alliance, nearly nine in 10 cars will attract higher rates of tax under the Chancellor's proposals. Fewer than one in 10 vehicles will benefit from the new system, and the biggest losers will be family cars. As a result of the reforms in the Budget, however, it is stated that "the majority of motorists will be better or no worse off in 2009."

It is unbelievably difficult to relate that assertion to the fact that nearly nine in 10 cars will attract higher rates of duty. The vehicles hit will include modest family cars and people carriers, so that drivers of Skodas, Ford Mondeos and other models costing up to £20,000 will be hit almost as hard as those paying 20 times as much for their Rolls- Royces, Bentleys and Ferraris. Mondeo man, whom the Government courted to get into power more than a decade ago, is paying the price of filling the Government's borrowing black hole.

The Prime Minister's much-trumpeted green effort seems to have a very ad hoc quality. With regard to carbon emissions, the Government seem to be focused more on the targets that are the most visible than on those that are most at fault on carbon emissions. There is also a certain degree of gimmickry—for example, the non-tax on plastic bags. The Chancellor announced the possibility that next year he would propose a law to require retailers to charge for plastic bags and transfer the profits to charities. That is rabbit-out-of-the-hat stuff to distract people from what is happening to the economy.

It is not surprising that Tony Juniper, the executive director of Friends of the Earth, commenting on the Budget, said that it "falls a long way short of not only what is necessary, but also what was possible to do…we need far more substantial measures to encourage waste minimisation and recycling.

Green tax measures would be more popular if they were linked to cuts in taxes on people and jobs…

Given New Labour's reputation for slick communications it seems that it was not a lack of creativity that was at fault, but a lack of leadership, vision and imagination."

The whole Budget demonstrates lack of leadership, vision and imagination.

The Budget is bad for small businesses. The Government deployed one of the oldest rhetorical approaches: when in trouble, they simply talked a good game and pretended that everything would be fine. On the day of the Budget, a new enterprise strategy was launched, regulatory reform was promised, and the Chancellor pledged to do more to help small firms get access to the finance that they needed. Business will not be deceived. The Chancellor is imposing more than £1 billion in new taxes on small firms at just the wrong moment in the economic cycle. He appears oblivious to that. He delayed a further £200 million tax rise on family businesses only because he realised at the last moment that it would not work. Those entrepreneurs and people in small business have already been hit by the scrapping of the 10 per cent. capital gains tax rate, and the Government will now reward only the first £1 million of wealth created—anything above that will be taxed at 18 per cent.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend rightly highlights the burden of the Government's proposals on small businesses. As he has said, what the Government referred to as an entrepreneurs' relief set a cap on the ambitions of those entrepreneurs. Does he agree that it is a peculiar approach on the part of a Government who claim to support enterprise to penalise anyone who is successful above £1 million?

Tony Baldry: The treatment of capital gains tax has been and continues to be a fiasco. Clearly, the Government have arrived at a compromise between wanting to get the greatest possible tax take and not wishing to frighten off the business community too much. The Government have recognised that the business community have understandably fallen out of love with them, and are trying to mitigate the damage.

Business owners have also been hit by reforms to capital allowances, which will raise billions for the Treasury. That makes the giveaways in the Budget—a small £30 million enterprise capital fund, a £12.5 million fund to invest in female-run businesses, and a £60 million increase in the small firms loan guarantee—appear to be exactly what they are: token gestures.

While it is true that businesses will receive more than £680 million-worth of tax relief from the Chancellor over the next three years, it is also true that £1.4 billion worth of new taxes will eat away at any gains that they may make. For most businesses, the rate of capital gains tax will rise from 10 per cent. to 18 per cent., a rate that the Chancellor said would be introduced next month as planned. Britain's corporation tax income from companies is higher than that of any other countries except Japan and Canada. Bill Dodwell, a tax partner at Deloitte, has said:

"Businesses are worried at the rate at which things are taxed but also on what they are taxed. They are taxed on far more... than in other countries".

Businesses have been hard hit by this Budget. Let me take up what the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) said about the tax on beer. As James Clarke, managing director of Hook Norton brewery in my constituency, has observed,

"A duty increase would not significantly affect off-trade prices, but would be devastating for pubs... Beer sold in pubs contributes to local economies, and often the pub can be the only retail outlet in a community, but obviously this still needs to be a viable business. Pubs are under increasing pressure from energy and food prices, as indeed we all are, so freezing duty on beer would not only be a real benefit, but it would also be seen as such."

Of course, the Government did not freeze the duty on beer; they put it up.

In my constituency, businesses will be asking "What next? We are seeing post offices being closed, hospital services being downgraded and village pubs disappearing. What will we see next under this Government?" I do not have time, notwithstanding the generous allocation that the House has given me—

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Baldry: No. I have no time to do so, or to draw the House's attention to the fact that nothing has been done to help business with red tape. Labour pledged to cut red tape in their 2001 manifesto, but even after three Acts of Parliament the regulatory burden on business is worse than ever.

This is a bad Budget for business, for jobs, for enterprise and for our constituents, and a particularly bad Budget for the families who are being hammered by this Government.

7.12 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): I do not propose to comment on what was said by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), because he repeated large amounts of what we have already read in the newspapers. What I will comment on, before I come to my main point, is the principal line that the Opposition appear to be taking in the debate. It was taken by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan), by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the former Chancellor, and by the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. Their argument was that the Government were at fault because they could have prepared earlier and better for the downturn. My argument is that this is not a normal downturn in a regular business cycle, and it is disingenuous and simpliste to suggest that that is so when the two central factors in the crisis are the United States sub-prime fiasco, for which the United Kingdom Government are not responsible, and—linked to that—the massive shift to securitisation and the opaqueness of trade assets. Because of the complete failure in the role of the credit rating agencies, the toxic effect of that was discovered too late.

I am not saying that the Government are not responsible in some ways. The Financial Services Authority could have acted more quickly in respect of Northern Rock, and there are other aspects of the crisis in the United Kingdom that we need to examine, but I believe that the main responsibility lies elsewhere. It is very easy in opposition, and in retrospect, to blame the Government irrespective of any real analysis of the situation.

Mr. MacNeil rose—

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman came into the Chamber in the middle of the debate, and he keeps popping up, presumably to assure Hansard of his presence. I will give way to him, but perhaps he should have come in earlier and made his own contribution instead of 10 interruptions.

Mr. MacNeil: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. His right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) pointed out that the Spanish Government had controlled mortgage lending far more responsibly than the United Kingdom Government. Does that not illustrate the way in which the United Kingdom Government sat idly by as the pressure was building and the pot was boiling?

Mr. Meacher: I accept that when we come to review all this we shall find aspects for which there is some responsibility on the part of any Government, although I think that that is arguable and that different judgments can be made. But my main point is that merely saying that this massive crisis, this downturn which may turn out to have cataclysmic proportions, is somehow the fault of the UK Government is absurd. That is absolutely not the case. The situation is much more complex and much more unpredictable than that. In a situation of such gravity, it would be better for the House to refer to a real analysis of the facts than to try to gain cheap political capital.

Mr. Philip Hammond: The right hon. Gentleman must not suggest that the Opposition's critique of the Government's economic policies is being expressed only in the context of the credit crunch, which, as he said, was not created by this Government. We are running a higher fiscal deficit than all but three developed countries. We have an economy that has grown in an extraordinarily unbalanced way over the past few years, with a housing market that has been spiralling out of control. Does the right hon. Gentleman not believe that, in the absence of the credit crunch, we would still have faced a downturn at some point as those effects inevitably unwound?

Mr. Meacher: I recognise that there were issues of long-term sustainability, some of which the hon. Gentleman has mentioned. In fact his intervention has helped me, because my main argument will pick up some of what he has said.

There was one rather odd omission from the Budget. It contained next to nothing about dealing with tax avoidance. That is quite surprising given the difficult state of the public finances—to which the hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention—the Chancellor's obvious need to close the gap, and the current international campaign led by Germany to tackle the scandal head-on, which I consider very important.

As we know, the hole in public revenues amounts to some £40 billion. That is a large amount, and it is increasing. The Treasury forecasts that the figure will be £7 billion higher than was suggested in the October pre-Budget report. The Chancellor had every incentive to claw back tax avoided and evaded to help balance the books without raising taxes for the rest of the population.

A recent pamphlet produced by the Trades Union Congress and written by the tax accountancy expert Richard Murphy found that tax avoidance and tax planning—by which I mean fabricating plans artificially in order to pay little or no tax, a device employed by very rich individuals—now account for about £13 billion a year, while the same device employed by companies in rather different ways accounts for a further £12 billion a year. There is obviously plenty of scope for much tougher anti-avoidance measures that would benefit everyone else. If such persons can be made to pay their due and proper taxes, others will need to pay less. Moreover, Inland Revenue statistics show that those who are paid more than £100,000 a year, who constitute less than 1 per cent. of the population, now receive £8 billion in tax reliefs and allowances.

Another important factor that could well have propelled the Chancellor towards a Budget assault on tax avoidance, which I think is long overdue, is that the international atmosphere is much more conducive to tougher action than it has been for decades. Germany, as we have read, believes that it is losing nearly £25 billion a year in tax evasion by rich Germans holding anonymous trusts in Monaco and Andorra, in addition to others who, rather curiously, were outed by a whistleblower as having secreted huge sums of money in another tax haven, namely Liechtenstein. Germany is now demanding cross-national action to force countries with banking secrecy to share information. That is a favourable climate for the UK to participate and take the lead.

Since there is considerable evidence that super-rich British people also use these and other tax havens—notably the Cayman Islands—for the same purpose, a crackdown on those avoiding their tax responsibilities could produce big benefits for the UK Treasury and, my goodness, there has never been a time when the UK Treasury needed big benefits as it does now.

Why was that not done in the Budget? I suspect the reason is the stranglehold exerted by the City on the Government—particularly on the Prime Minister, I have to say—who have been persuaded that the financial enclave of the City of London is central to the economic interests of the UK as a whole. I submit that of course it has an important role, which I would not downplay for a moment, but the idea that it is central to the UK economy is quite another proposition.

By bending over backwards to encourage hedge funds and private equity firms through the most egregious tax liberality—I refer to the absurdly low 18 per cent. basic tax rate on income from the carry, or share, of the gains on these massive deals, which is less than half the income tax rate payable by top earners—and as a result of other measures, the Government have in effect turned the UK, or more specifically the City of London, into a gigantic tax haven for the internationally mobile business élite. The problem is that, by sucking talent and capital from other parts of the economy, the remarkable successes over the past 10 years, which I am the first to praise, have been bought at a very high price—I would say too high a price.

As the credit crunch is now exposing, City profits on invisibles cannot and never could compensate for the steady, continuing decline of Britain as a manufacturing nation—and that is the basis of wealth for all industrial countries. The volatility and excesses of the finance sector are outweighed by the 1 million jobs lost in manufacturing over the past decade, the stagnant industrial output, the £7 billion-a-month trade deficit, and the weakness of manufacturing investment and of the so-called knowledge economy—R and D—which is confined to a very few sectors. Those also have to be taken into account. My point is not that the City of London does not have a key role, but that it cannot be allowed to exploit that role at the expense of reducing the capability of Britain as a sustainable industrial base.

Even when other countries have recently made what can only be regarded as a very serious effort to counteract some of these excesses in tax avoidance, the UK has taken a lead in blocking them. The UK has for example regularly refused to allow the deduction of tax from interest payments within the EU, which would hugely restrict the effectiveness of tax havens because the basic rate of tax—presumably about 20 per cent.—would already have been deducted from the income before it reached the tax haven. There can be little doubt that this withholding tax proposal of the EU was stymied in order to preserve the UK as a tax haven, given the City of London links to the overseas protectorates and Crown dependencies.

If I may I shall give just one more example of what I think is an industrial and financial way of life that is not sustainable. Maintaining fiscal independence from Europe may be a populist move—clearly it is in this country—but in reality it enables the international corporations to play the EU and other countries off against each other in constantly bargaining for lower tax rates.

The credit crunch and the approaching downturn, which some people, even today, believe may have very serious consequences, show that a different approach is now necessary. Not only is closer regulation of the financial markets clearly now imperative to prevent future damage to the international economy—the precipitate collapse of Bear Stearns is clearly not the last of it—but the UK in particular can no longer afford either the prohibitive cost of the tax privileges of the City or, just as importantly, the collateral manufacturing damage inflicted on Britain as an industrial nation. [Interruption.] Before the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) gets carried away, let me remind him that Winston Churchill, as Chancellor in 1925, said that he would rather see industry with head held high and finance less proud. He was absolutely right, and that applies just as much now.

In particular we need a fundamental change in the tax culture in this country so that corporations and super-rich individuals no longer regard it as a duty—as we learned from Tesco in the press a few weeks ago—to minimise tax by any artificial devices that can be dreamed up to secure private gain. It is surely, by contrast, a responsibility that they make a fair contribution to the overall public gain of which they are a part.

There are several ways to achieve that. Obviously a key one is to seek to eliminate tax haven abuse. The non-governmental organisation Tax Justice Network calculates that the total assets now held by the wealthiest people in the world in tax havens amounts to a staggering $11.5 trillion, at a potential cost to world Governments in tax forgone of about $255 billion. To put that in context, the money lost to Governments worldwide is more than two and a half times total global aid flows last year.

Mr. Prisk: The right hon. Gentleman is talking about the amounts that high net-worth individuals have, which he says are lost to Government. How would he comment on the contributions of people such as Bill Gates, who give a huge proportion of their income to the very aid that he is trying to support? Governments do not have to do that on their own; individuals can contribute to it.

Mr. Meacher: That is fine. I know that some of the richest people such as Gates, Warren Buffett and, to some extent, Richard Branson have made substantial contributions, which is extraordinarily creditable, but that is not an argument for saying that very wealthy individuals should not pay their full, proper and due tax.

In the UK alone, the tax amnesty for those holding accounts with the offshore branches of some UK high street banks in the main Crown dependencies—I am thinking of Jersey, Guernsey and the Isle of Man—is expected by the Treasury to yield a recovery of about half a billion pounds in tax from just 60,000 people, or 0.1 per cent of the population, who admit to undeclared income in these places. That shows the sheer scale at present, and it is unacceptable.

I am not against amnesties; I understand why we have had one now, and I think it is succeeding. Instead of just having occasional amnesties, however, all UK dependencies and protectorates—particularly the Cayman Islands—should now be required to use the same standards of disclosure and accountability as the UK itself. The UK standard should also be tightened by requiring all UK-registered companies to report annually on all their overseas subsidiaries, including their revenues and how many people are employed. If we were to introduce that transparency, it would dramatically improve the prospect of fair and balanced tax collection, and I intend to table an amendment to the Finance Bill to that effect—if the Government do not do that first. [Interruption.] Yes, I think that that is unlikely, which is why some of us need to assist and nudge an arm or two.

There are several other ways of dealing more effectively with tax avoidance and evasion. We should look at the tax reliefs and allowances that accrue to those earning over £100,000 a year—the richest 1 per cent. of the population. One might ask: what is the justification for enhancing by means of tax reliefs an already enormous salary, when that will mean that others will have to pay more to compensate?

Mr. Love: I agree with many of my right hon. Friend's points, although I must say that we ought not to set manufacturing and finance in competition with each other; both must flourish within our economy. How does he respond to the classic argument that is made against his case for proper taxation of the wealthy, which is that they are so mobile that they will simply move outside the jurisdiction of the UK authorities?

Mr. Meacher: I shall come on to that. [Interruption.] I know that many Members say that when they might not intend to do so, but I do intend to—in the brief time that I have left.

I was talking about how we might deal with offshoring, and I also wish to talk about the domicile rule. Frankly, it is indefensible. If it were abolished, that would recoup more than £4 billion in lost taxation. Abolition might not be the answer, but there should certainly be a considerable reduction in its application. As for so-called capital gains on all assets held for less than a year, they are clearly not capital gains but a form of income, and they should be treated as such and be subject to income tax. That would save about half a billion pounds in otherwise lost tax. Also, the tax authorities should make it absolutely clear that they are deadly serious. The UK should co-operate with other countries, particularly in Europe, to ensure that tax is paid where the taxable economic activity occurred. That would largely stop misallocation of profit to tax havens.

More complex tax avoidance should be tackled by enshrining in law the general principle that wherever an otherwise commercial transaction is added to any arrangement the sole or main purpose of which is to reduce tax liability, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs should disregard the artificial addition and tax the transaction accordingly. Counter-productively, HMRC is being run down by 25 per cent. in the five years to 2010. In order that corporations and super-rich individuals understand that tax avoidance does not pay, it should instead be built up substantially, as the Treasury calculates that each member of HMRC staff recovers 96 times their full cost of employment.

Artificial tax avoidance and tax evasion are a cancer on the body politic. Economically, this is the best time for decades to launch a systematic campaign to eradicate that, and I look to the Treasury to set it in place.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): It is not an unalloyed pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher), although it does present me with an opportunity to thank him for sponsoring my private Member's Bill to deal with the problem of fly-tipping, which was introduced under the ten-minute rule. I fear that his speech was a return to the fantasy land of 1970s extreme socialism, when Anthony Wedgwood Benn used to say, "The Government should grab the pension funds from the City and invest them in industry," as if those vast pension funds were somehow the plaything of the rich.

The right hon. Gentleman truly misunderstands the mobility of modern capital and of individuals in the global economy. He talks about billions of pounds being raised by dealing with tax avoidance, but those billions of pounds will simply disappear from the UK's jurisdiction. I do not apologise for one moment for the fact that we have made London and the United Kingdom a tax haven for a great many rich people, who come here and pay modest taxes in this country instead of higher taxes elsewhere. Hundreds—if not thousands, or tens of thousands—of individuals bring their talent and wealth to London and this country not just because it is a great country to live in, but because it is worth their while financially to do so. We will be casting them out.

It must be placed on the record that the mooted alterations to the status of the so-called non-doms have already done great damage to the UK's reputation for stable tax policy. Stable tax policy—predictability in terms of the tax burden—is vital for businessmen to be able to plan and invest for the long term. If the right hon. Gentleman's proposed amendment were to pass, he would effectively be creating probably the most unstable tax regime in the whole of the OECD, which would be guaranteed to drive a lot of inward investment and talent away from the UK, at great cost to the Exchequer. We should have learned over the past 10, 15 or 20 years that lower tax rates in fact yield higher tax revenues, and a benign tax regime is good for economic growth, for tax revenues and for the very public services that he and I both believe in.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman has just repeated the theory of the Arthur Laffer curve, for which there is not the slightest supporting evidence. On non-doms, is he aware that the Treasury has estimated that of the 120,000 persons with that tax status probably only about 3,000 would seriously think about leaving? Moreover, how far is it justified to build the wealth of a country on the extreme wealth of a tiny number of people, at the expense of manufacturing industry and the general prosperity of the rest of the country, and of poorer people who have to pay far more in order to compensate?

Mr. Jenkin: The right hon. Gentleman made three points in what was a rather long intervention, and I shall try to deal with all of them. First, it is impossible for the Treasury or anyone to predict how tax changes—on the non-doms, for example—will affect people's behaviour. Tax changes very often create unintended consequences, which, had we understood at the time, might have changed our view of the changes. Treasury officials and Ministers tend to take a rosy view of how much revenue tax changes will yield. They rarely underestimate how much extra tax revenue will be gained by a tax increase, but there is a tendency to underestimate by how much tax revenues will rise when we cut taxes.

That brings me to the right hon. Gentleman's second point—we will just have to disagree about the Laffer curve. It is an extremely logical and provable relationship that lower tax rates increase economic growth and tax revenues. His final argument about there being a trade-off between a low tax regime that attracts talent from around the world and manufacturing is completely fallacious. The fact that the UK is responsible for 90 per cent. of the currency and bond trading in the European Union although we are outside the euro, and that the Sarbanes-Oxley Act has resulted in our attracting much of the equities and derivatives trading to London seems to pass him by. The idea that if we clobbered the City, closed it down as the world's premier financial centre and drove all that offshore, there would then be an instant revival in traditional manufacturing is fantasy—it bears no relation to the real world in which we live.

Mr. Jeremy Browne: This is an interesting ideological discussion. Does the hon. Gentleman share my dismay that in the whole of his 20-minute speech, the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) concentrated all his attention on a relatively small number of people earning a large amount of money and said precisely nothing about the millions of people in this country on very low earnings who are paying marginal rates of income tax of about 70p in the pound?

Mr. Jenkin: I would like to pick up on a point made about the abolition of the 10 per cent rate. Only last week, my surgery received a visit from a pensioner couple who could not understand how they have been caught by a grievously punishing tax increase. The lady is a non-taxpayer on a modest pension; the gentleman did pay 10 per cent. tax but will now pay 20 per cent. tax, and there is nothing that they can do about it. It is monstrous for this Government to claim that they are eradicating poverty when they treat categories of pensioner in that way. I hope that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will take heed of the point that the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) and I have made in this debate and respond to it, because I cannot for the life of me see how that policy can be greeted as fair.

The main burden of my comments centres on whether the Government are properly prepared for the economic downturn. I listened to the comments made by the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton, and I should like to make a correction: no one is blaming this Government for the sub-prime crisis in the United States—I am happy to put that on the record and I am sure that my Conservative colleagues would assent to that. We cannot pin that one on the Government. What we can point out, however, is that over the years people have warned about a forthcoming credit crunch. For example, in evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Economic Affairs on 7 November 2006, Professor Tim Congdon said that "the current high rate of money growth is largely responsible for the buoyancy of asset prices and mini-boom conditions in the UK's service industries...asset price weakness, including falls in house prices, is a probable feature of the adjustment to slower money and demand growth in late 2007 and 2008."

He did not foresee a credit crisis, but he certainly foresaw a correction that would be reflected in falling asset prices or lower growth in those prices.

An even earlier piece of evidence, published in 2005, was a book entitled "Crunch Time for Credit?", by Edward Chancellor, the financial historian. That book noted:

"The credit bubble that has developed in the UK and US economies over recent years is unsustainable and has 'badly corrupted' the economies of the two countries, with potentially serious destabilising results, says a major new study of the economic and investment implications of the build-up of debt in the two countries."

The book refers to the great depression of the 1930s and the recent experience in Japan and Korea as examples of what could be happening in the United States and the United Kingdom. He wrote:

"The growth of credit has created an illusory prosperity".

The Government have to take their responsibility for that. He continued:

"It may well end in either an extraordinary deflation...or an extraordinary inflation."

When discussing the UK economy in particular, he said:

"The UK economy has become 'increasingly vulnerable' to a credit crunch".

So this particular crisis did not come out of the blue as a bit of bad weather. Anybody who knows anything about economics knows that straight lines do not continue for ever.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie), who was briefly in his place on behalf of the Scottish nationalists, discussed the words used in the voluminous book that we still call the Red Book although it has been disguised as a sort of pamphlet that puts the argument for all the Government's polices. It contains pictures of schoolchildren, a dear old lady, somebody building a house, somebody recycling their rubbish and somebody carrying a bicycle, but it is meant to be a serious document. Budgets have become increasingly unintelligible; they talk about, "Sustainable growth and prosperity" but it is difficult to find a Government table illustrating debt, borrowing and spending, given the chapter heading:

"Fairness and opportunity for all".

I wish we would get back to more intelligible Budget documentation. Nowhere does the book refer to the end of boom and bust, which is what we were promised. No matter how many times the Prime Minister promised an end to boom and bust when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, any sensible person knew that no Government could promise that. Thus, in the good times one is meant to prepare for the bad times. One thought that that was what the golden rule was all about—it was meant to be about building up the capital in the good times so that we could weather the bad times, but that did not happen.

What has happened over the past 10 years is that the Government have substantially increased public expenditure. It has risen from 37 to 42 per cent. of gross domestic product, which is a 40 per cent. real terms increase over seven years and has the effect of overcalculating GDP. A useful table produced by Reform shows that GDP is inflated by about 7 per cent. merely by increasing public expenditure.

As the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) said, nurses and doctors create wealth too. If more money is spent on nurses, doctors and teachers, that contributes to the GDP. Unfortunately, the large increases given to health and education over the years have not produced the commensurate increase in output and productivity—in fact, productivity in the health service has collapsed. That is one of the reasons why some of us prefer the private sector over the public sector when it comes to deciding how to modernise public services. Interestingly, even this Government are importing all kinds—[Interruption.] The Chief Secretary is looking suspicious, but she might ask herself why treatment centres are to be run by private companies. She supports bringing the private sector into the health service, and that is one of the policies that we will need to examine.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): My hon. Friend is referring to the growth of public spending. I hope that he will remind the House that we must wait until the last two pages of the Red Book—pages 203 and 204—before we discover table C14, on the historical series of public sector balances, receipts and debt, and table C15, on the historical series of Government expenditure. It is all laid out, but, surprisingly, Ministers did not include it earlier in the book.

Mr. Jenkin: Those tables used to be what Budgets were about; now they are about all the rhetoric and guff at the front. One must wait two or three days before the real truth of the Chancellor's Budget emerges. I do not intend to waste any more time anatomising the Chancellor's Budget statement.

The big increases in public spending have not produced the transformation of public services for which many had hoped. They have produced a rising tax burden—I understand that we are talking about an extra £1,250 per person in this country over a 10-year period. Of course, taxation has lagged behind the increase in spending. Taxation has only grown from 35 per cent. to 37.5 per cent. of GDP, which means that we have moved from a fiscal surplus of 1.7 per cent. at the beginning of the period to a fiscal deficit of 2.7 per cent. That is at a time when we should have been paying off our public debt, not increasing it. When we compare those figures to other countries, we see that Australia's 3.7 per cent. deficit during that growth period is now a surplus of 1.3 per cent. In New Zealand a 0.2 per cent. deficit in 1999 is now a 3.3 per cent. surplus. Whereas other countries have been building up their funds for the inevitable correction in the markets that takes place after any period of sustained economic growth, our Government have been storing up economic problems for the future, so that we are in the worst position to deal with whatever crisis the international markets throw at us.

It is worth pointing out that the increase in taxation and spending, and the lost productivity that tends to happen in the private sector, has led to a consistent overestimate of tax revenues. In each of the last seven years, as the Taxpayers' Alliance demonstrates, tax revenues have come in substantially below forecast and Government spending has overshot. The Government have shown very little discipline with public spending, even overshooting their own forecasts. Substantial increases in spending of 4.3 per cent. per annum on average over 10 years have outstripped economic growth. Consequently, the debt to GDP ratio has risen from 30 per cent. to 37 per cent.

Now we have the credit crunch, which was entirely predictable. The Library has kindly provided me with figures for household debt in relation to GDP for the US and the UK. In the US, where the sub-prime mortgage crisis has occurred and triggered everything else, household debt was 66 per cent. of GDP in 2005 and rose to just under 100 per cent. of GDP in 2006. It has continued to worsen in the last two years so that it is now more than 100 per cent. geared to GDP. We keep hearing how irresponsible the US financial system is, but precisely the same has happened in the UK. It is an extraordinary coincidence, but in 1995 household debt was 66 per cent. of GDP and in 2006 it had gone up to £1.3 trillion, equivalent to 100 per cent. of GDP. It has continued to get worse and the Government have done nothing about it. They are responsible for monetary policy through the Bank of England, and it is no good disclaiming responsibility for it.

Monetary growth has fed the credit boom, and excessive monetary growth will now suffer from the correction. There are only three ways to deal with accumulated debt. The Government can inflate their way out of the debt, so that everybody's debt is devalued by inflation. People can work to pay their debt off, but the markets have decided that there is so much debt out there that defaults are likely. It is not surprising that we now have a crisis in the banking system. Of course, I share the cynicism of some Labour Members about why some of those people in those institutions make those decisions. I should declare an interest in that I used to work in the City in the venture capital markets, but the responsibility of investors is to make good and sound investment decisions and to walk away from the deal when it becomes too expensive. Markets behave like herds in such instances, and it is the responsibility of the Government and the regulators to ensure that such excesses do not occur.

What should the Budget have been about? It should have been about stability. We heard the word "stability", but it was an invocation with remarkably little power behind it. Public expenditure will be on a tighter rein in future years, but it will only stabilise at around 42 per cent. of GDP, which displays a continuing upward trend. That is assuming that economic growth and tax revenues match the Government's anticipated figures, which is unlikely. It also assumes that we meet the tighter spending targets, also unlikely under this Government.

The Budget has put off the fiscal responsibility that is required to stabilise our public finances. The national debt will continue to rise. The Budget has not been about addressing the economic crisis or competitiveness: it has been about increasing taxation on ordinary people in this country. It has been about hoping that something will come up between now and the next election to bail out the Government and prevent them from having to face the consequences of being a tax and spend Government, as all Labour Governments turn out to be. The Government have squandered the economic inheritance that they received from the Conservatives; failed to reform the public services as many sincerely hoped that they would do; and failed the British people.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): Several hon. Members have spoken about the technicalities of the Budget, but I want to talk about the impact it will have on people and how we can address some of the problems facing those who will feel the impact of the decisions that will be made by the House tonight.

I welcome some aspects of the Budget. First and foremost, as a former apprentice mechanic, I was pleased to hear that we will continue to support the development of apprenticeships, which should be welcomed by every hon. Member as a way to address the problems of our young people and provide them with better and different types of education. The lowest number of apprenticeships ever was 25,000 in 1992. Many of the industries that many of us had grown up with had been destroyed, and there was no one to provide apprenticeships. Thankfully, that has been turned round.

We have also done well in supporting 250,000 children who have been taken out of poverty, although there is clearly much more to do. I also want to focus on pensioners. It is noticeable that Age Concern and other groups have welcomed the fact that 600,000 pensioners will no longer pay tax, through the changes made last year, and the increase of the minimum income guarantee to £124. The positive moves on the heating allowance are also welcome, but they would have been a bit more positive if they had been made last year—2006-07—when some of us were arguing for a £100 increase in the heating allowance for people aged over 60. It is a shame that that has not been followed through this year.

The biggest impact on pensioners, especially those aged between 60 and 64, will be the removal of the 10p tax band. That is the one issue that pensioners and low-paid workers raise with me, and we must address it in the coming months and years. The £50 on the heating allowance for those aged between 60 and 64 will be more than eaten up, because they will pay at least £2 a week more in tax, according to letters I have received from the Treasury. They will get £50 in one hand and have £100 taken from the other. That is not the way to make progress.

I come back to the issue of the reinstatement of the link between earnings and pensions, which has been discussed before and forms part of the Pensions Bill. We must stop debating whether it will happen, and the time that it will happen should be brought forward, because by 2012 many people will be out of the loop as they will no longer be with us. The other aspect to that is that once the link is restored, it will not be enough to leave it at that, because 15 or 16 per cent. of the average salary in 2012 will be much less in 2020 in cash terms. Although the percentage might be the same, the National Pensioners Convention estimates that in 2012 the link will be worth 15 or 16 per cent. but that the gap will be about £500. Ten years beyond that, if there is not an uprating mechanism, the gap will be nearer to £1,000, and that is not acceptable. I have suggested to the Treasury that when the link is restored we should put in place a commission such as the one that monitors the national minimum wage, which would consider all the factors that impact on pensioners' lives and say that we should uprate pensions above and beyond the current link.

Another positive move, which has not quite gone far enough, is the good news about smart meters. Smart meters are the way ahead for the energy companies, for the green agenda and to help people in this country save money. Reports out this weekend have estimated that, in the north-east alone, if every household had a smart meter put in it would save people £50 million and reduce carbon emissions by 300,000 tonnes. That could be replicated across the country, but we need some impetus. The small discussion in the Budget, although it is welcome, is not enough. We should have the same mental attitude as we had in the 1960s, when we converted every house with gas from ordinary gas to North sea gas. We did not let anything stand in our way. We should say to the utility companies, "If you want to carry on making money in this country, you must work with the Government and put in smart meters as a matter of urgency." I suggest that the utility companies would be up for that; we should be up for it, too.

We must also do something about prepayment meters, because people are being robbed by them. I am glad that the Budget has made moves in that direction, but an Energywatch report this year showed that people were being charged up to £300 more for the same amount of electricity as others simply because they cannot afford or have access to direct debits. That is out of order.

Over the past week or two, there have been a number of programmes on the TV about how alienated white working class people feel in this country. That is a valid point, but it is not only white people. Ordinary working class people in this country feel disengaged from the political process and that they are being overlooked. I believe that our Government should look to the future.

I have three practical cases that we could pursue to bring back those people who feel that they have been left out. First, I suggest that we consider introducing free school meals for every child in this country. It would at a stroke reduce the stigma for those who have free school meals at the moment. It would obviously increase uptake. It would develop healthy eating habits. It would, I hope, give children a more educated outlook about what food is and the importance of a balanced diet. It might also mean that some children would get at least one good meal a day.

I also suggest that we should consider keeping children in schools at lunchtime. It might not be popular with children, but it would certainly be popular with local people because it would reduce antisocial behaviour and litter. It would also give teachers more time to spend with the children and encourage them to develop the children as human beings. There will be a cost, but I believe that the benefits will outweigh the cost. Obviously, some parents would gain financially if they no longer had to pay, but the long-term health benefits and the importance of a healthy diet should outweigh that.

The second issue that I ask the Treasury to consider is the fact that for more than 30 years we have been committed to equal pay for men and women, but for more than 30 years we have failed to address the problem properly. Last year, one in five employment tribunals were about equal pay. Unison and GMB between them have 60,000 cases lodged at employment tribunals against the NHS and local authorities. Some negotiations have seen some success, but ultimately the lack of resources from national Government has prevented real movement. Even the most successful cases, which have been negotiated, are being unravelled by no win, no fee lawyers. The Government and employers have a duty to ensure that pay audits are performed and that they deliver equality. Only real Government support can address the issue.

We have put this off for 30 years. It is 11 years since the single status agreement was agreed in local authorities. It is nearly five years since the agenda for change was agreed in the NHS. If we as a Government do not find the resources to give to public authorities, the probability is that the employment tribunals and the courts will make it their responsibility. Neither the NHS nor local authorities will be capable of funding the bills that they will be landed with. Again, as well as doing the right thing we will make working people know that we are on their side.

Finally, I want to put forward a policy that my party and my Government are committed to, at least on paper: the development of a real role for councils in the provision of social housing. Some 2.5 million people have rejected the privatisation of their homes under various ballots for arm's length companies, or arm's length management organisations—you name it. Many more left in-house provision because they were given little, if any, real alternative. In Sunderland, for example, they were told, "Your houses need an investment of £250 million. If you don't vote for it, you won't get any investment, but your rents'll go up £5 a week." Obviously, people did what they thought they had to do.

The truth is that policy debates, political promises and procrastination have been the hallmark of the past few years. While we sit and talk about it, 1.6 million people are on local authority waiting lists. It is the biggest issue that I face in my constituency, and we have decent council housing. My surgery, postbag and phone calls every day bring cases of people with housing issues: they cannot get a house, they cannot get the house they want, they want to be out of the one they are in or the one they are in needs upgrading and they are waiting for it to be upgraded. I am not saying that we have not done anything about that—we have. The truth is that if we want to be faithful to the working backbone of this country, we must give local authorities the tools they need to deliver good social housing.

The official impact assessment that accompanied the new Housing and Regeneration Bill suggests that councils will be allowed to build only 2,500 houses a year, yet the Government have committed to build 3 million. Do we not trust councils? Do we not think that they can deliver? Do we not have faith in them? We should have—they are our people. They are democratically elected to do the job that ordinary working people have asked them to do. We should tell them to get on and do it.

If we do that, I believe that ordinary working people in this country will say yet again, "Yes, the Labour party and the Labour Government speak for us. They believe in what we do." We have aspirations. I do not believe that "aspirations" is a word that can be used by only one side or another of this House. We should all have aspirations to make this world a better place for the people we represent, no matter what their background.

In my community, no one has yet said to me, "Dave, how much extra inheritance tax will I leave to my children?" We have some decent houses where I live. We have people who will leave £1 million and more. The issues that working people in my constituency bring to me are those that affect them day in, day out. I spoke yesterday to a gentleman who runs a local pub, and he said, "What on earth are you doing? Are you trying to drive us out of business?" An increase of 4p on a pint of beer might not sound like much, but the smoking ban—whether we like it or not, and I think we made the right decision when we imposed it—has had an impact on pubs. People can go down the street and buy 24 litres of beer for £16. If the guy who runs the pub wanted to sell 24 litres of beer, he would have to charge £100, which would give the Government and the country a lot of VAT that they would not get from the supermarkets, so we lose in every sense of the word.

We have to realise that we are alienating the people who we would say were our core supporters. We need to look at things like the fact that not only are we putting 4p on beer but we are committed to put it up by 2p plus inflation over the next period. That will not impact on binge drinking or disorder. People are not going to stop going out and getting smashed just because we have put 4p on a pint of beer, but that increase might close community locals where people are just hanging on by their teeth. Surely that is in nobody's interest.

Finally, I want to say a word or two about the people who keep this country ticking over—the police, prison officers, nurses and everyone who works in our public and civil services. Over the past year, they have asked us time and again, "What are you doing to us? Why are you not paying us what we are worth? Why are you cutting our jobs and starting to pay us regional pay?"

Tens of thousands of civil service jobs have been lost, and it has been announced that another 12,000 jobs in the Department for Work and Pensions are to go. We ask fewer staff to do more work for less pay, so it is no wonder that they ask, "Where is our Government going?" It is our responsibility to look after them, because they carry out the work that we decide must be done. If we do not look after them properly, how can we expect them to look after our people properly?

I hope that this Budget, and the one next year, will give us a chance to resolve some of the problems that I have outlined. I am saying not that we should ignore middle England but that we should give priority to the issues that ordinary working people feel are not being addressed—their pay and conditions, their sense of equality, the houses that they live in and the homes that they are proud to have been brought up in. Those homes have been denigrated in this House, and people who live in social housing sometimes feel like second-class citizens. That is not how the Labour party and a Labour Government should behave.

I do not believe that the Conservative party will stand up for this country's ordinary working people. No one knows what the Liberal Democrats would do if they were in charge but, if we do not get our act together and start looking after our working people, we might find out.

8.11 pm

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson), who spoke powerfully and sincerely about the matters that concern people in his constituency. I hope that the Minister was listening. I suspect that politically, there are things that will divide us, but the hon. Gentleman made a very powerful point about aspiration. That is a subject that has not been mentioned much in the debate, although I hope to talk about it in a moment.

I was also interested to note that the hon. Member for Blaydon was the fourth Labour Member to speak negatively about the effect of the proposed beer tax changes on small businesses, pubs, clubs and local community groups. Again, I hope that the Minister was listening carefully.

Last Wednesday, the attention of British business and economic commentators was focused on what might be in the Chancellor's Budget statement to the House, but in the long term, it would probably have been better if it had been focused on events in New York. While we focused on the contents of the Red Book, the fate of Bear Stearns—Wall street's fifth largest investment bank—was beginning to unravel. This debate has been going on since last Wednesday, and in that time Bear Stearns has been sold off, for a price that represents just 6 per cent. of what its value was last week. Last week most of us may not have been intimately familiar with Bear Stearns, but its fate has repercussions for us all. Many hon. Members have mentioned the credit crunch, but the fate of Bear Stearns shows that, far from being over, the crunch has merely embarked on its next phase.

Sadly, as various hon. Members have noted, this country is not well placed to cope with the coming financial storm. Indeed, we are more vulnerable than many of our competitors. Higher personal debt, low private savings and a record balance of payments deficit have left this country exposed, because we rely so much on other people's money.

However, the debate has made it clear that it is the level of Government borrowing that is exposing us to the worst of the bad economic weather. We have had 15 years of steady global growth. Over that period, any sensible Government—like any sensible business—would have taken the opportunity to build up their position and put something in reserve. Not this Government, though: instead of entering the downturn with a healthy surplus, they have built up a huge deficit. At 3 per cent. of GDP, our budget deficit is worse than that of all our major competitors—unless, of course, the Government now wish to count the Egyptian economy as a major competitor.

What a wasted opportunity it has been. Having inherited a golden legacy, Labour could have—should have—used the past decade to invest for the long term and prepare for the downturn. What have we had instead? The Government have not taken the long, strategic view; rather, we have had a decade of petty tinkering and meddling, of petty targets and stealth taxes. I suppose it was no surprise that last Wednesday, with the global financial markets in turmoil, the Chancellor dithered over whether we should have a ban on plastic carrier bags. That was the extent of the vision in the Budget.

One result of the Government's obsession with fiscal tinkering is that this country now has the longest and most complex tax code of any major economy. Since 1997 "Tolley's Tax Guide"—the principal compendium of all our tax regulations—has doubled in size and is now nearly 10,000 pages long. Ministers claim that they want to simplify the tax system, but their policies are achieving the reverse.

The Red Book—I shall carry on calling it that, although my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) was right to say that both its colour and its purpose have changed—contains all the principal measures in the Budget. Two pages are devoted to tax simplification, but they are accompanied by tax law explanatory notes 270 pages long. Indeed, the explanatory notes on all the changes are longer than the entire Red Book itself. By tinkering and meddling with dozens of taxes, rates and thresholds the Chancellor—and inevitably, of course, the Prime Minister before him—has created a hideously complex system that wastes the time and money of every taxpayer and business in the land.

That leads me to the Government's peculiar approach to so-called tax abuse. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) is not in the Chamber at present, as he gave us a fascinating description of how he thinks we should clamp down on anyone who is successful. Hon. Members will know that until 1997 there was tax avoidance and there was tax evasion; one was legal, the other was not. The Prime Minister, when he was Chancellor, rejected that approach. He believed that too many people were abusing the system and not paying what he thought that they should. He therefore devised the new notion of tax abuse, which sits somewhere between evasion and avoidance and, peculiarly, straddles both legal and illegal activity.

For example, the IR35 rules were brought in to tackle freelancers who the Prime Minister, when he was Chancellor, thought were abusing the system. We were told that millions of pounds of taxpayers' money would be recovered, but the reality is very different. For example, of the 1,400 cases taken out against freelance members of the Professional Contractors Group—a body that represents just one part of the marketplace—only three have been prosecuted successfully by the taxman.

The same misguided thinking can be seen in the so-called "income shifting" proposals. Over the last few years, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs—sanctioned by Ministers—has spent nearly £500,000 on a single vindictive case against Mr. and Mrs. Jones of the Arctic Corporation, over an alleged liability of only £40,000. There was a good use of public money: spending £500,000 on a case to reclaim a £40,000 alleged irregularity. Ministers lost the case, both on appeal and in the High Court, so what did they do? They decided to change the law, with the result that they now seek to interfere in every family business and to decide the value of what different owners bring to that business.

Mr. Jeremy Browne: Does the hon. Gentleman share my grave concern that if the family business is a farm, it is very difficult to quantify what each member brings to it? There is the farmer, and his wife may help with bread and breakfast, while his son, daughter or son-in-law may help with mending farm machinery or with the harvest at the appropriate time of year. The Government have deferred implementing the proposal for a year, but they have not scrapped it altogether. The problem is that it will be massively intrusive, and will lead to a huge rise in bureaucracy for small businesses.

Mr. Prisk: I agree with my hon. Friend—I mean with the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne), although he has been present in this debate for so long that he is becoming a friend to those of us on the Conservative Benches. The hon. Gentleman is right: how will the Government implement that proposal, other than by using clipboards and intruding unnecessarily into every family business?

I welcome the decision by the Chancellor to delay the proposals by a year, but it would be far better if common sense prevailed and they were dropped altogether. The perceived abuse is smaller than Ministers have been told, and as the hon. Member for Taunton suggested, the costs of trying to resolve the problem—economically and, if I may say so to the Chief Secretary, politically—will prove far greater than the benefits the Government seek. Rather than creating a vicious circle by creating new laws and then trying to clamp down on the changes that are made as a result, Ministers should make our tax laws simple, clear and constant. By doing that, they would tackle the root of the problem; they would remove the desire and the opportunity to evade one's obligations. A simpler and fairer tax system is what the UK needs, and I am pleased to say that that is what my party is proposing.

Last Wednesday the Chancellor announced not just the Budget but, as we heard from the Secretary of State earlier, the Government's latest enterprise White Paper. Like his predecessor, the Chancellor talked glowingly about the importance of small businesses and highlighted a number of policies that he obviously hopes will begin to restore their confidence in him. Well, if I were him I would not hold my breath.

After the last year small businesses have lost whatever faith they may have had in the Government. First came the increase in small company corporation tax, then rising business rates, then an extra £10 billion in new regulatory costs and finally the £900 million capital gains tax bombshell. The result of all that is that from April—in just a few weeks—the tax bills of small businesses will rise by £1,000 million per annum, and from April 2009 they will rise by £1,500 million per annum. Given the economic downturn, why increase tax bills for 99 per cent. of businesses? Given that small businesses employ more than 10 million people, why make their finances worse, just when the economy needs all the help it can get?

As I said, the Budget was accompanied by a White Paper on enterprise. Ministers describe it as a "strategy" but in fact it is the usual new Labour hotch-potch of warm words, photo opportunities and good intentions. To be fair, there are some good points in it—on procurement and invoice finance, for example. I am pleased that the Government finally accept that some small businesses should be exempted from some regulations. For the past seven years, since I have been a Member, Ministers have fought tooth and nail against that principle, but now that they have accepted it we shall see whether they mean what they say.

On female entrepreneurship, we heard from the Secretary of State earlier that it is important to increase the proportion of women who start and run their own firms. I entirely agree. It is a sad truth that British women are only half as likely to run their own firm as their counterparts in America. However, we have heard that language from Ministers before. In the 2005 Budget the Prime Minister, who was then the Chancellor, announced a new women's enterprise task force. We were told that it would turn things round in three years and make demonstrable progress, yet 11 months after the announcement Ministers had not even appointed a chairwoman to run it. With less than 12 months left to undertake the earlier initiative, we have another announcement and another initiative. The truth is that such Whitehall-led, top-down initiatives rarely work, and those that show promise are never given the long-term commitment needed to make a real difference.

In his opening remarks, the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform proudly pointed to the rise in the number of small companies as a sign that our entrepreneurial culture is increasing. However what he did not say is that the increase has been slower than the growth in our population. The start-up rate has actually fallen, from 3.2 per 1,000 people in 1997, to only three per 1,000 last year. The other critical measure of that activity—total entrepreneurial activity—has also dropped, from 7.7 per cent. in 2001 to 5.8 per cent. in 2006. Despite what the Secretary of State claims—and, I suspect, hopes—the culture of entrepreneurship is reaching a smaller and smaller proportion of the country; it is a culture that is shrinking, not spreading.

Similarly, small firms are growing more slowly. All the leading independent statistics show that the proportion of small firms achieving turnover at the critical figure of £1 million after five years has fallen—from 48 per cent. in 1997 to only 16 per cent. in 2006. In fact, in the UK it now takes an average of 14 years for a company to reach a £5 million turnover.

Of equal concern is the fact that fewer small businesses employ people than 10 years ago. The most recent statistics show that the figure has fallen to only 28 per cent. of SMEs. In other words, after 10 years of Labour Government, seven in 10 small firms no longer employ people. When Ministers produce whatever their next set of employment regulations may be, they might just want to reflect carefully on why fewer businesses want to employ people.

The Chancellor and other Ministers talk about promoting small businesses, but their policies are holding them back. While DBERR—the Department for business—is publishing its enterprise White Paper, the Treasury is simultaneously raising small firms' bills by £1 billion. The sad conclusion, which I hear all the time from the business community, is that DBERR Ministers—business Ministers—are increasingly irrelevant. Last year, when asked about corporation tax rises, the Secretary of State for business merely referred people to the Treasury. He said that he had nothing to say. When the Chancellor announced the capital gains tax rise he did not even consult the Secretary of State for business. What use is a Secretary of State for business and enterprise who is completely overlooked by the Treasury when business taxes rise?

Over the coming months our economy faces a stern test, but I am sorry to say that it is one for which the Government have left us ill-prepared. I want business to prosper and entrepreneurs to thrive, but I fear that with the current incumbents in Downing street—at No. 10 and No. 11—British business and British entrepreneurs will have to compete with one hand tied firmly behind their back.

8.26 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I want to talk about the reality of the British economy today, in particular in my constituency in Wrexham in north-east Wales. The reality bears little resemblance to the words of the prophets of doom on the Opposition Benches. The Government's record over the past 10 years in building the foundations for a strong economy is testament to their being a Government of great economic reform.

Today the A380, one of the most magnificent examples of British engineering, landed at Heathrow after its first commercial flight. The wings for the A380 are built at the Broughton plant in north-east Wales and are testament, first, to the engineering skill of the people of north Wales but also to the Labour Government's investment in the Airbus company and the British economy generally. That work is also testament to European co-operation, something that the Conservatives certainly do not believe in.

Airbus employs 13,000 people in the UK—about 8,000 at the Broughton plant in north-east Wales. Several hundred people from my constituency work there. In addition to the contribution that the civil aircraft sector has made in the past few years. Airbus has announced in the past fortnight that the air tanker project commissioned by the US Government, worth £3 billion, is to be awarded to the European Aeronautic Defence and Space company—EADS—and Airbus. Again, that is a huge vote of confidence in UK manufacturing industry, and it shows the reality of the manufacturing sector in north-east Wales. The sector extends further than aerospace; Sharp, the Japanese manufacturing company, manufactures photovoltaic cells in my constituency and has invested in the manufacture of those cells for export to the UK market. That investment came to the UK in preference to any other country in western Europe because north-east Wales and the UK was the best place to invest, manufacture and export.

The pharmaceutical sector has invested in Wrexham, too. An Indian company, Wockhardt, is investing in the manufacture of pharmaceutical products in Wrexham, and a French company, Ipsen BioPharm, is investing in Wrexham so that it can export to the US market. All those investments have been made in the Wrexham economy in the past five years. The reality for the people of Wrexham is that the rate of unemployment has declined since 1997, when, under the Conservative Government, about 2,000 people in my constituency were registered as unemployed. That figure has halved; it is now just over 900.

The reality of manufacturing industry—I have focused only on manufacturing—in my constituency under the Labour Government is that it has been successful, has developed and strengthened, and is prospering. We should listen less to the doom-mongers on the UK economy and recognise progress when it has been made. I say quite candidly to the Conservatives that it would be extraordinary to listen to their lectures about running the economy. I was born in the same town as my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson), I think, and I experienced what a Conservative Government did to the UK economy between 1979 and 1997. I remember when, in the early 1980s, 3 million people were unemployed. I was seeking work in the north-east at the time, but I went to Germany to work during a summer holiday because there were no jobs available in the north-east. Unemployment was at 3 million not just once but twice under the Conservative Government. Lives were wasted and set aside for 18 years, so I do not listen at all to the arguments put forward by the Conservatives; they can give no lectures whatever about the economy and how to run it.

Mr. David Anderson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the unemployment experienced in the 1980s was not an accident, but was the result of a policy of which the Conservatives were actually quite proud?

Ian Lucas: Absolutely, and it was a policy of waste. We should remember that during all those years when 3 million people were unemployed, each of those individuals was being paid benefits. A dependency culture developed, and we are still struggling with it today. There are individuals who were put on the incapacity benefit scrapheap by the Conservatives and who are still on incapacity benefit today. That dependency culture cannot be cured overnight; we are working to defeat it, and we are making real strides towards doing so. The most important stride that we are taking is in creating an economy where work is available—something that did not happen under the Conservative Government.

Mr. Philip Hammond: If the hon. Gentleman does not want to take any lectures on the UK economy from us, what does he think about Alan Greenspan, the Prime Minister's adviser, who says that the UK economy is "more exposed" than that of the US to financial instability, or Goldman Sachs, the Treasury's appointed adviser, which says that or the OECD, which says that the slow-down will be larger in the UK than elsewhere?

Ian Lucas: I should be delighted to invite the hon. Gentleman to visit my constituency of Wrexham, with which I believe he has some familiarity. I invite him to see the prosperity, which is built not on public sector investment—although there has been such investment in Wrexham—but on the inward, private-sector investment in north-east Wales that I described. Retail investment is going into the north-east Wales economy from the private sector because it has confidence in the UK economy and the people who are bringing prosperity to the manufacturing industry and the area.

I refer to one specific proposal in the Budget relating to child poverty—

Stewart Hosie: Before the hon. Gentleman moves from manufacturing to child poverty, may I say that I welcome what he said about north-east Wales and I am delighted for his constituents working in those industries, but he should not be complacent about the 650 employees at NCR who were laid off last year or the 100 at Michelin in my constituency, the closure of the Yorkshire Fittings plant in my constituency, the wheelchair company that moved production to China, and Patak's Foods? There is not a universal picture. A million manufacturing jobs have been lost, including 1,100 across Dundee in the past year. The hon. Gentleman must realise that the picture that he paints is not uniform across the UK.

Ian Lucas: I speak of my constituency, and I realise, of course, that companies close in all constituencies, including mine, because we live in a globalised economy. We must confront the challenges of competitiveness and low-wage economies. We must progress and constantly improve our manufacturing base. The way forward has been shown by companies such as Airbus and Sharp UK, which have invested in high-technology products.

I could also speak about the development of the apprenticeship network, which is strong in north-east Wales. Apprentices were a lost breed under the Conservatives, but are now resurgent. When I go to my local further education colleges, I see local companies employing apprentices and planning and investing in the future. That is how we will compete as an economy in the future.

I wish to mention a specific aspect of the Budget that I welcome. Mrs. Sheila Harrison, who is the manager of my local citizens advice bureau in Wrexham, approached me last year and suggested that it would be a major step forward in tackling child poverty if the Government considered disregarding child benefit for the purposes of calculating housing benefit and council tax benefit. At that time, I wrote to the Treasury and to the Department for Work and Pensions. I also tabled a parliamentary question and established that it would cost about £300 million to implement that. I tabled an early-day motion, which I am sure had an inordinate effect.

I was delighted to read in the Budget that from next year the Government will implement that very proposal. Mrs. Harrison rang me up, having been apprised of it by the citizens advice bureau network. I take this opportunity to thank the Government for taking the wise words of advice from Mrs. Harrison. No doubt other individuals made representations to that effect. It is heartening indeed to hear that we have a Government who are committed to eliminating child poverty by 2020 and halving it by 2010, and who are taking steps year by year in that direction.

The difference between the present Government and the Conservative Governments is that when the Conservative Governments were in power, they did not even regard that as a goal that they wished to achieve. I am proud that we have a Government who are creating manufacturing industry that is developing and prospering in north-east Wales, and who are confronting and attacking child poverty in our midst.

8.38 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): It is a—I was about to say a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas). I note that in many of the references that he made to the success of Wales in attracting high-tech manufacturers he did not give credit to the Welsh Development Agency and the political skill that Welsh Labour MPs in particular have in persuading it to support business in Wales. On the other side of the Welsh border we notice that to our cost. The hon. Gentleman is to be congratulated on the role that he plays in that.

Ian Lucas: On a point of information, I should point out that the Welsh Development Agency no longer exists.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful for having been brought up to date on the extent to which Wales keeps ahead of other regions of the country in developing its support for industry.

I should like to focus most of my remarks on the macro aspects of the Budget. Many speakers have discussed the extent to which the Chancellor is in denial of the events surrounding this country. So concerned has he been to convince us that all is well with his stewardship of the economy and that all is stable in his hands, that he failed to recognise—and barely mentioned in his speech—that the stable door has been blown open by the financial storm coursing around the globe, and is left flapping in the wind.

In opening the debate, the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform repeated the mantra about stability; apparently, the problems are all the Conservatives' fault for talking the economy down. However, we did not cause the credit crunch, as was generously acknowledged in one of the Labour contributions. We did not cause the crisis; nor are we talking it up. However, we do believe that the Chancellor needs to wake up to the consequences of these unprecedented events, as many commentators warn that he should.

What is the Chancellor's reaction to the shocks? In his speech last week, he talked up the resilience of the UK economy and today Ministers and the few Back Benchers who have turned up to support the Chancellor have been parroting that mantra too. However, what is there to be so resilient about in an economy whose house price inflation is among the highest and most resilient—in that sense—in the world? Our household debt levels are at record highs and our consumer saving ratios are at record lows. The day after the Budget, Roger Bootle, a leading economist, wrote:

"Our housing market is one of the most over-valued; our consumer saving ratio has plunged to levels only exceeded by the US; we are heavily exposed to the global economy, which is threatened; we are heavily dependent upon international financial activity, which could be severely hit; and our scope to take expansionary fiscal action is limited by our recently lax fiscal policy. On balance we are relatively badly placed to weather the storm."

That says it all—far more than the Chancellor has acknowledged in his assessment of how we are placed to cope with the financial crisis.

It is not only our own economists who are spreading cautionary tales. The managing director of the International Monetary Fund, Dominique Strauss-Kahn, was quoted in the papers as saying:

"It's a problem for economic growth. We clearly face a situation in which the risks to economic growth are more and more serious."

I hope that he passed that message on to the Prime Minister and the Chancellor when he met them today.

Today, the Bank of England published its latest quarterly review. In commenting on activity in the sterling financial markets in February, it pointed out that the "difficult conditions in bank term funding markets would continue for some time, which would be likely to lead to a reduction in the supply of credit to the economy generally...This could act as a drag on economic activity, and in turn could prompt further deterioration in the quality of banks' assets and limit their ability and willingness to lend".

One example of the speed of change is that the central forecast in the Budget is for house price growth of 2.5 per cent. per annum. Figures for last month show that house prices have already declined, after five successive months, to an annual rate of only 1.4 per cent. So, before the year has even begun, we are considering an optimistic annual house price assumption in the Red Book.

Where does that leave Government finances and the Chancellor's forecasts? It leads to an overwhelming lack of credibility. The Chancellor chose to downgrade his GDP growth range for 2008 to a range of 1.75 to 2.25 per cent., rising back to trend after 2009. However, he did that on the back of consensus economic forecasts, which looked to 1.5 to 1.7 per cent. The bottom of the Chancellor's range for growth in GDP in the year that is about to start is marginally above the consensus average. Independent commentators, who gave evidence to the Treasury Committee on Monday, raised particular anxieties about that. Bridget Rosewell from Volterra Consulting described the Chancellor's forecast as complacent. She said:

"The particular form of optimism that I find most disturbing was not that overall headline number, where even the bottom end of the range is above the current consensus, which seems odd, but also the discussion about the UK's resilience to economic shocks and how this is expected to have increased. It was the complacency surrounding that which I found particularly disturbing."

What does that forecasting optimism mean for the public finances? The Government, especially the Chancellor's predecessor, have form on forecasting the public finances. Every year since 2003—seven years in a row—the year in which public finances cross over into Budget surplus has been pushed out. In the 2003 Budget, it was predicted to happen in 2005-06. Only last year, in the 2007 Budget, the date was pushed to 2008-09. The pre-Budget report, which was published only last October, pushed it to 2009-10 and the Red Book now says that it is to be 2010-11.

The public sector net debt, excluding Northern Rock and the international financial reporting standards—IFRS—changes, to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) referred, has increased by £20 billion over the period of the Red Book. What impact does that deterioration in public finances have on the Government's famed sustainable investment rule? It places it perilously close to a breach. Table C5 on page 184 of the Red Book shows that public sector net debt reaches 39.8 per cent. of GDP. How much headroom does that give us? Headroom of 0.2 per cent. is equivalent to only £2.8 billion. That compares with a £13 billion to £14 billion average forecasting error since 2003. That leaves a high probability of a breach—a 50:50 chance, according to the experts who spoke to us on Monday. Where is the discussion about what happens in those circumstances in the Chancellor's explanation of the Budget? It appeared nowhere in his speech or in the Red Book. The Chancellor is crossing his fingers that it will not happen.

Of course, the figures completely exclude the impact of Northern Rock, which the Office for National Statistics declared will have to be added to the public debt yet the Chancellor conveniently decides that he can ignore. The ONS calculated the Northern Rock debt at 30 June as adding 6.7 per cent. to the public sector net debt as a proportion of GDP, blowing us way off the sustainable investment rule. Yet that has not been discussed and there has been no explanation of what the Government will do.

The figures also exclude the impact of moving the public accounts on to an IFRS basis. The Government have agreed to that but decided to defer doing it for another year. That is likely to add a further £30 billion of PFI off-balance-sheet debt to the public sector net debt. Again, there was almost no discussion of that in the Chancellor's presentation.

Let me consider briefly the specific measures that the Chancellor proposes. We are debating a tax-raising Budget. Much has been made of the fact that it is fiscally neutral and, technically, it is, but only for the year that starts in April. Measures to be introduced in April 2009 raise just short of £800 million and those to be introduced in April 2010 raise a further £1.8 billion. When taken with measures that were announced in the Budget in 2007 and since, the figure rises by a further £1 billion to £2.8 billion in the third year of the Budget, so we are talking about a tax-raising Budget, not a tax-neutral Budget.

By and large, the measures in the Budget are puny—that point was well made by the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne). Of the 52 measures set out in table A.1, which shows the fiscal impact of the policy decisions in the Budget, 42 have a fiscal impact in the first year of plus or minus £25 million or less. Indeed, many have either a zero or an insignificant impact. By 2010-11, some 34 of those 52 measures will continue to have a minimal impact. Those measures amount to tinkering at the edges and have little significance on the national accounts.

Overall, the measures are also regressive. Almost everybody earning less than £18,000 will be worse off under the proposals, particularly if they drink, smoke or drive. The more significant measures have been shambolically introduced. Other hon. Members have talked about the capital gains tax changes, which were announced in the pre-Budget report. It was then announced that there would be a rethink, but the rethink was delayed. Finally, the proposals were confirmed a few weeks ahead of the Budget, giving business men very little opportunity to arrange their affairs before the end of the tax year.

The Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform had the gall to argue that the Budget is a Budget for entrepreneurs that, to use the expression that I think he used, abandons short-termism. In fact, the Government's capital gains tax proposals abandoned the very incentives that encouraged long-term investing. Is it any wonder that the Government's reputation for economic competence has now been exposed as blowing in the wind?

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), which is part of Wales's Sudetenland, as he knows, not that we have any plans to re-conquer it. I am sorry that I did not hear an expression of the spirit of generosity that we have seen from the English rugby XV, following recent events on the other side. We have heard what seems to be a Meldrew approach to the Budget. I was also delighted recently to see something that I had not noticed before—that the English rugby team has "O" and "2" on its kit. Apparently, that is the answer to the question of how many times certain countries have won the triple crown in the past five years: two times for Wales and zero, sadly, for England. However, it is nice of England to do that for us.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk), who has just left the Chamber, made some selective points about entrepreneurship. It is only fair that I should cite some facts about entrepreneurship that he unfortunately omitted. The UK is now third in the G8 ranking for early stage entrepreneurship, which is very creditable, up from fifth in 2001. That is a considerable improvement. The proportion of the working age population expecting to start a business in the next three years has increased by 70 per cent. Again, that is very creditable and a good story. The proportion of the population who believe that they have the skills to start a business has increased by a quarter, from 40.2 to 49 per cent.

That is extremely good news, and I do not see why the Opposition should be blind to it. I delight in the fact that in my constituency and in my country, Wales, there is now a spirit of entrepreneurship that did not exist historically. In the past, Wales has seen itself as a country of employees rather than of employers—a country with the branch factory rather than the headquarters.

Let me give just one example of a company in my constituency that is firmly rooted in Newport and Wales. It is a firm with enormous promise named Lifeforce, which has world patents on a process for parking the immune system—that is, extracting the white cells from blood transfusions and placing them in three different locations, to be stored for a lifetime if necessary. They can then be brought out for use if the person's immune system is under attack or has been damaged by chemotherapy or by a disease such as AIDS. The white cells can then be used to re-infuse the healthy immune system into the body. This is an exciting development. It would have enormous repercussions for our health if we could re-infuse a healthy immune system into the body when it comes under attack.

The Nobel prize was won by Martin Evans at the university of Cardiff. He is a specialist in mammalian genetics. That, too, has great promise for the future of science and our health. We need to capitalise on those developments. Lifeforce, the firm that I mentioned earlier, already has a link with the Bill Gates Institution and with a firm in America and another in Germany. Its procedure is now a practical proposition that has been approved by the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency in this country and by the Food and Drug Administration in America. Those two regulatory bodies have given their approval to its science, which could be of great benefit to our future life expectancy, and it has commercial prospects as well.

I should like to suggest a way in which the Government could raise money through the Budget. Sadly, the proposal is not in this one, although I have suggested it in the past. They could raise a good £2 billion in a manner that would be painless as well as popular and just. It involves the national insurance scheme, which is very unfair at the moment. People like me, who are in the happy position of having reached retirement age but are still working, pay no national insurance contributions. However, people in this happy situation have reached a time of life at which we could certainly afford to do so, but those of us in that position pay nil per cent. Most hon. Members pay about 1 per cent., because our earnings are high, but people at the bottom end of the pay scale can pay up to 10 per cent. of their income in national insurance contributions. It is a hugely unfair tax.

If they wished, the Government could change the law so that those who were still enjoying the pleasures of a working life after reaching retirement age would continue to pay national insurance contributions. Indeed, they are receiving some of the benefits of the national insurance scheme that others might not live long enough to enjoy. That would be a just measure, and it would raise the sum of £2 billion. Those fortunate enough to be in that happy position would find such a tax acceptable.

The national insurance scheme is in a bizarre situation, because it has been building up huge surpluses. The actuaries insist that there should be a surplus of about £17 billion, to allow for a serious increase in unemployment. However, we have built up a surplus that is way beyond that amount in each year over recent years, and we now have a surplus of about £48 billion. If we were to continue in that way, by 2013 we would have a surplus in the national insurance scheme that could fund a rescue in another Northern Rock crisis, if there was one.

The current situation is unfair because the money is being used as though it were ordinary taxation revenue. It is being used in the same way as other taxes are used, but it has been raised unjustly, because it is a tax that falls more heavily on the poor and the low paid than on those who are very well off. I would like those on my Front Bench to consider my proposal and to change the whole nature of the national insurance scheme so that we no longer build up those surpluses.

A great deal has been made by the Leader of the Opposition of last year's UNICEF report that was critical of the progress that had been made on tackling child poverty in this country. It is a great shame that the same people who exaggerated the effect of that report did not look at UNICEF's report from 2004. It came from the same body from the same source—the Innocenti centre in the Piazza della Santissima Annunziata in Florence—and said that of the 25 richest countries in the world, the country that had achieved most in reducing child poverty was Great Britain. That report was totally ignored by the press. I tried to get some attention drawn to it in an early-day motion, because it had had no coverage whatever, as positive news tends to be something that people do not want to hear. We do not see headlines in the papers about that sort of thing, but it gave impressive recognition of all that the Government had done to take children out of poverty. It is, of course, the negative news that gets the attention.

The leader of the Conservative party recently wondered how we could allow child poverty to happen and how we could have got ourselves into such a position, but given the extent of child poverty under the 18 years of Tory Government from 1979 to 1997, he should be more careful in his remarks. When the Tories came into office, by the same measure, one in seven children were in poverty; but by the time they left office, it was one in three. That is a terrible record of indifference to the relative poverty of those at the bottom end of the scale.

We should also look at certain enterprises that the Government have entered into and we should become more critical of the Chancellor's involvement in the nuclear industry. An extraordinary answer was given to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Davies) a fortnight ago. It revealed that an enterprise that had been opposed by hon. Members in speeches and in early-day motions and by environmental groups such as Greenpeace and Friends of the Earth nevertheless had the support of every party in the House. The amount of money spent on that flawed proposal, on an evidence-free and unscientific basis, was £473 million.

There was no great mystery behind the opposition, because everyone who opposed it said clearly that the cause was impossible: it could not work; it was impractical and it had no rational basis. It was intended that the mixed oxide plant at Sellafield would produce 120 tonnes of uranium fuel every year. It has been in full production for five years now, yet it has produced only 5 tonnes—a monumental failure. It is difficult to go back through our industrial history and find an investment that has failed as spectacularly as that, yet we still put this faith in nuclear power—mainly, I think, because most Ministers and others involved in the enterprise feel themselves to be scientifically semi-literate or illiterate and do not question the claims made by the nuclear power lobby. We already know that the bill for clearing up the mess from nuclear power over the long term is something in the order of £73 billion.

The affair reveals the extraordinary gullibility of the House. This is not ancient history either; it happened over the past eight years. It was in the year 2000 that the great debates about the mixed oxide plant were taking place in this House. Every one of the arguments put forward by the environmentalists and others in the House turned out to be justified, and the arguments supported by those on the Front Benches of all parties turned out to be false.

The Lib Dem spokesman mentioned the farming industry earlier, and I would like to make another point about it. There is lobbying at the moment about problems in the farming industry, particularly in pig farming. Almost ignored, however, is the enormous amount of money being made by the grain industry, whose profits went up 70 per cent. one year and nearly 50 per cent. the next year. Those are huge sums. When we talk about additional burdens on the farming industry because of the price of grain, why do we leave out the fact that there have been those huge increases in the incomes of grain farmers on account of that? That is not mentioned—we do not get a morning chorus of whingeing on the "Farming Today" programme about the huge windfall profit enjoyed by grain farmers. If sections of the farming industry are doing exceptionally well, there should be a virement to those sections that are under pressure. We should not continue uncritically to support the whole farming industry as we have in the past. The traditional subsidies are no longer supported, particularly given their effect on the developing world countries. Sadly, one man's subsidy is another man's poverty in another part of the world.

Opposition Members have mentioned the Office for National Statistics. An official launch will be held by Michael Scholar to celebrate the ONS's new independence. It was suggested that the Act that introduced that independence was of great importance, which it is, given the cynicism about national statistics. Under that Act, the full independence of the ONS will be guaranteed. The office is located in my constituency, and I remember being approached many years ago by statisticians who felt that their work and their integrity were being undermined by a previous Prime Minister, who was moving the ONS from one Department to another, and who had a vested interest in seeing that the figures might be fiddled in some way. I had a letter from Margaret Thatcher at the time, saying what an unworthy thought that would be. But there was that possibility and suspicion throughout that time. I look forward to the fact that when we debate these issues in future, we will know that the statistics provided by the ONS are genuinely independent and objective.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I shall not speak for long.

Labour Members have been talking about employment and employment rates. Much to most people's surprise, I spent six years as a junior Minister ending in 1990, when the employment rate was higher than it is now—that is my guess from the charts in the Red Book. I shall speak mainly, however, about trying to get more consistency into the Red Book.

Will Ministers discuss with the Statistics Commission whether it is appropriate to have such odd runs of years in its figures? Obviously, figures on projections for population growth over the next 30 years are rather different from those on the balance of payments over the past 30 years. However, I shall give some illustrative examples, which will not be very exciting.

On page 11, in charts 1.1 and 1.2, on Government expenditure by function and Government receipts, it would be useful to have a run showing percentages, to illuminate how we are letting Government spend money. On page 18, chart 2.1 on inflation performance and expectations from 1990 to 2008 gives an 18-year run of years. Incidentally, in some of the graphs, it would be useful to have a log projection, rather than just a linear one, when the figures have changed significantly.

I will not go through the whole list, although I would if I had more time. The chart on meeting the golden rule has a 14-year run of years, and the chart on protecting investment has a 33-year run of years, I think, unless I have misread my own figures. On page 29, the chart on meeting the sustainable investment rule has a 16-year run of years. So it goes on. I could go through a whole series.

I suggest that Ministers ask whether those different runs of years were put in because they asked for them, or because the officials suggested them. I suspect that political advisers said before Ministers saw them, "I don't think the Minister would want people to see that. If you don't show the Minister, they can deny that they were the ones who made the decision." I ask for an explanation of the run of years, preferably in advance of the Red Book coming out.

Instead of just having a list of tables and charts at the back of the Red Book, it would also be useful to have a list of boxes. I should like to see an index, and in particular I should like to see the cost of the Red Book reduced from £45 to about £20. We do not need the photographs, although it is nice to see ethnic balance. Of the 10 people pictured, five are not white, five are, and there is one random hand floating around—but we do not need that kind of thing, however balanced it may be.

Perhaps Ministers could ask an archivist to show them a Red Book produced, say, 30 years ago, and ask what the cost would be of printing it in that format. They would find that it would be substantially lower, which would reduce the costs incurred by those who want to see what we are doing.

I should like to know whether a chart is available to Ministers showing where the economic cycle starts each year. We know that there have been changes, so why not provide the information? I also wish that the Government had managed to include a chart explaining the retail prices index. The consumer prices index is a separate thing: we know perfectly well that it is at 2.5 per cent., although it would have been at 2.2 per cent. if the methodology had been different. The retail prices index is at 4.1 per cent., which matters more to my constituents. The information that the price of strawberries went down in February is not much use to them, nor is information about the drop in the price of hobbies and games. They are interested in the real prices of real things, and the retail prices index matters to them.

9.11 pm

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley), whose speech was admirably concise. I am grateful to him for that.

I want to say something about child poverty, which has featured in speeches by Members on both sides of the House since the beginning of the Budget debate. On Thursday, a source of contention between the two Front Benches was how Government and Opposition could aspire to reach the 2010 as well as the 2020 target. I think it both possible and desirable to eradicate child poverty in a way that fulfils the Government's commitment. If we define 60 per cent. of median earnings as the poverty threshold, it is entirely possible to raise people from below that level to above it.

There are two ways of doing that. First, there is what I would call the sustainable way. That involves creating circumstances in which people's earnings carry them from below the threshold to above it. The second way is to regard child poverty as an entirely fiscal phenomenon and to make financial transfers from one group to another, thus topping up poorer people's incomes and raising them above the threshold. That is not a sustainable method, and I think we should draw a distinction between the two. Our ambition to eradicate child poverty should go hand in hand with enabling people to stand on their own two feet, and to earn enough from the product of their labours to sustain themselves and their families.

I find it slightly depressing that in recent weeks the debate about child poverty has concentrated purely on the fiscal transfer, as if that were the only possible way of addressing the problem. If, through a wave of the Chancellor's magic wand in subsequent Budgets, we were to increase the contribution of state benefits to take everyone who is currently below the 60 per cent. level above it—so that, technically, poverty would have been abolished—would we see an absence of all the social problems that we associate with poverty? Absolutely not. Many of them would continue to exist. The speech made today by the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) made it clear that poverty is as much a symptom of other social problems as it is a self-contained phenomenon to be abolished. We need a more sophisticated understanding of it.

No one has captured that point better than my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith). He identified a range of contributors to child poverty, from poor housing through poor education and dependence on drugs to family breakdown. Those are the issues that we must tackle if we are to make a sustainable dent in child poverty and, ultimately, eradicate it.

This should not be an issue of contention between both sides. One of the remarkable contributions of the right hon. Member for Darlington today was to suggest that we take a broader view. In that, he is consistent. I was struck by a speech he made recently in which, like today, he quoted Professor Amartya Sen, the Nobel prize-winning economist who has noted that social equality is best tackled if we tackle the root causes not the symptoms. The right hon. Gentleman said that that must mean moving beyond simply correcting low wages and family poverty after the event towards policies that spread opportunity and help people realise their own aspirations for progress. Correcting low wages after the event should not be enough. It might be a temporary palliative, but we should have higher ambitions.

Peter Bottomley: I am sure that the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) is right to say that we need to go beyond trying to make sure that when people start having children, when their incomes are low and their needs high, money helps, but is not it odd that a Nobel prize winner can be quoted with approval yet when Keith Joseph said roughly the same thing, the whole of the media and the Labour party jumped on him?

Greg Clark: As my hon. Friend points out, times change. I welcome the conversion of the right hon. Member for Darlington to the cause. At the moment, the debate is all about precisely what the right hon. Gentleman suggests we avoid doing: correcting low incomes after the event, rather than tackling the root causes. Last year 2.6 million families received tax credits, excluding the family element of the child tax credit. The number of people receiving this element of tax credit is double what it was in 2001 and treble what it was in 1997. The consequence is that 1 million children are above the poverty line by less than they receive in tax credits. Everyone must be relieved and grateful that they have been put above the poverty line and that their circumstances are improved, but do not let us pretend for one moment that the problem of child poverty has been solved. It has been masked or disguised. Those 1 million children are effectively in poverty and the state is intervening to drag them above the line. That is not a sustainable recipe. They need tax credits to escape poverty, so poverty has not diminished in that sense.

The Chancellor has a golden rule and a sustainable investment rule—a golden rule suggesting that we borrow only to invest, backed by a sustainable investment rule that makes sure that borrowing does not reach such a high proportion of national income that it dominates it. In tackling child poverty, we should have a rule that says that we must eradicate child poverty, but that the means of doing so should come from income and the ability of people to earn for themselves. That is the only true sustainable means of tackling child poverty. That makes economic and personal sense for the people concerned. It makes economic sense, because if we are to compete internationally the idea that we permanently have a sub-optimal equilibrium of a payment running into many billions of pounds that we have to sustain to keep society together is not acceptable.

That is the equivalent of the losses of the nationalised industries during the 1970s, when we accepted that companies such as British Steel and British Leyland could not possibly earn enough in their markets to sustain themselves and had to be given a permanent subvention from the Government. It is the equivalent today of the common agricultural policy, where rather than just protecting the incomes of farmers in times of volatility, it is permanently acting as a tax on every taxpayer in the EU and on the consumers of agricultural products.

These are measures that were meant to be temporary but have become permanent, and they all cost. If we are to be competitive, we must not get back into the way of thinking that these permanent drains on our resources are somehow acceptable. They should be temporary. Our ambition must be to get people back into jobs by equipping them with skills, incentives and motivation so that we regard it as a failure if, having eradicated child poverty in 10 years' time, we have not also made sure that that was down to the sustainable abilities of people to earn their income, rather than transfers from the state.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): This has been an interesting debate, although it has not been particularly well attended by Labour Back Benchers. We started with 11 of them when the Secretary of State stood up, and at the low point of his speech we were down to six. He took what might be regarded as a sensible approach in the circumstances: he adopted the micro-economic approach to analysing the Budget. He focused on the enterprise White Paper, which some in the business community might think of as being akin to fiddling while Rome burns. He spent 20 minutes explaining the details of the well-meaning but rather small-scale proposals in the White Paper, when most of his audience were more concerned about the macro-economic backdrop, which seems to be deteriorating by the hour. Interestingly, he told us that the Government wanted to ensure access to finance for entrepreneurs, but then supported the slapping of an 80 per cent. tax increase on business angels. We know that he fought the cause internally, but ultimately the clunking fist won.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) countered the Secretary of State's narrow approach by focusing on the macro-economic backdrop to the Budget. He also reminded the House that following the Budget 73 per cent. of people believe that it will contribute to a downturn in the UK economy—perhaps showing us that the man in the street has a better grasp than the man in the Treasury, and also perhaps accounting for the recently published opinion poll showing that Labour's standing on economic competence has fallen from 7 per cent. before the Budget to minus 8 per cent.—in other words, there is an 8 per cent. Conservative lead following the Budget.

The hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne)—who has returned to the Chamber just in time to hear my next remarks—made an excellent speech. He described the Budget as a Budget with a hole, because the most important measures—the income tax changes—were not in it. He pointed to a lack of purpose or any sense of vision in the Budget, and he contrasted it with the Budgets and speeches of the big beasts who have occupied No. 11 in the past, comparing what they did with this Chancellor's focus on the possibility of introducing a plastic bag tax at some time in the future. He described the Budget as a humiliation for the Chancellor—a series of micro-announcements that he was forced to make to pad out the allotted 50 minutes, with £1 million here and £1 million there. He also gave a highly entertaining, but completely inaccurate, list of supposed Conservative policies, and I am thinking of seeing whether we can book him as an after-dinner cabaret turn for a future Conservative party conference.

The right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) observed, with what might be described as classic understatement, that mid-term Budgets are never easy. He also described the Chancellor's approach as calm, which is perhaps the friendly-fire version of the description of it as soporific by the hon. Member for Taunton. However, the right hon. Gentleman made a thoughtful speech, in which he focused on the need to support wealth creators—although when he did so, not all Opposition Members were quite sure that he was taking along with him on his journey the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), who was sitting next to him. The right hon. Member for Darlington also confirmed candidly that the relationship between business and the Government had been sorely tested over the past six months, and he called for a renewed focus on social mobility, which certainly all Conservative Members would agree with. He pleaded with those on his Front Bench to ensure that the Government focus on being an empowering Government, rather than a controlling one. I am sure that the Secretary of State would be happy to accede to that, but I am not so sure whether the Prime Minister will have any truck with it.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) made an excellent speech, agreeing with the right hon. Member for Darlington, but he described the Budget as a mini-Budget that did not move us any nearer to achieving any of the laudable goals that the right hon. Gentleman aspired to. My right hon. and learned Friend also set out a critique of the complacency in the Chancellor's analysis of the strengths of the UK economy. He also contrasted the rapid resolution at Bear Stearns over the past 72 hours with the prolonged agony of dithering indecision that we have been forced to ensure as the Chancellor faced the Northern Rock crisis. He left us with an enduring and charming cameo image of the Chancellor presenting his Budget as the boy stood on the burning deck whistling the tunes of his predecessor.

Sadly, the Chancellor is not here. He would probably be interested to hear the prediction made by the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) that we face a "winter of discontent" ahead. The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), reminded the House that efficiency savings are easy to predict but difficult to deliver, and pledged his Committee's continued pursuit of auditable efficiency gains.

The prescription of the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras—more regulation—was predictable. He wanted that applied to banks, markets, credit and mortgages. He took us on a trip down memory lane, describing himself as old-fashioned old Labour—and coining an elegant new description of himself as "heritage Labour". Perhaps he thinks he will be preserved for eternity under that label. All in all, it was a nostalgic performance, reminding not a few of us of his speech in last week's Northern Rock debate.

The right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) made a wonderfully old Labour speech that made the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras look like a dangerous moderniser. He took us on a tour of Monaco, Liechtenstein and the Canary islands, and he suggested an easy remedy for the Government Front-Bench team. Parroting the TUC line, he told us that the Chancellor could easily collect £40 billion of avoided tax, and lambasted him for not doing so. He helpfully confirmed that, as we have argued, there has never been a time when the Treasury needed big benefits as much as it does now, and he attacked the Chancellor and his predecessor, the Prime Minister, for turning the City into a tax haven, assuring the House that the financial services sector and, as he put it, the so-called knowledge economy, could never replace manufacturing as the mainstay of the British economy.

The right hon. Gentleman very effectively headed off what I believe he thought was going to be an intervention by me by citing to aid his case Winston Churchill's words as Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1929. I suspect that some of my hon. Friends heard the unmistakable sound of flapping white coats as we reached the end of the speech—but that is for them to say, not me.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) had a high-level economic debate with the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton, after which he spoke about the pernicious effect of the doubling of the 10p rate on some of the poorest pensioners in his constituency. He also pointed out that the Government were repeatedly warned of a coming credit crunch threatening an economy that is increasingly built on debt, both public and private. I apologise if time does not permit me to recall the contributions of all other hon. Members.

I welcome the Chancellor to his place. When the present Prime Minister was Chancellor, he was fond of recounting an old Treasury adage that there are only two types of Chancellor—those who fail and those who get out early enough. He has gone, and the jury is out as to whether he got out early enough. So last Wednesday, it was this Chancellor who had to stand up to admit that at the end of a decade and a half of economic growth, his cupboard was bare, and he had no room for fiscal manoeuvre at a time when our competitors are responding to the economic slow-down by reducing taxes and boosting spending in a classic counter-cyclical response.

It was the Prime Minister who was responsible for the mismanagement of the economy that left the Chancellor with that empty cupboard. The Prime Minister was responsible for the piling up of public debt through the good years while our neighbours and competitors were fixing the roof while the sun shone, paying down debt and reducing deficits—some of them even set aside something for more difficult times to come.

Back in 1995, the Prime Minister wrote:

"Nobody should doubt my iron resolve for stability and fiscal prudence".

Yet it is thanks to his policies that while Ireland and Australia have paid off all their net public debt, and a third of OECD countries are entering the downturn with a fiscal surplus, Britain has the highest fiscal deficit of any country in the world bar Egypt, Pakistan and Hungary, and the highest peacetime non-North sea tax burden.

There is therefore no room for manoeuvre. As a result, when the cost of regulation is rising and the corporation tax rate has gone from being the third most competitive in the EU to the 17th, the Chancellor is imposing an 80 per cent. tax increase on business gains. At a time when his own figures show that business investment is set to fall by two thirds, this Chancellor slaps a tax on it. When families are reeling from the effect of two years of falling real average earnings, rising mortgage costs and soaring prices, they are being hit with a total of £2.8 billion of additional tax burden in this year's Budget, on top of the impact of the doubling of the 10p rate bequeathed to the Chancellor from the Prime Minister's last Budget. Taken with all the other income tax changes announced in the Budget, and even after the tax credit changes, that will leave 5.3 million low-income British households worse off and, as the right hon. Member for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) pointed out in the debate last week, will also drag another 145,000 people into marginal tax and benefit withdrawal rates in excess of 60 per cent.

Stability, I have to tell the Chancellor, is not only about sound fiscal policy. Stability is also about fostering balanced economic growth. One big problem that we face as we enter this economic slow-down is that our economy is seriously unbalanced, and consequently extremely vulnerable, because of an over-reliance since the beginning of the new century on three key drivers that have delivered between them effectively all of the net economic growth over the past few years. We have had rising public spending financed on the back of mounting fiscal deficits; a soaring housing market that has in turn underpinned a surge in borrowing and fuelled an unsustainable consumer spending boom, on the back of the £1.4 trillion of personal debt that has been piled up; and the dramatic growth of the financial services sector on the back of innovative new financial products.

The Prime Minister could see—and I suspect has been able to see for some time—that the party would have to come to an end. That is why he was so desperate to move next door at the earliest possible date. He will not have foreseen the scale of the credit crunch, leading to the collapse of mighty financial institutions and bringing the boom in financial services to a shuddering halt. But he will have well understood that the debt-fuelled spending boom of British consumers on the back of spiralling house prices had to come to an end. And he knew, too, that his "blank cheque" approach to public spending could not endure, as the current comprehensive spending review demonstrates, with a halving of the growth rate of public sector spending next year.

So Britain enters this period of economic slow-down uniquely vulnerable, with all of the principal drivers of economic growth slowing and the public finances in disarray. Last October, the Chancellor revised upwards his projection of how much he would need to borrow in the coming year to £36 billion, and last week he admitted that in the space of just five months, his estimate had risen by another £7 billion. Even that is almost certainly an underestimate. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe reminded us, for seven years the Government have predicted that the public finances would move into surplus two years hence. Every year, that two years is put off by another year, so like the carrot on the stick dangling in front of the donkey, it is always tantalisingly in the future.

When the Chancellor says that Britain is well prepared for tougher economic conditions ahead because inflation is low, our constituents will wonder what planet he lives on. Does he ever go into a supermarket or fill up a car with petrol? Does someone else write the cheques for his gas and electricity bills? Because in the real world that the rest of us inhabit, inflation is not low and stable; the cost of living is soaring. Bread is up 15 per cent. in a year, eggs 30 per cent., petrol 20 per cent., mortgage interest 12 per cent., butter 36 per cent., and gas and electricity up by double digits in the single month of February—and that is all before the Budget. Of course, the Government are not responsible for the world economic slow-down or the acceleration in global inflation. No one is claiming that they are, although they were quick enough to claim credit when benign world economic conditions delivered steady growth and low inflation powered by the expansion of far-eastern economies over the past decade.

The Chancellor's predecessor, the Prime Minister, is responsible for the woeful lack of preparedness of the British economy after a decade and a half of economic growth. He inherited a strong economy from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe, and his stewardship of it coincided with 10 years of sustained low-inflation world growth. Instead of leaving the economy lean and mean, the Prime Minister bequeathed the Chancellor nothing in the cupboard. There is no legacy from the 15 years of economic growth and nothing put by for the rainy day that threatens. The Prime Minister, as Chancellor, did not fix public services, close the skills gap or the productivity gap, or fix the welfare system.

If the backdrop to the Budget looked gloomy last Wednesday, it has darkened significantly over the past 72 hours. There are those outside who thought that the Chancellor's downgrade of his economic growth forecast looked optimistic last week. Today they will be thinking that it looks like dangerous complacency.

I want to put a specific proposal to the Chief Secretary. In normal times, the Treasury, rightly in our view, sticks to the mantra that it makes forecasts of economic growth and fiscal projections only twice a year, in the pre-Budget report and the Budget. Given the scale and speed of the events that are developing around us, and the size of the change in the Chancellor's estimate of the fiscal problem he faces, which he announced last Wednesday, will the Chief Secretary consult the Chancellor and see whether she can assure the House tonight that if the Treasury's internal modelling significantly downgrades his estimate of economic growth, or upgrades his expectation of public sector borrowing, between now and the PBR in November, he will make an interim statement to the House so that Parliament is not kept in the dark on those most crucial issues for the best part of nine months?

Let me turn to the measures in the Budget that the Chancellor delivered. Most have already been well-debated. I detected a familiar pattern. As in previous years, after the Chancellor sat down the facts caught up with the rhetoric and the Budget unravelled. As many of my hon. Friends pointed out, the new tax on gas-guzzling cars, which was painted as an environmental measure, turns out to be a tax increase on seven out of 10 cars on the road—just another burden on hard-pressed families. It is a stealth tax, not a green tax, and there is a bigger percentage increase in the tax on a Nissan Micra than in the tax on a six-litre Hummer.

The pre-Budget spin of a fiscal assault on binge drinking turned out not to be a precision weapon aimed at problem drinking but a carpet-bombing of ordinary moderate drinkers. The tax rises that we heard about, it seems, are permanent, yet the increase in the winter fuel payment is for one year only, echoing the one-year pre-election council tax bonus paid to pensioners in 2005. The education spending announcements came with no new money. The rhetorical commitment to extra money for our fighting troops in Iraq and Afghanistan turned out to be a mere accountant's note, transferring money that is already spent from the contingency reserve to the defence budget. The rest was a rehash of the Chancellor's predecessor's Budget announcement and the flotsam that survived the storm provoked by the PBR with a climbdown on non-dom tax, a U-turn on capital gains tax on business and a merciful postponement of the income shifting proposals. The only things that survived intact were the watered-down Conservative policies on inheritance tax and air passenger duty.

For 10 years, the Prime Minister has traded on a carefully cultivated reputation for having delivered economic stability that was actually the product of a benign world economy. But now that the world economy is slowing and inflationary pressure gathering, his chickens are coming home to roost. The public have spotted his squandering of the legacy that he inherited, and how he has wasted the window of opportunity presented by the decade of Chinese-fuelled, low-inflation world growth. Instead of preparing Britain for the future, as other countries have prepared themselves, instead of turning it into the lean, skilled, competitive and productive economy of his early rhetoric, the Prime Minister blew the lot, and some more.

Last Wednesday, we witnessed the miserable spectacle of the Prime Minister's successor as Chancellor being left to pick up the pieces as we enter this economic slow-down less prepared and fit, and more vulnerable, than almost any other country in the developed world. That is Labour's economic legacy for Britain. We are left steering into stormy economic waters, with a deficit that makes Italy look positively parsimonious and a Chancellor who has been forced to increase taxes when all his counterparts around the world are lowering theirs.

This is a bad Budget for Britain. It burdens millions of hard-pressed families and businesses just as the economy is slowing. It is a Budget that has been dictated not by economic logic but by fiscal necessity. The words and figures of the Red Book projections set out for all to see the economic incompetence of this Government and this Prime Minister in failing to prepare Britain for the challenges ahead.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Yvette Cooper): We have had a good debate, with generally thoughtful contributions from Members in all parties. I congratulate the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) on his speech, and I agree with the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond)—for possibly the only time—that it was probably the most entertaining one to be made today.

I listened carefully to the speech made by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan), who had much to complain about. I listened really hard, but I did not hear him put forward a single alternative policy, or even defend his party's tax plans. However, that may be because the hon. Gentleman—like me and, I suspect, like the shadow Chancellor—is struggling to keep up with what those plans are.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) made some substantive points, and I shall respond to them in due course. In his indomitable style, he lamented what he described as the "puritan" spirit that he said was pervading both public and media. Interestingly, he also called for an end to any pre-Budget consultation and said that measures should be announced and implemented straight away, with none of what I am sure he would call "fashionable" consultation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) made some important points about alcohol and fuel prices. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) and my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) also raised their concern about the impact of rising world energy prices on fuel bills. They welcomed this year's introduction of the additional winter fuel payments for pensioners, but they also made some important points about the energy companies.

In respect of the matters raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Selby, I can tell the House that we have made it clear that we expect energy companies to reduce the differential between prepayment meters and standard tariffs and that we will use Government powers if they do not do so. We also expect them to do more on the social tariff. It is worth about £50 million at the moment, but we believe that it should be closer to £150 million. In addition, I can tell my hon. Friend that, if necessary, we will legislate to underpin the tariff.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) articulated the importance of global markets, describing both the immense economic opportunities that they offer and the considerable risks that they can pose. He also made clear why it is so important that we work with countries across the world to get greater transparency about the risks involved in global markets so that we can respond to some of the challenges that we face.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) questioned the proposed efficiency savings. However, I can tell him that the Government have made £20 billion in savings already as a result of a previous comprehensive spending review, and that there have also been tangible net reductions of nearly 80,000 in the civil service work force. That has enabled resources to be redirected to improving services instead.

My right hon. Friends the Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) and for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) raised concerns about the impact of decisions in the City on the real economy. The hon. Members for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) and for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) merely complained about pretty much everything the Government have ever done. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform pointed out in response to their concerns, there has already been a significant increase in small and medium-sized enterprises since 1997 and the Budget sets out more help to support them in future.

Mr. Prisk: The Secretary of State could not answer my question, but perhaps the Chief Secretary can: if small businesses are so important to the Government, why are the Government increasing taxes on them by £1,000 million over the coming year? In a downturn, what is the economic logic for that?

Yvette Cooper: As Members are aware, we have set out long-term reductions in the tax burden through corporation tax. It is right that there should not be incentives for people to avoid tax and it is right, too, that we should support SMEs, for example through additional work in the public sector, through procurement. The consequences of our decisions are a big and significant increase in the number of SMEs, with a strong boost to enterprise as a result.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) pointed out in his contribution, businesses have moved to Wrexham, where the result has been economic growth. I pay tribute to him and his constituent, Mrs. Harrison, for their campaign on the child benefit disregard, which alone will help more than 150,000 children out of poverty as well as improving work incentives.

Mr. Jenkin: Can the right hon. Lady explain what effect abolition of the 10 per cent. tax rate will have on the households that pay it? If the rate goes up to 20 per cent. does it not amount to a very large tax increase indeed?

Yvette Cooper: As Members are aware, our changes to the personal tax package, which comes in this year, include reduction of the basic rate to its lowest for 75 years. In addition, we have introduced the national minimum wage, which has raised the wages of people on low incomes, and the tax credit system, which has provided important support. Four in 10 families make no net tax contributions at all as a result of the reforms we have made to help people out of poverty and to become better off.

[Yvette Cooper]

There is continued turbulence in the global financial markets. Banks are not lending to each other in the normal way and we have seen the consequences for one of the largest banks in the US. Every major country of the world expects repercussions as a result. As we predicted last week, the increase in world fuel prices is having an impact on domestic fuel bills and household inflation.

Alan Duncan: Can the Minister list any other countries whose response to the credit squeeze to which she has just referred has been to increase taxation?

Yvette Cooper: If the hon. Gentleman had read the Red Book properly he would understand that in fact we are putting money into the economy over the next 12 months, which is the right thing to do. Borrowing will increase over the next 12 months. We are delaying the introduction of fuel duty. We are putting more money into pensioners' pockets through the winter fuel payment, and in addition we are introducing the lowest rate of basic tax for 75 years.

I appreciate the fact that Opposition Members do not want to hear the truth, but we are putting more money into the economy, which is the right thing to do. We have to make sure that over the long term we bring the level of borrowing down in line with the fiscal rules we have set. We shall continue to take responsible decisions to support economic stability.

Faced with the challenges, the Chancellor set out a responsible Budget. We start in a stronger position than many other countries. Inflation is lower than in the euro area, lower than in the US and far lower than it was in the '80s or '90s. Employment is at a record high. Government debt has fallen since 1997, and borrowing is substantially lower than it was in the early '90s when it hit 7.8 per cent. of gross domestic product.

The Bank of England continues to support stability through its cuts in interest rates and through support for liquidity in the financial markets. We are working with the Bank, the Financial Services Authority, our international partners and the financial sector on ways to get the securitisation markets moving again and to help banks regain confidence in each other so that they begin lending again and get credit markets moving again.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Will the Chief Secretary to the Treasury explain to the House why, between 2005 and 2008—after eight years of the Prime Minister's chancellorship—the United Kingdom's contribution to the wider European Union position has been to make it considerably weaker, not stronger?

Yvette Cooper: What we have seen is the Labour party's strong commitment to working with our European partners. There have also been improvements in the long-term economic performance of the country. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe wanted to argue that Britain was somehow the worst placed country in the entire world to deal with the global economic challenges that face us, and as I have said, if he is drawing on his experience in government, one can understand why he came to that conclusion. Certainly, it is true that in the early 1980s and the early '90s Britain was first into recession and slow-down and last out, and had a far deeper recession than other countries across the world.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The right hon. Lady should follow the Chancellor and refer to the economy that the Government inherited, not the economy of the late '80s and early '90s. We had come out of the recession and were well poised for growth with low inflation when her party took over. I suggest to her that the opportunity should have been taken to put forward some credible, new fiscal rules for the future, to give realistic estimates for future borrowing and, because of the threat of the economy, to decide that this was not the time to raise corporation tax for small businesses. The whole Budget lacks imagination and any strategy at all for facing the present crisis, and makes misleading statements about the past.

Yvette Cooper: I noticed the right hon. and learned Gentleman trying very hard, in a slippery way, to sidestep and disown the events of the early '80s and early '90s, and trying to cling on to the events of the middle '90s, when he stoked up inflationary pressures, when corporation tax was substantially higher than it is today, and when the tax burden on businesses was higher as a result.

In the early '80s the world economy slowed, but Britain did not just slow—it shrank. That was the case in the early '90s, too. In the early '80s, inflation hit nearly 22 per cent., unemployment topped 11 per cent., and borrowing hit nearly 5 per cent. In the early '90s, inflation hit nearly 11 per cent., unemployment topped 10 per cent., and borrowing hit nearly 8 per cent. For the 10 years before 1997, we had the lowest gross domestic product per head in the G7. Eleven years on, we have seen continuous growth and the largest growth in income per head of any G7 country. We are no longer bottom of the league; instead, we had the second highest level of national income per head of any major economy last year.

Mr. MacNeil: The Prime Minister—the former Chancellor of the Exchequer—used to boast that he had put an end to boom and bust. Does the right hon. Lady agree that those words are hollow today, or does she actually believe that the Prime Minister put an end to boom and bust? Which is it?

Yvette Cooper: The fact is that as a result of decisions that we have taken we have had much greater stability over the past decade than we had previously. For example, when the dotcom bubble burst, and after the 9/11 attacks, world stock markets halved, but while the economies in the rest of the G7 shrank, the British economy continued to grow by over 2 per cent. We face serious global challenges and serious pressures in the financial markets. They will inevitably have an impact on the UK, just as they will on countries across the world, but we start off in a stronger condition than many of our European competitors and many countries across the world, in part because of decisions that were made on issues such as Bank of England independence, which the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe always opposed, and on investing in Britain's future.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con) rose—

Yvette Cooper: I will make progress.

The Budget sets out clear plans to help pensioners and families with children. Even at a time of global challenges, we are able to help the oldest and the youngest. The Budget raises revenue from alcohol duty; that is what makes it possible to help pensioners with their fuel bills this winter, and to help families with child benefit and the child tax credit the year after that. So this is the right time to use that revenue to help pensioners. The average price of a bottle of wine has fallen from the equivalent of nearly £4.50 in 1997 to nearer £4 today. Even after the duty increase, it will still be significantly cheaper than in 1997. So yes, we are giving pensioners an extra payment of £50 for all pensioners and £100 for the over-80s. In 2009 we will use the money to help child tax credit and those on low and middle incomes.

The question for the Opposition tonight is whether they will back that. Will they back the increase in alcohol duty to fund the payment to pensioners this winter? Will they back the increase in alcohol duty to fund the child benefit increase and the child tax credit the year after? Or will they once again turn their backs on pensioners and on families with children, as they did for so many years when they saw child poverty double and a big increase in the number of pensioners in poverty? Will they once again turn their backs on those who are youngest and those who are oldest across society? It is indicative that the one thing that the Opposition have proposed to cut to fund their plans is Sure Start—one of the programmes that makes the greatest difference to those in greatest need. That is what the Conservatives want to cut.

What, then, are the alternatives offered in tonight's debate? The hon. Member for Taunton set out what he thought was the Conservatives' policy. He said that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge was proposing tax cuts in seven years. He pointed out that we had fought and won a war in less time. The hon. Member for Taunton is doing better than the rest of us if he manages to keep track of the Conservatives' policies. They have said that they think borrowing is too high. They have also called for £10 billion of unfunded tax cuts that would push borrowing even higher.

This weekend the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge said that the Opposition would not cut taxes for an entire parliamentary term, yet just three days before, on Budget day, they called for massive tax cuts to come in next month. It is still there on the Conservative party's website. The shadow Chancellor calls on the Chancellor to bring in a massive series of unfunded tax cuts, including inheritance tax for millionaires in this year's Budget.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con) rose—

Yvette Cooper: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman if he can tell me what on earth his party's tax proposals are.

Mr. Harper: I want to ask the right hon. Lady a question about hers. Will she confirm that 5.3 million households—8,000 per constituency—will be worse off as a result of the increase in the basic rate of tax from 10 to 20 per cent.?

Yvette Cooper: I notice that the hon. Gentleman could not answer the question about his party's tax proposals. We have set out a series of changes from which people will be considerably better off than they were in 1997 as a result of this Government. Three days after calling for massive tax cuts next month, his party and its No. 2 were telling The Sunday Telegraph that they could not introduce tax cuts for another five, six or seven years. Then, just a day later,

"a source close to Mr Osborne" told the Daily Mail that

"cuts could come at any time"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We refer to hon. Members by their constituencies, not by their names.

Yvette Cooper: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. I was quoting from the Daily Mail, which did not use our parliamentary conventions.

Perhaps the Opposition's party leader could get a grip and set out the party's policies. In his speech on Saturday he said:

"we need to get used to saying 'no' more often than 'yes.' That is the discipline that government demands and that is the discipline that this Party has always understood."

But what else did he say at the same conference? He promised dedicated maternity nurses, scrapping the couple penalty, rewarding management and, because it was in the north-east, a new north-south rail link and the A1 western bypass. He does not know how to say no; he just keeps saying yes. Another day, another Tory policy; another interview, another economic promise. How can the Opposition support stability in the economy if they cannot even deliver stability in their own policies? Back the Budget and back stability in the economy.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

1. Amendment of the Law

(1) That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance.

(2) This Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting a supply, acquisition or importation,

(b) for refunding an amount of tax,

(c) for any relief, other than a relief that—

(i) so far as it is applicable to goods, applies to goods of every description, and

(ii) so far as it is applicable to services, applies to services of every description.

MR. SPEAKER then, pursuant to paragraph (3) of Standing Order No. 51 (Ways and means motions), put forthwith the Questions necessary to dispose of the further motions.

2. Income tax (charge and main rates for 2008-09)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Income tax is charged for the tax year 2008-09.

(2) For that tax year—

(a) the basic rate is 20%, and

(b) the higher rate is 40%.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

3. Income tax (personal allowances for those aged 65 or over)

Resolved,

That—

(1) For the tax year 2008-09—

(a) the amount specified in section 36(1) of the Income Tax Act 2007 and section 257(2) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 (personal allowance for those aged 65 to 74) is replaced with "£9,030", and

(b) the amount specified in section 37(1) of the Income Tax Act 2007 and section 257(3) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 (personal allowance for those aged 75 and over) is replaced with "£9,180".

(2) Accordingly—

(a) section 57 of the Income Tax Act 2007 (indexation), so far as relating to the amounts specified in sections 36(1) and 37(1) of that Act, and

(b) section 257C of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, so far as relating to the amounts specified in section 257(2) and (3) of that Act, (indexation) do not apply for the tax year 2008-09.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

4. Income tax (abolition of starting rate)

Motion made, and Question put,

That—

(1) In section 6 of the Income Tax Act 2007 (rates at which income tax is charged)—

(a) in subsection (1), omit paragraph (a), and

(b) in subsection (2), omit "starting rate,", and accordingly, in the title, omit "starting rate,".

(2) In section 10 of that Act (income charged at main rates: individuals)—

(a) omit subsection (1),

(b) for subsection (2) substitute—

" (2) Income tax on an individual's income up to the basic rate limit is charged at the basic rate (except to the extent that, in accordance with section 12, it is charged at the starting rate for savings).",

(c) in subsection (4), omit the entry relating to section 12, and

(d) for subsection (5) substitute—

" (5) The basic rate limit is £36,000.

(6) The basic rate limit is increased in some circumstances: see—

(a) section 414(2) (gift aid relief), and

(b) section 192(4) of FA 2004 (relief for pension contributions).", and accordingly, in the title, omit "starting,".

(3) Omit section 20 (starting rate limit and basic rate limit).

(4) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect for the tax year 2008-09 and subsequent tax years.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

Question accordingly agreed to.

9. Rates of tobacco products duty

Resolved,

That—

(1) For the table in Schedule 1 to the Tobacco Products Duty Act 1979 substitute—

"Table

1. Cigarettes	An amount equal to 22 per cent of the retail price plus £112.07 per thousand cigarettes
2. Cigars	£163.22 per kilogram
3. Hand-rolling tobacco	£117.32 per kilogram
4. Other smoking tobacco and chewing tobacco	£71.76 per kilogram"

(2) The amendment made by this Resolution comes into force at 6 p.m. on 12 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

10. Fuel duty rates and rebates (simplification)

Resolved,

That—

(1) The Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979 is amended as follows.

(2) In section 6 (hydrocarbon oil: rates of duty), for subsection (1A) substitute—

" (1A) The rates are—

(a) £0.5035 a litre in the case of unleaded petrol,

(b) £0.6007 a litre in the case of light oil other than unleaded petrol, and

(c) £0.5035 a litre in the case of heavy oil."

(3) In section 6AB(5) (duty on bioblend), omit the words from "of the description" to the end.

(4) In section 11(1) (rebate on heavy oil)—

(a) in paragraph (b), omit "which is not ultra low sulphur diesel", and

(b) omit paragraph (ba).

(5) In section 13AA(6) (restrictions on use of rebated kerosene), omit "which is not ultra low sulphur diesel or sulphur-free diesel".

(6) Omit section 13A (rebate on unleaded petrol).

(7) In section 20AAA(4)(a) (mixing of rebated oil), for "section 6(1A)(d)" substitute "section 6A(1A)(c)".

(8) In Article 21(7) of the Renewable Transport Fuel Obligations Order 2007, for "sulphur-free petrol" substitute "unleaded petrol".

(9) The amendments made by this Resolution come into force on 1 April 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

11. Fuel duty (biodiesel and bioblend)

Resolved,

That—

(1) The Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979 is amended as follows.

(2) Section 1 (hydrocarbon oil) is amended as follows.

(3) In subsection (1), for "Subsections (2) to (7) below" substitute "The following provisions".

(4) After subsection (7) insert—

" (8) "Kerosene" means heavy oil of which more than 50% by volume distils at a temperature of 240°C or less."

(5) Section 2A (power to amend definitions) is amended as follows.

(6) In subsection (1), for paragraphs (a) to (e) substitute—

" (a) biodiesel;

(b) bioethanol;

(c) unleaded petrol."

(7) Omit subsections (1A) and (1B).

(8) In section 6AA (excise duty on biodiesel), after subsection (3) insert—

" (4) See section 14A (biodiesel used other than as fuel for road vehicles) for rebates on duty charged under this section."

(9) In section 6AB (excise duty on bioblend), for subsections (3) and (4) substitute—

" (3) The rate per litre of duty under this section on any bioblend is the sum of—

(a) HO% of the rate per litre of duty under section 6 in the case of heavy oil, and

(b) BD% of the rate per litre of duty under section 6AA.

(4) In subsection (3)—

"HO%" means the percentage of the bioblend that is heavy oil, and

"BD%" means the percentage of the bioblend that is biodiesel, where the percentages are by volume to the nearest 0.001%.

(4A) See section 14B (bioblend used other than as fuel for road vehicles) for rebates on duty charged under this section."

(10) In section 8 (excise duty on road fuel gas)—

(a) in subsection (2), for "in" substitute "for", and

(b) omit subsection (6).

(11) In section 10 (restrictions on use of duty-free oil), omit subsection (8).

(12) In section 12 (rebate not allowed on fuel for road vehicles), omit subsection (3).

(13) In section 13 (penalties for misuse of rebated heavy oil), omit subsection (7).

(14) In section 13AA (restrictions on use of rebated kerosene), omit subsection (5).

(15) In section 13AB (penalties for misuse of kerosene), omit subsections (3) and (4).

(16) In section 14 (rebate on light oil for use as furnace fuel), omit subsection (9).

(17) After that section insert—

"14A Rebate on biodiesel used other than as fuel for road vehicles

(1) This section applies if, at the excise duty point, it is intended that biodiesel on which duty under section 6AA is charged will not be—

(a) used as fuel for a road vehicle, or

(b) used as an additive or extender in any substance so used.

(2) A rebate of duty is to be allowed on the biodiesel at a rate of £0.0969 a litre less than the rate of duty under section 6AA.

(3) In this section "the excise duty point" has the same meaning as in section 1 of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1992.

14B Rebate on bioblend used other than as fuel for road vehicles

(1) This section applies if, on the delivery for home use of bioblend on which duty under section 6AB is charged—

(a) it is intended that the bioblend will not be—

(i) used as fuel for a road vehicle, or

(ii) used as an additive or extender in any substance so used, and

(b) if the heavy oil used to produce the bioblend was kerosene, it is intended that the bioblend will not be—

(i) used as fuel for an engine within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 13AA(1), or

(ii) used as an additive or extender in any substance so used.

(2) A rebate of duty is to be allowed on the bioblend.

(3) The rate per litre of the rebate is the sum of—

(a) HO% of the relevant hydrocarbon rebate rate, and

(b) BD% of the relevant biodiesel rebate rate.

(4) "The relevant hydrocarbon rebate rate" is the rate specified in section 11(1) for the kind of heavy oil used to produce the bioblend.

(5) "The relevant biodiesel rebate rate" is—

(a) if the heavy oil used to produce the bioblend was kerosene, the rate of duty under section 6AA, and

(b) otherwise, the rate of the rebate under section 14A.

(6) Section 6AB(4) (meaning of "HO%" and "BD%") applies for the purposes of subsection (3).

14C Restrictions on use of rebated biodiesel and bioblend

(1) Rebated biodiesel or bioblend must not be—

(a) used as fuel for a road vehicle,

(b) used as an additive or extender in any substance so used, or

(c) taken into a road vehicle as fuel or as an additive or extender in any substance used as fuel.

(2) Rebated bioblend that was produced by mixing kerosene and biodiesel must not be—

(a) used as fuel for an engine within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 13AA(1),

(b) used as an additive or extender in any substance so used, or

(c) taken into the fuel supply of such an engine.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply to a quantity of biodiesel or bioblend if the amount specified in subsection (4) has been paid to the Commissioners, in accordance with regulations, in respect of it.

(4) The amount is—

$$Q \times R$$

where—

Q is the quantity (in litres) of the biodiesel or bioblend, and

R is the rate of the rebate under section 14A or 14B at the time of payment.

(5) In subsection (3) "regulations" means regulations under section 24(1) made for the purposes of this section.

14D Penalties for misuse of rebated biodiesel or bioblend

(1) If biodiesel or bioblend is used or taken into a road vehicle in contravention of section 14C(1) or (2), the Commissioners may assess the amount specified in section 14C(4) as being excise duty due from any person who—

(a) used the biodiesel or bioblend, or

(b) was liable for it being taken into the vehicle, and may notify the person or the person's representative accordingly.

(2) Conduct within any of the following paragraphs attracts a penalty under section 9 of the Finance Act 1994 (civil penalties)—

(a) using biodiesel or bioblend in contravention of section 14C(1) or (2),

(b) becoming liable for biodiesel or bioblend being taken into a vehicle or the fuel supply of an engine in contravention of section 14C(1) or (2), and

(c) supplying biodiesel or bioblend, intending that it will be put to a particular use that is a prohibited use.

(3) A person commits an offence if—

(a) the person intentionally uses biodiesel or bioblend in contravention of section 14C(1) or (2),

(b) the person is liable for biodiesel or bioblend being taken into a vehicle or the fuel supply of an engine in contravention of section 14C(1) or (2), and knows that the taking in is in contravention of that provision, or

(c) the person supplies biodiesel or bioblend, intending that it will be put to a particular use that is a prohibited use.

(4) "Prohibited use" means a use that would contravene section 14C(1) or (2) if no payment under section 14C(3) were made in respect of the biodiesel or bioblend.

(5) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to—

(i) a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or (if it is greater) 3 times the value of the biodiesel or bioblend in question, or

(ii) imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or both, and

(b) on conviction on indictment, to a fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 7 years or both.

(6) Subsection (5)(a)(ii) has effect as if the reference there to 12 months were to 6 months—

(a) in this section as it extends to England and Wales, in relation to offences committed before the commencement of section 282 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 (increase in maximum term that may be imposed on summary conviction of offence triable either way), and

(b) in this section as it extends to Northern Ireland."

(18) Omit section 17A (repayment of part of duty where biodiesel used otherwise than as road fuel).

(19) Section 20A (mixing: adjustment of duty) is amended as follows.

(20) For subsections (1) to (4) substitute—

" (1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply if—

(a) a relevant substance upon which duty under this Act has been charged is mixed in a pipe-line with another kind of relevant substance upon which such duty has been charged, and

(b) the mixing is approved mixing (see subsection (5)).

(2) If the Commissioners are of the opinion that—

(a) the amount of duty that would be charged on the mixture (if duty were charged at the time of mixing), is greater than

(b) the total amount of duty charged as mentioned in subsection (1)(a),

they may charge under this section a duty of excise on the mixture of an amount equal to the difference.

(3) If the Commissioners are of the opinion that the amount mentioned in subsection (2)(a) is less than the amount mentioned in subsection (2)(b), they may make under this section an allowance of an amount equal to the difference.

(4) Where a charge or allowance is made under this section, any relief or rebate which was permitted or allowed in respect of the charges mentioned in subsection (1)(a) is for the purposes of this Act to be disregarded.

(4A) In this section "relevant substance" means biodiesel, bioethanol, bioblend, bioethanol blend or hydrocarbon oil.

(4B) The cases that fall within subsection (1)(a) include cases where one kind of hydrocarbon oil is mixed with another kind of hydrocarbon oil."

(21) In subsection (5)(a), for the words from "in" to "only)" substitute "relevant substances (or specified kinds of relevant substances) in a pipe-line".

(22) Section 20AAA (mixing of rebated oil) is amended as follows.

(23) Omit subsections (3) and (5).

(24) In subsection (9), for ", (2)(a) or (3)" substitute "or (2)(a)".

(25) In section 20AA(1) (power to allow reliefs), after "12(2)" (in both places) insert "or 14C(3)".

(26) Before section 21 (but after the heading "Administration and enforcement") insert—

"20AC Determination by Commissioners of composition of substance

(1) The Commissioners may, for any prescribed purpose, determine in such way as they consider appropriate the proportion of any substance that is biodiesel or bioethanol.

(2) In subsection (1) "prescribed purpose" means a purpose, prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioners, that relates to any duty under this Act."

(27) In section 23 (prohibition on use etc of road fuel gas on which duty has not been paid), omit subsection (2).

(28) Section 24 (control of duty-free and rebated oil) is amended as follows.

(29) In subsection (1), for the words from "section 11," to "section 14(1)," substitute "any of sections 11 to 14C,".

(30) In subsection (2)—

(a) for the words from the beginning to "above" substitute "The regulations", and

(b) for the words from "subsection (2)" to the end substitute "section 12(2), 13AA(3) or 14C(3) are to be effective for the purposes of those provisions."

(31) In subsection (3)—

(a) after "hydrocarbon oil" insert ", biodiesel or bioblend", and

(b) in paragraph (b), for "or rebated light oil" substitute ", rebated light oil, rebated biodiesel or rebated bioblend".

(32) In subsection (4A)(a), after "oil" insert ", biodiesel or bioblend".

(33) In subsection (5), after "oil" insert ", biodiesel or bioblend".

(34) In section 24A (penalties for misuse of marked oil), omit subsection (4).

(35) Section 27 (interpretation) is amended as follows.

(36) In subsection (1)—

(a) in the definition of "controlled oil", after "13AA" insert "or biodiesel or bioblend in respect of which a rebate has been allowed under section 14A or 14B",

(b) after that definition insert—

""excepted vehicle" means a vehicle that is an excepted vehicle within the meaning of Schedule 1;",

(c) after the definition of "hydrocarbon oil" insert—

""kerosene" has the meaning given by section 1(8);",

(d) in the definition of "rebate", after "14" insert ", 14A, 14B", and

(e) in the definition of "road vehicle", for the words from "venicle which" to the end substitute "excepted vehicle;".

(37) After that subsection insert—

" (1ZA) For the purposes of this Act, a substance is used as fuel for a vehicle if (and only if) it is used as fuel for—

(a) the engine provided for propelling the vehicle, or

(b) an engine which draws fuel from the same supply as that engine.

(1ZB) For those purposes, a substance is taken into a vehicle as fuel, or as an additive or extender in any fuel, if (and only if) it is taken into the vehicle as part of the supply from which the engine provided for propelling the vehicle draws fuel.

(1ZC) For those purposes, the following persons are liable for a substance being taken into a vehicle or into the fuel supply of an engine—

(a) the person who has charge of the vehicle or engine at the time the substance is taken in, and

(b) the owner of the vehicle or engine at that time (or, if another person is entitled to possession of it at that time, that other person).

(1ZD) Subsection (1ZC) applies in relation to appliances and storage tanks as it applies in relation to vehicles."

(38) In Schedule 4 (regulations under section 24), in paragraph 22 (interpretation), omit the words from "and section 12(3)(a)" to the end.

(39) In Schedule 5 (sampling), in paragraph 3(1), omit "of oil".

(40) The amendments made by this Resolution come into force—

(a) so far as they confer a power to make regulations, on 19 March 2008, and

(b) for all other purposes, on 1 April 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

12. Fuel duty (other provision)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979.

13. Rates of vehicle excise duty

Motion made, and Question put,

That—

(1) Schedule 1 to the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994 (annual rates of duty) is amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph 1 (general)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (2) (vehicle not covered elsewhere in Schedule otherwise than with engine cylinder capacity not exceeding 1,549cc), for "£180" substitute "£185", and

(b) in sub-paragraph (2A) (vehicle not covered elsewhere in Schedule with engine cylinder capacity not exceeding 1,549cc), for "£115" substitute "£120".

(3) In paragraph 1B (graduated rates for light passenger vehicles), for the table substitute—

"Table

CO_2 emissions figure		Rate
(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)
Exceeding g/km	Not exceeding g/km	Reduced rate £	Standard rate £
100	120	15	35
120	150	100	120
150	165	125	145
165	185	150	170
185	225	195	210
225	—	385	400

The table has effect in relation to vehicles first registered before 23 March 2006 as if—

(a) in column (3), in the last row, "195" were substituted for "385", and

(b) in column (4), in the last row, "210" were substituted for "400"."

(4) In paragraph 1J (light goods vehicles)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (a) (vehicle which is not lower-emission van), for "£175" substitute "£180", and

(b) in sub-paragraph (b) (lower-emission van), for "£115" substitute "£120".

(5) In paragraph 2(1) (motorcycles)—

(a) in paragraph (b) (motorbicycle and engine's cylinder capacity more than 150cc but not more than 400cc), for "£32" substitute "£33",

(b) in paragraph (c) (motorbicycle and engine's cylinder capacity more than 400cc but not more than 600cc), for "£47" substitute "£48", and

(c) in paragraph (d) (any other case), for "£64" substitute "£66".

(6) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect in relation to licences taken out on or after 13 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

42. Stamp duty land tax (notification and registration of transactions)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003 (stamp duty land tax) is amended as follows.

(2) For section 77 substitute—

" 77 Notifiable transactions

(1) A land transaction is notifiable if it is—

(a) an acquisition of a major interest in land that does not fall within one or more of the exceptions in section 77A,

(b) an acquisition of a chargeable interest other than a major interest in land where there is chargeable consideration in respect of which tax is chargeable at a rate of 1% or higher or would be so chargeable but for a relief,

(c) a land transaction that a person is treated as entering into by virtue of section 44A(3), or

(d) a notional land transaction under section 75A.

(2) This section has effect subject to—

(a) sections 71A(7) and 72A(7), and

(b) paragraph 30 of Schedule 15.

(3) In this section "relief" does not include an exemption from charge under Schedule 3.

77A Exceptions for certain acquisitions of major interests in land

(1) The exceptions referred to in section 77(1)(a) are as follows.

1. An acquisition which is exempt from charge under Schedule 3.
2. An acquisition (other than the grant, assignment or surrender of a lease) where the chargeable consideration for that acquisition, together with the chargeable consideration for any linked transactions, is less than £40,000.
3. The grant of a lease for a term of 7 years or more where any chargeable consideration other than rent is (a) less than £40,000, and the relevant (b) rent is less than £1,000.
4. The assignment or surrender of a lease where the lease was (a) originally granted for a term of 7 years or more,
   (b) the chargeable consideration for the assignment or surrender, other than any rent, is less than £40,000, and
   (c) the relevant rent is less than £1,000.
5. The grant of a lease for a term of less than 7 years where the chargeable consideration does not exceed the zero rate threshold.
6. The assignment or surrender of a lease where
   (a) the lease was originally granted for a term of less than 7 years, and
   (b) the chargeable consideration does not exceed the zero rate threshold.

(2) Chargeable consideration for an acquisition does not exceed the zero rate threshold if it does not consist of or include—

(a) any amount in respect of which tax is chargeable at a rate of 1% or higher, or

(b) any amount in respect of which tax would be so chargeable but for a relief.

(3) In this section—

"annual rent" has the meaning given in paragraph 9A of Schedule 5,

"relevant rent" means—

(a) the annual rent, or

(b) in the case of the grant of a lease to which paragraph 11 or 19 of Schedule 15 applies, the relevant chargeable proportion of the annual rent (as calculated in accordance with that paragraph), and

"relief" does not include an exemption from charge under Schedule 3."

(3) In section 79(2) (registration of land transactions), after "every" insert "notifiable".

(4) In section 122 (index of defined expressions), in the definition of "notifiable (in relation to a land transaction)" after "72A(7)" insert "and paragraph 30 of Schedule 15".

(5) In Part 4 of Schedule 6 (SDLT: disadvantaged areas relief), in paragraph 13, for "section 77 (which specifies" substitute "sections 77 and 77A (which specify".

(6) In Schedule 17A (SDLT: further provisions relating to leases), in paragraphs 3(2) and (5) and 4(1) and (4A), for "section 77" substitute "sections 77 and 77A".

(7) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect in relation to transactions with an effective date on or after 12 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

43. Stamp duty land tax (charge where consideration includes rent)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 2003 (amount of SDLT chargeable: rent) is amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph 9 (SDLT chargeable in respect of consideration other than rent)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1), insert at the end "(but see paragraph 9A)", and

(b) omit sub-paragraphs (2), (2A) and (3), and accordingly, in the heading before that paragraph, insert at the end ": general".

(3) After that paragraph insert—

"Tax chargeable in respect of consideration other than rent: 0% band

(1) 9A This paragraph applies in the case of a transaction to which this Schedule applies where there is chargeable consideration other than rent.

(2) If—

(a) the relevant land consists entirely of land that is non-residential property, and

(b) the relevant rent is at least £1,000, the 0% band in Table B in section 55(2) does not apply in relation to the consideration other than rent and any case that would have fallen within that band is treated as falling within the 1% band.

(3) Sub-paragraphs (4) and (5) apply if—

(a) the relevant land is partly residential property and partly non-residential property, and

(b) the relevant rent attributable, on a just and reasonable apportionment, to the land that is non-residential property is at least £1,000.

(4) For the purpose of determining the amount of tax chargeable under section 55 in relation to the consideration other than rent, the transaction (or, where it is one of a number of linked transactions, that set of transactions) is treated as if it were two separate transactions (or sets of linked transactions), namely—

(a) one whose subject-matter consists of all of the interests in land that is residential property, and

(b) one whose subject-matter consists of all of the interests in land that is non-residential property.

(5) For that purpose, the chargeable consideration attributable to each of those separate transactions (or sets of linked transactions) is the chargeable consideration so attributable on a just and reasonable apportionment.

(6) In this paragraph, "the relevant rent" means—

(a) the annual rent in relation to the transaction in question, or

(b) if that transaction is one of a number of linked transactions for which the chargeable consideration consists of or includes rent, the total of the annual rents in relation to all of those transactions.

(7) In sub-paragraph (6), the "annual rent" means the average annual rent over the term of the lease or, if—

(a) different amounts of rent are payable for different parts of the term, and

(b) those amounts (or any of them) are ascertainable at the effective date of the transaction, the average annual rent over the period for which the highest ascertainable rent is payable.

(8) In this paragraph, "relevant land" has the meaning given in section 55(3) and (4)."

(4) Each of the following provisions of Schedule 6 to that Act (SDLT: disadvantaged areas relief) is amended in accordance with paragraph (5) of this Resolution—

(a) paragraph 5(4) (residential land wholly situated in disadvantaged area),

(b) paragraph 6(6) (mixed land wholly situated in disadvantaged area),

(c) paragraph 9(4) (residential land partly situated in disadvantaged area), and

(d) paragraph 10(6) (mixed land wholly partly situated in disadvantaged area).

(5) In those provisions—

(a) in paragraph (a), omit sub-paragraph (i) (and the "and" after it), and

(b) omit paragraph (b).

(6) In paragraph 12 of that Schedule (rent and annual rent) for "9(2)" substitute "9A".

(7) In Schedule 8 to that Act (SDLT: charities relief) in paragraph 3—

(a) in sub-paragraph (3)(b), for "does not exceed £600" substitute "is less than £1,000", and

(b) in sub-paragraph (5), for "9(2)" substitute "9A".

(8) In Schedule 15 to that Act (SDLT: partnerships)—

(a) in paragraph 11(2B)(a), for "9(2A)" substitute "9A(6)",

(b) in paragraph 19(2B), for "9(2A)" substitute "9A(6)", and

(c) in paragraph 23(3)(c), for "9(2)" substitute "9A".

(9) In Schedule 17A to that Act (SDLT: further provisions relating to leases) in paragraph 18A(5)(a)—

(a) for "9(2)" substitute "9A",

(b) for "the Tables" substitute "Table B", and

(c) for "the relevant rental figure exceeds £600" substitute "the relevant rent attributable to non-residential property is not less than £1,000".

(10) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect in relation to transactions with an effective date on or after 12 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

44. Stamp duty land tax (withdrawal of group relief)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Part 1 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 2003 (group relief) is amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph 3(5), for "paragraph 4" substitute "paragraphs 4 and 4ZA".

(3) In paragraph 4 (cases in which group relief not withdrawn)—

(a) omit sub-paragraphs (2) and (3), and

(b) in sub-paragraph (5), for "sub-paragraphs (3) and (4)" substitute "sub-paragraph (4)".

(4) After that paragraph insert—

"Group relief not withdrawn where vendor leaves group

(1) 4ZA Group relief is not withdrawn under paragraph 3 where the purchaser ceases to be a member of the same group as the vendor because the vendor leaves the group.

(2) The vendor is regarded as leaving the group if the companies cease to be members of the same group by reason of a transaction relating to shares in—

(a) the vendor, or

(b) another company that—

(i) is above the vendor in the group structure, and

(ii) as a result of the transaction ceases to be a member of the same group as the purchaser.

(3) For the purpose of sub-paragraph (2) a company is "above" the vendor in the group structure if the vendor, or another company that is above the vendor in the group structure, is a 75% subsidiary of the company.

(4) But if there is a change in the control of the purchaser after the vendor leaves the group, paragraphs 3, 4(6) and (7), 5 and 6 have effect as if the purchaser had then ceased to be a member of the same group as the vendor.

(5) For the purposes of this paragraph there is a change in the control of the purchaser if—

(a) a person who controls the purchaser (alone or with others) ceases to do so,

(b) a person obtains control of the purchaser (alone or with others), or

(c) the purchaser is wound up.

(6) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (5) a person does not control, or obtain control of, the purchaser if that person is under the control of another person or other persons.

(7) In this paragraph references to "control" shall be interpreted in accordance with section 416 of the Taxes Act 1988 (subject to sub-paragraph (6)).

(5) In paragraph 4A(1) (withdrawal of group relief in certain cases involving successive transactions), in the words following paragraph (d), for "and 4" substitute ", 4 and 4ZA".

(6) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect—

(a) in relation to transactions with an effective date on or after 13 March 2008, and

(b) (subject to paragraph (7)) in relation to transactions with an effective date before that day if, on or after that day, there is a change in the control of the purchaser (within the meaning of paragraph 4ZA(5) of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 2003, inserted by this Resolution).

(7) The amendments made by this Resolution do not have effect by virtue of paragraph (6)(b) where the change of control takes place in pursuance of a contract entered into before 13 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

45. Stamp duty (exemption from ad valorem duty for low value transactions)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning with 19 March 2008 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) Paragraph 1 of Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1999 (charge to stamp duty on conveyance or transfer on sale) is amended as follows.

(2) In sub-paragraph (3), for "(4)" substitute "(3A)".

(3) After that sub-paragraph insert—

" (3A) Stamp duty is not chargeable under sub-paragraph (1) on a transfer of stock or marketable securities where—

(a) the amount or value of the consideration for the sale is £1,000 or under, and

(b) the instrument is certified at £1,000."

(4) In paragraph 6(1) of that Schedule (meaning of instrument being certified at an amount), for "paragraph" substitute "paragraphs 1(3A) and".

(5) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect in relation to instruments executed on or after 13 March 2008 and not stamped before 19 March 2008.

(6) For the purposes of section 14(4) of the Stamp Act 1891 (instruments not to be given in evidence etc unless stamped in accordance with the law in force at the time of first execution), the law in force at the time of execution of an instrument—

(a) executed on or after 13 March 2008 but before 19 March 2008, and shall be deemed to be the law as varied in accordance with this Resolution.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

Stamp duty (abolition of fixed 46. duty on certain instruments)

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning with 19 March 2008 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) In section 129(1) of the Finance Act 1982 (exemption from duty on grants, transfers to charities etc), omit ", or paragraph 16,".

(2) Part 3 of the Finance Act 1985 (stamp duty) is amended as follows.

(3) In section 83 (transfers in connection with divorce, dissolution of civil partnership, etc), omit subsection (2) (fixed duty).

(4) In section 84 (death: varying dispositions and appropriations)—

(a) omit subsections (8) and (9) (fixed duty and adjudication), and

(b) in subsection (11) (commencement), omit from "and," to "subsection (8) above".

(5) Part 3 of the Finance Act 1986 (stamp duty) is amended as follows.

(6) In section 66 (company's purchase of own shares), omit subsection (2A) (fixed duty).

(7) In section 67 (stamp duty on certain transfers to depositary receipt systems)—

(a) in subsection (1), after "instrument" insert "(other than a bearer instrument)",

(b) in subsection (3), for the words from the beginning to "then," substitute "In any other case—

(a) stamp duty is chargeable on the instrument under this subsection, and

(b) ",

(c) in subsection (9) (transfer of securities between depositary receipt systems), for "the stamp duty chargeable on the instrument is £5" substitute "stamp duty is not chargeable on the instrument", and

(d) after subsection (9) insert—

" (9A) In this section "bearer instrument" has the meaning given in paragraph 3 of Schedule 15 to the Finance Act 1999."

(8) In section 70 (stamp duty on certain transfers to a clearance system)—

(a) in subsection (1), after "instrument" insert "(other than a bearer instrument)",

(b) in subsection (3), for the words from the beginning to "then," substitute "In any other case—

(a) stamp duty is chargeable on the instrument under this subsection, and

(b) ",

(c) in subsection (9) (transfer of securities between clearance systems), for "the stamp duty chargeable on the instrument is £5" substitute "stamp duty is not chargeable on the instrument", and

(d) after subsection (9) insert—

" (9A) In this section "bearer instrument" has the meaning given in paragraph 3 of Schedule 15 to the Finance Act 1999."

(9) In section 72A(1) (transfer of securities between depositary receipt system and clearance system), for paragraph (b) substitute—

" (b) stamp duty is not chargeable on the instrument."

(10) In Part 3 of the Finance Act 1987 (stamp duty and stamp duty reserve tax)—

(a) in section 50(1) (warrants to purchase Government stock, etc), omit ", or paragraph 16", and

(b) in section 55(1) (Crown exemption), omit ", or paragraph 16".

(11) Schedule 13 to the Finance Act 1999 (instruments chargeable to stamp duty and rates of duty) is amended as follows.

(12) In paragraph 1(5) (treasury shares), for the words from "any instrument" to the end substitute "sub-paragraph (1) does not apply to any instrument to which sub-paragraph (6) applies."

(13) In Part 3 (other instruments chargeable to stamp duty and rates of duty) omit—

(a) paragraph 16 (fixed duty on transfer otherwise than on sale) and the heading before it,

(b) paragraph 17 (fixed duty on declaration of use or trust) and the heading before it,

(c) paragraph 18(2) (fixed duty on disposition of certain property in Scotland),

(d) paragraph 19(1) (fixed duty on duplicate or counterpart),

(e) paragraph 21(3) (fixed duty on partition or division),

(f) paragraph 22 (fixed duty on release or renunciation) and the heading before it, and

(g) paragraph 23 (fixed duty on surrender) and the heading before it.

(14) Schedule 15 to the Finance Act 1999 (stamp duty: bearer instruments) is amended as follows.

(15) Omit paragraph 6 (fixed duty on instrument given in substitution for a like instrument stamped ad valorem).

(16) At the beginning of Part 2 (exemptions) insert—

"Substitute instruments

12A (1) Stamp duty is not chargeable on a substitute instrument.

(2) A substitute instrument is a bearer instrument given in substitution for a like instrument stamped ad valorem (whether under this Schedule or otherwise) ("the original instrument").

(3) The substitute instrument shall not be treated as duly stamped unless it appears by some stamp impressed on it that the full and proper duty has been paid on the original instrument."

(17) In paragraph 20 (variation of original terms or conditions), for paragraph (b) substitute—

" (b) has been stamped in accordance with paragraph 12A, or".

(18) In paragraph 26 (instruments treated as duly stamped), omit paragraph (b) (and the "or" before it).

(19) Paragraphs (1) to (4), (10)(b) and (11) to (13) do not have effect in relation to an instrument effecting a land transaction or a duplicate or counterpart of such an instrument.

(20) In paragraph (19) "land transaction" has the same meaning as in Part 4 of the Finance Act 2003, except that it does not include a transfer of an interest in a property-investment partnership (within the meaning of Schedule 15 of that Act).

(21) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect in relation to instruments executed on or after 13 March 2008 and not stamped before 19 March 2008.

(22) For the purposes of section 14(4) of the Stamp Act 1891 (instruments not to be given in evidence etc unless stamped in accordance with the law in force at the time of first execution), the law in force at the time of execution of an instrument—

(a) executed on or after 13 March 2008 but before 19 March 2008, and

(b) not stamped before 19 March 2008,

shall be deemed to be the law as varied in accordance with this Resolution.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

47. Expenses of management of investment business (oil extraction etc)

Resolved,

That provision may be made about deduction of expenses of management of investment business from profits arising from oil extraction activities and oil rights.

48. Value added tax (time limits for assessments of excess credits etc)

Resolved,

That—

(1) In section 73 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 (assessment of overpaid VAT credits etc), after subsection (6) insert—

" (6A) In the case of an assessment under subsection (2), the prescribed accounting period referred to in subsection (6)(a) and in section 77(1)(a) is the prescribed accounting period in which the repayment or refund of VAT, or the VAT credit, was paid or credited."

(2) Section 80 of that Act (credit for, or repayment of, overstated or overpaid VAT) is amended as follows.

(3) After subsection (4A) insert—

" (4AA) An assessment under subsection (4A) shall not be made more than 2 years after the later of—

(a) the end of the prescribed accounting period in which the amount was credited to the person, and

(b) the time when evidence of facts sufficient in the opinion of the Commissioners to justify the making of the assessment comes to the knowledge of the Commissioners."

(4) In subsection (4C), for "(2)" substitute "(3)".

(5) The amendments made by this Resolution come into force on 19 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

49. Value added tax (time limits for old claims)

Resolved,

That—

(1) The requirement in section 80(4) of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 that a claim under that section be made within 3 years of the relevant date does not apply to a claim in respect of an amount brought into account, or paid, for a prescribed accounting period ending before 4 December 1996 if the claim is made before 1 April 2009.

(2) The requirement in section 25(6) of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 that a claim for deduction of input tax be made at such time as may be determined by or under regulations does not apply to a claim for deduction of input tax that became chargeable, and in respect of which the claimant held the required evidence, in a prescribed accounting period ending before 1 May 1997 if the claim is made before 1 April 2009.

(3) In this Resolution—

"input tax" and "prescribed accounting period" have the same meaning as in the Value Added Tax Act 1994 (see section 96 of that Act), and

"the required evidence" means the evidence of the charge to value added tax specified in or under regulation 29(2) of the Value Added Tax Regulations 1995.

(4) This Resolution has effect on and after 19 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

50. Inheritance tax (interests in possession)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending section 53 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984.

51. Vehicle excise duty (rebates)

Resolved,

That provision may be made about rebates of vehicle excise duty.

52. Climate change levy (coal mine methane)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for coal mine methane to cease to be regarded as a renewable source for the purposes of climate change levy.

53. Landfill tax credit (withdrawing approval of environmental bodies)

Resolved,

That—

(1) Part 3 of the Finance Act 1996 (landfill tax) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 53(4)(d) (withdrawal of approval of environmental body or regulatory body), for "approval of an environmental body or the regulatory body to be withdrawn" substitute "the withdrawal of approval of an environmental body by the Commissioners or by the regulatory body, and the withdrawal of approval of the regulatory body by the Commissioners,".

(3) In section 54(1) (review of Commissioners' decisions), after paragraph (c) insert—

" (ca) a decision to withdraw approval of an environmental body under any provision contained in regulations by virtue of section 53(4)(d) above;".

(4) The amendments made by this Resolution come into force on 19 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

54. Air passenger duty (standard class travel)

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending the definition of standard class travel for the purposes of air passenger duty.

55. Alternative property finance

Resolved,

That—

(1) The Finance Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) For the title of section 73A substitute "Sections 71A to 73: relationship with Schedule 7".

(3) After section 73A insert—

" 73AB Sections 71A to 72A: arrangements to transfer control of financial institution

(1) Section 71A, 72 or 72A does not apply to alternative finance arrangements if those arrangements, or any connected arrangements, include arrangements for a person to acquire control of the relevant financial institution.

(2) That includes arrangements for a person to acquire control of the relevant financial institution only if one or more conditions are met (such as the happening of an event or doing of an act).

(3) In this section—

"alternative finance arrangements" means the arrangements referred to in section 71A(1), 72(1) or 72A(1);

"arrangements" includes any agreement, understanding, scheme, transaction or series of transactions (whether or not legally enforceable);

"connected arrangements" means any arrangements entered into in connection with the making of the alternative finance arrangements (including arrangements involving one or more persons who are not parties to the alternative finance arrangements);

"relevant financial institution" means the financial institution which enters into the alternative finance arrangements.

(4) Section 840 of the Taxes Act 1988 applies for the purposes of determining who has control of the relevant financial institution."

(4) The amendments made by this Resolution have effect in relation to alternative finance arrangements entered into on or after 12 March 2008.

And it is declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

56. Alternative finance arrangements

Resolved,

That provision may be made for amending Chapter 5 of Part 2 of the Finance Act 2005 by order.

57. Duties (abolition of disregard of fractions of penny)

Resolved,

That provision may be made repealing section 137(4) of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979.

58. Relief from tax (incidental and consequential charges)

Resolved,

That it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to any duty or tax (including charges having retrospective effect) that may arise from provisions designed in general to afford relief from taxation.

PROCEDURE (FUTURE TAXATION)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain the following provisions taking effect in a future year—

(a) provision for corporation tax to be charged for the financial year 2009,

(b) provision about the standard rate of landfill tax,

(c) provision about the rates of climate change levy,

(d) provision about the rate of aggregates levy, and

(e) provision amending section 139 of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003.

PROCEDURE (FIRST-YEAR TAX CREDITS)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may include provision for first-year tax credits to be paid in connection with first-year qualifying expenditure under the Capital Allowances Act 2001.

PROCEDURE (INFORMATION AND INSPECTION POWERS IN CONNECTION WITH CERTAIN FOREIGN TAXES)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to the matters that may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may make provision about obtaining information and documents, and inspecting premises, in connection with—

(a) a tax of a member State, other than the United Kingdom, which is covered by the provisions for the exchange of information under the Directive of the Council of the European Communities dated 19th December 1977 No. 77/799/EEC (as amended from time to time),

(b) taxes and duties imposed under the law of a territory outside the United Kingdom and covered by arrangements having effect by virtue of section 173 of the Finance Act 2006, and

(c) value added tax charged in accordance with the law of a member State, other than the United Kingdom.

FINANCE [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act of the present Session relating to finance ("the Act"), it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) sums incurred by the Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs in making payments under the Act to charities who are given donations under the gift aid scheme,

(b) sums incurred by the Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs in preparing for the introduction of a new duty chargeable in respect of flights by aircraft, and

(c) sums incurred by the Treasury in making payments under the Act from the Exchequer accounts in satisfaction of financial claims concerning any of those accounts.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolutions: And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Secretary Hilary Benn, Mr. Secretary Hutton, Secretary James Purnell, Secretary Ruth Kelly, Secretary Ed Balls, Yvette Cooper, Angela Eagle, Kitty Ussher and Jane Kennedy do prepare and bring it in.

FINANCE BILL

Jane Kennedy accordingly presented a Bill to grant certain duties, to alter other duties, to amend the law relating to the national debt and the public revenue, and to make further provision in connection with finance: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. [Bill 89]

PETITION

Road Improvements (Wellingborough)

11.13 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to present the petition of residents of the Croyland ward of Wellingborough and surrounding areas. It deals with a road—well, I should rather say a series of potholes and craters with a little bit of tarmac in between—in the constituency. The petition has been signed by more than 200 residents, including people who work at the local ambulance station. It reads:

The Humble Petition of residents of Croyland ward of Wellingborough and surrounding areas,

Sheweth,

That The Kingsway, a road in Wellingborough, is in disrepair, speed humps are severely damaged and the footpath is in a deplorable state.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House urges the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government to liaise with Northamptonshire County Council to provide, a) a complete resurfacing of the road and footpath, b) the removal of all speed humps and c) a revision of traffic calming measures including the installation of chicanes and a Vehicle Activated Speed Sign.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Chippenham Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Michael Foster.]

11.14 pm

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I am glad to have the opportunity of an Adjournment debate, even at this late hour, on a subject of huge concern in my constituency—a matter that has angered the population of Chippenham and the surrounding area more than almost any other issue that I can remember in my 11 years representing them in this place. That culminated in an angry public meeting in Chippenham town hall a week ago on Saturday, attended by 300 people, some of whom were very upset. They were upset about the fact that Chippenham hospital—which serves a town of 40,000 people that is soon to grow to 50,000 people—was to be cut from 43 medical beds to 10 medical beds. That would not resemble a hospital as we normally think of it, and it is questionable whether it would have been sustainable in the long term from an economic or a medical standpoint.

The anger of the local people is well understood, particularly as the proposal comes after various other cuts in the hospital, including the closure of the overnight minor injuries unit, the withdrawal of day care for geriatrics, and the fact that the hospital stopped using the cardiac machine that cost £23,000, which was recently raised by popular subscription. All that was done over last autumn. The final blow was the proposed reduction in beds from 43 to 10.

At oral questions this afternoon, the Minister was able to announce to the House something that has since been confirmed in a press release: the number of beds at Chippenham hospital would be reduced to 20 rather than to 10. Without being immodest, I should like to think that the timing of that decision may not have been uncoincidental with the occurrence of this Adjournment debate and oral questions today, but perhaps it was for other reasons. There has been a change of heart by the primary care trust, which was adamant on the subject at a stormy meeting only two weeks ago.

The chairman and chief executive of the PCT are decent enough people, but were carrying out the will of the Government and were adamant that the hospital would go down to 10 beds. I am glad that in the subsequent two weeks they have seen reason and realised that 10 beds is not sustainable and that 20 is a more reasonable number. A deal has been done with the Royal United hospital in Bath, which will have 10 beds at Chippenham. That is an eminently healthy development. It is still not enough; 20 beds is half the present number, and it is difficult to assess whether that is sustainable.

The news removes some of the passion from the debate. I welcome it and I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say later about that deal. I hope that it may be possible to extend that 10-bed deal to a better arrangement for Chippenham hospital. The development comes about as a result of the "Pathways for Change" consultation. As a result of the proposals in that document, a petition with 25,000 signatures was delivered to Parliament. There were huge public meetings and outcry everywhere, but that outcry was nothing by comparison with what has happened to the hospital since.

All that comes as a great disappointment, as the Government went out of their way to seek to reassure us about the future of community hospitals. They said in their rather fetchingly entitled consultation paper "Our Health, Our Care, Our Say" that "we are clear that community facilities should not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures", and that

"Primary Care Trusts that are considering closing community facilities should now review that in the light of the clear strategy that we have spelled out in the White Paper."

In a debate on 30 January 2006, the then Secretary of State reassured me that Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire should think again about its strategy to close or cut community hospitals. We took some encouragement from that. We like to take encouragement from what the Government tell us. Imagine our surprise when, despite that, Malmesbury was effectively closed, and Westbury, Trowbridge, Melksham and Devizes hospitals were closed and huge cuts were made elsewhere in hospital provision across the area.

Despite the Government's assurances on community facilities, why is all this happening? I had a written parliamentary question last week that may help to explain. The Minister admitted last week that one of the worst funded primary care trusts in England is that in Wiltshire. We in Wiltshire get £1,155 per head per annum for health care—compared with £1,182 in neighbouring Hampshire, £1,425 in Northumberland and £1,416 in London. Why should Wiltshire get £300 per head less than Northumberland? What on earth would justify that—other than the fact that Northumberland, of course, is entirely represented by Labour Members of Parliament, while Wiltshire, I am glad to say, is entirely represented by Conservative ones?

To put the whole thing into context, I should say that before all this started Wiltshire community hospitals had a total of 173 beds, spread across the hospitals that I mentioned. The "Pathways for Change" document proposed that the number should be cut to 74—24 beds in Marlborough, 20 in Melksham and 30 in Chippenham. However, Melksham closed and Warminster got its 20 beds. Then, with no consultation at all, it was proposed that the number for Chippenham would be cut from 43 down to 10—or now, 20.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): One of the things that my hon. Friend's constituents and mine are concerned about is maternity services. Has he seen the recent Healthcare Commission report, which commended both Chippenham and Trowbridge maternity units? Does he share my exasperation that the primary care trust that we unfortunately have in Wiltshire seems selective in the evidence that it uses to back up its position? It appears to ignore things such as the Healthcare Commission's assertion that smaller is better when it comes to maternity services.

Mr. Gray: My hon. Friend is right, and I am grateful to him for staying so late in the evening to support me in this Adjournment debate. The fact is that maternity services, for example, are delivered better in small units than in big ones. Although I welcome the fact that our maternity unit in Chippenham is being maintained, I very much regret that many of the others around Wiltshire have gone, such as the one in Malmesbury, for example—also in my constituency and for which we campaigned hard. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The mere facts that we are keeping our maternity unit in Chippenham, which the Minister will no doubt raise in a moment, and that we have a 20-bed specialist stroke unit in Chippenham, do not excuse the fact that all those other facilities around the county have been abolished.

The fact is that we will end up with 30 per cent. of the community beds that we had before all this started, and that seems altogether retrograde. We are a large rural area. There are first-class hospitals in Bath and Swindon, although criticisms can be made of them. However, those hospitals are remote from my and my hon. Friend's constituents in rural Wiltshire. We need community hospitals, particularly to deal effectively with those needing intermediate and geriatric care.

In replying, the Minister may well say that I am looking at things in an old-fashioned way and that we do not just need community hospitals because now there are community teams. Of course, we all welcome the notion that if people can be cared for at home, they should be. That is a good thing; no one wants to lock people up in hospitals if that can be avoided. However, if the community teams are to work properly, the hospital beds should be kept open until the teams are working. Incidentally, community teams are not working 24/7, as was promised; there is, as yet, no night-time care in the area.

If the Minister came to the House and said, "The Chippenham hospital beds are empty week after week, and we are paying a lot of money to keep them", we would all say, "Fine—close them down. We have no problem at all, as the community teams are great." However, the fact is that the community beds are fuller than ever. Currently, they are 96 per cent. occupied over the winter. Most people stay in them for 30 days, and some for 40 days. The Great Western hospital intermediate care unit has closed, which means that the patients have to go to Chippenham instead. Six wards in the Royal United hospital in Bath are currently closed because of the norovirus and there are terrible MRSA problems there too; there are constant red alerts all winter. All the people have to come to Chippenham, especially those requiring geriatric or intermediate care.

In January, RUH in Bath ended up sending patients to local private hospitals to try to meet the Government's 18-week target. Last week in Chippenham, local managers inquired as to whether it would be possible to take the Cameron ward in the hospital out of mothballs. It has been mothballed ever since the Government closed it down, but the managers asked whether it could be brought out again because the beds were needed so badly. When they found that they could not do that for economic reasons, they inquired whether the day rooms at the end of the open wards could possibly have beds in them, because they were short of beds. Against that background, they are apparently cutting the number of beds from an inadequate 43 to 20.

As yet, the neighbourhood teams are not working. The chief executive of Carers Support North Wiltshire wrote to me this week. She stated:

> "The neighbourhood teams are very far from the promised 24/7 service. We have heard of several cases where a patient has been told not to expect a visit for toileting assistance but either 'to wear incontinence pads and wait for someone to arrive, or to have a catheter inserted'... As a very experienced nurse, I am becoming appalled and almost ashamed to be part of that profession."

What about the dignity of life? We are closing hospital beds in Chippennam, where people can be properly looked after, and sending them home and suggesting that they should either wear incontinence pads or have a catheter inserted until the nurse turns up. That will not do. People demand the proper human care that they have had over the years. The cuts, even to 20 beds in Chippenham hospital, are unrealistic and inhumane.

We look to the Minister for three things. First, will he please explain why the people of Wiltshire have £300 less a year spent on them than, for example, the people of Northumberland? The county is among the worst funded in England. What will we do about that? It is a question for the long term and the Minister should answer it.

Secondly, surely the Minister accepts that there is a place for community hospitals such as Chippenham. Will not he continue the negotiations that the PCT has had with, for example, the RUH in Bath, and maintain the movement that got the number of beds increased from 10 to 20? Let us try to get the figure back to 30 if we can.

Thirdly, I hope that the Minister can give a hint about the next question, even if he cannot answer it. The PCT applied for some £17 million to redevelop the old hospital, which had been the Victorian workhouse, but the Government did not like some aspects of the application and asked the PCT to renew it. It has now done that. It would therefore be interesting to receive a hint from the Minister about whether that application for £17 million to redevelop the hospital might meet the Government's approval. That would give new life and hope to the community around Chippenham hospital.

The people of Chippenham—and throughout North Wiltshire, because the hospital serves the whole of my constituency, not only the town of Chippenham—deserve a fully functional hospital. They demand that the Government give them it.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) on securing the debate and I appreciate his comments. I would like to take the opportunity to pay tribute to all NHS staff in Chippenham and North Wiltshire for their hard work and dedication.

I hope, in the time that is left, to reassure the hon. Gentleman, and, through him, his constituents, that the proposed changes to NHS provision in Wiltshire have been developed after extensive consultation and approved by democratically elected local councillors, and are not about cost-cutting. On the contrary, funding is increasing, and I will deal with that later.

[Mr. Ben Bradshaw]

The proposed changes will lead to better clinical care for the people of Wiltshire, and Chippenham hospital has a good future.

The proposals of Wiltshire primary care trust for Chippenham hospital—the "Reforming Community Services" programme—were developed after two years of extensive consultation. The board of the PCT agreed the programme in January last year, and it was considered in March 2007 by the county council's overview and scrutiny committee. The council is dominated by the Conservative party. As the hon. Gentleman knows, overview and scrutiny committees are composed of local councillors.

To increase democratic oversight of NHS decisions, the Government made it a requirement that such committees should consider any reorganisation of local health provision. If they have concerns about those proposals, they have the power to refer them to the Secretary of State—and my right hon. Friend has made it clear since he took on his role that in such circumstances, he would automatically refer the matter to the independent reconfiguration panel. That has happened in several cases in which recommendations have been overturned. As the hon. Gentleman will know, Wiltshire county council's overview and scrutiny committee did not refer the proposals to the Secretary of State, but supported the "Reforming Community Services" programme.

It is not up to me to second-guess what was on the minds of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues on Wiltshire county council, but I cannot believe that they would have approved the programme if they thought that it would not be for the benefit of their constituents, or would be about cost cutting. The main driver for any local health service reorganisation has to be clinically led, and the central focus must be the best outcome for patients. That is not about saving money, but about investing in services fit for the 21st century.

Let me deal with funding in Wiltshire more generally. Wiltshire PCT's funding allocation has increased from £341.1 million in 2003-04 to £539.6 million this year. Next year funding will increase further, to £569.1 million—a 66 per cent. increase since 2003-04. Whereas a few years ago some primary care trusts were a long way from their fair funding target—Wiltshire may have been one of those—no primary care trust in the country, apart from Northamptonshire, is now more than 3.5 per cent. away from its target. Just to correct the hon. Gentleman about Northumberland, it is not represented in the House only by Labour MPs; rather, I understand that there are two Labour MPs, one Conservative MP and one Liberal Democrat MP. Those funding figures mean that funding per head in Wiltshire has increased in just five years from less than £800 to more than £1,200. That is, in any sense of the term, a massive increase.

I do not think that Wiltshire councillors would have approved proposals that they thought would lead to worse clinical outcomes for patients, either. Having looked into health provision in the county and future need, the PCT concluded that there was an oversupply of general medical beds at Chippenham hospital, which currently has 73 beds. Wiltshire PCT was proposing to reduce the number of medical beds to 10, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but has now reconsidered that. The PCT has been in discussions for some time with the Royal hospital in Bath, apparently about the possibility of devolving some of the acute beds from Bath to Chippenham, and, to allow for the possible relocation of services from the Royal Bath to Chippenham, has adjusted that figure up to 20. There are no plans to reduce the size of the stroke unit at the hospital, and the maternity unit, which has also be referred to, will in fact be expanded. Taken in all, those changes will mean that Chippenham hospital will still have a total of 54 beds.

According to the PCT, one of the reasons for the reduction in the number of general medical beds is that it has been determined to reduce what is called delayed discharge, where patients are ready to go home, but the support to enable them to do so is not in place. Wiltshire PCT has already cut delayed discharge by half. I hope that we would all congratulate it, and Wiltshire county council, on achieving that. As I am sure the hon. Gentleman would accept, delayed discharge is bad for patients and bad for the taxpayer.

The second reason for the reduction in general medical beds is that the PCT has been investing in neighbourhood nursing teams, which have been gradually introduced since November last year. Existing teams provide cover to those in Chippenham, Calne, Corsham and Box, and last month another team was set up covering Malmesbury and the surrounding area. The teams comprise 52 nurses and 22 physiotherapists or occupational therapists in total, and serve a population of 18,000 people aged over 65. In January the teams saw 350 new patients. It is worth noting that fewer than 300 new patients were admitted to the general in-patient beds in Chippenham hospital during the same period.

On a recent visit to Wiltshire, I had the opportunity to visit the nursing team in Calne, in the constituency of the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). I accompanied one of district nurses on a visit and saw at first hand how valued the service that the team provides to the local community is.

As the hon. Member for North Wiltshire acknowledged in his speech, people want to be treated at home where possible, or as close to home as possible. However, the development of community support should not mean that the days of the community hospital are numbered. The general devolving of services—the devolving of services out of acute hospitals, as I hope they will be devolved out of Bath to Chippenham, and out of Chippenham to people's homes—is the direction of travel that is supported in, I think, all parts of the House.

The Government still have a massive commitment to the redevelopment and modernisation of our community hospitals, involving a £750 million programme over this spending review period. Our region in the south-west is already a major beneficiary of the community hospitals programme. It has received £58 million, which is more than a quarter of the total of £190 million allocated so far. That money is supporting major refurbishments in Yate, Minehead, South Bristol, Keynsham Park and Dursley, and at the Moreton and Bourton hospitals in the north Cotswolds.

Wiltshire PCT has not submitted a bid to the community hospital fund, but it has been in discussions with the strategic health authority about its bid for capital improvements at Chippenham, and there are other funding streams that it can use to bid for funding. For 2008-09, we are changing the way in which capital allocations are made to PCTs. The Department will no longer make formula-based, top-down allocations of capital to fund PCTs' local investment priorities. Instead, PCT capital allocations will be determined by robust and realistic bottom-up expenditure plans submitted by individual PCTs and agreed with their SHAs. That process has already begun, and will be refined over the coming weeks to give maximum flexibility according to local NHS needs over a three-year cycle.

The fact that Wiltshire PCT is looking at making major capital investments on the Chippenham site should reassure the hon. Gentleman and his constituents that Chippenham hospital has a secure future. It will continue to provide stroke services for Wiltshire and, in future, it will be the main base for community maternity services for north and west Wilshire. There will continue to be the minor injury unit, out-patient consultant clinics, assessment clinics, and X-ray and other diagnostic services, in addition to the therapy services and mental health services that are provided at the site. The hospital is the base for many of the community teams working in the area, including the neighbourhood team for Chippenham, health visiting, school nursing and social services. The GP out-of-hours service uses the hospital on weekday evenings and at weekends to provide local access to urgent primary care advice and treatment. I hope that I have been able to go some way towards reassuring the hon. Gentleman that his hospital has a very good future indeed.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes to Midnight.

Oral Answers to Questions

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Minister for the Cabinet Office and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Social Exclusion (Rural Areas)

1. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on reducing social exclusion in rural areas. [195045]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Phil Hope): Delivery of the socially excluded adults public service agreement and the families at risk review will reduce social exclusion in rural areas. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is fully engaged in working to reduce social exclusion in rural areas, as is reflected in his strategy for strong rural communities.

Miss McIntosh: Does the Minister not realise that the programme of rural post office closures that his Government are completing will at one swift move destroy any prospect of reducing social exclusion in rural areas, particularly as they are removing any possibility of profitable post offices remaining in shops, and even disallowing shops that have operated a post office from offering any services that might compete with the Post Office? Will his Government reduce this programme of closures?

Phil Hope: We recognise that post offices play an important social and economic role in rural areas, but, as the hon. Lady knows, the post office network is costing the taxpayer about £3.5 million a week, which amounts to half a million pounds a day, and the cost per transaction in some of the 800 smaller post offices in rural areas is £17. That is simply unaffordable. We will, however, maintain a subsidy of £150 million a year to maintain a national network of post offices in rural areas, and we will apply minimum access criteria so that 95 per cent. of the population in rural areas will have access to a post office within three miles. I would be interested to hear whether the hon. Lady or any other Conservative Members, including those on the Front Bench, will match our commitment to spend £150 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that it can be particularly bad to be poor in a rural area, as housing can be more expensive, transport links can be a problem—public transport is almost non-existent in some areas—and people can feel very isolated? We must recognise that, because if people are poor, they are poor, regardless of whether they live in a rural area or in the middle of a council estate.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and we have a programme to tackle social exclusion in rural areas precisely because poor people in such areas require that. That is also why we give a massive subsidy of £55 million to local authorities for rural transport, in order to provide bus services for people in rural areas. That is why we have pledged to build more affordable homes—some 10,500 more homes in rural areas by 2011. That is why we fund third sector organisations—not least community transport schemes—to provide help and support to people in most need in rural areas. I am pleased to be able to say that two of our family nurse partnership programmes—which are programmes to help poorer families—will be piloted in rural areas, to ensure that those from rural families will, like everybody else, have the successful start to life that they deserve.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): The Minister will be aware that according to Save the Children 1.3 million children in our country live in severe poverty, and yet the take-up of benefits by families entitled to them is poor. One of the most effective ways of getting across the message of take-up campaigns is to use post offices; indeed, in rural areas they are the only institution of that kind. Why is the Minister closing post offices?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point about access and take-up of benefits, which is why I am very pleased that since 1997 we have lifted some 600,000 children out of poverty, and in the Budget—which we have debated and which the Opposition voted against last night—we made pledges to lift another 250,000 children and young people out of poverty. If the hon. Gentleman were to vote in accordance with the questions he asks—in other words, if he were to support lifting children out of poverty—we might have a little more respect for some of his opinions.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Earlier comments have rightly focused on families and children, but we should address older people as well, especially in England. Older people are disproportionately represented in the rural population—the average age in rural areas is 50, and in urban and city areas it is 42—and they are particularly prone to poverty, deprivation and exclusion, and are less likely to take up the benefits to which they are entitled. Will the Minister use his cross-cutting powers with the Department for Work and Pensions and other Departments to raise awareness of benefits among older people in rural areas, who might not have access to relevant information, so that he and his Government tackle the poverty that many such older people are having to endure?

Phil Hope: We will happily take forward the challenge that my hon. Friend has given to me. He will be pleased to learn that only last week I spoke at a conference in Leicester that examined the valuable role that older people play in communities. He will know that we have published a public service agreement called "Later Life", which spells out a range of new targets and new actions, be they about older people playing their part in communities, dealing with social exclusion and poverty, or providing better health services, safer neighbourhoods and independent living. Many older people want the ability to make a positive contribution to their community. The new free local bus travel anywhere in the country will certainly benefit many older people, as will the increased winter fuel payment of £50 and of more than £100 for older people. Such measures will directly address some of my hon. Friend's key questions about tackling pensioner poverty.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I do not doubt the Minister's good intentions about tackling social exclusion in rural areas, but the common thread running through all this, whether we are talking about crime, schools, the delivery of medical services, sport, entertainment or leisure, is transport, which is not working in rural areas. Will he please get a cross-government initiative going to tackle the issue? It is no good giving free bus passes to pensioners if there are no buses, and it is no good providing free school transport if children cannot get back to enjoy the rest of the benefits of the community in which they live.

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that we must do more to ensure that proper services are provided in villages and rural areas. I represent some 60 villages in my constituency and I work closely with them on integrating services, supporting village halls and providing rural transport. He is right to say that we must provide access to services, not only for older people through the use of free bus passes, but for children and young people. That is why we have a presumption against school closures in rural areas and why we are building more affordable homes. I know that some Conservative Members are opposed to home building, but such homes are vital for young people who want to have a house in their own village rather than leave it. That is why we support organisations such as Action with Communities in Rural England—ACRE—which is a strategic partner of the Cabinet Office in developing new policies and strategies to ensure that we address the specific issues of social exclusion and creating strong rural communities.

Third Sector Organisations

2. Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the potential role of third sector organisations in providing public services. [195046]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Edward Miliband): Third sector organisations have the potential to play an important role in the design, development and delivery of public services. That is reflected in our recent reforms in offender management, employment policy and health and social care. However, the third sector should never be an excuse for cutting Government funding to public services.

Mr. Reed: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply and am reassured by his belief that the third sector should not be used as an excuse for cutting services. What further help can the Government give third sector organisations operating in my constituency, such as the West Cumbria Society for the Blind, the Hospice at Home West Cumbria, NCH and others, to ensure that local authorities and bodies such as primary care trusts give them the help and resources that they need to undertake their work?

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the relationship between local authorities and third sector organisations on the ground, because it often defines whether or not those organisations succeed. I pay tribute to the organisations in his constituency that he mentions. We have made progress, in the sense that one of our targets for local government will measure the relationship between the local authorities and local third sector organisations, which will help to address a relevant issue in many areas—how local authorities treat the third sector and whether they help such organisations to grow and thrive.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Is the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster aware that a number of local charities throughout England and Wales have recently become involved in the running of local post offices? They have found that where post office staff are not available to do that job, they can provide a service for perhaps two or three days a week. What steps is he taking to intervene with the Department for Work and Pensions, which created this crisis in the first place by reducing local post offices' footfall?

Edward Miliband: As my ministerial colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope), said, we are providing a subsidy of £150 million a year to local post offices. I have heard no proposals from the Conservative party as to how it would provide more money; all we hear, as we hear about every issue, is that we should have a moratorium on closures, but the Conservatives offer no real solutions. We are ensuring that we have not only a thriving post office network, but a sustainable one.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): Surely the Minister recognises—in fact, I know that he does—the third sector's value to many of our constituencies, in particular my own, which contains the Mary Ann Evans hospice and other valuable charities. Does he understand that in the current world climate of financial slow-down, all those charities will be severely challenged in raising the money that they need to keep those good services going? Will the Government give a commitment to examine carefully the core funding they provide? Perhaps the Government will be able to increase it at this difficult time.

Edward Miliband: My hon. Friend makes an important point: at a time of financial pressures, third sector organisations in particular can feel the pinch. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made announcements in his Budget statement last week that will help charities to the tune of £300 million—that is money that they thought they were going to lose as a result of changes to income tax, but which they will get through gift aid. That will make a difference to them.

My hon. Friend also emphasises the need to fund small local organisations properly. That is why the new grassroots grants programme, which has been pioneered by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby, will help local organisations with those small sums that can make a big difference to the kind of services that they can provide to the community.

Post Office Closures

3. Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): What assessment the Social Exclusion Task Force has made of the likely effect of post office closures on social inclusion. [195047]

4. Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): What assessment the Social Exclusion Task Force has made of the effect of post office closures on social inclusion. [195048]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Phil Hope): The Government recognise the social and economic role of post offices in local communities. Our subsidy to the Post Office of £150 million per year until 2011 will help to maintain a national network with national coverage, ensuring that all areas, including rural and deprived urban areas, will continue to have reasonable access to post office services.

Mr. Lancaster: I am pleased that the Minister recognises the contribution that post offices make in both rural and urban communities—I have both in my constituency. But does he understand the anger felt by residents of Little Brickhill when they discovered, through an inadvertent leak on the Post Office website, that their post office was to close some nine months before the consultation was due to start? Does that not expose what a complete sham the consultation is?

Phil Hope: It is not appropriate for me to comment on any individual post office. However, the hon. Gentleman must recognise that the present subsidy of £3.5 million a week is unaffordable. He is making representations on behalf of his constituents, but I would like to know why, between 1979 and 1997 when his party was in power, 3,500 post offices closed and not one penny of subsidy was given to post offices.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In the Government White Paper, "Rural Affairs", the then Deputy Prime Minister said that "we will...retain and renew the rural Post Office network and make banking, internet, pensions, benefits, prescriptions, health and other services available from rural post offices".

Is it not the job of the Minister's Department to make the Government keep the promises in their White Paper and develop and sustain those post offices, instead of shutting them down?

Phil Hope: That is precisely the reason why we are giving a subsidy to the network of £150 million a year until 2011. I notice that the Opposition have significantly failed to make a commitment to match that subsidy. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make a serious point about this, I would like to hear from his Front Benchers whether his party supports that level of subsidy.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): Could the Minister find out what is happening in my constituency? The post office in Blyth has to move out of the Co-op, because it is closing, and no one seems to know what will happen to the post office. We wonder whether it is part of the closure programme that we do not know about.

Phil Hope: I cannot comment on individual cases, but the national criteria mean that 99 per cent. of the population in the top 15 per cent. most deprived areas will be within one mile of a post office. On a case by case basis, the Post Office has to take into account local geography, the availability of local transport and other socio-economic factors when making a decision about a particular post office. Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to take back those criteria to his local post office for the negotiations.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I had a rural post office close in Rodmersham, so I wonder whether I could persuade my hon. Friend to speak to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform about merging the rural library service with a rural post office service, so the rural hamlets and villages in my constituency could have such a service at least once a week.

Phil Hope: Innovative proposals of that kind can be discussed and negotiated locally. I would encourage the Post Office to engage with local authorities and other third sector organisations that may wish to step in and fund or support particular branches or introduce innovative approaches to delivering services. However, in doing so, the Post Office will need to consider all the costs, not only at branch level, but the support it gives to post offices. I would encourage every local partner to get involved in such innovative proposals and see whether they can find a way forward.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): When the Post Office and the Government announced the most recent round of closures, there was also a commitment to reopen a limited number of post offices, especially in areas of social exclusion that were underserved because of prior closures. I now understand from conversations with the Post Office that that will not apply in any urban areas, including areas such as Ham ward in my constituency, which is most deprived and does not have a single post office. Will the Minister please take up that issue with his colleagues?

Phil Hope: I am sure that the hon. Lady can champion her own constituency perfectly well. The criterion being used nationally for urban areas is that 99 per cent. of the population should be within one mile of a post office in the top 15 per cent. most deprived urban areas. That is an important commitment. At the beginning, that commitment applied to only the bottom 10 per cent. of deprived urban areas, but we have increased it to 15 per cent. My difficulty in responding to the hon. Lady stems from the fact that the Liberal Democrats appear to be saying that they will fund every post office no matter what the cost. Frankly, that is fairyland economics.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham) (Con): Is it not now clear that the crucial access criteria for the closure of post offices will leave thousands of elderly and vulnerable people isolated from the services on which they depend, with walking routes that are dangerous to the alternatives and no public transport available? Were Ministers in the Cabinet Office consulted on the social exclusion implications of those access criteria? If they were not, what is the point of their having responsibility for social exclusion? If they were consulted, why did they make such a Horlicks of it?

Phil Hope: Once again the right hon. Gentleman lays down a challenge about the extent to which older people are being included in the discussions, but I notice that once again he has signally failed to match our commitment to provide the exact subsidy that he seeks, which will enable the post offices to remain open. I will give him more time at the Dispatch Box to answer my question: will he match our £150 million a year subsidy to support the rural and urban network?

Mr. Maude: It would be great to get an answer to the question that I asked and I am sorry that the Minister has failed to do that. It is perfectly clear that the total incompetence of this process is leading to hundreds of completely viable post offices facing closure, creating huge problems for thousands of vulnerable people. What does the Minister think that his constituents in Corby will make of his fulminating in his local paper against post office closures in his constituency when those closures are being forced through by his Government? Will they not conclude that the Government are now shot through with hypocrisy?

Phil Hope: My Corby constituents hold me in extremely high regard. They like the fact that I stand up and campaign on their behalf. The fact that we now have a new town centre, a new railway station, two new secondary schools, a new hospital, brand new housing and a regenerated growth economy with low unemployment and higher wages might give some indication that the people of Corby are very pleased with the conduct and performance of their local Member of Parliament. They will not be persuaded by a sham campaign by the Conservative party, which is pretending to support post office openings at the same time as failing to commit to match the Government's pledge of a £150 million subsidy until the year 2011.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Many people across the UK and in Northern Ireland are alarmed at what appears to be a sustained campaign for the demise of the post office network, particularly in rural areas. When will the Government go back to the drawing board and invest in a campaign to sustain and rebuild the rural post office network?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is right to press for a subsidy for the post office network to maintain those post offices that are not financially viable. I am pleased that he will support the £150 million a year in subsidy that we are giving to the Post Office until the year 2011. I assume that he will support that, and I hope that he will persuade some of the other parties in this Chamber to support that £150 million subsidy, too.

Sports (Volunteering)

5. Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): What steps he is taking to reduce the administrative burden of volunteering in sport. [195049]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Edward Miliband): The Government are committed to reducing administrative burdens that may hinder any type of volunteering. Following the report of the independent Commission on the Future of Volunteering, we will produce guidance to help us reduce unnecessary Criminal Records Bureau checks, including in sport. Sport England is also running specific programmes to reduce the administrative burden on sports volunteering.

Mr. Reed: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will want to congratulate the 5 million people who volunteer in sport on a monthly basis, including Nina Walker, from my constituency, who recently won the BBC unsung sporting heroes award. However, will he ensure that his Department plays a lead role in ensuring that the unintended consequences of worthwhile legislation, such as CRB checks, do not impact on the sporting sector? For example, the points system for migration might lead to sports clubs having to sponsor international visiting teams. Will he play a lead role in ensuring that good policies do not impact unnecessarily on sport?

Edward Miliband: Let me pay tribute to my hon. Friend's constituent who, after that question, is more of a sung than an unsung hero. My hon. Friend is right to pinpoint unintended consequences as an issue, but people sometimes get an impression about legislation that turns out not to be correct. That is why I said in my answer that we need to give people proper guidance about the CRB checks so that they know when they are needed. We shall be very much involved in that process.

Child Poverty

6. Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): What account the Social Exclusion Task Force takes of child poverty in setting its work plan. [195050]

The Minister for the Cabinet Office (Edward Miliband): Through its work on families at risk, the Social Exclusion Task Force is seeking to improve services for families and children facing multiple disadvantages such as worklessness, poor housing and mental health problems.

Following more than 90 applications from local authorities and their partners, the Cabinet Office and the Department for Children, Schools and Families will shortly be announcing the successful councils that will develop innovative approaches to working with such families.

Mr. Harper: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. He will know that the Opposition share the Government's aspiration to eliminate child poverty by 2020 but, given that the Department for Work and Pensions has admitted that the Government are unlikely to hit their target of halving child poverty by 2010, what will his Department do to make sure that the Government hit their 2010 child poverty target?

Edward Miliband: The hon. Gentleman says that he shares our aspiration to meet the child poverty target, but why did the Opposition vote yesterday night against the Budget measures that would make it possible to take 250,000 more children out of poverty? It is all very well for him to say that the Opposition support the target, but that means that they must vote for the measures that will help us to meet it.

On the wider question of the 2010 target, the Government are determined to make progress. The shadow Chancellor has said that we have one more Budget to go, and we are determined to do more to tackle child poverty.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham) (Con): Last Thursday, the Work and Pensions Secretary—who has just come into the Chamber—said of the Government's child poverty target:

"We aim to meet it in 2010."—[Official Report, 13 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 445.]

His words were rather different from those used just now by the Minister for the Cabinet Office. However, the DWP's annual report was published recently and it makes it absolutely clear that "these targets are unlikely to be fully met."

In the middle of that muddle, who is right—the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, or his Department's annual report?

Edward Miliband: The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is absolutely right—we do intend to meet the 2010 target. It is a challenging one, but the difference between the Government and the Opposition is that we are determined to adopt the measures that will take us towards meeting it. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to shed crocodile tears about the target, but he is in no position to talk about these matters if he is not willing to take those measures.

Family Intervention Projects

7. Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of family intervention projects. [195052]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Phil Hope): Family intervention projects are pioneering new ways of working with socially excluded families. Such approaches have demonstrated real benefits for seven out of 10 families, for example in their physical and mental health and in their educational attainment. Building on that success, the Government recently launched their £16 million family pathfinders programme and extended the family nurse partnership programme to new areas of the country.

Mr. Heppell: Does the Minister agree that, although the programmes are often portrayed as extensions of the nanny state, they are actually the exact opposite? By using a carrot-and-stick approach, we are helping people to take charge of, and responsibility for, their own lives.

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am delighted that some of the pioneering work includes a family intervention partnership project in his own Nottingham constituency. Families that have probably been written off by many agencies are given intensive and tailored support to bring about change. Those projects have been remarkably successful, and that is why, through the Department for Children, Schools and Families and the Department of Health, we are rolling out similar programmes across the country.

Data Protection

8. Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): What plans his Department has to improve data security across Government. [195053]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Tom Watson): The Cabinet Office is committed to improving data security. The Cabinet Secretary's review has already led to enhancements in data security across Government. I expect him to report shortly.

Mr. Randall: Would the Minister agree that, quite frankly, the Government are in a complete shambles? I refer to the loss of private details. Can he give an assurance that he is confident that he has taken measures to ensure that that never happens again?

Mr. Watson: When O'Donnell reports, there will be four action points on which we have to deliver: increasing accountability and responsibility in Departments, putting in place specific measures to protect our information, ensuring that every Department has robust scrutiny mechanisms, and, crucially, ensuring a culture change so that every public servant treats personal data like their own money.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [195060] Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 19 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Gordon Brown): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

Mrs. Moon: Having met four young people from my Bridgend constituency, my right hon. Friend will be aware that it is vital that those young people have the assurance and confidence that, for their futures, there will be apprenticeships and good jobs available for them, on which they can build their future lives. Can I give them that assurance from the Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: I was pleased to meet young people from my hon. Friend's constituency and to talk about the creation of jobs and opportunities for young people. The whole House will be pleased to know today that the employment figures show that we have more people in employment than at any time in our history.

Despite the global financial turbulence, which has meant unemployment rising in America and unemployment twice as high as ours in France and Germany, we have seen unemployment fall in every region and nation of the country over the last year. That is possible only because of the policies of stability and the creation of the new deal, which we will continue to pursue; that never happened under the previous Government.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): The whole world will have been shocked by the pictures on television last night of the security crackdown and the dead bodies on the streets of Lhasa and other parts of Tibet. Does the Prime Minister agree with me that, yes, our relationship with China is vital, and China is a major power, but we must be absolutely clear in telling the Chinese Government that this is completely unacceptable?

The Prime Minister: I spoke to Premier Wen of China this morning, and I made it absolutely clear that there had to be an end to violence in Tibet. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will agree with that. I also called for constraint, and I called for an end to the violence by dialogue between the different parties. The Premier told me that subject to two things that the Dalai Lama has already said—that he does not support the total independence of Tibet and that he renounces violence—he would be prepared to enter into dialogue with the Dalai Lama. I will meet the Dalai Lama when he is in London. I think it is important that we all facilitate discussions, but the most important thing at the moment is to bring about an end to the violence, to see reconciliation, and to see legitimate talks taking place between those people in China.

Mr. Cameron: Can I congratulate the Prime Minister on making absolutely the right decision with regard to the Dalai Lama? It is a difficult decision, but it would not have been made any better by delaying it, and I congratulate him on doing the right thing.

The Prime Minister: We make the right decisions at all times.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): May I say to my right hon. Friend that long-term unemployment is down 82 per cent. in my constituency, and overall unemployment is down by 39 per cent.? I have just been in discussions with a prospective inward investor who proposes to bring another 600 jobs to my constituency. My right hon. Friend knows that the success in turning around the economy in my area is due to the relationship between the Government and the private sector. Will he ensure that we invest in training, so that those good trends continue in future?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has fought hard for the car industry and other jobs for his constituency, and for the development of the science-based industries in the whole of the north-west region. He will be pleased to know that unemployment is falling in the whole region, that unemployment is down on a year ago, and that more jobs are being created in all parts of the country. We will continue to pursue the policies that are necessary—putting stability first by bearing down hard on inflation, a new deal to give people chances of jobs, and apprenticeships for young people. None of that would happen under the policies of the Opposition.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Two hours ago a retired Gurkha soldier handed over this medal to me in protest at the Government's refusal to grant him British citizenship. Does the Prime Minister know what it means for a loyal British soldier to give up a medal that he won for his long years of service to this country? Can he explain to the Gurkhas why on earth he believes that Gurkhas who have served in the Army after 1997 are worthy of British citizenship, but those who served before that date should be deported?

The Prime Minister: Let me also pay tribute to the Gurkhas. They have been in existence since 1815. They have served loyally in every part of the world, particularly in Iraq and Afghanistan, where they fought with Prince Harry over the past few months. They have done a tremendous job for our country. We are the first Government to have given Gurkhas the right to a pension, for those serving after 1997. We are the first to have given equal pay to the Gurkhas. We are the first to have dealt with the problems of married accommodation, and we are the first to say that after four years in the Army they will have the right to residence in this country. Those are changes that we have brought about. Why is the date 1997? It is the date that the Gurkhas, once based in Hong Kong, moved to be based in Britain. That is why we are honouring the promises that we made for the period after 1997.

Mr. Clegg: That is a technical argument on a moral issue. It is a spectacular misjudgement from the man who signed the cheques for the Iraq war, but has never had the moral courage to take responsibility for it. After five years of conflict in Iraq—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the right hon. Gentleman speak. [Interruption.] Order.

Mr. Clegg: After five years of conflict in Iraq—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clegg: After five years of conflict in Iraq, at the cost of 175 British soldiers' lives, over 600,000 Iraqi civilians and £7 billion of taxpayers' money, will the Prime Minister tell the House today whether he has any regrets about his decision to support and pay for the war in Iraq?

The Prime Minister: There is a democracy in Iraq as a result of the changes that have been brought about. Millions of children are getting the benefit of education, vaccination and health care services as a result. We are rebuilding, with the Iraqis, the economy of Iraq. I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman wants to go back to a situation where Saddam Hussein was in control of Iraq.

Q2. [195061] Christine Russell (City of Chester) (Lab): Children's centres, where community midwives, health visitors and speech and language therapists are working alongside child care providers and family support workers, are making a real difference to the life chances of children and giving tremendous support to their parents. Will my right hon. Friend please give an assurance to the House that the funding for the Sure Start programme will continue, so that every community has access to fully integrated children's services?

The Prime Minister: There is a transformation taking place in care for the under-fives. There are 1,500 children's centres now, and there will be 3,500 in 2010. That means that for most constituencies, there will be five or six Sure Start children's centres available for use by both parents and children. What would be a terrible mistake is the Conservative policy to take £200 million out of the budget of Sure Start centres. The Conservatives must explain how many areas will have their Sure Start centres closed as a result. They are proposing doing the worst by young children by cutting back on vital provision in early years learning.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Before the House breaks for Easter, I should like to give the Prime Minister the opportunity to answer some of the questions that he has completely failed to answer in recent weeks. [Interruption.] I thought he would welcome the opportunity. Last week I asked him whether we could have free votes on the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill in this House, whereas in the House of Lords he whipped his peers on conscience issues. Can he tell us today: will we have free votes on that Bill on his side of the House when it comes here?

The Prime Minister: I made the position clear last week about this Bill. This is an important Bill that improves the facilities for research and is vital for dealing with life-threatening diseases. It is a Bill that has gone through the House of Lords. I said very clearly that everybody in this House should have the right to exercise their consciences. We will come back to the House with our proposals to take it through in later times.

Mr. Cameron: Why can he not just tell us whether we can have free votes or not? What is so difficult about making a decision about this issue? If he cannot make a decision about this, no wonder the country is in such a mess.

Let me try an issue that I asked the Prime Minister about two months ago—identity cards. I asked him whether he was personally in favour of compulsory identity cards. I am opposed to that; he says that it is a matter for Parliament. Well, the last time I looked he was a Member of Parliament. Will he be voting for them—yes or no?

The Prime Minister: I was in favour of them then, and I repeat that now. I ask the right hon. Gentleman the question that he never answered: is he in favour of compulsory ID cards for foreign nationals—yes or no? We are in favour. Is he against?

Mr. Cameron: If the Prime Minister wants to ask me questions, he should call an election, so he can ask six a week. In the meantime, my responsibility is to ask him questions on behalf of the country, and his responsibility is to answer on behalf of the Government. ID cards for foreigners are just a way of spinning biometric visas, and there is not a person in the House of Commons who is opposed to them.

Let me try another question. [Interruption.] It is good to see the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families sitting there so quietly this week. [Interruption.] Very, very good. He had a choice: he had to learn either to shout more clearly or to be quiet. He has made the right choice.

When I asked the Prime Minister about A-levels six weeks ago, he could give absolutely no guarantee that they would remain after the review in 2013. That means that children starting secondary school do not know whether they will be doing A-levels or not. I want A-levels to remain as the gold standard. Does he?

The Prime Minister: I also answered this question a few weeks ago. The review will take place in 2013. Nobody is going to take away A-levels when they are successful. What we are going to do is look at how the diplomas are working, review the issue in 2013 and then make a decision. That is a guarantee that A-levels are in business for the next five years.

Mr. Cameron: So the Prime Minister can give us absolutely no answer for after 2013. That means that children at secondary school and their parents have no idea about what sort of examination system is going to be in place.

The Prime Minister cannot make a decision about free votes and he cannot make a decision about A-levels. No wonder his new spin doctor Stephen Carter says that living in Downing street is like living in a surreal cartoon. There are now so many spin doctors in Downing street that they have started spinning against each other and leaving in floods of tears. There is a new strategist, a man called David Muir. Yes, I have done a bit of research—he is the chief strategist and on the internet he has listed his favourite book. It is called—[Interruption.] Is his favourite book not the following? It is called "The unstoppable power of leaderless organisations". If the Prime Minister cannot make a decision, and if he cannot run his office, why does anyone wonder why he cannot run the country?

The Prime Minister: We are dealing with the substance of issues. The Opposition are playing at politics; we are dealing with the substance of governing. It is interesting that there was not one question about the global economy. Why? Because the Conservatives do not have a policy on the global economy. There was not one question about the health service, because they have no proper policy on the national health service. There was not one question about local government services because they are cutting local government services. They have no answer to the problems of this country.

Q3. [195062] Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): With current market conditions deteriorating, will my right hon. Friend reassure this House that now is not the time to abandon the target that we have set—that 50 per cent. of all new housing in London should be affordable?

The Prime Minister: Fifteen thousand houses are being built in London in the course of a year. The Mayor has raised the target to 30,000, but he also wants 50 per cent. of those houses to be affordable housing. It is very sad that the Conservative mayoral candidate for London has abandoned pursuing that target, in the event that he were ever elected. Surely in London, of all places, we need more affordable housing. We will deliver it; the Conservatives would not.

Robert Neill (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Can the Prime Minister explain how a London Underground public-private partnership contract that charges out a technician at the rate of £140,000 a year meets the Government's targets for best value? Who shall we blame for this state of affairs?

The Prime Minister: We are increasing usage of the underground in London from 1 billion passengers a year to 1.5 billion passengers a year. Public transport in London has never been better as a result of the decisions that we are taking. Unfortunately, it would be cut by the Conservatives.

Q4. [195063] John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): It seems certain that coal miners' beat knee is about to be made a prescribed industrial disease. In order that we can avoid another feeding frenzy for solicitors, will the Prime Minister get his Ministers to meet interested MPs to see whether a scheme can be established that gives value for money to the taxpayer, fair compensation to the coal miner and nothing to the solicitor?

The Prime Minister: I understand that the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council is currently looking at this very issue and at whether the disease should be prescribed and therefore liable to compensation and help. It will make recommendations to Ministers at the Department for Work and Pensions in due course, and we will take action on that. I can say to my hon. Friend that it is only because we have taken action on industrial diseases over these past 10 years that miners are now receiving the compensation that they never received under the previous Government.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): 2008 is the year of reading. Is the Prime Minister aware that many visually impaired and dyslexic children cannot obtain vital textbooks in accessible formats? Last year, the Government made a welcome commitment to improve the provision of such materials. Will he ensure that that commitment is delivered?

The Prime Minister: I had the privilege of being at the launch of the national year of reading. It is very important to encourage all children to get the benefits of reading. The hon. Lady rightly raises the problem of dyslexic children and others who are in need of special help. I will look at everything that she says on that matter and write to her.

Q5. [195064] Helen Southworth (Warrington, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend take action to protect children and young people from harmful content on the internet and in video games?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has been very active in protecting children, particularly children who are away from their homes, from abuse and exploitation. As she may know, we have set up the review under Dr. Tanya Byron, which is to look into the evidence of harm and measures to protect children from inappropriate content online. I have talked to Dr. Tanya Byron about her review. She will report soon. I believe that she will make recommendations that will take into account the need to see the internet as a means by which people get access to learning materials and to new technology but also as a danger and a harm on which we have to take action where necessary. I hope that my hon. Friend will look forward to Dr. Byron's report.

Q6. [195065] Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): Is it right that a person who has been given a driving ban for a serious offence such as causing death by dangerous driving and is subsequently given a prison sentence for an unrelated criminal offence can continue to use up their driving ban while in prison? Should it not be deferred until they are released?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, and we will look at it.

Q7. [195066] Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): Last Saturday's grand slam victory shows the sporting skills and passion of the Welsh nation. In looking forward to the Olympic games in 2012 and the opportunities that they will provide to Welsh communities such as my own, Ynys Môn, which has been chosen for potential training facilities for athletes from across the world, does the Prime Minister agree that the legacy from the Olympics must be spread across the United Kingdom, and will he urge his Ministers to work with the devolved Administrations and the Olympics committee to ensure that that legacy crosses the United Kingdom and peripheral areas such as north-west Wales?

The Prime Minister: I hear that my hon. Friend has a sore throat, no doubt from cheering all over the weekend. I, too, send my congratulations to the captain and the manager of the Welsh team on their great success in the international championship.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The benefits of the Olympics must be spread across the whole country. That is the intention behind persuading the different teams to do training in particular areas of the country before they arrive in London. I understand that the Australian Paralympics team are going to base themselves in Wales for the pre-games camp. I hope that in other areas of the country, regions, cities and towns will see the benefit of such activity as we move forwards to 2012. The Olympic games are for the whole United Kingdom, and I believe that that is how the public see them.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Can the Prime Minister tell the House how many post offices are due for closure in his constituency? Is he fighting to keep them open, as his Cabinet colleagues are doing in their constituencies? Does he not find it rather bizarre that they are fighting against a policy of his and of his Government that is doing so much damage to the post office network in this country?

The Prime Minister: The post offices are losing half a million pounds a day. I, too, want to see good services for post offices in every part of the country, but the fact of the matter is that there are 800 post offices where, on average, 16 people attend every week. We have got to take action. I take it from the motion that the Conservatives have tabled for debate today that they are not proposing extra money to save the post offices. Unfunded promises are empty and hollow promises to the people of this country. We have put aside £1.7 billion to make such money available to the post office network. I can only repeat what the chairman of the National Federation of SubPostmasters said this morning:

"Post Offices do not have the customer base they used to have many years ago. Many Post Offices are far quieter than they used to be and...although this is unpopular closing two and a half thousand Post Offices, it is necessary to make sure that the remaining eleven and a half thousand have a future."

That is what we intend: to make sure that they do have one.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before going any further, Mr. Evennett, it is not your purpose to come into this Chamber to shout down the Prime Minister, or any other hon. Member who is addressing the House—and that goes for a few others. I will not tolerate this situation.

Q8. [195067] Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): A constituent of mine will have approximately £1,500 less spent on him for public services than the exact equivalent in Glasgow. There is increasing anger in the English regions about the Barnett formula, which is a threat to the Union. Will my right hon. Friend agree to review this formula?

The Prime Minister: We are due to publish a paper on the Barnett formula soon, but I say to my hon. Friend that the allocation of funds in the United Kingdom is based on a needs assessment that started more than 30 years ago, has been agreed by all parties subsequently, and has been followed by every Government since. It is based on the idea that we should allocate resources in the UK on the basis of need. That is the basis on which the Barnett formula exists.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman will know that the Lincolnshire police authority has increased its precept by 78.9 per cent. That is the result of continuous underfunding due to a grants system that does not properly address the needs of rural areas. Would he please ensure that in the coming year there is a special one-off payment to help, and that in future the grants system is adjusted so that forces such as Lincolnshire get proper resources?

The Prime Minister: We have promised police authorities a minimum of 2.5 per cent. extra per year for the next three years. I have not seen similar promises to fund policing made by the Conservative party. As a result of doubling expenditure on police since 1997, we have more police than ever before in our history, and we are better served by police and community support officers. I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will agree that that is one of the reasons why crime has fallen in this country.

Q9. [195068] Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): Figures revealed to me show that 10,500 households in Brighton and Hove are currently waiting for council homes fit to live in. Some are rehoused 20 miles away in temporary accommodation, while others are in private rented accommodation that is substandard to say the least. What additional powers will the Prime Minister make available to Members of Parliament to force Tory-led local authorities such as mine to build more affordable homes?

The Prime Minister: There is a desperate need for more houses in this country, and it is important that all the agencies that can make possible the building of housing do so. Therefore, it is sad to see that some Conservative and Liberal authorities are unprepared to build the houses needed. We are prepared to make additional funding available, as we have shown. I hope that local authorities in every area of the country will respond to the urgent need.

Q10. [195069] Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): My constituent, Adela Mahoro Mugabo, who is HIV positive after being raped and tortured in Rwanda, is threatened with being sent back to that country, where she will not be able to access the treatment that she requires to stay alive. Will the Prime Minister intervene to stop that travesty of justice?

The Prime Minister: I am very happy to look at the case that the hon. Gentleman mentions. Obviously, there is no reason to believe that people being returned to Rwanda, which is now a peaceful country, will be tortured or in difficulties as a result of that. If there is an issue about the treatment of this particular patient, we will obviously consider it.

Q11. [195070] Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): Can it be right that a tax exile is allowed to spend unlimited amounts of funding on political campaigning outside an election period? Is it not time that that issue was tackled, and is not that best done by getting all the political parties back around the table to agree a settlement that is acceptable to all?

The Prime Minister: We have made proposals to reform party funding and we will introduce a White Paper on the matter soon. It is important to acknowledge that most of the public want a ceiling on election expenditure and on individual contributions. We are considering that; it is unfortunate that it does not have all-party support.

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): Yesterday, I was pleased to present a petition to the Prime Minister on behalf of my constituent, Mr. Ali Pourkaberian, an Iranian Christian who was supposed to be deported. We were delighted to get the news on the same day that his deportation has been put on hold. However, when will the Government accept that deporting Christians, homosexuals or anyone else whom the objectionable regime in Iran does not like is simply not facing up to our human rights responsibilities?

The Prime Minister: I think that we do face up to our human rights responsibilities, and when there is a proven case on which we can act, we will take action. I do not know about the individual case, but it is important to ensure that the system is used fairly and that decisions are made in the right way at all times.

Q12. [195071] Mr. Martin Caton (Gower) (Lab): It is clear that the international drive for biofuels is doing more harm than good for food security and biodiversity, and even in combating climate change. Will my right hon. Friend take a lead in Europe by calling for the current targets to be abandoned until we have a truly sustainable generation of biofuels?

The Prime Minister: I attended the European Council last Friday and we are holding fast to the general environmental targets, which include a 60 per cent. or more reduction in carbon emissions by 2050. My hon. Friend will have noted the Chancellor's proposals on biofuels in the Budget. Of course, we wish other countries to do as we are doing in making it clear that we will make the necessary changes, based on the scientific evidence.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): What assessment has the Prime Minister made of the independence and effectiveness of Postwatch in representing the best interests of post office users?

The Prime Minister: The consultation process leads to three different stages, in which Postwatch is involved. As a result, 10 per cent. of the proposals have been changed. There is an additional stage that has been agreed whereby the chairman of the Post Office, Mr. Leighton, will examine any individual representations that are made to him after those stages. I believe that there is, therefore, a set of opportunities for people to put their case. The fact that 10 per cent. of changes have been reversed shows that the Postwatch system is working.

Q13. [195072] Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): Gift aid makes a genuine difference to many charities, which will welcome the transitional measures that were announced last week in the Budget to help soften the blow caused by the reduction of the basic rate of income tax. Will the Prime Minister reassure charities in my constituency that there is a long-term plan, past the three years referred to, to ensure that there is no reduction in income and that we can drive up levels of giving through gift aid?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We provided £100 million a year as transitional support for those who receive gift aid relief as charities to enable them to deal with the consequences of reducing the basic rate from 22p to 20p. We have also introduced several other measures, such as a comprehensive programme for bringing additional smaller charities into gift aid and outreach to many new charities to help them use gift aid to advantage. Of course, in the past few years, the amount of tax relief available to charities has risen from £1.9 billion to £2.9 billion. That is £1 billion extra through tax relief going to the charities of this country. That would not have been possible without proper economic policies that were working for the people of Britain.

Q14. [195073] Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The Prime Minister will be aware that the global economic downturn is sending jitters through the whole economy. He will also be aware that there is a delay in the European Union on a decision regarding state aid for Northern Rock. That will obviously be causing great concern to those whose jobs are at risk and to small investors in Northern Rock, such as me. When does he expect the Commission to give a ruling on state aid provisions for Northern Rock?

The Prime Minister: I hope, therefore, that the hon. Lady would support the policy that we have proposed on Northern Rock, as someone who has followed what has happened, and that she might disagree with what those on the Opposition Front Bench have done. As far as the European Union is concerned, we are in discussions with the Union, and I believe that it will approve our proposals. I believe that our proposals are right for the company, right for the work force and right for the stability of the economy, and I believe that we will make progress very soon.

Q15. [195074] Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that regenerating small towns and cities is as key as regenerating large ones, and that universities can be part of that process? With that in mind, will he welcome and encourage the ambitious plans of Blackpool and the Fylde college to give a new cutting edge to the leisure and creative industries and to business, in our university plans in Blackpool?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is a persistent campaigner on behalf of Blackpool and its regeneration. It is important to recognise that colleges of education, colleges of higher education and universities are some of the biggest employers in our towns and cities. It is only because of the Government's policies to expand higher education, to have more students and apprenticeships, and therefore to have more people staying on at school in education afterwards, that it is possible to contemplate new universities in this country, and that is exactly what we are going to do.

National Security Strategy

The Prime Minister (Mr. Gordon Brown): The primary duty of Government, and our abiding obligation, is and will always be the safety of all British people and the protection of the British national interest, so, following approval by the National Security Committee and the Cabinet, the Government are today publishing the first national security strategy. It states that although our obligation to protect the British people and the British national interest is fixed and unwavering, the nature of the threats and the risks that we face has in recent decades changed beyond all recognition and confounds all the old assumptions about national defence and international security. As the strategy makes clear, new threats demand new approaches. A radically updated and much more co-ordinated approach is now required.

For most of the last century, the main threat was unmistakable: a cold war adversary. Today, the potential threats that we face come from far less predictable sources, both state and non-state. Twenty years ago, the terrorist threat to Britain was principally that from the IRA; now it comes from loosely affiliated global networks that threaten us and other nations across continents. Once, when there was instability in faraway regions or countries, we had a choice: to become involved or not. Today no country is, in the old sense, far away, when the consequences of regional instability and terrorism, as well as risks such as climate change, poverty, mass population movements and even organised crime, reverberate quickly round the globe.

To address these great insecurities—war and terrorism, and now climate change, disease and poverty; threats that redefine national security not just as the protection of the state, but as the protection of all people—we need to mobilise all the resources available to us. They include: the hard power of our military, police, security and intelligence services; the persuasive force and reach of diplomacy and cultural connections; the authority of strengthened global institutions, which can deploy both hard and soft power; and, not least because arms and authority will never be enough, the power of ideas and of shared values and hopes that can win over hearts and minds and forge new partnerships for progress and tolerance, involving Government, the private and voluntary sectors, community and faith organisations, and individuals.

The foundation of our approach is to maintain strong, balanced, flexible and deployable armed forces. I want to pay tribute to Britain's servicemen and women, and those civilians deployed on operations, who every day face danger doing vital work in the service of our country, and in particular to remember today the sacrifices made for our country by all who have been injured or who have lost their lives in recent years in Iraq, Afghanistan and other theatres of war.

To raise recruitment and to improve retention in our armed forces, we will match our new public information recruitment campaign, launched this week, with the Government's first ever cross-departmental strategy for supporting our service personnel, their families and veterans. This will be published shortly.

In the past two years we have raised general pay levels and introduced the first tax-free bonus of nearly £400 a month for those on operations, as well as a council tax refund, and today the Secretary of State for Defence is announcing new retention incentives for our armed forces. There will be increased commitment bonuses of up to £15,000 for longer-serving personnel, and, starting with a new £20 million home purchase fund, we will respond to the demand for more affordable home ownership for servicemen and women.

I can also inform the House that, to meet the threats ahead, after a trebling of its budget since 2001, the Security Service will rise in number to 4,000, which is twice the level of 2001. I can also inform the House that we will be increasing yet again, this time by 10 per cent., the resources for the joint terrorism analysis centre, which brings together 16 departments including the police and intelligence agencies, and giving it a new focus on the longer-term challenge of investigating the path to violent extremism.

I can also confirm that, to meet future security needs, we have set aside funds to modernise our interception capability; that at GCHQ and in the Secret Intelligence Service, we are developing new technical capabilities to root out terrorism; and that the new Centre for the Protection of National Infrastructure, which we set up last year, will provide a higher level of protection against internet-based threats.

The strategy published today will be backed up by a new approach to engage and inform the public. Two years ago, we removed from being classified as secret the information on threat levels for the UK. We will now go much further. Starting later this year, we will openly publish for the first time a national register of risks—information that was previously held confidentially within Government—so that the British public can see at first hand the challenges that we face and the levels of threat that we have assessed.

To harness a much wider range of expertise and experience from outside Government, and to help us plan for the future, we are inviting business, academics, community organisations and military and security experts from outside Government to join a new national security forum that will advise the recently constituted National Security Committee. Having accepted the recommendation of the Intelligence and Security Committee—I thank it for its work—to separate the position of Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee from policy adviser to the Government, and having appointed Mr. Alex Allan as Chair of the JIC, I can confirm that, as proposed by the Butler review, his responsibility will be solely to provide Ministers with security assessments formulated independently of the political process.

We will also immediately go ahead to introduce a resolution of both Houses—in advance of any future legislation—that will enshrine an enhanced scrutiny and public role for the Intelligence and Security Committee. This will lead to more parliamentary debate on security matters, to public hearings on the national security strategy, and—as promised—to greater transparency over appointments to the Committee, so that the Committee can not only review intelligence and security but perform a public role more akin to the practice of Select Committees generally in reporting to and informing the country on security matters.

Emerging from all the experience and lessons learned of the last decade is the clear conclusion that we are strongest when we combine the resources of our military, police and security and intelligence services with effective diplomacy, and when we work closely with international partners to confront the new global challenges and bring about change. This approach emphasises the importance of strengthening our key diplomatic and military alliances: with the United States, our strongest bilateral partner; with NATO as the cornerstone of our security; with our central role at the heart of an outward-facing European Union; and with our long-lasting and deep commitment to the Commonwealth and to working through international institutions.

I can tell the House that Britain will be at the forefront of diplomatic action on nuclear weapons control and reduction, offering a new bargain to non-nuclear powers. On the one hand, we will help them, and we have proposed the creation of a new international system to help non-nuclear states to acquire the new sources of energy that they need, including through our proposed global enrichment bond, and we are today inviting interested countries to an international conference on these important themes later this year.

In return, we will seek agreement on tougher controls aimed at reducing weapons and preventing proliferation—first, by ending the stalemates on the fissile material cut-off treaty and the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty and, secondly, by achieving, after 2010, a more robust implementation of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty with the aim of accelerating disarmament among possessor states, preventing proliferation and, ultimately, freeing the world from nuclear weapons. And, as a new priority to meet the dangers both of proliferation to new states and of material falling into the hands of terrorists, we propose not only tougher action against potential proliferators such as Iran but new action against suppliers. We are seeking to strengthen export control regimes and build a more effective forensic nuclear capability in order to determine and expose the true source of material employed in any nuclear device. Having already reduced the number of our operationally available warheads by 20 per cent. and made our expertise available for the verifiable elimination of warheads, I can confirm that we, Britain, are ready to play our part in further disarmament.

As great a potential threat and as demanding of a co-ordinated international response is, of course, the risk from failing and unstable states. Again, the national security strategy published today proposes a new departure—and, again, it is a lesson learned from recent conflicts ranging from Rwanda and Bosnia to Iraq, Afghanistan and Somalia. It proposes to create a stand-by international civilian capability so that for fragile and failing states, we can act quickly and comprehensively by combining the humanitarian, peacekeeping, stabilisation and reconstruction support that those countries need. In the same way as we have military forces ready to respond to conflict, we must have civilian experts and professionals ready to deploy quickly to assist failing states and to help rebuild countries emerging from conflict, putting them on the road to economic and political recovery.

I can tell the House that Britain will start by making available a 1,000-strong UK civilian stand-by capacity that will include police, emergency service professionals, judges and trainers. I am calling on EU and NATO partners to set high and ambitious targets for their contributions to such a force.

Between now and 2011, Britain is offering £600 million for conflict prevention, conflict resolution and stabilisation work around the world, including work in Israel and Palestine, Darfur, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Iraq and Afghanistan, Kenya and the Balkans. As we assume our presidency of the UN Security Council in May, we are proposing an appeal by the UN Secretary-General for a co-ordinated crisis recovery fund to provide immediate support where reconstruction is needed, to which Britain will be prepared to contribute.

Specifically, because we know the importance of peace in Darfur, I am announcing today more help from Britain to train, equip and employ African troops for the joint UN-African Union peacekeeping operation. Given the importance of safeguarding peace in Somalia, I can announce that Britain will help to pay for 850 Burundian troops as part of the African Union peacekeeping force there. Given the critical importance of economic and political reconstruction complementing military action as the elected Afghan Government face down the Taliban, we are proposing an integrated civilian-military headquarters—headed by a civilian—that will now be constituted in Helmand. And in Iraq, where we have already brought electricity and water supplies to more than 1 million citizens, we are stepping up our contribution to the work of long-term economic reconstruction by supporting the Basra development commission, led for the British by the businessman Michael Wareing who is doing an excellent job.

In order to maximise our contribution to all the new challenges of peacekeeping, humanitarian work and stabilisation and reconstruction, the Secretary of State for Defence is also announcing this afternoon that, as part of a wider review, the Government will now examine how our reserve forces can more effectively help with stabilisation and reconstruction in post-conflict zones around the world. With this year being the 100th anniversary of the Territorial Army, I want to pay tribute to the servicemen and women in our reserves, who provide such an essential element of our nation's defence.

Mr. Speaker, the security strategy published today also makes it clear that, as well as being able to respond to crises as they develop, we need to be able to tackle the underlying drivers of conflict and instability. Those include poverty, inequality and poor governance, where by focusing on areas where poverty breeds conflict, we have quadrupled Britain's aid budget and we are pushing for bold international action to meet the millennium development goals.

The second set of underlying drivers is climate change and competition for natural resources, where we are leading the way in arguing for a post-2012 international agreement and for a new global fund to help developing countries mitigate and adapt to climate change, including in the areas most under stress and therefore most likely to suffer instability as well as humanitarian disasters.

The third drivers are disease and global pandemics, where, with the World Health Organisation, the priority is to improve early warning systems, to increase global vaccine supplies and to help put in place a more co-ordinated global response. Given the importance of building stability and countering violent extremism in the middle east and south Asia, we are also increasing the number of Foreign Office staff there by 30 per cent.

Among all the security challenges to citizens of this country covered by the new strategy, the most serious and urgent remains the threat from international terrorism. As the head of MI5 has said, Britain is facing 30 known plots and is monitoring 200 networks and about 2,000 individuals. There have been 58 convictions for terrorism in just over a year and the Home Secretary is announcing today that we will have four regional counter-terrorism units and four regional intelligence units, significantly increasing anti-terrorism police capability in the regions. Since the events of 11 September, on suspicion of being a threat to national security or fostering extremism, 300 individuals have been prevented from entering the country. Now—backing up the unified border agency, compulsory ID cards for foreign nationals and our proposals in the Counter-Terrorism Bill that would allow us in unique circumstances to extend detention to ensure full investigation of terror threats—the Government will match stronger action against those whom we suspect of stirring up tensions with collaborative work with our European partners to strengthen the EU rules on deporting criminals—a matter that I shall discuss with President Sarkozy when he visits Britain next week.

For action against terrorism and against organised crime, it is important to strengthen Europol and Eurojust, to ensure the rapid and secure exchange of information across borders, and to speed up the extradition of criminals and the confiscation of their assets. Starting with the United Arab Emirates, we are signing more agreements so that once the assets of a convicted criminal are seized in one country, with the assistance of the other, both countries will get a share of the proceeds.

Our new approach to security also means local resilience against emergencies: building and strengthening local capacity to respond effectively to a range of circumstances from floods to potential terrorism incidents. That means not the old cold-war idea of civil defence, but a new form of civil protection that combines expert preparedness at local level for potential emergencies with a greater local engagement of individuals and families themselves. Next month the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government will report on additional measures that we propose for young people in colleges and universities, in prisons and working in faith communities to disrupt the promoters of violent extremism, all building on the support of the vast majority of people of all faiths and all backgrounds who condemn terrorism, terrorists and their actions.

The national security strategy shows a Britain resolute in the face of an unstable and increasingly uncertain international security landscape. It demonstrates the lessons that we and other countries have learnt in recent years: that we must expand our policing, security and intelligence capacity—and we are doing so; that we must do more to prevent conflict by, for instance, more effective international control of arms—and we are doing so; and that we must strengthen the effectiveness of international institutions to promote stability and reconstruction, for which we have presented proposals today.

We will always be vigilant, will never leave ourselves vulnerable, and will support and at all times and wherever necessary strengthen—as we do today—our defence and civilian support for national security.

I commend my statement to the House.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): I thank the Prime Minister for his statement. Let me first put on record the huge debt of gratitude that we owe the police, the security services and our armed forces for the work that they do to keep our country safe.

The Prime Minister made a very wide-ranging statement, and there was much in it that we support. We welcome the idea, which we have long supported, of a stand-by civilian capacity so that we can act quickly in fragile or failing states. We also support the idea of a cross-cutting manifesto for forces' families. I set it out in my party conference speech two years ago, and I am glad that it is bearing fruit. We strongly back what the Prime Minister said about greater co-ordination of our effort in Helmand province. Anyone who has been there knows that that really is needed.

However, I want to focus my questions on the theory and practice of a national security approach. The statement has been a long time coming, and at first sight it looks—and sounded from the Prime Minister—rather more like a list than a strategy. It would help if instead of announcing a series of things that the Secretary of State for Defence or the Home Secretary is to announce, the Prime Minister simply told us more clearly what will change and why the position will be different. Owing to the tenor of his approach, that did not come across at all clearly. That may be because the strategy has had a very difficult birth. According to sources inside Downing street,

"it... has proved a bit of a disaster... Its genesis has been marked by delays, indecisiveness at the top, a total lack of funds"—

[Interruption.] I am reading because it is a very long quotation. The hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Austin) has been warned before. He is slowly getting closer to the door—he used to sit behind the Prime Minister—and, as I said yesterday, apparently the door is what he will be going through. The quotation continues

"and some glorious Whitehall squabbling."

We will study the strategy in detail, but the idea of a national security strategy—

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Jacqui Smith): Shocking!

Mr. Cameron: Shocking? It is shocking when people interrupt all the time when I am trying to reply to the statement.

The idea of a national security strategy is one that we welcome. The need for a national security approach is clear: the threats to our national security, from terrorism to climate change and energy security, have proliferated, and the Government must adapt to deal with them. That is why, in 2006, my party said that it was time not just for a national security strategy but for a national security council. Does the Prime Minister agree that a national security strategy will work only if it is put in place and carried out properly? To achieve that, three things must happen. First, institutions in the UK need to be properly organised to deliver a national security approach. Secondly, we need to understand fully the connections between foreign and domestic policy, and how they impact on our security. Thirdly, and vitally, any strategy will make sense only if the Government follow through and take all the necessary practical steps.

[Mr. Cameron]

Let me take each of those in turn. Can the Prime Minister explain why the Government have decided to set up a national security forum—another talking shop—instead of a proper national security council? Surely, a proper national security council would have dedicated staff—[Interruption.] Perhaps the Prime Minister will sit and wait, then he can answer the questions at the end. A proper national security council would have dedicated staff and decision-making powers. It would be at the heart of Government, with all the relevant Ministers, and it would be chaired by the Prime Minister. We do not have that; we should have it. Can he explain how a forum and an existing Cabinet committee can drive the implementation of a national security strategy across all Departments? Are we not in danger of having a talking shop and confusion?

On the connection between foreign and domestic policy, is there going to be a properly joined-up approach? The Prime Minister talked about a single security budget, but will it genuinely cover all the areas? For instance—and I have asked him about this before—will the single security budget include special branch, which is currently funded by separate forces? The United Kingdom must retain the power, properly funded, to intervene abroad militarily when necessary, as the strategy says, but we must understand that military operations abroad have consequences for security at home. As the Joint Intelligence Committee warned, our interventions in Iraq and Afghanistan, which we supported, increase in the short term the threat of terrorism domestically in the UK, yet we have to ask whether all the necessary action was taken domestically at the time. It is clear that the answer is no.

That leads to the third issue—the importance of following through on the national security strategy. The Prime Minister has a number of questions to answer. First, why, despite Government statements to the contrary, has he still not banned Hizb ut-Tahrir, which is clearly a gateway group that seeks to poison young minds against our country and way of life? [Interruption.] He says, "My goodness", but the previous Prime Minister said that he would ban it, so why has it not happened? Why, despite rightly preventing the preacher of hate, Yusuf al-Qaradawi, from entering Britain following our recommendation to do so, has he not followed the lead of the Irish Government and excluded Ibrahim Moussawi, a spokesman for the terrorist organisation, Hezbollah, who recently conducted a speaking tour of the UK? Why has his Government allowed public money to end up in the hands of extremist groups such as the Muslim Brotherhood? Does he understand the damage done to our reputation by the perception that the UK has allowed itself to become a terrorist breeding ground and a threat to others? Why, despite the urgent need to secure our borders, does he still refuse to create a proper border police force with enforcement powers? What is holding him back from those obvious and necessary measures?

May I end by asking the Prime Minister to begin his response by answering the following question? A national security approach will not succeed unless we learn from the mistakes that have been made in the past. In the statement, he talked about learning the lessons from conflicts such as Rwanda and Iraq. With that in mind, does he not think it is time to establish the promised inquiry into the conduct of the Iraq war? To say that that cannot be done while our forces are still in Basra is effectively to kick this into the very long grass, and it flies in the face of the fact that the United States, for instance, has held such inquiries. When he stands at the Dispatch Box, will he answer that question and tell us when we will have that inquiry, which, if we are to make a national security strategy work, is clearly needed.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his support for the standby facility and for the co-ordination of our efforts in Helmand. I am grateful, too, for his support for our armed forces and security services generally. I am afraid, however, that only he can trivialise a national security statement. If he had done his research, he would know that there is a National Security Committee, which includes the Chief of the Defence Staff, the chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee, the heads of all the intelligence agencies—MI5, MI6 and GCHQ—the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, and the head of the Association of Chief Police Officers, who attend the meetings. The terms of reference are to consider issues relating to national security and the Government's international and European policies, as well as their international development policies. What the right hon. Gentleman is asking for we have already. It is chaired by the Prime Minister, and it met only last week. It meets regularly to look at the relationship between domestic and international issues, and it has been in existence for several months, apparently without his knowing about it.

The right hon. Gentleman raised the question of an inquiry on Iraq and asked what lessons we have learned. I made it very clear in my statement that we are expanding our policing, security and intelligence capability. We want to do more on the early prevention of conflicts by more effective international control of arms. We want to strengthen the international institutions to promote stability and reconstruction, and, of course, our forces, including the security forces, are always vigilant. As for an inquiry, four inquiries have reported to the House on conditions related to the action in Iraq. It would not be a good use of Ministry of Defence resources to have to reply to an inquiry, when we have troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. It would not be right, when we have troops in danger and at risk, particularly in Iraq, for the country to turn its attention to an inquiry instead of doing everything we can to protect them. We will therefore be consistent in our judgment, even if his party is not consistent on this matter, that the right time to look at these issues and review the lessons learned is when our troops have finished the work in Iraq, which they are conducting with great efficiency. They deserve our full support, the wholehearted attention of the Ministry of Defence and the support of all the institutions of government.

I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman about the thesis behind the work that we are doing. As I said at the beginning of the statement, there is growing recognition that we cannot distinguish between issues that are somehow "over there", as if they have no effect on our country, whether they concern the environment, terrorism or national disasters, and what happens in our own country. It is a fact, as we found with 11 September, that the richest citizen in the richest city in the richest country can be directly affected by what is happening to the poorest citizens in the poorest countries in other parts of the world. Our security strategy must reflect that, which is why we are looking at what we can do internationally on the control of weapons and to rebuild international institutions. That is why, too, we are looking at what we can do domestically do improve our resilience.

The right hon. Gentleman raised the issue of people who have come into the country. Three hundred potential terrorists or people suspected of extremism have been refused admission into the UK in recent years, so we are alert in taking action against those who pose a danger. As he knows, the decision was made to refuse Mr. al-Qaradawi a visa—he has not applied for entry into the UK—for this country. Mr. Moussawi came to the UK in December and again on 28 February. On both occasions, his visit passed without incident. In all those cases, however, we keep matters under review. In relation to Hizb ut-Tahrir, I have said that we will be vigilant in examining its activities. Our consistent advice is not to give that organisation the oxygen of publicity by banning it. We wish, however, to keep it under review. We will always take the action that is necessary, but we will look at it case by case, and everyone with a sensible voice on these matters in the House would propose that we do so.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I am grateful to the Prime Minister for his statement. Before dealing it, may I say that we have witnessed some breathtaking political opportunism, because the leader of the Conservative party pressed for an inquiry into a war that he and all his colleagues signed up to support lock, stock and barrel, with no questions asked? Perhaps we need an inquiry into how his party has flip-flopped on Iraq.

I agree that an overarching view of the different threats to our nation's security is necessary. However, I hope that the Prime Minister agrees that the document that he has put before the House is the beginning, rather than the end, of the process. What we have heard today is an assessment of what the threats are, but not quite yet a strategic overview of how all those threats will be tackled. I hope that more time will be made available to the House to examine the document in greater detail.

Does the Prime Minister agree that many of the threats he has enumerated—terrorism, climate change, cross-border crime—cannot be dealt with by the United Kingdom on its own, and, indispensably, we can deal with them only as full and committed members of the European Union? I noted that in his statement he referred to the EU only third after the United States and NATO as a crucial forum in which many of the collective security threats will be tackled. Does that attach enough significance to the extent to which our membership of the EU affords us a certain safety in numbers?

The Prime Minister has in the past talked about drawing red lines in Brussels. I wonder whether the time has now come for him also to draw red lines in our relationship with Washington. Why, for instance, has he entered into a secret deal with the United States Administration to base George Bush's "son of star wars" missile defence system on British soil? Does he seriously think that that enhances our national security?

The Prime Minister spoke about the need to have strengthened global institutions. I agree with that. We all agree that we need a rules-based multilateral system to safeguard all our security. Does he, however, think it is compatible with that view of the value of a strong, multilateral, rules-based system that he has been completely silent—so far at least—on President Bush's veto of the proposed ban on the use of torture by American military personnel around the world?

I hope the Prime Minister will also agree that security and liberty are two sides of the same coin. We should never be forced to accept that there should be a trade-off of one in favour of another—that our security can be promoted only by a sacrifice of our liberty. For that to be the case, does he also agree that any measures that infringe on our liberty in the name of security must be based on overwhelming, compelling evidence that they are necessary, and does he truly think that the Government have yet marshalled that overwhelming, compelling evidence in favour of their proposal to extend further the period of detention without charge?

The Prime Minister spoke of a wider review being undertaken by the Secretary of State for Defence. We all know that our armed forces are overstretched, overcommitted and under-resourced. Does the Prime Minister agree that as it has been 10 years since there was a full strategic defence review, it is high time that he announced a new full strategic review of our defence capabilities for today and the years ahead?

The Prime Minister: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will also acknowledge that we are spending more on defence every year, and we are making equipment available to our armed forces that was not available in the past. The Chief of the Defence Staff said only a few days ago that the forces were now better equipped than at any time for 40 years. That is because we have not only increased the budget for defence, but we have made available what are called urgent operational requirements to the Ministry of Defence, as a result of which £3.3 billion has been spent in Iraq and Afghanistan in the past two years—exactly the money the right hon. Gentleman was opposing only a few minutes ago when he raised another question in this House.

I have to correct the right hon. Gentleman on one or two issues. The ballistic missile defence system is for the Czech Republic and Poland, not the United Kingdom. The European Union does not have an official role in foreign and security policy; it is an intergovernmental organisation, in part for dealing with defence and security policy. He should understand that that is how the European countries interact for the preservation of security, and that that is why NATO is so important—and also why the Bucharest summit in the next few days is so important.

I also hope that the right hon. Gentleman supports what we have done for the armed forces, with up to £15,000 for retention so we can retain more of our highly qualified people in our armed forces for longer. That announcement of today will raise the number of people in the establishment—in the Army, Navy and Air Force—to a higher level than before.

As for the issue of torture, the right hon. Gentleman will know of our record of opposing torture in every part of the world. As for what he says about the powers of detention, he—and even the Conservative party—has supported the Liberty proposals that say there may be circumstances in which more than 28 days is necessary for arresting and interviewing someone before charge. I believe he should look seriously at the similarities between the original Liberty proposals and those we are putting forward. We are not saying that in every circumstance someone who is detained must be detained for up to 42 days; we are saying that there should be a reserve power and that if the Home Secretary, with others, decides it should be used, she would come to the House of Commons and ask for that power to be activated. That is very similar to the power proposed by Liberty that the right hon. Gentleman supported because he recognised that there may be circumstances in which it might be necessary to go beyond 28 days. That is not what is at dispute, even though he wants to think that is the issue. The issue is the mechanism that we use. I hope the Liberal party will rethink what I believe is an incredible position on this issue.

Margaret Beckett (Derby, South) (Lab): I warmly welcome the publication of this first national security strategy and its rich content, not least its drawing together of issues such as climate change and nuclear non-proliferation, which tend to be dealt with separately in public debate, but which are obviously part of a continuum in public policy making. I also very much welcome what the Prime Minister said about both the work of the Intelligence and Security Committee and greater resources for the agencies it monitors. Will he confirm that he recognises—as, I believe, does the Committee—the importance of maintaining the delicate balance between a welcome greater openness to Parliament and the public, and maintaining the operational effectiveness of those agencies on which our security so much depends?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for her comments. She pushed for non-proliferation when she was Foreign Secretary and made very important disarmament proposals, and we have drawn on the work she has done in today's national security strategy document. I also appreciate the work she is now doing as Chairman of the Intelligence and Security Committee. We will go ahead with our proposals, with a resolution to the House, for more parliamentary debate on security matters, and I believe all Members will welcome the fact that there will be wider debate on these issues. The national security strategy can be subject to hearings in public before the Intelligence and Security Committee, and I believe that there is agreement among Committee members that that would be a good thing to do. There will also be greater transparency over appointments to the Committee. I believe that these three measures will give the Committee an enhanced role in explaining to the public some of the difficult and complex issues of national security, but we will do nothing to put at risk what my right hon. Friend rightly says is the delicate and balanced relationship between the need to inform the public and the need to retain the support and confidence of security agencies, which do so much for the good of the country but which have to be protected in the work they do for reasons all Members regard as obvious. I believe that our proposals get the balance right.

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): The Prime Minister rightly paid tribute to the magnificent work that the Territorial Army is undertaking in overseas war zones. Will he and the Defence Secretary look to give an enhanced domestic role to the TA in dealing with security incidents at home, should they happen? If there is a major terrorism incident in this country, the regular Army and our security services will be hard-pressed. There could be an ideal role for the Territorial Army both in contributing to the security containment zone that will have to be set up, and in terms of the specialist units and dealing with the clean-up and the aftermath. The Territorial Army used to have a domestic role when some of our battalions were committed to NATO. This could be an ideal future role for it.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman makes a very important point, and I am grateful that there is a bipartisan approach. The review of the Territorials—it is 100 years since they were created, and it is appropriate that we have this review now—will look at exactly the issue he raises: their domestic as well as their international role. He rightly says that volunteers and the Territorial Army have played a great role in civil emergencies in recent years; we want to look at that as part of the review, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will feel able to contribute to it.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I, too, warmly welcome the Prime Minister's statement, with its emphasis on co-ordination and benchmarking. On parliamentary accountability, the last time the Select Committee on Home Affairs took evidence from the head of MI5 we travelled in a car that had darkened windows, we entered the building through the garage and we had a private session. Even though the information he gave us was excellent, we could not quote from it in our report. Will other Committees be able to take evidence from the head of MI5 in public, where it better informs us of decisions, so that we can report back to Parliament?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend rightly points to the co-operation and briefings that he has received as part of the Home Affairs Committee's work from the head of MI5. We should return to the question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Margaret Beckett). It is important to get the balance right between the desire to show to the public as much as possible of the work that we are doing in the most open and transparent way and the need to protect our security services in the work that we do. We will continue to get that balance right.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that although there are things to welcome in this statement—to call it a strategy would be to over-egg the pudding—as so often with the Prime Minister, the rhetoric collides with the reality? We no longer have strong, balanced and flexible armed forces—they are grossly overstretched and underfunded, and we cannot go on paying retention bonuses for anything other than a sticking plaster operation. The right hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg), the leader of the Liberal Democrats, is right to call for a defence review so that some necessary major procurement decisions may be taken for the future. We cannot run a procurement policy on urgent operational requirements. We must be able to take the decisions about the carriers and about Trident, areas that all need examining again.

The Prime Minister: We have already made our decisions about Trident and have set aside the money for that to happen. We have set aside money for aircraft carriers as well. We have the biggest equipment budget in history and, at the same time, we are spending more current money on our defence forces every year. That is why we have the second largest defence budget in the world. I believe that the hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that our defence forces are not strong—they are strong and we are proud of them for being strong, and they are flexible and we are proud of them for being flexible. I know that he is a prolific reader, but I doubt whether he has read the full national security strategy in the past few minutes. I hope that on reflection, once he has read it, he will be able to praise the work that we have done and contribute to the debate on it for the future. We will annually update the national security strategy, and obviously we welcome any comments from him.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I very strongly welcome the parts in my right hon. Friend's statement about nuclear weapons, not least because the terrorists' capacity to obtain them is a serious one. In the same vein, does he recognise that biological and chemical weapons possibly pose an even bigger threat? It is probably easier for terrorists to obtain access to those weapons because of the nature of them. Will he give the same urgency to dealing with chemical and biological weapons—the so-called "poor man's nuclear weapons"?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who takes a huge interest in these matters having been a Minister at the Foreign Office. He rightly says that although I emphasised in my statement the measures that we wish to take to promote nuclear disarmament, references are also made in the national security strategy document to the dangers and risks posed by chemical and biological weapons. He is right to say that the dangers of those weapons falling into the hands of potential terrorists mean that we have to examine not only the owners of those weapons but who is supplying them. We now have excellent ability to do post-fact detection of who the supplier is, which should enable us to locate the suppliers of chemical, biological and nuclear weapon parts and take strong action against them. That is an important part of the national security strategy that we have published.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): What role does the Prime Minister foresee for Her Majesty's Coastguard in national security?

I was in Darfur a few weeks ago, where I was briefed by some African Union's senior military figures. They told me that a no-fly zone and a dozen attack helicopters were urgently necessary. Both of those points were raised 12 months ago, but people are still dying who would not be dying if those things were put in place.

Finally, the Prime Minister refers to a more robust implementation of the non-proliferation treaty. Is the renewal of Trident not a breach of that treaty anyway?

The Prime Minister: No is the answer to the third question.

I praise the work of Her Majesty's coastguards—indeed, I visited many of them some weeks ago to thank them for the work they do both on rescue and on the security of the country.

As for Darfur, I agree with the hon. Gentleman: this is a human tragedy that is being acted out, involving a threat to the lives of young children as well as to those of adults. He rightly says that we should consider a no-fly zone. The problem with such a zone, as I have said before in this House, is that we are dealing with an area the size of France—a massive geographical area. Therefore, the aircraft requirement to be able to police a no-fly zone is way beyond what countries are prepared—or able at this time, because of other action in Afghanistan and elsewhere—to supply. That is the problem in respect of a no-fly zone at the moment. People must be realistic enough to recognise that it is difficult enough to get the supply of helicopters that he is talking about, so staffing and policing a no-fly zone is very difficult, even when aerial bombings, which are completely unacceptable, are taking place.

As I said last week in the House, the way forward in Darfur is to get the peace negotiations started again, to get both sides—not only the Government, but the rebel groups that never came to the original proposals for the peace talks only a few weeks ago—to the talks and to get the African Union and United Nations force in to back up whatever settlement can be agreed. Those are the priorities, and I hope that we can move forward on them with speed.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): The Prime Minister mentioned the new civilian capability. Can he tell me whether he intends UK industry to participate in that organisation so that it, too, can play its part?

The Prime Minister: We have an industrial strategy for the defence industries that was published a few months ago. It will be regularly updated, it is the source of a great deal of consultation with the defence manufacturers and it is a very important part of building confidence in this country's defence manufacturing industries. We will continue this collaboration, which has been of great use to us in the past and has been intensified in recent years.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Although I welcome the Prime Minister's earlier answer on the Territorial Army and reserves, may I urge him to look across the Atlantic at the model of the National Guard, which, besides making a remarkable contribution in dealing with both Hurricane Katrina and the aftermath of 9/11, also provides highly effective combat brigades and fast jet fighter squadrons for use in Iraq? May I suggest that the basic lesson that we can learn from America is that an organisation is most successful—the National Guard is the only part of the American armed forces that is fully recruited—when it is led at all levels by volunteer reserves, when it has a real footprint in every part of the country and, above all, when it is used as a force in its own right, be that for combat, peacekeeping, disaster relief and so on, and not merely as a provision of spare parts for the regular counterparts?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is a great champion of the Territorial Army and I understand his deep interest in these matters. I believe that the proposals that he puts forward and his desire that we look at what is successful in other countries, including the United States of America, are things that we can draw on during this review. I hope that he will contribute his thoughts to the Defence Secretary as he moves forward with the review.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): I particularly welcome the support that the Prime Minister will be giving to our armed forces and the £20 million homes investment plan, although more may be needed in respect of social housing. On climate change, it is essential that we develop a strategy for sustainable global security. Will he have talks with the Oxford Research Group in delivering the new role that climate change will play at the heart of our global strategy?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right about the importance of taking action on climate change. That is why not only are we making proposals for international action to secure a post-2012 agreement, but we are proposing that the World Bank should take on a new role as a world bank for the environment, as well as for development, so that it can provide money for energy-efficiency schemes and for alternative sources of energy to be invested in by some of the poorer countries in the world. International co-operation is vital to deal with the problems of climate change. She probably knows that we are sponsoring a major afforestation project in the Congo basin. It is one of many projects that we are prepared to support with the environmental transformation fund.

My hon. Friend also raises the issue of armed forces' accommodation. In total, £5 billion has been allocated for improvements in accommodation over many years, but is important that we make a start as quickly as possible with some of the schemes that can give the greatest results. That is why the £20 million set aside for these armed forces equity sharing and home ownership pilots is important to send a message to members of the armed forces that as they prepare to move to new careers later, we will help them to buy their first home.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Could the Prime Minister give some indication of the implications of this statement for the Department for International Development, which plays a key role in fragile and failing states and in conflict prevention, resolution and stabilisation? Does he agree that it may be an appropriate time to review the fairly severe staffing constraints on that Department, if it is to be able to provide civilian support and co-ordination, as well as poverty reduction?

Can the Prime Minister also give me an indication of the proposal for Helmand for an integrated civilian-military headquarters headed by a civilian? How will that relate to the provincial reconstruction team that is already established? Is it a replacement for that or something that will have to co-ordinate with it? Is he able to give a clearer steer on how that will operate?

The Prime Minister: They will work together. The right hon. Gentleman may know that we are determined to move as quickly as possible to appoint a development co-ordinator in Afghanistan, as that is urgently needed. As he will know, Lord Ashdown would have been a great appointment to that job, but that was not possible. Now we have a proposal for a regional appointment and I hope that that will make quick progress.

On aid, I have to disagree with the right hon. Gentleman. The budget of DFID, and Britain's aid budget generally, has quadrupled from £2.1 billion to nearly £9 billion by 2011, so there is additional money available for the priorities of the Department. He is right to say that in places such as Iraq and Afghanistan—as well as in Africa and in Israel, and in dealing with the Palestinian authorities—we will need DFID. If we are to combine humanitarian aid, peacekeeping, stabilisation and reconstruction, it has a key role to play.

Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South) (Lab): I, too, welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to climate change. Will he support my proposals for a world environment court and review the work of the working group chaired by Stephen Hockman QC to ensure that the Kyoto targets and the post-Kyoto targets are enforceable?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful for the interest that my hon. Friend has taken in this matter and the effort he makes in his constituency to persuade young people, especially schoolchildren, to take an interest in the environment. His proposal for the world environment court is an interesting one. We have to get to the first stage first, and that is persuading all countries to accept binding targets. That will be our priority in the post-2012 negotiations, and we will ally to that our proposal that funding be made available to developing countries to persuade them that it is in their interests to sign up to those agreements. How we make those agreements binding is a matter for the discussions, and obviously his proposal is one that will be taken into account.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): I note with interest the Prime Minister's comments about recruitment and retention, and about supporting servicemen's families. Part of that package is facing up to things that go wrong, and the coroner's inquest is where many of those things are brought to light, as happened in the case of Captain James Philippson, who was sadly let down by a lack of equipment. Will the Prime Minister request the Secretary of State for Defence to row back in trying to gag our coroners and dilute their comments? Will the Prime Minister also ask that the Minister for the Armed Forces retract the comments that appeared to cast a slur on Captain James Philippson's comrade-in-arms, Major Bristow?

The Prime Minister: I hope the hon. Lady will acknowledge that we have made more money available to make it possible for coroners' inquests to move more quickly. We understand the grief that is experienced by relatives, the desire for closure and the problems that arise if inquests are delayed or are slow in happening. However, I do not agree with her interpretation of the letter from the Secretary of State for Defence. It is important that the coroner's inquest does the work it is intended to do by statute.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that today the security agencies are watching more than 2,000 people whom they believe have serious terrorist intent. Those people will have multiple identities and their behaviour is little known to us. It is therefore important for the House to hear the argument for pre-charge detention clearly and carefully put so that we can be confident in supporting it, because it is definitely needed.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because the balance between the needs of liberty and security is an important issue. It is also important to recognise that our constitution is founded on the liberty of the individual, but all parties now seem to have accepted that there may be occasions when it is necessary to go beyond 28 days for the pre-charge interviews, if that is necessary for a proper charge to be laid. That is what the debate is about. All parties agree that there may be circumstances in which that might have to happen. The question is whether we can agree on the mechanics of it, and that is what the debate will be about.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I join others in paying tribute to the fantastic job done by our servicemen and women, and the police services, in keeping our country safe both at home and abroad. I welcome many elements of this comprehensive statement today, in particular the help given to service personnel and their families, although I am sure that the Prime Minister will agree that more could and should be done on that front.

On the specific issue of the national security forum, the Prime Minister referred to the threat posed to this country's security by the IRA over many years. Indeed, the threat continues in relation to dissident groups in Northern Ireland. He talks of drawing on experience from outside government. Would he undertake to consider the experience and expertise available in Northern Ireland, which—tragically—have been built up over many years? I am sure that they would be made available to assist in protecting the country from the current more diverse but very challenging threat to its security.

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. We have to draw on the expertise that is available from all parts of the United Kingdom. I assure him that what he says will be taken into account in formulating the membership of the national security forum, but also in learning the lessons from the actions that had to be taken against terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Point of Order

1.26 pm

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I point out that the Prime Minister has misled this House, both about the position of my party but more importantly—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot say that. He must withdraw that remark.

Chris Huhne: On your advice, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that point, but it is clear—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must withdraw the remark without qualification. My ruling is that that is not a point of order. Are there any other points of order?

Chris Huhne rose—

Mr. Speaker: It had better not be on the same issue, because the hon. Gentleman has just made a mess of it. Points of order are not about extending the statement that we have just heard.

Chris Huhne: Please hear what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear what he has to say, but I warn him that I will stop him if it is not a point of order.

Chris Huhne: This morning on the "Today" programme, a Minister made exactly the same point as the Prime Minister just made and was subsequently corrected by Liberty about its position. Liberty does not have the ability to correct the matter in the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is one thing that I am not responsible for, it is the organisation Liberty. It can speak for itself.

Local Authority Powers (Election Campaigns)

1.28 pm

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to impose restrictions on the types of decisions that local authorities can take during specified periods prior to local elections; and for connected purposes.

I hope not to take up the full 10 minutes, because I know that we are coming to an important debate on post office closures to which many of my hon. Friends wish to contribute. Many Ministers have also been working hard in their constituencies and no doubt they, too, will want to get their views on the record.

The objective of the Bill is to bring local councils in line with Parliament and to prevent any major decisions from being taken during the period of a local election campaign. For Parliament, there is Cabinet Office guidance for what is known as the pre-election period about the types of decisions that can be made. It states:

"During an election campaign, the Government retains its responsibility to govern and Ministers remain in charge of their Departments. Essential business must be carried on.

However, it is customary for Ministers to observe discretion in initiating any NEW action of a continuing or long term character.

Decisions on matters of policy on which a new Government might be expected to want an opportunity to take a different view from the present Government should be postponed until AFTER the Election."

So it is official that no major decisions can be made during the four weeks of an election campaign but, following the Prime Minister's recent performance, I am led to believe that he might not be aware that it is just those four weeks. He seems to be doing it all the time.

No such rule applies to local authorities. It could be argued that we do not need such a policy, because we know when the election date will be and if we are all fair about it councils can ensure that no ambiguous, controversial or large financial decisions are made during that election period. Guess which party in local government decided to exploit that loophole and to take advantage of the absence of policy? Yes, I am afraid that it was our dear friends the Liberal Democrats, who will do anything to get elected. They will cuddle you during the daytime only to cross you by nightfall. They scandalously seek and practise power without responsibility.

By way of illustration, let me take the House back to last year's local elections and the night of 3 May 2007. It was a great evening, as you may recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when the Conservatives gained 921 seats. The Liberal Democrats, I am afraid, lost 246 seats, but it was described by the then leader of the Lib Dems, the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), as a mixed bag of results—not an accurate judgment, I think, of the day's events.

In Bournemouth, the big issue on the campaign trail was a proposal by the incumbents—the Lib Dems—to build a multi-million pound development on Bournemouth's sea front. Such was the unpopularity of the proposal that it contributed to the Lib Dems' losing control of the town hall. They lost 23 seats, returning only seven councillors out of 51.

On the election night itself, long after the working day was over, the Lib Dems tiptoed into the town hall, not to clear their desks or pick up their sandals, knowing that they would not be back in office, but to place the final signature on a controversial contract that committed the people of Bournemouth to a massive seafront development that they did not want. Why did they do this? Nobody knows. Even cross-examination by Jeremy Paxman on "Newsnight" could not get the chief local Lib Dem plotter, the aptly named Councillor Fudge, properly to explain that malicious, selfish and vindictive behaviour. Yes, there were inquiries. Even the Electoral Commission got involved, but it was eventually determined that nothing illegal had been done. Morally and ethically speaking, however, I believe that the Lib Dems are guilty as charged as they deliberately burdened a town with a development that it did not want and the new administration with the costs that it campaigned so hard to avoid.

My Bill would prevent such scandals from being repeated and other councils from being subjected to such tactics. How would it work? It would require all local authorities to introduce a policy preventing major financial or controversial decisions being made in the four weeks leading up to an election. It would be up to the individual councils to determine the size of the budget and the other parameters. All that would be required would be that the matter be debated locally and local decisions be made.

Local authorities need not wait for my Bill, which I hope will be passed, but can adopt an appropriate policy themselves. I encourage them to do so. However, the purpose of the Bill is to ensure that no council would be subjected to the costly, time-consuming and completely avoidable dramas endured by Bournemouth. I urge hon. Members to support the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): The Question is that the hon. Gentleman have leave to bring in his Bill—

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I would like to oppose the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should rise a little more promptly.

1.33 pm

Simon Hughes: I rose immediately.

I just want to say a few words that show that the Bill is unnecessary. I have not followed the Bournemouth events in detail, but my understanding is that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) has not given the full picture of what happened before the local elections last year. My understanding of the position is that the political decision was taken entirely properly before the election period and that all that remained to be carried out was the implementation of that which was in the hands of officers. No new political decision was taken later at all.

If that is the case, which is what I am led to believe, the normal rules were followed in Bournemouth as they have been in many local authorities up and down the country. In Southwark back in the '80s, the outgoing Labour administration, thinking that it might be defeated at the polls, entered into a controversial planning application and a land property deal just before the election. The political decision was taken earlier, but the documents were signed on the day before the elections. I understand that that is legitimate if it is a matter of administration rather than political decision. If that is the case, the Bill is not necessary. We have plenty of legislation and plenty of controls on local councils, with an absolute guarantee that purdah applies in local government up to local elections in England.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who normally argues from his party's position, which is that we do not need more legislation, will reflect on the fact that more legislation restricting local government is the last thing that any party in local government wants and any council in administration wants. That includes his party, which now runs Bournemouth council.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tobias Ellwood, Sir John Butterfill, Mr. Desmond Swayne, Mr. Eric Pickles, Mr. Richard Benyon, Andrew Rosindell, Mr. Hugo Swire, Mr. David Evennett, Mr. Edward Vaizey, Greg Clark and Anne Main.

Local Authority Powers (Election Campaigns)

Mr. Tobias Ellwood accordingly presented a Bill to impose restrictions on the types of decisions that local authorities can take during specified periods prior to local elections; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 17 October, and to be printed [Bill 90].

Opposition Day

[7th Allotted Day]

Post Office Closures

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): We now come to the main business, the Opposition day debate on post office closures. I have to tell the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister and has placed a 12-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

1.37 pm

Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House regrets the proposal to close up to 2,500 post offices; recognises the vital role post offices play in local communities; notes the concern and unpopularity amongst the general public of closing such a large portion of the network; has concerns that the access criteria laid down for the closures consultation do not adequately take into account local geographical factors and public transport networks; is concerned that the consultation period is only for six weeks rather than three months, as recommended by Cabinet Office guidelines; believes that post offices must move with the times in the services they offer and that options for business expansion and developing business opportunities with local authorities should be explored further; and calls upon the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform to instruct Post Office Limited to suspend the compulsory closure of sub-post offices while these issues are re-assessed.

This matter affects both sides of the House in equal measure. I was concerned a moment ago that only two Labour Back Benchers were sitting in the Chamber but I see that the numbers are now swelling. I shall try to keep my remarks to a minimum, because I know that Members from all parties want to speak.

We are entering a critical phase of the Government's closure programme. Half of the country's constituencies have now gone through the process of consultation and as a result approximately 1,120 post offices are already destined to close. The network change is well on its way, yet the chorus of dissent that surrounded the then Secretary of State, now the Chancellor, when in 2006 he published his proposals for the most radical programme of cuts in the Post Office's history has not faded away, as his successor will have hoped. In fact, the more people encounter the process at first hand, the more they realise that it is not just unfair, but in many respects illogical; not just badly thought-through, but in some cases even avoidable.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Alan Duncan: I have hardly got off first base, but I will. If I may, I will set the scene and then give way to a series of interventions from Members from both sides of the House so that I do not end up taking 40 minutes. The quicker I get through this, the better it will be for allowing everybody to have the chance to say what they want to.

[Alan Duncan]

I agree with what the Secretary of State has said on numerous occasions: we have to face the facts about the future of postal services in this country. The debate has not been convened whimsically. We understand that the Post Office is haemorrhaging around £4 million a week; that the development of online mail has eviscerated part of the Post Office's traditional customer base; and that in this difficult business climate, uncertain times lie ahead.

Although the closure of post offices is one of the most emotional political issues, we in the Opposition do not lead with our heads. Let me make it clear that we fully expect the network to shrink in size. We have never given a guarantee that no post offices will close, because such a guarantee is not ours to give.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Alan Duncan: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, and then to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram).

Sir Robert Smith: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I thought that he might have been giving the Government too much of a defence in respect of the problems facing the Post Office. The effect of online ordering has been to increase the amount of delivery work undertaken by post offices. People order goods online, but delivering those goods is a new business opportunity for Royal Mail, with post offices as collection points.

Alan Duncan: The hon. Gentleman is potentially right, but we must distinguish between the post office network and Royal Mail, as it is the latter that makes those deliveries. That is an important distinction, and it must be admitted that the internet has displaced much of the revenue-earning activity previously enjoyed by post offices.

I give way to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes.

Mr. Ancram: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend. He was talking about the process by which the decision about closures was made. One post office to be closed in my constituency is in an area where a significant new housing programme is about to begin. The alternative post office is already notorious for being overcrowded and incapable of being expanded. Does that not suggest that the consultation process was a farce, and that what we are seeing is a lottery in order to meet a Government target?

Alan Duncan: My right hon. and learned Friend illustrates exactly the sort of example that is driving Members of this House to distraction. There appears to be a lack of commercial logic to many of the decisions being forced on the post office network.

Tony Baldry: My hon. Friend said that the consultation process was unfair, but is it not also fraudulent? In my area, we have been told that all that will happen if we succeed in persuading the Post Office to keep open one of the post offices that are threatened with closure in the Cherwell district is that it will simply go ahead and close another office in the district. It is clear that the Government are determined, come what may, to close all the post offices in Cherwell, however good the arguments against doing so may be. The consultation process is therefore wholly fraudulent.

Alan Duncan: My hon. Friend makes a crucial point. It is something that I want to expand on, ever so briefly, in a few minutes. If I may put it this way, we are involved in a game of pass the parcel. All hon. Members have in their constituencies post offices that are due to be shut, but if they succeed in keeping one office open, another one elsewhere will be closed. Therefore, what might appear to be a local success for one hon. Member becomes a local difficulty for another. That is one of the main problems that we face.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Committee has reported on post office closures. I put in a very detailed draft of evidence, including nine recommendations for changing the closure programme. However, 50 other hon. Members from both sides of the House also put forward evidence, and they included Front Benchers from the Conservative party. If the hon. Gentleman feels so strongly about this matter, why did he not offer any evidence to the Select Committee?

Alan Duncan: Because I think that it is improper for a Front Bencher to try to pre-empt and influence a Select Committee in that way. The proper way for me to speak about these matters is at the Dispatch Box in the House of Commons. That is what I am doing now, on a day when the hon. Gentleman has the opportunity to vote with the Opposition.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): My hon. Friend is wholly right about displaced closures, but the problem is worse than he suggests. In my constituency, the county council is negotiating about taking over the post office at Laverstock on the edge of Salisbury, but despite that, the Post Office is insisting on closing it on 1 April and on removing the post office equipment—even though it might be taken on by the county.

Alan Duncan: Again, my hon. Friend makes a good point. It fits exactly with the picture that we are painting—a picture that cannot fail to be persuasive for hon. Members on all sides of the House.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Committee—what used to be the Trade and Industry Committee—has looked into the matter quite deeply. The Committee is chaired by his colleague the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff). It looked at the cost of haphazard closures, and reluctantly accepted that the Government's plan was the only way forward. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) knows full well what the Committee recommended, and it looks a little sneaky to have this debate today, at a time when the Select Committee is away and the Chairman has no opportunity to reply. Is he afraid that some Conservative Back Benchers might have been persuaded by the Committee Chairman?

Alan Duncan: Much more sneaky is the fact that the hon. Gentleman is trying to hide behind the supposed conclusions of the Select Committee—which I think are not as he described—when he has signed the early-day motion in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). The wording of that early-day motion is exactly the same as the motion under consideration today, so he can have no option but to vote with us—along with the 35 other Labour Members who have echoed, word for word, what we are calling for in this debate.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): I was not one of those who signed the early-day motion that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, but is there not an element of hypocrisy in his approach? The previous Tory Government closed 3,542 post office branches. Why did they do that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman responds, I advise the House that the word "sneaky" is just about allowable, as is the right hon. Lady's use of the word "hypocrisy". However, we must be extremely careful about the words that we use. I know that hon. Members care very strongly about these matters, but we should nevertheless choose our words with care.

Alan Duncan: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think that the right hon. Lady should be aware of her own words. She said:

"I do not understand what the, so called, public consultation was for... I want Post Office Ltd to explain how this can amount to a meaningful public consultation, when they have ignored the views of 2,203 people."

We are seeing a picture of inconsistency, but my purpose today is not to keep on pointing out the inconsistency between what Labour Members say at a local level and how they might vote tonight; rather, I want to urge them to vote with us so that they can prove that they are honest and consistent.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that one concern for people in constituencies such as mine in West Dorset is that the Post Office has absolutely refused to enter into discussions about how we might provide the voluntary effort that would cut its costs and keep the services open? Is that not an extraordinary state of affairs?

Alan Duncan: My right hon. Friend is right, but only half right. The Post Office has declined to embrace both voluntary efforts and legitimate commercial efforts. Even worse, it is discriminating against the commercial options that post offices and shops should be allowed to enjoy.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Alan Duncan: I will, and then I shall do a rat-a-tat-tat after that.

Hon. Members: On the Table!

Mr. Weir: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. As a member of the BERR Committee, I should point out that we said that we reluctantly accepted that there would have to be some closures, but not necessarily those planned by the Government. In both our original report and the recent follow-up to it, we have questioned where the figure of 2,600 closures came from, and asked why that round figure was chosen.

Alan Duncan: I would love to see the envelope on the back of which that arbitrary number was written.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government and the Post Office have carried out the consultation process in an extremely underhand way? The process has been different in different areas of the country, and there have been attempts to gag the sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses involved. The Government and the Post Office have tried to prevent any shops that might subsequently be set up when a post office is closed from selling the same products for a year afterwards. That will make it very difficult for a village shop without a post office to carry on trading. Are not all such tactics underhand?

Alan Duncan: There is a grave suspicion that a lot of the tactics involved are underhand.

Alan Duncan: I shall take one more intervention from each side, then make some progress. I give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham).

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State, as he is being very patient and indulgent. There is serious anger many sub-postmasters in North-West Norfolk, who say that it is an outrage and a disgrace to be told that they will not get any redundancy pay if they carry on offering services for the lottery, the payment of utility bills, private courier services and so on. Does he agree that that is a disgraceful restraint of trade?

Alan Duncan: In my view it is, and I shall explain why in a moment. Finally, at least for the moment, I give way to the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter).

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman, who will be pleased to know that I plan to make some fairly harsh criticisms of the fundamental flaws in the consultation process.

I was attracted to the wording of the motion, but the hon. Gentleman has acknowledged that the post office network is losing a substantial amount of money. If I am to be tempted to vote for the motion, will he give an undertaking on behalf of his party to put £1.7 billion of investment into the network so that it can be sustained in a good old socialist fashion up to 2011?

Alan Duncan: I will not do that, and furthermore I do not need to do that to win the argument today, because the whole purpose of what we say is that we should give an opportunity for the money that is being spent to go a lot further, and give a lot of branches the opportunity to continue to exist; at the moment they are being bulldozed into submission.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alan Duncan: I will have a pause from taking interventions; I shall take more in two or three minutes.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Alan Duncan: Well, I think that I am obliged to give way to the Front Bencher of another party.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A few moments ago, an hon. Member suggested that the Select Committee on Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform indicated that it supported the Government's closure of 2,500 post offices. I have before me a press notice issued by the Select Committee. It says clearly:

"This is not a report about the principle of closing 2,500 sub post offices as that is settled government policy and one on which we have commented previously. It is a report about how the process is being managed and the implications for communities."

That is not the same as the Committee saying that it supports the closures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not, strictly speaking, a point of order for the Chair. It is more a matter that would normally be raised in the course of debate.

Alan Duncan: The time was when an hon. Member who had been put right with the kind of accuracy that my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) used would have stood up and apologised for the mistake.

Mr. Clapham: I will read out the recommendation in the report. It says quite clearly:

"We do not think it is satisfactory simply to accept that the network may continue to shrink in an unplanned way between now and 2011; Post Office Ltd should be obliged to use its best endeavours to keep the network at a minimum of 11,500 fixed outlets."

That is the report.

Alan Duncan: The hon. Gentleman had already stuck his finger in the fire; he would have been well advised not to do it again.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alan Duncan: I really should give way, one final time, to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), the official spokesman for her party.

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman likes to portray himself as the saviour of the post office network, but he does not have a plan for investing in upgrading the network. He was just asked a clear question about his plans for investment. He has a series of proposals, supposedly aimed at increasing revenue, but nothing on increasing the investment in modernising the post office network. How can he justify claiming that he can save all those post offices?

Alan Duncan: The investment in the post office network is, to a large extent, already made by private individuals who take a risk and invest in their own company—the family business—so the hon. Lady's question is misdirected. Much more pertinent is the question of what those businesses can be allowed to do to enable them to expand and have a prospect of survival, rather than annihilation. We would like them to be able to take on more tasks, so that they can expand the business that they can undertake. Sub-postmasters are entrepreneurs. They want to develop new services and they want to survive on business, rather than on subsidy.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Alan Duncan: No.

Sub-postmasters should be able to develop more financial services; they should be able to take on local council work; they should be able to take on Government services; and they should be able to do a lot of things that the Post Office currently forbids them to do. Let me briefly say why we think that the current activity forced on the Post Office by the Government is flawed.

Hugh Bayley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Alan Duncan: No. I will move on, as I said I would.

First, there are the flawed access criteria. They are simple, linear, as-the-crow-flies measures. There is no appreciation in them of hills, crossroads and main roads that have to be crossed. There is no proper appreciation of the nature of a community built around the use of a post office. Furthermore, a lot of the census figures and population figures that the Post Office is using are completely out of date and unrelated to the effective market catchment area of the post offices that are threatened with closure.

Many in this House think that the consultation is a sham. They know that the 2,500 figure has been picked out of the air. The Post Office is ramming through the closures, and if a Member of Parliament succeeds in keeping one post office open, another one will shut. Absurdly, someone who phoned up the Post Office and asked, "Excuse me, why is my village post office closing?" was told, "Because the postmaster wants to retire." "That is not true," said the caller; "I know it; I am the postmaster." What is more, community is being pitted against community, because when a post office in one village is saved, another is shut elsewhere.

As for the post offices that are told to close, there appears to be no rationale for distinguishing between the ones that the Secretary of State always cites as having only 20 transactions a week, and those that are far more active and very popular, and which are run alongside a profitable shop and are basically viable businesses that are being forced to close for no rational economic reason whatever.

We are calling for a freeze on the consultation. If the Government doubt whether that is possible, let us point out that, to a limited extent, they have done it already; they suddenly realised that their plans cut across the campaigning period for a local election and, indeed, a mayoral election, in which their own candidate even threatened judicial review because he is so against the policy of the Government whom he is once again pretending to support. The idea that there cannot be a freeze is absurd. There has been a semi-freeze already, and we think that there should be a suspension so that all the new ingredients that have become clear over the past few months can be factored into a revised programme that could perhaps, on the same money, allow many of those post offices that are currently being forced to shut to stay open.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman talks about maintaining viable post offices, but in fact only 4,000 post offices in this country are profitable—a word that he previously used. How many of the other 10,000 would he subsidise, and how many of them would be expendable under his plan?

Alan Duncan: I can but quote the hon. Gentleman's own website. To use his exact words, he "condemned the decision, which he said was inexplicable given the high levels of activity at each of the offices in question."

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the way in which he is making his case. Is he concerned that the 2,500 post offices are just the tip of the iceberg, as a number of other post offices have been closed on a temporary basis, including the one in Heath End in my constituency? Is that not just another political trick? The Government are trying to keep the number of those post offices out of the 2,500, but those post offices are also condemned.

Alan Duncan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Today we are hearing, basically from Members on both sides of the Chamber, sorry tales of how the closure programme is being implemented in their constituencies.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Alan Duncan: I give way to the hon. Gentleman, a fellow Leicestershire MP.

Mr. Reed: I would like the hon. Gentleman to return to the point that he started to make, but failed to finish, in reply to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster). He started to explain that he thought that a particular number of post offices would make for a viable network, but he rapidly moved on. Will he today commit himself to a figure, and will he say what additional expenditure and commitment the Government should make to ensure that the number is reached? Before he quotes back at us some of the proper representations that we have made in our constituencies, let me ask him to answer the question.

Alan Duncan: I have never called for a specific number. I am calling for some logic in the judgment on which post offices are viable and should remain open, and which are not.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alan Duncan: I shall make a few more points; I promised I would not take up too much time, but this has been a shared performance. However, the clock is ticking away. Let me come on to something that I think is enormously important, both for urban and rural communities, namely the link between the post office and the shop. In many post offices, and most of those threatened with closure, there is an alliance with a shop that is part of the same business, and is on the same premises. A shop is an essential part of any community. It is its focal point, its hub. We are not just talking about the end of the opportunity to go and buy some stamps and post a letter; more often than not, the closure of the shop is in harness, in tandem, or in parallel with the closure of the post office.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con) rose—

Alan Duncan: I will give way to my hon. Friend, and then I want to say why what is happening at the moment is especially pernicious.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: Perhaps I can give my hon. Friend some more ammunition. In Bicknoller in my constituency, we have a voluntary shop and post office. Every single volunteer goes there because they want to, and the postmaster gives everything that he earns back to the post office, yet it is still being shut. When I asked the Post Office why, it said, "It needs to be shut; you haven't got enough people," even though everything goes back into that shop to keep it going. Does not my hon. Friend find that ridiculous?

Alan Duncan: The post office network and shops are private enterprises. Families have risked money and borrowed—often against their only residence—to start and run a business. Many who have started to do that only recently, having taken a risk in good faith so that their shop can go hand in hand with the post office, are finding that the rug has been pulled from beneath them, that the shop and the post office will go, and that they may not be able to meet their debts.

Alan Duncan: I shall give way to hon. Gentlemen in a moment. I want to make a couple of important points first.

I am extremely concerned, as are hon. Members in all parts of the House, about the way that the compensation is working. It is all very well to offer a postmaster compensation in the hope that he will not face financial adversity, should the post office shut, but that compensation attaches only to the post office. As I have already said, many of those enterprises run in parallel with a shop. What is deeply pernicious is the way in which the Post Office is setting terms and conditions on the compensation in a way which, as well as closing the post office, will also destroy the shop.

What the Post Office is doing, which I think amounts to a restraint of the trade of shopkeepers, is saying that if they take the money for closing down the post office counter, they will be prohibited thereafter from doing certain things in the shop. They will not be allowed to sell lottery tickets. They will not be allowed to conduct certain transactions which, in the eyes of the Post Office, might technically compete with it. They will not, for instance, be able to install a PayPoint terminal, which is a revenue-earning service for the shop, but competes with the Post Office. So in offering compensation, the Post Office is effectively putting a restrictive covenant on trade that could be enjoyed by the shop. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West

[Alan Duncan]

(Rob Marris) says, "Standard business practice". If he thinks it is standard to be so irresponsible, let me tell him that I do not.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): It is standard business practice. I know that as a lawyer working in employment law. There are restrictive covenants in all kinds of contracts with respect to the activities that an individual may and may not undertake. People sign up to that. It is a financial transaction. Furthermore, as the hon. Gentleman knows, it is a financial transaction with those restrictions which is supported by the National Federation of SubPostmasters.

Alan Duncan: If the hon. Gentleman really thinks that the future viability of the Post Office will be undermined and destroyed by village shops being able to get someone to pay a bill at their counter, the advice that he might have given to business in the past does not bear scrutiny.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that there may be something else that we are in danger of losing—the post office branch as a social safety net? There are those who are alone and possibly elderly, who come into the post office regularly for benefits or pensions. If they do not come in one week, perhaps the only person who will notice is the sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress. If the branch is no longer open, who does my hon. Friend think will fulfil that role?

Alan Duncan: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I have no doubt that it will be made in the debate in future.

Alan Duncan: I shall make progress and then give Labour Members a final chance to chip in. I am conscious of the clock. The House can tell that I have been racing through my remarks as quickly as possible. I want to give hon. Members a chance to speak, but I shall point out aspects that matter particularly to Labour Members.

There was an early-day motion at the beginning of the year signed by 35 Members from the Labour Benches. It is pretty well word for word the motion before the House today. The only respect in which I have heard that it is thought to be different is the use of the word "instruct" in the context of instructing the Post Office to suspend its consultation. That is dancing on the head of a pin. It would be intellectually dishonest of any Member to think that that gives them a let-out clause.

The Government, through the shareholder executive, owns the Post Office. They instructed the compulsory closure programme to start in the first place, so they can equally instruct the Post Office to suspend it. As I said earlier, in part at least because of the local elections, they have already done just that. So the insinuation of the word "instruct" is no excuse for those hon. Members who have signed the early-day motion not to vote with us tonight.

Furthermore, we know that hon. Members, including Ministers and Cabinet Ministers, are campaigning in their own constituencies. I entirely accept that there are occasions when the Government—even the Government of their own colour—do something and hon. Members want to make a stand for their constituents, but what we are seeing are not just a few scattered examples of an hon. Member saying, "I must defend the interests of my constituents"; we are seeing a wholesale operation across the entire map, with almost every Member doing that. Thus, wholesale activity makes a mockery of what should be collective responsibility. Collective action has driven through collective responsibility.

Of even deeper concern is the fact that the Secretary of State revealed in an interview

"that he might campaign against Post Office closures in his own back yard."

He said:

"'I want to see what the detailed proposals are'"— he happens to be in charge of them, but never mind—

"'but my job doesn't make it impossible . . . I'm the member of Parliament for my constituency. If I think people have got a legitimate concern I'm going to raise it with the Post Office'".

Fair enough, except for this: when everyone is doing it, it is not just representing our constituents; it is collectively denying the entire policy of the Government.

There is a more perturbing point. As we all know, if a Member succeeds in keeping one post office open, under the current plans another one will shut. We can but ask whether a Secretary of State who is in charge of the shareholder executive that owns the Post Office might perhaps have more clout in those negotiations than a mere Back Bencher. If the Secretary of State can keep one or two post offices open in his constituency, where does that leave his colleagues in a neighbouring constituency?

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): A few moments ago, if I understood the hon. Gentleman correctly, he was arguing for more predictability in the framework in which shopkeepers operate, depending on whether or not they have a post office. Part of that predictability relates to the level of subsidy that they can expect from the Government. What level of subsidy for the sub-post office network is the hon. Gentleman suggesting?

Alan Duncan: The same as is proposed, but the purpose of our argument is that it can go further if people are not bulldozed into closure by a misguided compulsory plan.

Chris Ruane rose—

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab) rose—

Alan Duncan: I will not give way. I want to conclude so that hon. Members, such as those on their feet, will get the chance to speak. I note that there are probably three times as many on the Opposition Benches as on the Government Benches.

Chris Ruane: It is an Opposition debate.

Alan Duncan: Yes, but it affects every constituency. That is why it is pertinent for me to point out that 90 Members on the Government Benches have been campaigning in their constituency against post office closures. That is about a quarter of the parliamentary Labour party, and includes seven Cabinet Ministers. It will be interesting to see how they vote tonight.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): My hon. Friend says "every constituency". Can he offer any logical explanation why four post offices should be closed in Mid-Sussex but none at all closed in Crawley, the most marginal Labour seat in the land?

Alan Duncan: I cannot give any polite logical explanation for the perceptive observations of my hon. Friend.

The Secretary of State knows that our arguments are valid. He is very uncomfortable about the closure programme that has been forced on the Post Office. He knows, because he will have heard it every day from right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Benches, that there is deep unhappiness across the entire House about the way that is progressing. He has a reputation in the Government. As shadow Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, I think that occasionally he speaks a lot of sense. However, the problem that he faces when he speaks that sense is that it is not necessarily popular with his Prime Minister—the very man whom he once described as someone who would make a "bloomin' awful" Prime Minister—[Interruption.] I translate for the sake of decency.

Hugh Bayley rose—

Alan Duncan: Today, however, we learned something else, and the finger of suspicion points at the Secretary of State. We are told that somewhere in Downing street, someone—thought to be a member of the Cabinet—is a poet, a bard. Given the flavour of the language, it can be but one person. The four lines published on the website of The Spectator today are clearly the Secretary of State's:

"At Downing Street upon the stair,
I met a man who wasn't Blair.
He wasn't Blair again today,
Oh how I wish he'd go away."

Hugh Bayley rose—

Alan Duncan: Today is an opportunity for the Secretary of State to enjoy a massive political revival. He could make himself one of the most popular and rational men in the Government by instructing the Post Office to suspend the closure programme and give much hope to the many hard-working postmasters whose enterprise, hard work and service to their communities deserve better than they are getting from the Government.

Hugh Bayley: He's frit! Frit!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows better than that.

2.11 pm

The Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform (Mr. John Hutton): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"recognises the vital social and economic role of post offices, in particular in rural and deprived urban communities; notes the decline in post office customer numbers in recent years and the financial losses of £174 million incurred by the network in 2007; further recognises the effect of changes such as direct debit facilities and increased use of the internet for payment and communication; commends the Government's action to support the post office network with investment of up to £1.7 billion up until 2011, including an annual subsidy of £150 million; further notes that this subsidy did not exist under the last government and that without it thousands more post offices would be under threat; and urges the Government to continue working with Post Office Limited to ensure a viable and sustainable network for the future.".

Perhaps I can reassure the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan). The poetry that he has just quoted is not mine. I say that for one simple reason: I would write better poetry. Those are absolutely not my words. I do not mind my own quotations being attributed to me, but I fundamentally resent words that are not mine being attributed to me.

Right at the beginning, I should like to acknowledge the important economic and social contribution that post offices make in all our constituencies. They play an obviously important role in cities, towns and villages right across the country. It is perfectly right and proper that hon. Members on both sides of the House should today have the opportunity to express our appreciation for the work that thousands of sub-postmasters do day in, day out.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: I shall in a minute. I shall give way to as many hon. Members as I can, but I ask for the House's indulgence for a few minutes so that I can begin to make my argument; I suspect that that is all I shall be able to do this afternoon.

Having acknowledged the importance of post offices, I should say that, like my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), I believe that we should acknowledge one other inescapable fact, however difficult it is. The role of post offices is changing, first as a result of technology and much greater use of the internet, and secondly because of different patterns of consumer behaviour. Both those factors have combined to reduce substantially the numbers of people using their local sub-post offices and to increase substantially the losses being incurred by the Post Office. We have a responsibility to address the reality of those changes.

Mr. Baron rose—

Mr. Borrow rose—

Mr. Weir rose—

Mr. Hutton: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron), and then to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow).

Mr. Baron: I hear what the Secretary of State is saying. However, he has to accept that we have a ludicrous situation in south Essex, particularly in my constituency. Post offices that are profitable and serving an expanding population are being closed. Essex county council has put £1.5 million on the table with a view to trying to allow a number of those post offices to continue in service for the benefit of the local community. Will the Secretary of State at least delay the decommissioning of those branches to give the council the time it requires to explore that possibility further?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that issue about Essex; I want to say something specifically about the Essex proposal later. I hope that he will allow me to do that in my own time.

Mr. Hutton: Let me finish my point. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House will be interested in exploring whether the proposal opens up a new opportunity. I hope that it does. Obviously, the discussions need to continue. I shall come later to the detail of the proposition, but it might be helpful if I make it clear now—I was going to do so later—that today I have written to the chief executive of the Post Office about these matters. I have placed a copy of the letter in the Library so that hon. Members can refer to it if they choose.

Mr. Borrow: In Lancashire, the consultation process finished two and a half weeks ago. When I received a letter from Opposition Front Benchers, I was tempted to consider voting with them today. However, I have read the Opposition motion. Does the Secretary of State agree that if we approve it, we will simply delay the whole process? In the absence of any new money, the same number of post offices will close in the end as are scheduled to close now.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful for that point. In a few minutes, I want to come to the substance of the motion.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con) rose—

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD) rose—

Mr. Hunt rose—

Mr. Hutton: I shall give way in a moment. I want to come to the substance of the Opposition motion. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble has rightly identified, there is a significant problem with the proposition that we should simply postpone making decisions. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton has made it clear—this is important for my hon. Friends, who I am sure heard what he said—that he is not prepared to match the subsidy that we propose to invest in the Post Office. Somehow, he believes that that will allow the subsidy to go further, but of course it will not—it will mean a significant diminution in the effectiveness of the subsidy that is going in.

Mark Pritchard rose—

Mr. Hunt rose—

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD) rose—

Mr. Hutton: I give way to the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron), who is my constituency neighbour.

Tim Farron: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way; he and I share an interest in some of the post offices scheduled for closure, including Greenodd post office. Does he agree that this should not simply be a case of pushing the issue off into the far future? There is a perfectly good framework that we could use to suspend the process and give local communities the chance to make decisions that affect their lives. I am thinking of the Sustainable Communities Act 2007, which comes into force as of this September/October. We have the ridiculous situation in which the Government would write to local authorities such as South Lakeland asking what they could do to make communities more sustainable. The response would be, "Well, we would have said that our post offices should be kept open—but you've shut them."

Mr. Hutton: We have not prevented local authorities from making arguments about how there could be a sustainable future for the local sub-post office network in my or the hon. Gentleman's constituency, for example. I do not accept that there is a legal conflict between the process now under way and the future legislation to which he has referred. We are not preventing local authorities from making any contribution to the debate about a sustainable future.

Hugh Bayley: Will the Secretary of State confirm that three quarters of post office branches are not profitable and that many more would close if there were not £150 million a year of public subsidy? Has he noticed that the Government's amendment explicitly supports that subsidy, whereas the Opposition motion does not? Will he issue a challenge to the Opposition, at least when they come to vote on the substantive motion, to support the Government amendment and the public subsidy to the Post Office?

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend must have had a sneak preview of my speech, because I am going to make that point soon. It is an important issue for my hon. Friends to consider during this debate. They are being invited to support a Conservative motion that might will the ends but does not provide the means. I have a lot of respect for the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, but he has to be able to stand in this place and say that he is willing to make the investment in sustaining the network for which he now claims to be the champion. He has completely failed to do that.

Alan Duncan: As the Secretary of State well knows, I have. The spending plans have been publicly announced. They are there, and remain unchanged.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman was specifically invited to comment on the issue at the beginning of the debate; we will have to check the record in Hansard. He will have to deal with what I am sure will be in Hansard tomorrow. He was specifically asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) to say whether he would commit to the £1.7 billion. We all heard him say clearly that he was not going to do that.

Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate) (Lab): I should like to reassure my right hon. Friend that I have no intention whatever of voting for the Conservative amendment, which comes from a party that when in government had absolutely no compunction about closing post offices, schools, hospitals, mines and heavy industry. However, there is real concern in my constituency about the proposal to close three highly efficient and consistently well-used post offices. I entirely accept that the usage of post offices has changed, but the people who use them most consistently and will be most severely affected if they are closed include the elderly, the disabled and single parents with small children. Is it not possible for the Post Office to put forward a proper cost-benefit analysis of what it is proposing as regards closures so that the consultation is genuine?

Mr. Hutton: I have a great deal of respect for my hon. Friend, who, like all other Members of this House, is perfectly entitled to put her argument to the Post Office, which has the responsibility for making these decisions in individual areas. Ministers are not making decisions about which particular sub-post office should or should not stay open. I am grateful to her for acknowledging that there has to be change in the network. My advice to her—I am sure that she does not need it from me—is that if strong arguments can be put, they should be. The Post Office has a responsibility—

Mark Pritchard: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: When I have dealt with my hon. Friend's point. When she has made those arguments, as I am sure she will, the Post Office, working together with Postwatch, will have to address them seriously. We acknowledge the substance of her point; that is why we are making £150 million-worth of subsidy available to support a much more extensive network than would have been supported if we were simply considering these issues on the basis of profit or loss—which post offices were making a profit and which were not. That is not part of the access criteria. We are trying to explain how the new network will work, how it can be sustainable and how it can address the concerns that my hon. Friend and others have raised.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way; he is being very generous. Given that seven Cabinet Ministers are campaigning with faint protest against the closure of post offices in their own constituencies, will he give an undertaking to the House that there will be no special access arrangements for Government Ministers visiting either him, other Ministers or officials in his Department, and that there will be equal access for all Members of this House campaigning against post office closures?

Mr. Hutton: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman and the House that assurance. The ministerial code makes it very clear, and rightly so—this has never been contested across the House—that Members of Parliament, even when they are Ministers, are perfectly entitled, as Members of Parliament, to make representations, in this case not to Ministers but to the Post Office, which is making decisions on closures. It would be an outrage if they were not able to do that. Of course, if any right hon. or hon. Member wants to come and discuss this issue with me, I am always available to have such discussions. There will be no special access—that would be quite wrong—and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that no one has sought such special access.

Mr. Andy Reed: Rightly, many Members have made specific representations on behalf of individual post offices, and progress has been made in some cases. Does my right hon. Friend think it significant that although the Opposition motion makes no commitment on additional moneys, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) seems to have hinted at the same number of closures taking place? Will my right hon. Friend expand on the implications of that dichotomy and the contradiction whereby the Conservatives want the same level of closures without committing to provide the same amount of money? That sends out false hope to many of our constituents who will have been misled by the Conservative motion.

Mr. Hutton: I would very much like the opportunity to do that, and if I can make some progress I will do so.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hutton: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman and then make some progress.

Mr. Evennett: I am listening carefully to what the Secretary of State is saying. My constituents in suburbia believe that decisions have already been taken and that the consultation procedure is just a PR sham. What is his view on that?

Mr. Hutton: The decision has been taken that the post office network needs to be reduced. The consultation is about the details of that in every local area and how it can be most sensibly dealt with. That is a decision of the Government, and that is why the Post Office is now conducting the consultation.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): As my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) says, there is a widespread view that this whole consultation process is a complete farce and a sham. What advice should I give to the postmaster at the Minley estate in Farnborough in my constituency? The Post Office says that the footfall in his branch is 591, yet he has conducted a survey that shows a 50 per cent. increase, without encouraging people to come in to make up the numbers. Is the Secretary of State saying that this consultation is going to make no difference whatsoever or that the Government are going to listen and look again at the figures, because this will apply to constituencies across the country, not only in rural areas, but in urban areas?

Mr. Hutton: I would regard it as the duty of the Post Office to look seriously at arguments such as the hon. Gentleman's. If there is evidence that the figures are wrong or inaccurate, there is an opportunity in the consultation process—this is why it is happening—to make those arguments and for those representations to be taken into account. Postwatch is there to ensure, as a neutral umpire, that the process is being undertaken fairly. [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen who are scoffing at Postwatch need to be very clear about what lies behind that scoffing. Postwatch is a neutral, independent observer. If the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), whom I heard scoffing—I do not think he would deny that it was him—would like to give the House evidence to suggest that Postwatch is in any way acting unfairly or improperly, I would like to see it now.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Is it true that Postwatch is being abolished?

Mr. Hutton: Postwatch is going to form part of a new, invigorated national consumer council. [Laughter.] Let me remind the hon. Member for Rayleigh, in case he has forgotten, that his Front Benchers have supported that policy. I do not understand the mirth that he is concocting; it is nothing other than a concoction. This debate does not need ridiculous rhetoric and phoney arguments of the type that he is putting forward. We should have a debate about the reality, not the bogus truth and distortions that he and others are bringing to this debate.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hutton: I will give way to the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) and then make progress.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Will the Secretary of State accept that there is genuine concern about the validity of the consultation process? The Southern Daily Echo is a politically impartial newspaper but nevertheless felt it necessary to publish a leader entitled "Post Office plan was a farce from the beginning", pointing out:

> "In many ways it would have been better if those in authority had simply announced their targets and then closed the book. All that this exercise has achieved is to deepen the anger amongst so many communities who now feel doubly cheated over this issue."

One of the MPs whom the article quoted in support of that view was the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), the Secretary of State's Cabinet colleague, who is protesting about the ridiculous closure of a post office in his constituency, where the alternative, as he points out, is at the top of the steepest hill in that constituency.

Mr. Hutton: I am sure that there is such a thing as a genuinely independent newspaper. I personally have not read one, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has found one. I do not think that his argument is the same as that of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton—that we should have just closed the post offices without any consultation. Today's argument is about the consultation process.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hutton: I am not going to give way for the moment.

I accept, of course, that people have expressed criticism of the consultation process, and they are perfectly entitled to do that, but my job is to try to ensure—we have tried very hard to do this—that people have the opportunity to pose a counter-argument. However, we have made the decision, which I am inviting the House to support, that the post office network will need to reduce in size. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton has acknowledged that there needs to be a reduced network; the question for us today is how we can best manage that.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hutton: I am not going to give way for the moment.

Mr. Paice rose—

Mr. Hutton: If the hon. Gentleman wants to raise the same point, then I have already dealt with it, although he might not like the way that I did so. If he has a different point, we will come to that later.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Paice rose—

Mr. Hutton: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, and then I really would like to make progress. So far, I have got to page one of my speech. I do not want to intimidate the House, but I have 28 pages left to deliver.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way, albeit with reluctance. The serious point is that the consultation concerns which post offices to close, and my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) made the crucial point that if, as a result of consultation, local pressure and new figures, it is decided not to close a post office, the policy that the Secretary of State is pursuing means that somewhere that is not on the original hit list will go on it. Will he explain to the House how that can be justified, and how the notion of the consultation being genuine can be correct if we are talking about such a trade-off? If it is possible to prove that a specific post office has a justified future and is viable, surely that should be the end of the matter.

Mr. Hutton: I accept that that is an important point. I was going to deal with it later, but I shall try to deal with it now. The criticism that the hon. Gentleman has made of the one-for-one rule is not true. We argued that up to 2,500 sub-post offices need to close, but we have never said that precisely 2,500 post offices must close.

Mr. Francois: That is what they are telling us.

Mr. Hutton: No, that is not what the Post Office is saying. Let me try to deal with the point by referring to what is actually happening: 14 area plans have been signed off for closure and in six of those areas, there was no one-for-one replacement requirement, but in the other eight there was. That is the point that I am trying to argue. There is no absolute rule of one in, one out; that is not how the Post Office is seeking to deal with the issue.

Anne Snelgrove: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way; he is being very generous with his time. I share concerns about the consultation process, but does he share my anger about the fact that Tory-controlled Swindon borough council has not taken part in the consultation exercise, and did not attend any of the meetings held by Postwatch or the Post Office? The Conservatives in Swindon are now jumping on the bandwagon, but have made no representations to the Post Office or to Postwatch about the closures in my constituency.

Mr. Hutton: I am surprised that that is the case, given the arguments that the Conservative party has been trying to deploy in this debate. It is obviously for Conservative councillors in my hon. Friend's constituency to explain themselves. In this place, Conservatives foam at the mouth about the injustice of post office closures, but when they are asked to contribute to the debate on how we can sustain the post office network, they make no contribution at all.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman now. If he will allow me, I would like to make progress with my speech. I have been speaking for 20 minutes and, as I said, I am still on page one.

It is precisely because we want to support the network, and ensure that it can continue to play the role we want it to, that the Government, on behalf of the taxpayer, are investing unprecedented resources in the post office network. The sum of £1.7 billion was referred to, and it is true that that is going in until 2011, including a new annual subsidy of £150 million a year, which will help to keep open thousands of non-commercial branches that it would be impossible to sustain were it not for this intervention.

It is worth reminding ourselves—the facts can sometimes be difficult and uncomfortable—that no Government funding or subsidy was provided at all during the period from 1979 to 1997, a period in which 3,500 sub-post offices closed. No effort was made by Conservative Ministers at any time in those 18 years to keep those sub-post offices open. Believe it or not, there are still a few hon. Gentlemen here who were Members in the House at that time, and we should hear from them at some point about the attitude they took in their constituencies when those sub-post offices were closing.

Alan Duncan: May I cite to the Secretary of State some figures pertinent to what he just said? From 1993 to 1994, the Post Office was in profit by £25 million; from 1995 to 1996, it was in profit by £35 million; and in 1996-97, it was in profit by £34 million. It was only with the arrival of his Government—this was not, I am sure, cause and effect—that it plunged into deficit.

Mr. Hutton: I am not disputing the hon. Gentleman's figures about profit, but that is not the argument. The argument is that 3,500 sub-post offices closed and the Conservative Government made no effort to keep any of them open. If he wants to contest that fact, let him come back to the Dispatch Box and describe the actions—they always speak louder than words—that the Conservative Government took to keep the network at its existing size. They took no such action.

One other rather inconvenient truth for the hon. Gentleman is that the use of the internet poses the greatest challenge to the post office network. Every month, 1 million people renew their car tax licences online. They used to do that in sub-post offices—that is true. It was certainly true in the 1980s and the 1990s, because we did not have the internet.

Mr. Davey: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hutton: No, I will not.

Let us be clear about this, because we need to hear it from the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton. Is his argument that he would go back to a time when people could not renew their tax discs online?

Alan Duncan indicated dissent.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head because we know that is what he is going to say. But that is why post offices have lost so much business. It is complete pie in the sky—[Interruption.] He knows that. I do not remember him making that argument in his speech.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): Post Office Ltd needs to compete for business. All that the Conservatives are saying is that they would delay the closure of 2,500 post offices, and all that would do is delay the inevitable. Prices would be dragged down in bidding for competition and business, and sub-postmasters and postmistresses would be paid less for transactions. It would destabilise the whole system.

Mr. Hutton: I agree. I do not think that postponing a difficult decision is ever the right thing to do, but that now seems to be the policy of Her Majesty's Opposition.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: No, I will not give way for a while now.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton asked why the Post Office imposes restrictions on what sub-post offices can do and went through a long list of them, as did one of his hon. Friends. He might be interested to hear what Mr. Thomson, general secretary of the National Federation of SubPostmasters, said during the recent Select Committee inquiry in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone. He was asked why all these unreasonable restrictions were in place, and he said:

> "I make it absolutely clear, there are no restrictions on what existing sub-postmasters can do."

We have dealt with that canard as well. If the Post Office operated—[HON. MEMBERS: "Wrong quote."] It is not the wrong quote; it was made only a few weeks ago. [Interruption.] It is entirely relevant because the hon. Gentleman argued that, if all the unreasonable restrictions could be lifted, somehow all these businesses could suddenly move from making losses to making profits. That is exactly the hon. Gentleman's point, and it is entirely wrong.

Alan Duncan: The Secretary of State has got this completely wrapped around his neck. Our complaint is about what the remaining shop is or is not allowed to do, not about what current post offices are allowed to do.

Mr. Hutton: The hon. Gentleman made specific reference to the lottery as well. It is important to recognise what the general secretary of the National Federation of SubPostmasters had to say on that, too. He said that choices had been put in the way of existing sub-postmasters and went through the four main ones, but on the lottery he said:

"If you think about it, if a sub-postmaster, for example, was earning £5,000 a year on the Lottery commission and he just wanted to move that Lottery to the retail side"— on which there is no restriction—

"so he is going to keep it, why would the Government possibly want to use taxpayers' money to give someone compensation for something they are continuing to do?"

That makes absolutely no sense.

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am going to make progress.

If the Post Office operated on a purely commercial basis, with no external subsidy, it is estimated that up to four times as many branches would have to stop trading. However, we do not believe that the Post Office should be operated purely as a commercial service. That is why we have committed such a large public subsidy and why we are working with Post Office Ltd to secure a more stable network for the future. George Thomson, general secretary of the National Federation of SubPostmasters, also recognised that. He said recently that,

"although regrettable"—

and it is regrettable—

"we believe that these closures are necessary to ensure the remaining post offices are able to thrive in the future."

We believe that changes are necessary, but we also aim to give people new reasons to use the Post Office and provide a range of services that make it a local provider of choice.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: No.

Let us remember that, even after the closure programme is over, the Post Office will still have a bigger network than all the banks put together. It will be some three times bigger than the top five supermarket chains combined. It will still have an unparalleled reach into every community—every corner of the UK—and continue to fill an important social and economic role through the post offices in the urban and rural communities that they serve.

The Post Office has been rising to the challenge of innovation and developing new products, contrary to what the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton said. For example, it is the biggest provider of foreign exchange in the country and a major provider of car insurance. It has launched a new broadband service in partnership with British Telecom, whereby people can pay in cash if they want. It is introducing some 4,000 free-to-use cash machines, often in the most deprived areas.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hutton: Not for the moment.

The Post Office has begun to exploit the great potential offered by internet shopping and mail order through the Local Collect service, which allows customers to collect deliveries at their local post office. It has introduced a new secure Christmas pre-payment scheme for savers from this Christmas onwards. The Post Office must travel that road of new services and new reasons to go to post offices, all built on a brand that people can genuinely trust.

The network must also fulfil its customers' modern-day demands. That is the basis for the decisions that we have made, after careful consideration, about the best way of sustaining a substantial network of sub-post offices. It will remain a substantial network in the light of the significant changes in the way in which the public—our constituents—use those services.

The current difficulties that the post office network faces have rightly been the subject of many debates. It is undeniable—no one has sought to dispute the facts, because they cannot—that the Post Office made losses of approximately £3.5 million a week, every week, last year, with 4 million fewer people a week visiting post offices compared with just two years ago. That is a drop of nearly 20 per cent. in customers—again, our constituents—who use sub-post offices.

No undertaking could afford to ignore the consequences of changes of that magnitude. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said today, 800 post offices have fewer than 16 customers a week, and each transaction costs the taxpayer—all of us—£17 in public subsidy. In urban areas, some 1,000 sub-post offices compete for business with at least six other post offices within a mile of them. That is happening at a time when the number of customers is falling. [Interruption.] Opposition Members say from a sedentary position that we are keeping some of those sub-post offices open. We are—that is the precise point of the access criteria and the subsidy. We recognise the social role of post offices and we have to strike the right balance. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton is asking why we are not closing them—

Alan Duncan: No, I am not.

Mr. Hutton: Apparently, he is not saying that, though he was hinting at it. The point of our actions is to keep those sub-post offices open, despite the losses that they are making, to ensure that his constituents and rural areas get a proper service. [Interruption.] He says that we should stop going on about the losses.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interjections from sedentary positions make it difficult, not only for the House to know what is happening, but, more particularly, for the Official Report to understand what is going on. If hon. Members want to intervene, it would be helpful if they stood up and did it in the normal way.

Mr. Hutton: I accept the admonition, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is my fault for responding to the childish observations of Opposition Front Benchers.

Sarah Teather: Let me take the Secretary of State back to his comments about the parcel collection service. Does he accept that decoupling Royal Mail from the Post Office would allow the Post Office to work with competitors and increase and expand the capacity for that, which could provide a new revenue stream for the Post Office?

Mr. Hutton: As the hon. Lady knows, the regulator has already made such a proposal, which will have to be carefully considered. It is a matter for the review that we have set up under Richard Hooper, who will examine all the consequences of proposals that people have made. However, today is not the time to deal with that specific proposal. The innovation that is under way in the Post Office confirms that we should support it in its pursuit of new business. We are doing that in parallel with the other difficult decisions that must be made now if we want the network to have a sustainable future. With great respect to the hon. Lady and the Liberal Democrat party, when one has been out of government for 100 years, one can make a series of decisions that have no consequences. Someone else will always pay for them and, worse, because we are considering Liberal Democrat economics, one can spend the same pound several times over. I have great respect for the hon. Lady but, in the real world, those are not genuine choices that Governments can make.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am one of those who was here when the Conservative party was in government. I want to ask two questions. First, how many sub-post office closures during that period were voluntary, in that the postmaster or postmistress retired and no one could be found to replace them? I do not know whether the Secretary of State has that figure, but it is relevant if he levels complaints about the Conservatives when they were in office. Secondly, I have just renewed my passport and driving licence at a post office in the Palace of Westminster. Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that the proposals— [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is enough of an intervention. The Secretary of State has indicated that he wants to make progress. Many hon. Members are trying to catch my eye. I appreciate that it is important to debate such matters but, unless we have fewer interventions or more progress, many hon. Members will not catch my eye and will be disappointed.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will the Secretary of State seriously consider the proposition by Essex county council and other organisations to save post offices, because they believe that they can put money in, which will enable the post offices to stay open?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, I want the Post Office to consider the proposal from Essex county council seriously. I have made that clear, as has my hon. Friend the Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs. It is also clear and transparent in the letter to which I referred earlier. The letter is in the Library and the hon. Gentleman can read it at his leisure.

I, too, use the sub-post office here regularly. Indeed, I renewed my car tax here rather than online. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman and I share one thing in common: perhaps we are not the greatest internet users.

Mr. Hutton: I must now take into account other Members' desire to contribute to the debate and I will make a little more progress.

We are invited to support or reject the motion, which asks the Government to instruct the Post Office to suspend the closure programme. My strong view is that it is a cocktail of false hopes, flawed economics and opportunism of the highest order. That is especially true, given the record of previous Conservative Governments in office. Postponing those difficult decisions would be wrong. It would result in more uncertainty for those sub-postmasters who are ready to accept the compensation deal on offer and leave the network with much of its original investment intact. The proposals would also "threaten the stability of those offices which will make up the new 11,500-strong post office network".

Those are not my words, but the views of the National Federation of SubPostmasters; and it is right that we should give them serious consideration.

Postponing sensible decisions is rarely a sensible course of action to take. Additional resources—taxpayers' money—would need to be found. The Opposition have given no indication today or in the past of where those additional resources would come from. We can all conclude, therefore, that their proposal is another unfunded and uncosted spending commitment, which forms part of a growing list of unfunded and uncosted spending commitments.

The network needs to change if it is to adapt to changing demand. We do not believe that it can continue as it is. If we fail to act now, I am afraid that matters will only get worse. The underlying fundamentals have to be confronted and addressed. That is what we are trying to do, in a way that supports the economic and social role of the network, while giving it a long-term sustainable platform on which to build for the future.

Rob Marris: I should like to reinforce my right hon. Friend's point. The difficulty with the Conservatives' motion is that it simply calls for a moratorium, because they do not have a policy. They are not fit for government and they do not want to take tough decisions. Some of them do not even seem to understand a sub-post office's measure of profitability or otherwise and look at it only through the eyes of the sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress. The Conservatives do not look at central costs—for IT, IT support, cash handling, delivery, security and so on—when assessing whether a post office is profitable. One cannot look at only one sub-post office, however; one must also look at how much it takes out of central financing. However, the Conservatives do not understand the financing, yet they claim that they are pro-business.

Mr. Hutton: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend. We have to be clear: all the costs that he referred to are met by the Post Office, not by the sub-postmasters, and it is entirely appropriate that we should take those costs into account.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): On the question of the Essex scheme, would the Secretary of State be prepared to try to persuade the Post Office briefly to delay the decommissioning of post offices, so that Essex has more time to put its scheme into place and ensure that it is a success?

Mr. Hutton: I understand that the Post Office has already agreed to do that in some cases in Essex. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find that the Post Office is open to a proper exploration of what Essex county council's proposal could look like and what it would mean. I want to discuss the Essex proposal in a minute, because it is an issue of genuine importance, not just in Essex, but for the future course of the consultations.

Mr. Davey rose—

Malcolm Bruce rose—

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Hutton: No, I am not going to give way.

A number of points have been made about the access criteria, and so on, which I should like briefly to deal with. The access criteria that we have set down will ensure for the first time—it is important that hon. Members appreciate that—that almost all the urban population of the UK, that is 95 per cent., will be within 1 mile of their nearest Post Office outlet and that 95 per cent. of the rural population will be within 3 miles. This is the first time that such a safeguard has been provided for vulnerable consumers throughout the UK, particularly in deprived urban areas and remote areas. The additional requirement for Post Office Ltd to take account of factors such as the availability of public transport, local demographics and the impact on local economies when developing its area plans means that the criteria are more robust and should help to ensure an accessible network.

Kali Mountford: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way on that very point. Will he warn people—especially people such as Nicola Turner, the Liberal Democrat councillor in my area—to be careful not simply to stick a pin in the map and simplistically say, "I'm putting a circle of three miles around each post office," before coming up with a figure for how many post offices will be closed? If we look at things in that way and do not look at the entire picture and at all the criteria, we will leave people feeling unnecessarily vulnerable and that their post offices will be closed, when that is entirely not the case.

Mr. Hutton: Let me reassure my hon. Friend that she really has no reason to worry about the Liberal Democrats in her constituency. She should also know that it is not the Liberal Democrats who are designing the consultation in her area. However, I am sure that her points are entirely appropriate.

There is a proper appeals process, as part of the consultation exercise that we have put in place, which has three stages. In the most difficult cases, the Royal Mail chairman, Allan Leighton, will review the issues and make the final decision.

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): Although I entirely endorse my right hon. Friend's views on the opportunistic activities of the Tories, may I tell him that the post office that serves the most deprived ward in my constituency is now threatened with closure? What a lot of local people find most disturbing is that when other closures were pushed through, during previous consultations, they were assured that things would be all right, because they could always go to the Crowndale road post office. However, that is the one that it is proposed for closure.

Mr. Hutton: Obviously I do not know the precise details of the consultation in my right hon. Friend's constituency, but I urge him—I am sure he will not need urging from me—to make those arguments to the Post Office, because they are perfectly credible and strong arguments. As I have said, the Post Office is under an obligation to take them into account and to justify the proposals that it is making.

There is one other important factor that we should all try to reflect on in this debate, as we come to making up our minds about which way to cast our votes. In the 23 area plans that have been published to date, on average, 90 per cent. of customers will see no change to the post office that they currently use and 99 per cent. will either see no change at all or be within one mile by road of an alternative branch. That is the reality of what we propose. I hope that hon. Members in all parts of the House will take that into consideration.

I want to turn briefly to Essex county council, which has been raised on a number of occasions. Some hon. Members have already raised the interest of local authorities in taking over the services provided by some existing sub-post offices, and I am sure that others will raise it later. Where a local authority makes serious proposals to maintain a service where branches are scheduled for closure, I would encourage Post Office Ltd fully to explore all those avenues.

It is clear that Post Office Ltd will want to ensure that all relevant costs are covered—my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) made an important intervention on that point—that there is a commitment for several years and that there will not be a damaging impact on post offices in the area that are not currently scheduled for closure. Councils will need to account to local taxpayers for expenditure on a network that is currently loss making. Ultimately, it is for Post Office Ltd and any local authority to discuss and agree the details of those arrangements, and to ensure that those rules are compatible with EU rules on state aid.

As I have said, I have today written to Post Office Ltd, the Local Government Association and the National Federation of SubPostmasters to set out the Government's position. I have placed a copy of that letter in the Library.

Mr. Baron: Will the Secretary of State give way on that point?

Mr. Hutton: I have already given way to hon. Gentleman once on this point. I now intend to conclude my remarks.

If there is a way forward that might allow more sub-post offices to remain open, while retaining a sustainable network, I am sure that the Post Office will want to look closely at how any such proposals could work in practice.

There is much more that I could say; fortunately for many hon. Members, they will not have to hear me say it. There are many arguments that I could deploy if I had the right amount of time. I hope that my hon. Friends will understand what we are trying to do and the way we are setting about doing it. As I said at the beginning of my speech, I appreciate and understand the concerns that have been raised today. All of us understand the importance of such issues. Post office closures have been happening for many years and, as we know, thousands closed under the previous Conservative Government. However, what we have tried to do in the current process is manage the reduction in the size of the network, ensure reasonable access criteria for our constituents, introduce new access services in some areas and give Post Office Ltd some financial certainty, which it desperately needs.

We have made a significant financial investment in the future of the network, to allow it to adapt to the changing society that it seeks to serve. I believe that it can do so. Our responsibility is to ensure that the network has a sustainable future. For this to happen, there needs to be change. I do not believe that there is any serious, credible alternative option on the table today, and the Opposition have certainly not presented one.

For all those reasons, I ask my hon. Friends to support the Government's amendment and to reject the cynical opportunism that is so manifestly reflected in the motion that has been tabled by the Leader of the Opposition.

3 pm

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): The Chamber is full of hon. Members hoping to make speeches about the closure of their local post office, which is why the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) promised to be brief. I am afraid that he failed in that. Being a short speaker is something that he and I normally have in common. I shall endeavour to be shorter.

I doubt that any other issue unifies communities across the country more than that of post office closures, regardless of whether it is in a rural or an urban constituency, whether the area is deprived or wealthy, or whether those affected are young or old. This is, without doubt, one of the most potent political issues of the day. The Liberal Democrats have always been opposed to the Government's closure project, which is euphemistically called the "network change programme". However, we are the only party here that has a policy to stop it. I was delighted to read that the Conservatives recognised our strength on this issue. I have here the Conservative campaign manual; I think it is called "Localiser". The Conservatives warn their candidates, in a big blue bubble, that "the Liberal Democrats campaign extensively on the issue of post office closures. If a post office is threatened with closure in your area it is vital that you quickly mount your own campaign before the Liberal Democrats commandeer the issue."

Mr. Burns: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Sarah Teather: Let me get started.

I am sorry that the Conservatives feel we have commandeered the issue, but I find it much easier to campaign on something when we have a policy on it. I would strongly recommend that the Conservatives get one. During this debate, I will have some suggestions for them on saving post offices.

Mr. Burns: From my experience, the only campaigning that the Liberal Democrats did when Chelmsford was facing post office closures was to wait until the sitting MP had done all the work—having meetings with the Post Office, writing and lobbying—then to get their clipboards out and do a high-profile collection of names. That was all.

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman sounds as though he is complaining about the Liberal Democrats commandeering the issue. Of course, it would also help if the Conservatives did not have a record of closing post offices when they were in government. During their final term in office, they closed the equivalent of—[Interruption.] Well, I am sure we can indulge hon. Members if they would like us to. During their final term in office, they closed the equivalent of four post offices a week. That amounted to 3,500 during their time in office. However, we have also seen crocodile tears from Labour Ministers and MPs on this issue. I find it difficult to listen to them when they say they are not opposed to the network change programme in principle and that they are opposed only to the closures in their own backyard. More often, they say that the problem is not the total number of closures but the flaws in the consultation process for a particular post office in a particular town.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman wishes me to give way, no doubt so that he can complain about a post office closure in his own area.

Mr. Hendrick: No, I do not want to complain. I just want to bring the hon. Lady back to the point about the Liberal Democrats commandeering an issue. Does that include having photographs of Liberal Democrat candidates outside a post office that they said was earmarked for closure, when in fact there was no such plan? That is what happened in the Tulketh by-election in my constituency.

Sarah Teather: I was about to say that I do not have any faith that the Government have a sustainable plan for the post office network. My fear is that this will not be the end of the post office closures; indeed, it might just be the beginning.

Malcolm Bruce: My hon. Friend will have noticed, as I did, that the Secretary of State was unwilling to give way to Liberal Democrat Members, perhaps because he knows that we have a policy on this issue. Does she agree that most people are concerned that this is not a closure policy but a process of attrition? The Secretary of State himself acknowledged that, after the last closure programme, the business of the Post Office contracted so sharply that we had to have another closure programme. What guarantee is there that this is not the start of an endless process?

Sarah Teather: I agree with my right hon. Friend. The truth is that the Government are presiding over the managed decline of our post office network. They are choosing to do that because they totally fail to understand the social value of our post offices to the 2 million vulnerable individuals who do not have bank accounts, for example. Those people rely on the post offices to access their benefits. The Government also fail to understand the role of the post office as a social hub for the community, or the economic value of the post office to the surrounding economy.

Those of us who have had post offices closed in our communities know that the death of the post office often spells the end for the shop in which it has been housed. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, too, mentioned that. The death of the main shop on a street can often spell the end for the nearby parade of shops as well. In Brent, in my constituency, the post offices are just part of a long line of services facing the chop. The process started with the health centres, as the primary care trusts struggled to scale in their debts. Then police station closures were announced, followed by the closure of job centres. There is a sense that Labour is shutting up shop in our community.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): How would the hon. Lady's list of proper concerns square with the Lib Dems' proposal to privatise the Post Office and, presumably, keep just the profitable ones, of which there are only about 4,000?

Sarah Teather: We are not proposing to privatise the Post Office. We are proposing to part-privatise Royal Mail, and to keep the Post Office in the public sector because it has social value.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab) rose—

Sarah Teather: I will give way again in a moment.

These closures will rip the heart out of the community. They are the places that people value for getting face-to-face advice, with centres on the high street. They provide vital local services. It is as though Labour is shutting up shop in the very heart of our communities. It is not only vulnerable individuals who are affected by post office closures; they also have a huge impact on small businesses, especially those in which people work from home as they often rely on their post office for posting parcels. When I campaign on this issue, I am struck by the fact that it is often young people who are the first to sign a petition. Perhaps that is understandable when we realise that 11 per cent. of all business transacted in post offices comes from small businesses.

The New Economics Foundation carried out some research into what happens when a post office is closed in an urban area. It estimated that the closure of such a post office would lead to a loss of about £270,000 to the local economy. Similarly, in rural economies, it is estimated that every £1 of subsidy makes between £2 and £4 for the local economy.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): I am sure my hon. Friend is aware that £6 of every £10 withdrawn from a post office—either from a Post Office card account or by people using the post office to access their bank services—will be spent in the local economy. That money will be spent elsewhere, and lost to the local economy, if the post office closes.

Sarah Teather: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I tried to make the point earlier about footfall and the local parade of shops. When we lose the post office, we often lose all the shops in the area.

Geraldine Smith: Is the hon. Lady aware of the relationship between Royal Mail and the Post Office? If Royal Mail were part-privatised, that would put the universal service obligation in jeopardy and rural communities would suffer. People would end up having to go to collect their mail; it would not even be delivered to their door.

Sarah Teather: That is not true at all. I am sure that the Secretary of State will tell everyone that that is not the case when he finally adopts our policy at the end of the review.

Alan Duncan: The real problem with the hon. Lady's policy is that she wants to get a lump of money from a one-off part-privatisation in order to subsidise a constant flow of need. It is not possible to finance such a flow from a stock of money without having an end point. Her proposal is therefore economically innumerate.

Sarah Teather: We want to finance a lump sum in order to modernise the network and to allow investment in infrastructure, for example. We also propose de-coupling Royal Mail from the Post Office, as I said in an intervention on the Secretary of State, to allow it to work with Royal Mail's competitors and bring in a new revenue stream. We are also arguing for extra revenue streams, just as the hon. Gentleman is doing. What he lacks, however, is any kind of policy for investment in upgrading the network. I cannot see how he can save 2,500 post offices—or even a little fewer, as I am not quite sure what exactly he claims to be saving—without that further investment. We think we can do that, but we do not think we can do any more than that, so I cannot understand how the hon. Gentleman can seriously think he can save all these post offices without any kind of investment in them. They need that to ensure that they can compete on the high street.

Dr. Murrison: Does the hon. Lady believe that the number of post offices we have now is about right and that they are based in approximately the right place? If not, what is her assessment of how many more post offices we would have in this ideal Liberal Democrat world? How would she determine where they should be and, more importantly, how would she pay for them?

Sarah Teather: I just made a point about investing in the capital and other infrastructure in post offices. It is a bit rich of the hon. Gentleman to be asking me how many post offices there should be in a local area, when he cannot even save the ones that he is proposing to save. [Interruption.] At least we have a policy for investment in the network.

Simon Hughes: Does my hon. Friend agree that not only do we have a policy for investing some capital at the beginning, but we support the idea that another process for supporting local post offices will be available when the Sustainable Communities Act 2007 comes into force? If, however, the consultation process allowed MPs and the public to know the commercial facts—details of profits and losses—in many cases we would be able to win the argument, but the Post Office never allows us to have the facts that would allow a proper consultation. It keeps moving the goalposts and playing a game with mirrors, so that consultation is a sham.

Sarah Teather: I completely agree with my hon. Friend about the consultation process, which has caused more anger among hon. Members and, indeed, members of the public, than almost anything else.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con) rose—

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD) rose—

Sarah Teather: I shall give way in a few moments when I have finished what I am saying. There is a huge sense of frustration that the Post Office is allowing only six weeks, which is not long enough for any community organisations to work together to produce a bid to save post offices—either with or without the Sustainable Communities Bill 2007. It is difficult for councils to intervene and almost impossible for them to intervene earlier because they do not know whether the post offices they wish to work with are going to be closed later under the network change programme. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) said, the goalposts are constantly moving.

Annette Brooke rose—

Bob Spink rose—

Sarah Teather: I shall give way to my hon. Friend first and then to the hon. Gentleman.

Annette Brooke: My hon. Friend rightly raises the issue of consultation. Does she share with me the concerns raised by Purbeck community partnership about the proposal to start the consultation on the network change programme on 15 July and for it to carry on for seven weeks? How can individuals be engaged when, for example, the parish and town councils may not even meet during that period? Surely the Government have some responsibility to arrange proper consultation.

Sarah Teather: It is a common complaint when consultations are arranged over a holiday period as it is difficult for community groups and political representatives to work with people in the community to stop these proposals.

I will give way now to the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink). Now that he has become independent, I hope that he will support our policies.

Bob Spink: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, who is at least trying to come forward with some constructive proposals; I welcome that, as we need them. Does she regret the fact, however, that her party did not oppose the EU regulations that prevented the Government from subsidising post offices and thereby keeping them open? It is those EU regulations that have forced the Government to go down the closure route.

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman may be independent, but he is still a Conservative, as he can get Europe into almost anything! There is no evidence that Europe is stopping us subsidising the post office network.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sarah Teather: Let me make some progress, as I promised to be a brief speaker and I am failing miserably so far.

All this grief and all this political damage are being caused for what is actually a pretty measly amount of money that the Government are saving—just £45 million. We have to ask whether it really will be a saving when everything else has been taken into account. I provided some figures a few moments ago on how much the closure of post offices costs the local economy in urban areas—about £277,000—but that probably equates to the best part of £50,000 in VAT lost to the Treasury. If we add in other costs to individuals, such as being more isolated or the difficulty of picking up benefits, and if we also add in the cost to the community of losing its high street, and then the environmental impacts of travelling further, probably by car, to access the local post office, we have to ask what we are left with. After all, £45 million is not a lot of money in the grand scheme of Government Budgets. We also have to remember that Royal Mail awarded its own board and chief executive more than £7 million in pay and bonuses last year, and well over £5 million in bonuses and benefits alone.

As one of my hon. Friends asked earlier, is there really any evidence that the closure programme will actually deliver the increased footfall to make the remaining post offices, which the Government are relying on, profitable? Where is the evidence to suggest that it will not simply cause people to change their behaviour and do business in another way? What of the overall cost to the Royal Mail Group when businesses decide to use a competitor?

Mr. Francois: Quite a few references have already been made to the innovative proposals from Conservative-controlled Essex county council to try to ensure that at least a number of the post offices under threat in the county remain open. Does the hon. Lady support in principle that brave attempt by Essex county council, or not?

Sarah Teather: What we want is a sustainable programme, but it is obviously for local councils to decide what they do. Of course the letter placed in the Library by the Secretary of State makes the point that the Government will stop the £150 million subsidy, so councils would then be required to put the extra money in from council tax payers. It is a difficult decision for councils; they need to know that the Government have a long-term plan to ensure sustainability. There are some good proposals for councils to work with the Post Office, but I really want something that is sustainable and not just about central Government shifting the blame and the responsibility on to local government, which causes local councils to pick up the costs without any kind of benefit.

The trouble is, as I have already said, that the Government have no long-term plan to save the network. The access criteria they have devised with the Post Office would be met if we had just 7,000 post offices, which raises the spectre of further closures. Of course, the £1.7 billion that the Government boast about investing over five years already includes the £150 million a year that they had already committed—£750 million overall—and the redundancy package for sub-postmasters, which is £70 million plus some extra for central changes, taking it perhaps to £100 million. The Government have not provided the exact figures on that. By the time we have added that and taken into account general losses that the Post Office incurs each week, it is hard to see how much money would be left for real investment to modernise the Post Office.

Additionally, post offices are steadily having every revenue option they have taken away from them, leaving the network with huge uncertainty over the future of the Post Office card account, for example. That is why we must clearly decouple Royal Mail from the post office network, to allow it to develop other business revenues with competitors. I have already mentioned having a parcel depot for other mail delivery companies. There would be all sorts of other options, but not until the brave step of uncoupling Royal Mail from the Post Office has been taken. We urgently need investment in the network. That is why we propose to part-privatise Royal Mail, raising about £2 billion for the Government to invest in upgrading the post office network. Crown post offices, in particular, desperately need investment to allow them to compete on the high street. They need refurbishment and IT investment, and their staff need extra training.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Did my hon. Friend notice that when the Secretary of State was trying to suggest that the closures were down to the internet and people not going to post offices, he failed to mention that one of the reasons why people are not going to post offices is that the Government have closed so many of them and another is the decision by the Department for Work and Pensions to bully hundreds of thousands of pensioners to take their pensions into bank accounts, in tandem with the decision of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to take the business of TV licences away from post offices? Is not the real truth that post office closures have been brought about by the Government and are not the fault of the public?

Sarah Teather: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. It is as if the Government were making a deliberate attempt to close post offices down.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): I am following the case that my hon. Friend is making, particularly in respect of the costs to the Government. It seems to me that one cost to the Treasury and the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform has not been estimated at all—the cost of the closure of other parts of businesses that ineluctably fail as well when the Post Office is removed. I refer to associated VAT costs, for example, which is direct revenue lost to the Government. Following a sham consultation, four post offices in my constituency were closed despite a massive protest and more than 1,000 people signing a petition. Does my hon. Friend agree that this so-called consultation has been a fraudulent exercise?

Sarah Teather: I agree entirely. There are many hidden costs of which the Government have taken no account. We have to ask whether saving £45 million is worth all this grief, and whether the Treasury is really saving any money in the long term.

Michael Jabez Foster: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Sarah Teather: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. I want to finish my speech, as I know that many other Members want to speak.

We must think about alternative long-term revenue streams for the Post Office. An obvious route that has not been discussed so far is development of the Post Office card account. About five years ago, the Government charged banks with making basic bank accounts available to those who needed them, but it simply has not worked. The best part of 2 million people still do not have access to an account, and the increase in basic bank accounts appears to have stalled. It is obvious from the take-up of the Post Office card account that it has been far more popular than the offers of basic bank accounts. It is also obvious that people want to use their post offices to gain access to their accounts and that some banks have been reluctant to allow them to do so. HSBC, HBOS and the Royal Bank of Scotland, for example, still do not allow people to use post offices for that purpose.

The problem is that there really is not anything in it for banks to offer basic bank accounts to people who are never going to earn very much, and who want to be dealt with face to face. The last thing that the commercial banks want are people who go into branches. They want people who bank by phone and by internet, whereas the Post Office needs footfall. Those are two very different needs.

It is time that the Government gave banks a choice. They should either force them to make their services available through the Post Office so that all can gain access to their basic bank accounts through the network, or give up on banks and develop the Post Office card account into a basic bank account. In either event, we need a universal service obligation on access to a bank account, and the Post Office should play a role in providing it. That could offer a very fruitful revenue stream.

We oppose the closure programme because it will have a devastating and permanent effect on our communities, but petitions alone will not save the network. We need a serious plan of investment—[Interruption]—a serious plan of investment, which the Conservative party—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order.

Sarah Teather: We need a serious plan of investment, which the Conservative party does not have—but neither do the Government, and I hope that they will adopt our policy following the review.

3.22 pm

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Let me begin by explaining some of the background to my interest in this issue. I was a member of the Trade and Industry Committee during the last Parliament, and was involved in the reports that first pressed Post Office Ltd to consider area plans rather than merely deciding where they wanted to change the network—to look at the broader picture, rather than at individual post offices in isolation—and to examine opportunities for post offices to win new business, as well as the constraints imposed by changing patterns of customer behaviour. When Post Office Ltd adopted the principle of area plans, I was a member of the Committee—again, the Trade and Industry Committee—which suggested that its approach to them should be rather different, and that it should change its methodology.

The review in Birmingham has not happened yet—it is scheduled for June—but when the urban reinvention programme in my constituency was launched in 2004, I submitted to Post Office Ltd a detailed analysis of the problems with its methodology and some of its conclusions. Along with an excellent campaign by local people, that managed to save two of the five post offices that were slated for closure. Last year I submitted evidence to the Department when it was drawing up the framework that led to the network change programme.

I have said all that because the discussions that have taken place, and the reports from the Trade and Industry Committee and its successor, have concerned serious questions that arise when we try to grapple with the issue of how to maintain the viable post office network that is so important to our constituents at a time of massively shifting patterns in customer behaviour and preferences. Such changes will affect the number of people who use post offices and the frequency with which they do so irrespective of the number of post offices, and irrespective of Government policies.

We must ask how much more people use phone lines than they did some years ago—and, in particular, how much they use the internet and other technologies—to gain access to services to which, in some cases, they could have had no access 10 or 15 years ago. We must also ask to what extent they seek to gain access to services that have hitherto been provided by post offices, not simply via technology but via technology outside normal working hours. There are no easy or simple answers to those serious questions.

I do not suggest that Post Office Ltd gets everything right all the time, or even much of the time. The reports that I have mentioned and the campaigns in which I have been involved convince me that there is an awful lot that it needs to learn about how to go about these programmes, and I expect to cross swords with it again in June. I feel, however, that what does the greatest disservice to our constituents is trying to pretend that the issues are simple, or—when it comes to the practical aspects of the campaign—reducing the argument to whether people are for or against post office closures in general. That was not the approach of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan), but I shall be interested to see what happens when the debate is reported outside and represented in leaflets. I think that simplicity will find its way straight back in at that point, and that at least one Opposition party—maybe two, maybe more—will try to present the debate and Members' votes in a way that will reduce it to something simplistic and utterly meaningless.

The hon. and learned Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) nods, so my prediction is probably correct. I hope I am wrong, but I have to say that the Conservative party has form in this regard. Even when I was helping to question the closures in my constituency in 2004, in some cases successfully, leaflets were appearing from the Conservatives claiming that I was supporting the very closures that we managed to beat off. One Conservative leaflet doctored Hansard to back up its claims, which earned the party and the councillor involved a rebuke from Mr. Speaker when it was reported to the House.

We have seen similar action on this occasion. Opposition politicians have claimed that for Ministers to establish a framework for consultation and then use their positions as local Members of Parliament representing their constituents to argue within that framework and take up issues of local concern is somehow illegitimate. That does their constituents a disservice, and reduces the debate to trivia.

Martin Salter: My hon. Friend has much joy to look forward to when the Conservatives get their teeth into the issue in his constituency, but I hope he does not find that his local Conservatives are as mad as mine. They jumped the gun before the network change programme was announced, and started to campaign to save three post offices that were not even in the frame for closure. All they have managed to do is frighten local pensioners. I hope that that does not happen in Birmingham, Northfield.

Richard Burden: Let us hope not, but I am not holding my breath. This is a serious issue, and I hope that Opposition Members will think about doing the right thing by their constituents and mine, and telling the truth about it.

Turning to the situation in Birmingham, and the proposals that are likely to be published in June, I am pleased that criticisms that we made in the Select Committee some years ago have, in theory, been addressed by the Post Office in the access criteria that it has laid down. I say "in theory", because the evidence is that they have not always been followed through in practice, which is something that Post Office Ltd must address. As a local MP I will only know what the proposals are, and whether there is a problem with the methodology, towards the end of the pre-consultation phase and just before the formal consultation. If and when proposals are produced, and if there is consensus about the methodology and confidence in the way in which Post Office Ltd has drawn up its plan, even if there is disagreement about its substance, the six-week consultation is probably not too bad. In fact, the National Federation of SubPostmasters says that six weeks is probably okay, if the aim is to minimise the period of sub-postmasters' uncertainty. However, problems will arise if there is not consensus about the methodology and people end up having to argue simultaneously about the methodology and the proposals themselves during that same six-week period. My message to Post Office Ltd is that it should be open with stakeholders at an earlier stage, and I do not think that that contradicts the framework that it has laid down. I do not buy all its arguments about commercial confidentiality, and I certainly do not think that they should take precedence over letting the public know the things that they need to know.

Finally, as we approach the publication of proposals on Birmingham, access criteria will apply, as elsewhere, guaranteeing the maximum distances from post offices. That is important, and it is an improvement on existing measures. The problem that we face in Birmingham, however, does not relate to distance. Birmingham's neighbourhoods are often compact in size, but they are far from compact in population numbers. There is an average of 377.2 people—I do not know where the 0.2 comes from—per square kilometre in England. In Birmingham, the average is 3,649 people per square kilometre. Under the current post office provision, that is 7,088 residents per post office, which has resulted in unacceptable queues in a number of places in my constituency. The people queuing outside in the rain are often old, frail and vulnerable, and if Post Office Ltd further reduces the number of post offices without taking into account population density figures as well as distance, those queues will lengthen. That will hit customers even more, and it will hit the very trade that Post Office Ltd and the Government are trying to protect.

I hope that Post Office Ltd will look at that, and that Ministers will have another word with it about taking those things into account. The framework and the access criteria do not need to change. They are not exhaustive, but they are a guide to what Post Office Ltd should take into account, and population density in urban areas is an important consideration. When Post Office Ltd draws up its plans for Birmingham, it should be open with stakeholders earlier, as there is nothing in the access criteria or the framework that prevents it from doing so. It must rethink the sequencing of involving Postwatch, local government, local MPs and the public. If there is a problem with the methodology, that will have consequences for the extent to which it sticks to the framework.

Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) (Lab): I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said about the effect on queuing in urban areas. Does he agree that part of the response should involve looking not only at the outlets but at the number of counters available?

Richard Burden: That is a very good point. Post Office Ltd has talked about investing in the network and upgrading it, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating. It is not good enough for it just to say that it is going to invest—it has got to look at precisely those things, and a few more besides.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the criteria are meaningless, as this is a reverse engineering project, designed to close 2,500 post offices? I can tell him from my experience in my constituency that none of the criteria mean anything, as we are closing perfectly profitable post offices.

Richard Burden: The hon. Lady is running a number of things together, and she is wrong. If she is arguing that there should be no overall target figure—and I would love to be in that situation—that would have financial consequences. That is why I asked her hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton how much subsidy he proposed. He said different things in the course of his contribution: at one stage, he did not give any commitment at all, but at another, he thought the maximum of the subsidy should be that which the Government have provided. There are consequences that flow from that—there is a financial limit, as the Conservative party, too, has accepted—and we cannot avoid numbers. I do not think that the access criteria are meaningless. However, the way in which they are structured does not tackle all situations in all places, so Post Office Ltd needs to be more sensitive.

Justine Greening rose—

Richard Burden: The hon. Lady has had a go, and as many other Members wish to speak, I shall now conclude.

We must be open with stakeholders at an earlier stage, and approach the consultation in that spirit. When proposing change in Birmingham and other urban areas where the reviews have not yet taken place, we must look at population figures as well as distances. We must also bear it in mind that if at the end of the process queues lengthen and those that suffer from that are the old, the frail and the vulnerable, we will not have addressed the issues that we are trying to address. I make that appeal to Post Office Ltd, and I ask Ministers to make it to Post Office Ltd as well.

DEFERRED DIVISION

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I now have to announce the result of the Division deferred on the question relating to the European defence equipment market and the European Defence Agency.

The Ayes were 254 and the Noes were 194, so the Ayes have it.

[The Division List is published at the end of today's debates.]

Post Office Closures

Question again proposed.

3.36 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am grateful to be called so early in the debate. It was clear from the Secretary of State's response to the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) that the Secretary of State does not have full control of what is going on. In answer to my question about the alleged one-for-one policy—that if one post office was saved another had to be added to the hit list—he said it was not happening, yet he then listed a number of areas where it clearly did happen, and a number of my hon. Friends have been openly told by Post Office management that that policy does exist.

Some remarks made by Labour Members, including the Secretary of State, serve to underline the existence of a fundamental gulf between their approach and ours—and I am sorry to say that in this context the views of the Liberal Democrats are shaped in the same mould as those of the Government. There seems to be an all-pervasive attitude that the entire debate must revolve around parties outbidding each other on how much subsidy they will give—how much they are going to guarantee. That is nonsense; that is not what the issue is about. Instead, it is about how we can best use what is available, and I shall offer some ideas on that. I should just add that, like the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden), I do not have any special pleading to make, as I do not yet know the proposals for Cambridgeshire.

The Government's approach to this matter is marked by four characteristics. There is almost an intention to create confusion about who is responsible: is the Secretary of State driving this, or the Post Office? Whenever a problem arises, it seems that it is automatically the other's responsibility. There is also a determination to micro-manage this whole process from the centre; as is typical of this Government, there is a refusal to accept that there just might be a better way. Attached to that, there is an aura almost of infallibility: the Government think that they know best, instead of accepting that they may have got this wrong and they have failed to convince anybody of their argument.

My remarks will come entirely from a rural perspective. I do not intend to refer to urban post offices simply because there are none in my constituency and I do not have a depth of knowledge about them. There are some 7,700 rural post offices, and about 65 per cent. of all rural communities have a post office. By comparison, only 10 per cent. of rural communities have a branch of a bank. That is an important distinction, because it shows that in most rural communities the post office is the only local "financial institution".

Of course, we have to accept that the majority of post offices are loss-making from a purely Post Office perspective—it would be unrealistic to deny that—but we should be looking for solutions. Before coming to that, however, I wish to emphasise the community and social role of a post office. As has been said, it is for many people a gathering place. It is also often combined with a shop and each part of the business gains from the other; attention has rightly been drawn to the amount of money people spend in the shop if they have just drawn money from the post office. Post offices are, of course, the outlets for the Post Office card account. I am sure I am not the only hon. Member who has received a lot of letters from people complaining that British Telecom now charges £4.50 when people do not pay their phone bill by direct debit. That demonstrates to me the number of people who still want to do everything by cash. That is another important reason why post offices are important, as is people's access to their benefits or pensions through them.

We have a policy, as, I believe, does the whole House, of wanting to encourage people to work increasingly from or close to their home to reduce travel. That again provides a need for rural businesses to have access to a convenient post office. Even things such as eBay, which is all-pervasive these days, generate more and more business.

The final point to make on the community and social role relates to the access criteria—the belief that the objective should be that virtually everybody is within 3 miles of a post office. We are talking about that distance as the crow flies, but in many rural areas the real distance may be double that—at least 6 miles, if not more—and it may be down narrow lanes, across motorways and so on. The proposal will certainly lead to far more car usage. A few weeks ago, I asked the Secretary of State a parliamentary question as to what assessment had been made of increased car usage and carbon emissions as a result of the proposals. Unsurprisingly, the answer came back that no such assessment had been made. I simply add that people who do not have a car will face a 2-mile walk—a 4-hour walk there and back—and that making such a journey is a near impossibility for somebody who is elderly and vulnerable.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): My hon. Friend is making an excellent speech and is being characteristically generous in giving way. My constituency, like his, has not had the closure announcements yet. Does he agree that if the Tenbury Wells post office were nominated for closure, the nearest post office for people would be in Leysters, which is 3.5 miles away? A bus runs between Tenbury Wells and Leysters, but it does so on the third Wednesday of the month and although it takes only 10 minutes to get to Leysters, one then has to wait five hours before one can go back. Does he agree that that makes the 3-mile criterion, or any of the criteria, completely inappropriate in constituencies such as ours?

Mr. Paice: My hon. Friend makes his point admirably. I am sure that everyone who represents a rural area could recount similar situations.

Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD) rose—

Mr. Paice: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, and that will be my two interventions done.

Dan Rogerson: The hon. Gentleman is making a good point about the social element of what a post office provides, particularly in a rural community. Given that postmasters and postmistresses provide such a valuable service, does he share my concern that the threatening letters that they have received as part of this process show that they have been treated very shabbily indeed?

Mr. Paice: I do, of course, agree. I am sure that all hon. Members who represent constituencies where the consultation process has been taking place will fully understand that the way in which the consultation and the closure process are being carried out involves seriously bad practice.

My main criticism of this whole sorry saga is that it is a top-down decision. Of course some post offices are very badly run—we have all been to see them, so we cannot deny that. The simple reality is that they could be more successful if they were under different management. Many of them will never be profitable in a purely commercial sense, which is one reason why I have just discussed the social aspects.

However, we ought to help and encourage the better ones to succeed, and the consultation appears to ignore that approach. Some excellent and apparently profitable post offices are being closed. Despite what the Prime Minister said earlier today about the post offices that have only 16 or 20 customers a week—a tiny minority of post offices have such a low level of usage—the reality is that many of them will remain open because of the access criteria and the fact that they are located in the most remote areas.

What should be happening is that the Post Office should simply set delivery standards and requirements of a sub-post office and tell people how much they will get paid for the work; the figure should be one that does not incur a loss for the Post Office. That would allow the sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress to make their own judgments about whether they can operate on that basis. It may depend on what other business they attach to it. Many may say that because they value their community and own the local shop or pub, they are happy to accept a small loss, because the village needs a post office. They may want to talk to local authorities—we have heard of the example of Essex—or other voluntary bodies and the local community. It is not a question of accepting continuous losses—no Government should do that—but of letting the individuals decide whether they can run a business on the basis of the standards and finances laid down by the Post Office, including perhaps subsidising it from other activities.

All the discussion about new business for the Post Office—the Secretary of State went on and on about it this afternoon—is focused on what is being decided by the Post Office nationally. It is the Post Office in London that is deciding to look out for insurance business, currency exchange or whatever. That is top-down thinking. Instead, the entrepreneurial sub-postmaster should be able to look for his own business. He may want some help from the Post Office nationally, if that can be done, but he should be set free to find other forms of business, perhaps in conjunction with local authorities, that could be related to the post office activity and help to make his business more viable. That is why I wholly condemn the arrangement that will prevent those closing with compensation from providing similar services through other providers. It is true that such constraints are often applied for a year or two in commercial law when someone ceases an activity, but we are not talking about purely commercial situations. The Minister fully accepted that many post offices play a vital social role and the whole issue of commerciality should be pushed to one side, in terms of allowing those businesses to offer PayPal or other services. The issue is access to public services, especially in our rural areas, and is accompanied by the issues of the quality of life and social gain.

We need a much more flexible approach to the network to accommodate post offices that fail, or what happens when a sub-postmaster wishes to retire or sell up. The system should facilitate a replacement in those circumstances, and that should be self-evident if we want a comprehensive network. We need to review urgently the planning and rating systems to encourage multi-use of our premises. I know that there are good examples of pubs, churches and village halls providing post office services, but they experience difficulties, including in the ratings sector, that need to be considered carefully. In many cases, the post office is part of the only remaining shop in the village and if the post office element is closed, the shop may go down too, especially with the restraint on trade that I have mentioned. The village is then left without any service. The implications for that on the need to travel, car usage, carbon emissions, and the sheer difficulty and harassment for individuals, are obvious.

If the Government really care about the post office network, and do not take just a purely mechanistic view of it, the first thing that they must do is get a grip on what the Post Office is doing. Other hon. Members have raised the threats to sub-postmasters and mistresses who face closure. They have been told that if they get early information that their post offices are on the hit list, they must not tell anyone; otherwise, they will not get their compensation. This is all blackmail. It is wrong, and the Government have to get a grip on it. They could do other things. They could make it a condition that the lottery provider ought to enable all post offices, at least in rural areas, to have a terminal. They could say to the Post Office, "Just tell sub-postmasters and mistresses what you want from them; what the services are and how much you are prepared to pay. Let them decide whether they can take it on on that basis and let them go out and look for extra business."

The Government could do all those things. They could reverse the whole process to a bottom-up system, but they will not. That was clear from what the Secretary of State said. No one in government really understands our rural communities. The Government believe in central decision making and that no individual can be trusted to make the right decisions. The main reason that they will not do these things is that they would have to admit that they are wrong.

The Government have continued to waste billions of pounds with little to show for it, yet when they have a chance to do something good for no extra money they refuse to do so. It is typical of a Government who have had their day.

3.50 pm

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole) (Lab): It is an honour to follow the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). We normally end up debating the future of pigs, so it is nice to move on to another subject, even if it still begins with the letter P.

When the announcement was first made some months ago, I was a Government Whip. It is good to be able finally to stand up in the Chamber and make some comments about how the decision has affected Brigg and Goole. I am reminded of the first time I stood for election in 1992 in the old Brigg and Cleethorpes seat—unsuccessfully, I hasten to add—against the Tory MP Michael Brown, who is now my good friend. One of the big issues was post office closures. It seems almost like groundhog day; here we are, still discussing it—[HON. MEMBERS: "More pigs!"] There will be no more pig analogies. That is the end of it.

Thousands of post offices have been closed under Conservative and Labour Administrations. They would probably be closed under a Liberal Democrat Administration, too, if there ever was one. As the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) candidly said, we cannot control everything in the way that we would perhaps like to.

Let me tell the House something about the experience in Brigg and Goole and how it has been handled. We are at the end of the process now and we were in the first tranche that was announced. When the announcement was made, it was proposed that Westfield Avenue post office in Goole, which is an urban post office, would be closed, and that the rural post offices in Reedness, Wroot, West Butterwick and Eastoft would change to outreach. We then went into the consultation.

A lot of hon. Members have said that the consultation was a complete sham. I would say that it was a curate's egg in some respects. It is very difficult to understand how some of the decisions were finally reached, even though some of them were definitely improvements on the original proposals.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): Whether the consultation was a sham or not, did not the hon. Gentleman's constituents have the same experience as mine? First, some of the rationale that the Post Office put forward in its explanation was factually wrong. Secondly, the process was truncated to a shorter time than is usual for such consultation procedures.

Mr. Cawsey: I would agree with that, based on my experience.

Goole is a good example. We were told, "It's an urban area. There is another post office only 400 yards away, it is a big town centre that could take the capacity, and there is a regular bus journey of only 10 minutes." We could see the rationale. However, when I met the Post Office I pointed out that the bus ride, which takes only seven or eight minutes to get to the post office, is not the same on the way back. The people in the Post Office dealt with that with great incredulity. They said that they had never heard of a bus that took seven minutes to go down the road one way and then took longer to come the other way. The point was that the bus does not go that way—it is a circular route. A short journey to the post office becomes a tour round the town to come back. That had not registered on their radar at all. When we reached the final conclusion, which was that that post office should be closed, all I got was a nice little paragraph in the reasoning, something like, "The MP put up a decent argument. We looked into it but we are not doing anything about it."

We made some progress with the outreach services. It was decided that the services covering Reedness and Wroot would remain in the shops where they are presently located, and that they would continue to be delivered by the people who deliver them now. Moreover, the fact that the outreach for Reedness was to come from the Goole post office meant that it could provide more services, including road tax and foreign currency. That shows how much had changed since we started our campaign, and that the decisions amounted to a bit of a curate's egg.

What happened next has been described by other hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. A final recommendation was made: the Goole office was to close and the others would be outreached, with two offices remaining in the shops where they were located. It was then announced that a complete hash had been made of one of the outreach offices in Lincoln—what was claimed to be a short walk across level ground turned out to be on a very steep hill.

The result was that there was a change of mind about the office involved, and that the office at Wrawby was suddenly put up for closure, even though it was fine in the initial consultation. I met Post Office representatives and said that that decision was wrong because it meant that people had had to go through the mill twice, when once was bad enough. However, despite my great admiration for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I was told that saving one post office meant that another office would have to go.

Justine Greening: The hon. Gentleman is reinforcing the point that I made earlier—that all the access and other criteria used to decide which post offices should close in the end mean nothing because the Post Office is determined to achieve the target of 2,500 closures.

Mr. Cawsey: A few weeks after being told that the office at Wrawby was viable, I was told that it no longer was. When I asked why, I was told that most of the offices that the Post Office proposed to keep open were not viable, but that it would propose closure only for offices that were not viable.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): The hon. Gentleman is touching on a problem that I have encountered in the north of Lewis. The postmistress at Skigersta is very anxious to save her office, but she is worried that solving her problem might cause difficulties for the Port of Ness office just a little way down the round. The closure programme is putting postmistresses and postmasters in a very invidious position.

Mr. Cawsey: I understand exactly where the hon. Gentleman is coming from.

What transactions are undertaken in post offices? All hon. Members will recognise that question from their discussions with the Post Office. What one is told—on a confidential basis only—when one asks is that the number of transactions that post offices carry out is very low. I was shocked when I found out how low the number is: as a local person, I had thought that it would be much higher.

There is no doubt that a significant change has taken place. Some of it is due to demographic changes, and no firm can lose 4 million customers in a relatively short period without such changes being part of the reason. In addition, people are making different decisions about how they get their pensions and benefits. It is worth bearing in mind the fact that 80 per cent. of pensioners had stopped getting their pensions from post offices before Labour was even elected. The demographic change is therefore not new, but has been going on for some time.

[Mr. Cawsey]

I picked up a petition at one of my local post offices that appeared to have been signed by everyone in the village. I said to the sub-postmaster that he had done extraordinarily well, but he replied, "Yes, Ian, but if everyone who signed the petition used the post office I would not need it." That is another common problem.

Questions have been asked about the adequacy or otherwise of the Post Office's management. I sometimes think that they have created problems for themselves, and that they continue to do so. For example, I said earlier that I was very pleased that the office at Reedness was to stay in the shop where it is presently located. The local sub-postmistress is willing to work more hours, but to do so she requires a relatively small amount of IT and a laptop computer. Without that equipment, she is forced to rely on the time that the person from the main post office can give, but the Post Office has refused to provide it.

The Post Office is making week-by-week, month-by-month savings on the hours that the Reedness sub-postmistress works, but it will not meet the one-off capital cost involved in giving her the kit that will allow her to work extra, voluntary hours while her shop is open. I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs on the Front Bench, as I have raised this matter with him previously. I hope that he is able to help.

I turn now to the provision of television licences. Why did the BBC decide not to let post offices sell the stamps that people use to buy licences? The answer is that the tender from PayPoint was £100 million less than the one offered by the Post Office. Why was it so much lower, and why has no one ever challenged the Post Office about whether it was serious and credible in its attempt to get the business?

John Taylor of the Rawcliffe Bridge post office told me that he wanted to install a PayPoint terminal when the decision about television licence stamps was taken but was told that he could not do so. I understand that the arrangements are more flexible now, but when the changes were all taking place he was told that he could not do it. PayPoint found other locations and that is not going to change now.

The same sub-postmaster said to me, "If you look at the back of a British Telecom bill, where it sets out how you can pay, it no longer mentions the post office." People can still pay through their post office, but it does not say so on the bill. I took that up with British Telecom, which simply said, "We're never going to stop people paying through the post office—obviously, we have links with the Post Office historically—but it is the most expensive way for us to collect our money from customers, and we ain't going to advertise it, although we'll continue to accept payments through the post office."

Only today, a constituent who wanted to pay her water bill told me that she would be charged more at the post office than at the local garage or the local shop. It makes me think: why is the Post Office creating these barriers to business? The report of the Select Committee on Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, which has been referred to, said that poor management has been a factor over the years, but that there was greater confidence in the people who are in place now. I really hope that that is true, but we are still waiting to see.

Local authorities can and should play a role, and I welcome some of the recent developments. My area is covered by two local authorities, one of which is North Lincolnshire council. When the announcement was first made, all that time ago, I had a conversation with Liz Redfern, who was then leader of the council. I asked whether there was something that the council could do. It is fair to say that I met with a polite response but not a great deal of interest. However, in May last year, North Lincolnshire was the only council in the country that went from being Conservative to Labour; I am happy about that, although I am not happy that only one council changed in that way, but at least the council concerned was my local council. Mark Kirk, who is now the leader of the council, is in discussion with its offices on how they can work with local post offices. Perhaps there can be outreach to the villages, too, so that local government services there use the post offices, boost the number of hours, and so make the post offices more viable.

My other local council is the Tory East Riding of Yorkshire council, and I have to say that on many issues, including the one that we are discussing, it is very enlightened. Stephen Parnaby, the leader, is doing a good job there. We were county councillors together. He is a good bloke, and he will be pleased that he is in Hansard. He came up with the idea, which his cabinet supported, of the local council becoming a corporate sub-postmaster. If the Post Office approves the idea, the council will be able to deliver post office branch services via its mobile libraries, its customer service centres, which already exist, and village schools. That is a way in which local authorities can make a big difference.

The council does not pay the tax on its vehicles at post offices, but in the council's defence, it can be said that there is a Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency office right next door to County hall, so it is probably difficult to justify doing so. Again, that is a simple thing that councils can do: they can get all their fleet taxed at local post offices. All hon. Members should ask their local councils whether they do that.

I want to mention sub-postmasters. I welcome the package and the fact that, this time, sub-postmasters get something if they have to go, because no such provision was in place before, and that was a mistake. However, what about those who want to go? At least one sub-postmaster in my area—I will not say who it is, because that would set another hare running—really wanted to be let go, under the consultation, but he has been told that that cannot happen. What happens to those people when the process finishes? We need answers to that. We should always remember that in this debate, we are talking about the future and livelihoods of the people who run our post offices.

We are ahead of most areas; frankly, we are at the end. Goole post office is closed, and the Wroot and Reedness services are staying in the shop. We are trying to work with the council to boost services in those outreach locations. I was speaking to the sub-postmasters in West Butterwick, Eastoft and Wrawby, and for all sorts of reasons that are not the business of the House, none of them is seeking any further involvement with the Post Office. They have made their decisions about what they want to do with their lives, and they want to move on. Frankly, there would be no benefit to Brigg and Goole from the suspension being proposed tonight. Indeed, it would mean a further period of uncertainty for the sub-postmasters concerned.

We maintain a network across our area, which is big and rural. I remain as determined as ever to work with the two councils in my area, which are of different political persuasions, to ensure that that remains the case, and to ensure that, despite the odds, we have a vibrant post office network for the future.

4.4 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Post office closures have hit many communities extremely hard. The Isle of Wight is no different. In Hampshire and the Isle of Wight consultations were held on 62 branch closures. However, despite many objections, only one branch was reprieved. Does not that call into question the whole consultation process? If a decision cannot be changed, it is not a consultation. The process taking place now is merely a sham.

Evidence that I have unearthed calls into question the closure process. Let us take the Isle of Wight as an example. Ten sub-post offices on the island were earmarked for closure. I worked with the rural community council and the chamber of commerce to draft a detailed response, which was submitted during the public consultation process. I should particularly like to thank Joanna Richards of the RCC for all her hard work. The first failure occurred when I did not receive an acknowledgement for the submission. That was put down to an administrative error.

My first confirmation that the closures were going ahead was a phone call the evening before the decision booklet was issued. In that booklet there appeared to be no reference to the issues that many other people and I had raised. It was as if our views did not count and the decision to close our local branches had already been taken. I am sure colleagues have had the same experience. We raised the matter with John Rattle, head of external relations at Post Office Ltd, who stated in an e-mail:

"All correspondence received is shared with Postwatch during and after the Public Consultation."

I have asked for documentary evidence from Post Office Ltd to show that my submission was taken into account. No such evidence has been forthcoming. I do not believe that any exists.

My office and I pay tribute to Gary Hepburn, south and west regional manager for Postwatch for his hard work on the current and previous closure plans. When we contacted Postwatch, Mr. Hepburn wrote:

"Postwatch finds it most unfortunate that many of our comments, and those made by you, were not mentioned in the branch summaries issued in the decision documents and we have raised this with Post Office Ltd."

Mr. Hepburn says that Postwatch does not receive all correspondence, in spite of what Mr. Rattle says. Mr. Hepburn reported:

"Post Office Ltd supply us with a summary sheet for each Post Office. . . We do not get to see individual letters and, indeed, we do not know the total number of letters received, only the number of times an issue has been raised."

Furthermore, it appears that petitions count as only one response. Postwatch stated:

"We understand that petitions and duplicated letters are either excluded from this list or count as one contact", so not only does Postwatch not see all the responses, but it is not made aware just how strongly people feel. For example, surely if 3,000 constituents sign a petition saying that a branch should remain open because of poor transport links, it should be recorded that 3,000 people, and not just one, raised the issue.

When we raised a specific matter about the bus service in Ventnor, Post Office Ltd allegedly said it was not responsible for the buses. I accept that, of course, but surely adequate public transport provision must be taken into account by Post Office Ltd. I should be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about that.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): The hon. Gentleman has revealed how Post Office Ltd seems uninterested in public demand. Does he agree that this mass closure, which will perhaps reduce the number of post offices to 4,500, is driven more by the requirement to satisfy the needs of Post Office Ltd than by the requirement to satisfy the needs of local communities?

Mr. Turner: I do. It is not the numbers that matter, but the cost. The company does not seem to consider that. It seems to be looking at pure numbers, for the Government.

If responses are not properly taken into consideration and a decision has already been made to close 2,500 branches, including Lowtherville, Calbourne, Meadow Road and Hunnyhill on the Isle of Wight, the consultation process is a shambles.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): On the previous consultations, is the hon. Gentleman surprised to hear that in 98 per cent. of cases the process was a sham and the Post Office went ahead with closure? In only 2 per cent. of cases did it listen to the community.

Mr. Turner: I recognise that, but I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber; I had not realised that.

Richard Younger-Ross: That is not true.

Mr. Turner: Not true?

Richard Younger-Ross rose—

Mr. Turner: I come to my second point. In answer to a parliamentary question, the Minister confirmed that only 7,500 branches are required to meet the minimum access criteria. We are told that after the network change programme, there will be a network of about 11,500 branches. What assurance can the Minister give to people on the Isle of Wight that in two or three years' time we will not be going through exactly the same process again? It would still be possible to meet the access criteria of 4,000 fewer branches, so when should we expect further closures?

My third point is about profitability. I asked Post Office Ltd whether any profitable branch had been closed under the current closure programme. In a letter to me, Alan Cook, the managing director of Post Office Ltd, wrote:

"Neither the level of profitability nor the level of saving achieved is the overriding consideration in proposing a particular branch for closure."

[Mr. Andrew Turner]

If branches are not closed because of lack of profitability—if so, I am glad—will the Minister tell us how they are selected for closure? That is not at all clear. Earlier in the letter, Mr. Cook also wrote:

"Only in the most exceptional circumstances would an office profitable to Post Office Ltd be closed under network change."

Taxpayers' money is being used to close what are effectively private businesses. Can the Minister clarify whether any have closed, and if so why?

On the whole closure issue, Post Office Ltd says that it is working to the Government's agenda, but then the Government say that decisions are an operational matter for Post Office Ltd. Surely someone is ultimately responsible. I should be grateful if the Minister told us who.

4.13 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Consultations have not yet started in my constituency, just as they have not in that of the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). As the area plan is drawn together, the local authority will no doubt be contacted to give its view. I have already started to contact my local authority and the sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses in my constituency to ask for their views.

I am writing to the chief executive of the local authority because I want to be sure that he has taken the geographical aspects of my constituency into consideration when he writes to Post Office Ltd to give it information on the area plan.

The Select Committee on Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform was directed to consider the new post office plan because in previous inquiries, such as that into the urban regeneration programme, our attention had been drawn to the fact that financial losses and haphazard closures were resulting in a run-down of the sub-post office network in an unplanned way that could be greatly to its detriment. Consequently, our report of 7 February concentrated on those areas and, in particular, the consultation process. In paragraph 7, we refer to the complexities of the network and say that in answer to a parliamentary question about what size the network would need to be in order to meet the national criteria, the Government replied that just 7,500 post offices would suffice. We came to the view that it was not satisfactory to accept that the network should continue to shrink haphazardly and drift towards that figure, and that Post Office Ltd. should be obliged to use its best endeavours to keep the network at the figure of 11,500 that has been worked to.

In citing that figure, I must also draw the House's attention to a figure that Post Office Ltd used during the inquiry when it said that there could be as many as 12,000 post offices plus 500 outreach post offices. The eventual figure could therefore be anywhere between 11,500 and 12,200; perhaps the Minister will comment on that when he winds up. In any event, whether there are to be 12,200 post offices plus 500 outreach post offices or 11,500 post offices, there is no doubt that the network will require a great deal of support.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): I am listening with great interest to the hon. Gentleman's account of the Select Committee's inquiry. Did it consider options other than closure to maintain the 11,000 post office branches at a profitable level, such as finding cheaper ways of delivering some of the services that are delivered manually over the counter or alternative revenue-raising opportunities for existing branches? If so, what conclusion did it reach?

Mr. Clapham: We were focusing purely on the network change programme, although we moved into other areas in considering how the Post Office may well be better prepared for the future.

During the inquiry we raised four major concerns, which are listed at the front of the report. We say that the six week consultation process was not sufficient. We go on to say that the merger between Postwatch and the consumer council may bring some disruption. We also said:

"Even with the restructuring, the long-term future of the network will depend on the entrepreneurial flair of Post Office Ltd".

That is one of the things referred to by the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (John Penrose)—how the Post Office may help to stimulate a more appropriate approach to the consumer in sub-post offices. Fourthly, we made a point about how the post office network should be sustained in future.

When we considered our first point, we were rather surprised about the lack of transparency in the consultation process. The process begins with an 11-week consultation, which draws up an area plan working with Postwatch—the necessary operating plan within that area. It is not until the 11th week that the local MP is approached, and between those times there is no contact or engagement with the community. We thought that that process needed to be changed.

Mr. Weir: Is the situation not slightly worse? As part of the evidence, we discovered that, on occasion, where a post office was scheduled for closure, and there had been a discussion about transferring business to another branch, business details were not shared between the two postmasters. The receiving branch did not know the closing branch's information, and vice versa. That seems a bizarre way of going about the consolidation of post offices.

Mr. Clapham: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, and he raises an important aspect. Because of the opaqueness, there is no connection between the post offices that will be affected by the process. The situation must be clarified.

Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clapham: I have taken my two interventions. The clock is moving on and many others want to speak in the debate.

In the 11th week, the MP gets involved to ensure that details drawn up in the 11-week period are made available to the public during the six-week public consultation so that the rationale behind a sub-post office being identified for closure is known. We can then properly advance arguments for its retention. There is a need for change in the consultation process. The Minister may want to refer to this matter later: the appeals procedure is run through Postcomm, but neither the MP nor the local authority has the input that I believe they should have in that procedure. The MP should, for example, be able to get involved in the appeals procedure by making a submission.

On the merger involving Postwatch, the thing to remember is that Postwatch has played an important role. When we met the general secretary of the National Federation of SubPostmasters, Mr. Thomson, he paid tribute to the way in which Postwatch had played its part. We looked at other areas of the country, and in Glasgow, for example, we found that 24 per cent. of the post offices identified were changed as a result of Postwatch's input. Postwatch is an important part of the process. We must be aware of whether it will be able to retain its robustness if it is merged with the Consumer Council. If it loses its robustness it could disrupt the process that we want.

We have heard that some aspects of sub-post offices' business could be developed. We believe that Post Office Ltd could play a more important part in supporting postmasters who want to be more entrepreneurial.

We were concerned about whether the network could be sustained. If it is reduced to 12,200 with 500 outreach post offices or to 11,500, it will still need the Government's commitment of £1.7 billion until 2011. That is an enormous amount for sustaining the post office network. We must also be aware that there will be closures over which neither the Government nor Post Office Ltd have control. If a postmaster wants to retire, the post office could close if no alternative venue is found for it. Even though we believe that a minimum of 11,500 post offices, supported by the money that the Government have contributed, could be sustainable, there will still be fragility around the edges. We must be aware of that—I know that the Minister is.

The money that the Government are making available will make the network sustainable. The Opposition did not say whether they would make the same sort of commitment after 2011. They should be prepared to comment on that. Are they prepared to match the Government's commitment to ensure the continuity of the network?

The suspension for which the motion calls would merely delay the inevitable, caused by the change in market behaviour, which has been detrimental to the post office service. If we are to stop the haphazard and unplanned run-down, we need the sort of plan that the Government have proposed. When hon. Members decide how to vote, I hope that they will vote to ensure a sustainable post office network. That means supporting the Government's plan.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), although his view of Postwatch as a robust organisation does not reflect my experience. Several hon. Members spoke to Postwatch about closures in London, and it seemed to lie on its back and wait to be tickled by the Post Office. It appeared simply to accept everything.

I shall be brief because I am aware of the number of Members who want to speak. We are considering a highly emotive subject. In my constituency and those of many hon. Friends and colleagues, it causes as much concern as any other local matter in recent times. Two post offices in my constituency are down for closure. My constituency is small, so that is a high number and I know both post offices well. Without going too far into individual merits—we could all do that—I will make a robust response to the consultation about Moorfield Road and Uxbridge Common Park Road post offices because they are as much a part of the community as the post offices in hon. Friends' rural communities. In suburbia, a parade of shops is exactly like village shops. Moorfield road is on a council estate and the post office is a vital part of the community. Masses of people have written to me about it. I agree that it is not good enough just to get a petition going and to try to make what we can out of the situation. I want to be pragmatic. I want to ensure that my constituents still get what they want.

In Uxbridge, we have had the experience of a Crown post office being moved into a branch of WH Smith—the experience has been shared elsewhere—although the move has not happened yet. We had a consultation period, during which I and members of the public raised serious concerns—the move is to the first floor, and we were worried about disabled access—and we received assurances. The post office will open next month and we will be watching it very carefully. However, the important thing is that those services will still be available. I hope that the post office will give the same service, if not a better one.

I want to speak as a retailer. As many hon. Members know, my family business has been in operation for a long time, and we have had to deal with changing patterns of what people want in the way of services. Anyone who has been in business for 120 years has to adapt. I therefore accept that things have changed and that that has not been all for the bad. Earlier we talked about eBay, for example, which has meant a lot of people wanting to post things that they are selling on.

A few years ago, we started selling stamps in my shop, when the Post Office allowed us to. They proved so popular that people started arriving with parcels that they wanted us to send, but of course we could not do so, because we are allowed only to sell first and second-class stamps, which is fine. However, I thought it would be a good idea to open a sub-post office in my shop. I was not a Member of Parliament at the time, so I was not thinking entirely of the community; I was thinking of business considerations. My shop is big enough, and a sub-post office would have brought lots of people in. However, I was told that I would not be able to have one. What amazed me, however, was that I would have been paid to have one. At that stage, I thought that I would have pay to get the franchise and have that excellent brand—the Post Office—in my shop.

I understand that it is important for a sub-post office to exist in some communities, but that that might not be economical. However, I cannot help feeling that the Post Office has certain services to offer.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Would the hon. Gentleman be surprised to find that, like many other hon. Members whose constituencies face closures, I visited every sub-post office in my constituency in the 11-week period? In virtually every sub-post office I found substantial openness to modernisation and entrepreneurial flair, but from talking to Post Office management at the regional level, I found a gap between wishing the Post Office to succeed and having the vision and creativity to plot a way forward that can save the 11,500 post offices that were mentioned earlier. I am not confident that the management have that vision.

Mr. Randall: I agree with the hon. Gentleman entirely. It is a great shame and a disgrace that those entrepreneurs are not being allowed to provide the services that they want to provide and that they know their customers want. We are getting a flavour of that from, for example, the talk about the one-for-one closures—I add my name to those who have talked about it. It was less than two weeks ago that I was told about that by the Post Office. If I managed to stop one closure in my constituency, that would be one thing—the Post Office would probably try to find another post office—but actually that did not matter, because there could be another one or even five post offices in London, and then the Post Office would come looking around in Hillingdon. The situation is ridiculous.

Mr. Scott: Does my hon. Friend agree with me about the flawed consultation? When I met the Post Office to discuss the three closures proposed in my constituency, it did not even know that one post office had been closed 100 yd away, in the neighbouring constituency of Epping Forest, because it was not in London. No thought has gone into the process whatever.

Mr. Randall: I could not agree with my hon. Friend more. We have been hearing repeatedly this afternoon that the consultation is flawed. That is a point that the Minister must go away with. If one thing is to make the whole process a mockery, it is when the examples that my hon. Friend has come up with are proven to be true. I question whether the Post Office knew this or that thing about this or that post office—frankly, I do not think it did know.

Justine Greening: Another example would be the Lower Richmond Road post office, which is threatened with closure. Post Office management were apparently totally unaware that the Putney hospital site, which is now derelict, was about to be redeveloped as a primary care centre.

Mr. Randall: The fact is that these sub-post offices provide something that we all agree is unique and very special. People want them, but some management team comes in and starts to close them completely randomly. This is being done because there are too many in an area; it has nothing to do with which is the most profitable. It is hard to imagine the representative of a chain of retail stores saying, "We'll close this one and that one because they are making a loss. Those two are making a profit, but it doesn't matter. We'll close one of them anyway." Those involved are not even bothering to look at this.

John Hemming: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Randall: No, I must keep going. The hon. Gentleman can have his own turn later if he manages to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I understand the visceral hatred that Labour Members feel when asked to vote for a Conservative proposal. I also understand that they are trying to find a good reason not to vote for this motion, which is why this has become about a suspension. We have heard some excellent ideas today, including the one suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice). We should now go back to the Post Office to say, "Don't close anything. These are the ideas that have been put forward. Let's think about them." As soon as I heard about the Essex county council initiative, I phoned up the leader of the London borough of Hillingdon, Ray Puddifoot, and he said that he would look into it.

I am not sure whether the Post Office actually wants to be helpful with these initiatives from local authorities. When I asked a Post Office representative how much each post office would cost, the first figure I was given was £20,000; then I was told that it could be more. I asked whether it might double to £40,000, I was told that that would about cover it—maybe. I am not sure that the Post Office wants local authorities to succeed in these initiatives. That is what upsets me, and that is why I am making a plea to Labour Members, many of whom are as upset about these closures as we are, to put aside their hatred of voting for anything proposed by the Conservatives just this once. Many of them have signed early-day motions. It is now time for us, the House of Commons, to say to the Post Office, "Stop! Let's look at how we can save these post offices. Don't just contract your business. If you keep selling everything off, it will just get smaller and smaller. Why not be adventurous? Why not be entrepreneurial? Why not try to expand the network?" That is the message that we should be sending.

4.57 pm

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): There is a kind of wake going on in Hastings and Rye this week, because three of our post offices have closed. There is still hope, however, because resuscitation work is going on in respect of the Old Town post office, and I hope that common sense will prevail. Having said that, I can tell the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) that I shall not be voting for the Conservative motion today, because it does not provide a solution.

The Labour Government have given more stability to the network than anything that went before—[Laughter.] Yes, more stability than anything that went before.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman have any confidence, as I do in relation to Staffordshire, that the Essex solution is pointing somewhat in the right direction? Does he feel that it is possible to have some element of constructive engagement on that subject?

Michael Jabez Foster: Yes, I do believe that there might be alternatives. Indeed, there might be other methodologies that could save some of the post offices that are now under threat. The Essex option—and perhaps an East Sussex option—could play that part. However, all such options would require funding.

The fact is that it is this Labour Government who have provided record funding for Post Office services—£150 million, as we have already heard, on a regular and ongoing basis for subsidising social need and £1.7 billion over the five-year period. Despite what has been said today, I am still unsure whether the Conservative Opposition are pledging that amount of money. What I am sure about is that they are not pledging anything more than that, but more will certainly be required if we are to support the sort of motion that the Conservatives have proposed today. They say no closures should happen, but some post offices will still have to close. I am not cherry-picking here and saying that our post offices should not close while everyone else's should, but it is surely a fact that some post offices will be unviable. That must be the case. Suggesting, as the Conservative motion does, that there should be no closures at all is unrealistic and therefore purposeless. For that reason, I will not support it.

Having said that, I do not believe that the present consultation or the closure programme have been right. I want to impress on the Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs that other things could have happened and I certainly want the next round of considerations to be dealt with very differently.

The first thing to establish is Conservative policy. It appeared—I say "appeared", but I am not sure what tense I should be using—to be that only profitable post offices should be retained. In and of itself, however, that is faulty. If we simply maintain profitable post offices, 4,000 or thereabouts will remain throughout the country, but they will all be in urban areas, able to compete alongside each other while still making profits, but at the expense of other more socially deprived areas. That does not amount to a comprehensive universal service across the nation. For that reason, the premise must be wrong.

Ms Dawn Butler (Brent, South) (Lab): I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend's point. Does he agree that we have to fight for a sustainable post office network, but that what we should not do is give out false information about post offices when they may not be closing? Mr. Suppiah Suren of the Kensal Rise post office said:

> "There are no plans to close my branch. The Liberal Democrats have sent out the wrong information", which resulted in his losing 15 to 20 per cent. of his business. Does my hon. Friend agree that we need to work together in a sensible manner to ensure that we have a sustainable network?

Michael Jabez Foster: I completely agree with my hon. Friend about the sort of vintage hypocrisy that we hear on the Opposition Benches, which is certainly not the way to make progress on what we all believe is an important part of our British way of life. We will not be enticed to support the Tories' gesturing until they are prepared to come up with the bucks to make it possible. At the moment, that does not seem to be likely. The Tories' banners and petitions do not impress me and will certainly not get me to support their motion this evening. We recognise that modern lifestyles and technology mean that things will change. That is inevitable. I will not deal with the Lib Dem propositions, mainly because to do so would be a waste of valuable time, but in any event, it is not yet bedtime so it is inappropriate to listen to their "happily ever after" stories.

The reality is that the post office network has to change, but how? That is where I would like to embolden the Minister to take a more robust view of what should happen. Some time ago, I spoke about post offices in my own constituency in an Adjournment debate and had discovered that the Post Office was being subsidised to the tune of £18,000 for each loss-making outlet. That is an amazing sum of money, which had never been available before. It seemed to me then that it would not be necessary to close very many post offices, so I think the Government have been rather unambitious in respect of that 2,500 figure. I know that they often say "up to" that number of closures, but it has been used as the number that the Post Office has taken as necessary.

Mr. Randall: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but does he think it is good business practice to close down a profitable business?

Michael Jabez Foster: Of course not, and if it is wholly profitable, that is great, but it should not be subsidised. The issue I want to come on to is what counts as profitable. What is the proper definition of "profitable"? This is where I want to encourage the Minister to look further into the facts. In connection with the Adjournment debate that I mentioned, I looked into exactly how much it cost to run some local branches in my constituency.

The Post Office was happy about handing me the figures until I decided to use them, but as I had not received them in confidence, I was able to share them with everyone. I was told that the post office in Tilling Green, Rye, was costing £18,000 a year to run at postmaster or local branch level, but that the on-cost or central cost—I know that my hon. Friend the Minister still thinks I have not understood the position, but I think I have—was £24,000. In other words, it was costing £18,000 to run the show and £24,000 to support it.

Then I began to look at the other figures, and I thought "How can this be? I know that this is not McDonald's or Pizza Hut and that the expertise at its centre is somewhat greater than it is in enterprises of that kind, but £24,000 to support an £18,000 outlet? It just cannot work like that." I wanted to know precisely what central costs were making a profitable outlet unprofitable, so I asked a parliamentary question about it. I am going to press my hon. Friend the Minister a little further in the hope that he can help me now.

At the beginning of February, I asked how the figures were made up. Being not entirely sure of the answer, my hon. Friend the Minister rightly said that he would ask the Post Office. A month later I asked when I would know the answer, and my hon. Friend asked the Post Office again. My question has still not been answered. Does the Post Office actually know how much it is costing to run the central administration? I do not think it does.

I want to embolden my hon. Friend. I think he has done great in ensuring that the right subsidies have been placed at the disposal of Post Office. The Labour

[Michael Jabez Foster]

Government have made it possible for the Post Office to maintain a network that it would not otherwise have been able to maintain. I do not know whether the Post Office's management are incompetent, and I will not accuse them of incompetence until I do know, but I cannot know that until I know how the central costs are made up and whether enterprises such as this are profitable or unprofitable.

I ask my hon. Friend now to insist that the Post Office give the information. It is owned by us. We are the shareholders, and we demand to know how its costs are made up so that we can determine whether the closures that are planned at present, and will be planned in future, are necessary. The Government are very bold in the main, but were they bold enough when they allowed the Post Office to consider as many as 2,500 closures? My guess is that it need not have gone as far as that. Certainly it will not need to go as far as that if we can do something about the amount that is apparently being spent by Post Office Ltd, perhaps through incompetence and perhaps not. In any event, the matter needs further investigation.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I am delighted to have been called. I am particularly delighted to follow the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster), and perhaps to represent the voice of sanity at the other end of Sussex, where we stand up for our post offices and for our constituents. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that he will not have "done great" himself this evening unless he supports the motion tabled by members of my party.

It is extraordinary that the focus of the Liberal Democrats' attack today has been not on the Government or their closure programme, but on the Conservatives. The same happened in my constituency when we were fighting for our post offices: the Liberal Democrats' attack was entirely based on what the Conservatives were doing, which was standing up for the post offices. It is the Liberal Democrats who are merely playing politics, and who have the audacity to claim otherwise.

I think I should declare an interest. I am pleased to speak soon after the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey), because earlier this week I was told by someone investigating my family tree that one of my ancestors, Joseph Loughton, and his father-in-law Ebenezer Easting ran a sub-post office in North Somercotes near Hull, just outside the hon. Gentleman's constituency, in 1892. Perhaps a more relevant interest for me to declare, however, is that my constituency contains the headquarters of the National Federation of SubPostmasters. I must say in response to what has been said by the Secretary of State and other Members that there is considerable disquiet among many sub-postmasters about the way in which they are represented by that organisation, which appears to have caved in and almost taken the Government's shilling in going along with the exercise. The new general secretary has certainly not been as robust in standing up for the future of our sub-postmasters as his predecessor, who lived in my constituency. He lives in Scotland, and comes down to Sussex every week.

On 17 December, I spoke at length on post office closures in Adur and Worthing. I was able to go on for 63 minutes, because of the collapse of business. The Minister responded to that debate and, despite three interventions from me, failed to mention the subject of post offices in Adur and Worthing. I hope that he will have another stab today, because in my constituency we are not losing one, two or three sub-post offices but seven—more than anywhere else in Sussex. It is not 18 per cent. of the sub-post office network—the average across the country—that will be going but 50 per cent. of my sub-post office branches. Mine is a predominantly urban constituency with a high pensioner population—4.6 per cent. of Worthing's population is over 85, which is the highest percentage in the country—and those people rely disproportionately on the post office network. However, they must now travel to the few remaining crowded and overworked branches.

In Lancing and Sompting in my constituency, the post offices are all to be closed, with the exception of the Crown post office, which has to provide a service for 28,000 people, although it is already struggling to deal with its increased business. The impact of the closure programme is not about nimbyism but about unfairness and unsustainability. Despite the petition signed by 6,200 people that I presented in the House, the hundreds of letters, the marches and public meetings, and the consultation exercise, which ended on Christmas eve and was truncated to six weeks, we got absolutely nowhere. On 29 January, it was confirmed that every single one of those seven branches would close. At the same time, MPs were invited by the Post Office to inspect the new state-of-the-art outreach mobile post offices, but we will not have any of those post offices in my constituency or elsewhere in Sussex. At the same time, our constituents have been serenaded with adverts for a new Christmas club, which is available at 14,000 post offices branches, if they can find one. At the same time, we have seen the multi-million pound rebranding exercise for "The People's Post Office". If that is how the Post Office thinks it will earn that title, it deserves all the criticism that is coming to it.

I have never dealt with a more duplicitous, bullying, self-serving, incompetent, arrogant and out-of-touch public body than the Post Office proved itself in the consultation. I do not use those terms lightly, and I am happy to justify my claims. You will judge, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the Post Office is off my Christmas card list, although those cards would probably only get lost in the post in any case. It is duplicitous, because it has proved itself a willing henchman following the Government edict that set in train the latest closure programme of 2,500 branches, based on spurious, ill-conceived and self-destructive criteria. Its duplicity is exceeded only by the actions of Government Ministers and Labour Back Benchers, who are happy to pose for the cameras in front of post office branches in their constituencies, pleading a special case for keeping those branches open.

Will the Minister confirm this whole question whether the Government told the Post Office that it had to close up to 2,500 branches; or does the Post Office really have to close 2,500 branches? That is a serious question that has not been answered. Let us not forget that the closures of those 2,500 branches, in contrast with what happened under previous Governments, are compulsory.

They are not voluntary—they are compulsory closures. The Government and the Post Office are duplicitous in saying that they have to close those branches because business has reduced. That has happened because the way the Government have instructed the Post Office has taken business away from post offices, following changes to the payment of pensions, the post office card account, about which the Government have dithered, and the changes to car tax discs and television licences. They are bullies, because they have virtually blackmailed sub-postmasters into accepting compensation terms at the outset, otherwise they may end up getting nothing at all. Those postmasters have, under this Government, already lost retirement tax relief, which was often based on their business. Their life savings are based on those businesses, and they cannot afford to lose that compensation if their business closes. They have been sworn to secrecy and scared out of lobbying to keep their post offices open, and, as we have heard, the compensation is linked to their not providing any competing services for at least a year: no lottery tickets, no foreign currency, no accepting payment for utilities. How is that acting in the interests of the people, rather than of the post office network, which is supposed to be there for the people? As every Member has said, the consultation was a complete and utter sham.

On the county council negotiations, I pay tribute to Essex, which has led the way, and my own West Sussex county council is currently trying to negotiate with the Post Office. I say "trying" because the Post Office is being very tardy in producing information that will allow the negotiations to go forward. All the while branches are closing down, however, and the equipment will be taken out of them, and it will be very hard to get them back up and running again if there is an eventual deal. The Post Office is clearly dragging its feet and not producing the necessary facts and figures, despite the Minister's warm words that he wishes to encourage such negotiations. Will the Government support a moratorium on closures while negotiations go forward? That is a crucial question.

I also accused the Post Office of being self-serving. It is supposed to be a community service. Its services are located within shops that are the heart of our communities, but there has been a complete lack of transparency in the consultation and closure programme. We just do not know which are the unprofitable branches, how unprofitable they are, or how much money it would take to make them profitable. Sub-postmasters have offered to take cuts in their remuneration, but, again, they have been completely rebuffed. The reasons for this lack of information on closing branches and for the Post Office dragging its feet on negotiations with other providers are that it is interested only in maximising the profitability of its remaining branches and it wants to get rid of the rest of the competition. Profits before people and public service is the hallmark of the whole enterprise.

The Post Office is incompetent because many of the facts in the consultation documents were full of holes. In the response to the consultation, in respect of one of my branches, there was a reference to the problems of crossing busy roads such as the A27. However, the A27 runs nowhere near that branch—but that was in the "facts" the Post Office used to justify the closure of that branch. When it was notified of the branch closures, one of the Worthing branches was described as being in East Sussex, but it is in West Sussex—and that from an organisation that specialises in addresses. That is completely bizarre. The response to this consultation was a total sham. In only a few lines, the future of our community post offices, the livelihoods of sub-postmasters who have dedicated themselves for many years, and the hopes of hundreds of thousands of pensioners who rely on them, were dashed without any come-back at all.

Serious question marks hang over all the access criteria as well. People are supposed to be within a mile of alternative post offices. That is all very well for a crow who lives in the post office that will be closed down, but many people live a mile the other way from the post office that will be closed down, so that could mean a two-mile trip, as the crow flies. Those criteria are also full of holes.

The consultation also ignores deprivation figures. During the consultation in Sussex, the new deprivation figures came out and they showed that my councils had slipped further down the deprivation league and that they now ranked above average for deprivation. All such factors were ignored.

The Post Office is arrogant, too. It seems to believe, with the connivance of the Government, that it should be above the scrutiny of Parliament and the parliamentary process on behalf of the people. All the claims are about the survival of the post office network. It has stuck two fingers up at pensioners, local businesses, the communities of which many post offices form the heart, environmental considerations, councils, councillors and Members of Parliament—yet it has the temerity to call itself the people's Post Office.

This whole consultation has been about blackmail and bullying. If we give in now, that will be a form of appeasement, and in a few years the Post Office will come back and say, "We need to close yet more branches in order to make the network sustainable." It is not on, and it is not fair, and we should continue to object in the fiercest terms.

4.59 pm

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the impassioned plea by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton). I share some of his frustration about how this process has been handled. Even Labour Members who support the Government think that it is fair to say that the consultation process has been less than transparent, and at times shambolic. The data that have been used do not bear scrutiny.

I gave careful consideration to the motion that stands in the name of the leader of the Conservative party—after all, like all hon. Members, I am a supporter of the post office network—but I do not believe that there are market solutions to every problem and I support the use of public subsidy to sustain the network for social reasons. Although it is not particularly fashionable in new Labour circles, I also believe in state intervention to create trade for the network. That is why I would have tried a lot harder to keep many services, such as dealing with TV licences and some benefits collection, within the Post Office's purview. I believe that because I do not think that post offices are just about providing vital community services; I think that they are an embodiment of civil society at the heart of our communities, and we need to intervene to ensure that they have a future.

[Martin Salter]

Of course none of that philosophy sits easily with the Conservative party and its policy of laissez-faire economics, which would allow unprofitable businesses simply to go to the wall. I was looking for some merit when I scanned the Tory motion, but I found it not only wanting but profoundly hypocritical. It was hypocritical because the Conservative party would put no extra money on the table to sustain the network—that fact was drawn out in earlier exchanges that other hon. Members and I had with the shadow spokesman.

In fact, the Conservative approach is worse, because the shadow spokesman failed even to match the Government's commitment to provide the £1.7 billion in subsidy and investment pledged to the post office network up to 2011. Not only is the motion hypocritical, but it is incoherent. The shadow spokesman started well but ended badly. Although he accepts that in this changing world, where an increase in online transactions has undoubtedly impacted on the Post Office's business, the network would shrink, he failed to tell the House what level of shrinkage would be acceptable to him.

Mr. Andy Reed: As my hon. Friend knows, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) said during those earlier exchanges that he would look at the same number of closures. Many Labour Members have examined the Conservatives' position and feel, like my hon. Friend, that it offers nothing new. It is a disgrace to suggest that it contains something new. The Conservatives would provide no new money, they are making no further promises and their approach is disingenuous to constituents, whose hopes may have been raised.

Martin Salter: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. The Conservatives' position gets far worse, but that will have to wait until I tease out aspects of the James review later in my contribution.

I found the attitude of the Conservatives' motion not only hypocritical and incoherent, but profoundly cynical and dishonest. How can they will the ends but not provide the means? How can they accept that closures are inevitable, but fail to put a number on how many branches should close? Let us also bear a history lesson in mind. Some 3,500 post offices closed under the previous Conservative Administration and, to my certain knowledge, Tory MPs in Berkshire campaigned to defend their local post offices at that time, so how can they criticise Labour and Liberal MPs for wanting to do precisely the same thing? That does not add up.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Martin Salter: No. Before I criticise the further irresponsible tactics of the Opposition on this issue, may I just say how much I appreciated the thoughtful suggestions made by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and other hon. Members as to how the post office network could be better organised? I hope that rather than defending the barricade in this debate, Ministers will take on board some of the suggestions that have come from all parts of the House.

On profitability, we know that only 4,000 of the 14,000 post offices can survive without some form of annual subsidy and that annual subsidy is running at about £159 million a year. We know that the size of the network is likely to shrink, and that shrinkage has been reluctantly supported by the National Federation of SubPostmasters, which the Conservatives pray in aid from time to time. We also know that 3,500 post offices have closed under previous Administrations, when not a penny piece of subsidy was provided to support the network.

No one should support the Tory motion, because there is no hiding place for their arguments while they remain light on policy and financially free in their commitments. There is not a Tory MP who was not elected on the pledge to cut public expenditure in line with the James review. Only this week, we read that James is alive and well. I note that it was claimed on 17 March:

> "David Cameron is to salvage a Tory plan to cut government spending by £12bn that formed the centrepiece of Michael Howard's 2005 general election campaign.
> In a sign of his determination to cut taxes, Cameron has authorised his shadow Treasury team to dust down the so-called James review of 2004-05, which identified £12bn of potential government savings."

Said a Tory source:

> "'We are still committed to many aspects of the James review...It has some very sound ideas. Savings will go into the pot and will be used for tax cuts or spent elsewhere.'"

Not only are the Tories failing to match the existing commitment, but there is a very real prospect that budgets will be slashed still further.

Ms Butler: Does my hon. Friend agree with Billy Hayes, the CWU general secretary, who says that we should not forget that the Conservatives tried to privatise the Post Office in 1994 and that the Lib Dems are now committed to selling off 50 per cent.? He also says that the Lib Dems are a right-wing party that will say leftist things in pursuit of a vote.

Martin Salter: I am aware of the battle royal in Brent between the political parties, and I could never be as horrible to the Lib Dems as my hon. Friend is, but I certainly acknowledge that they will say one thing in one place and something else in another.

In Reading, West, we went through an especially tough time in 2004 with the network reinvention programme. Other hon. Members will also bear the scars of that time. In my constituency, we faced the proposed closure of branches in Lyon square, Whitley Wood, Beecham road and the Meadway—all areas of west Reading. But with the strong support of Postwatch and the engagement of the local community, and by focusing on two of the four branches that were clearly pushing at the envelope of the published criteria, we were able to achieve at least one success: we were able to stop the closure of the Whitley Wood branch in one of the most deprived parts of my constituency. While I was not happy to see three post offices close, I accepted that at least the process had some integrity.

That was in 2004. Let us fast forward to 2008. One of the arguments that allowed the Post Office to go ahead with the closure of the Meadway branch—I realise that the names will mean little to other hon. Members—was the fact that there was another branch within one mile, in Wantage road, also in my constituency, and we had to accept that argument. How surprised was I to find, in 2008, that as part of the current programme the Wantage Road branch was scheduled for closure, along with a branch at Lower Tilehurst in Kentwood Hill. Like any good constituency MP, I sprang into action. We have all done it, and other hon. Members will do it when it happens in their constituencies. I raised the petitions, lobbied Postwatch and tested the proposals against the criteria. Once again, I thought we had a case on at least one of the branches.

Let this be a warning to everybody engaged in this process. I wrote to the regional chair of Postwatch, having measured the distances, considered the deprivation indices, and examined the promises that had been made before about additional counters to deal with queuing as a result of the previous closures in 2004. I wrote:

"The criteria which the Post Office use to determine whether or not to close a local post office is whether people have another post office within one mile, except in areas of significant deprivation. In these areas post offices can remain open if the residents live less than a mile from another branch. The Dee Road estate is in part served by the Wantage Road Post Office and significant data is available from Reading Borough Council to demonstrate that this is an area of deprivation. Should Wantage Road be closed, some areas of Dee Road Estate"— that deprived estate in my constituency—

"would be 1.2 or 1.3 miles away from their nearest post office."

In addition, it was proposed that a post office at the bottom of an extremely steep hill with an intermittent bus service would be closed. The replacement post office was already overcrowded, with many pensioners queuing out into the street. We had been promised additional counters in 2004, but they did not appear—certainly not as regularly as we wanted.

We challenged the fact that no account had been taken of additional housing that was being built in the local community, with another 400 new chimney pots coming on stream—another 400 potential customers. I believe that we had put together a strong and powerful argument and I was confident, as I was in 2004, that we could deliver—or save—at least one of those post offices.

Our consultation closed on 31 January. There were reasons to be cheerful on 15 February, because the letter arrived from Postwatch. In my view, it could not have been clearer. It said: "Postwatch has very serious reservations about the consequences of the closure of the Wantage Road post office. We have received numerous concerns from customers and the local MP"—that is me—"with particular reference to Postwatch's responsibility"—this is important—"for vulnerable individuals and communities. We ask Post Office Ltd to reconsider this closure proposal, affecting as it does a relatively deprived area characterised by low incomes, high unemployment and a high proportion of social and special needs housing." We had it in black and white. It was not unreasonable to assume that that would be taken to review and that we had a good chance of saving that post office.

The reviews were then announced, and it turned out that Postwatch did not mean what it said. Although it expressed serious reservations and had asked for reconsideration, it had failed to trigger the formal process. The lesson for hon. Members is that if they get Postwatch on their side—and they need to—they should please make sure that it means what it says. Weasel words alone will not save a branch in any of our constituencies.

Finally, throughout the process the local Liberals remained silent. We do not have too many of them in west Reading, so there was no danger of their colonising the issue. The local Conservatives were noisy but spectacularly irrelevant. As I said earlier, my opposite number, the Tory candidate, launched a campaign a month before the publication of the closure programme to save three branches in Southcote, Purley and Hildens drive that were never at risk and were never going to be at risk. Yet he and his campaign failed even to lodge an objection with Postwatch or to engage in the campaign to help those branches that were earmarked for closure. This is the sort of irresponsible behaviour that has been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Ms Butler), and means that local people, pensioners and disabled people who rely on their post office to provide vital services end up frightened and distressed.

Scaremongering and unnecessarily frightening pensioners in my constituency is no substitute for good, honest campaigning. The dishonesty, incoherence and hypocrisy in the Conservative motion are no substitute for honest politics and there is no case for going into the Lobby tonight for the Conservative party.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I judge that on such an occasion it might be more important for hon. Members to be able to get something on the record rather than to have the full 12 minutes, so I propose with immediate effect to reduce the time limit to seven minutes. I hope that on that basis we should nearly get there.

5.14 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): The Government's post office closure programme is a complete muddle. There is simply no logic in the choice of post offices to be axed, as an example from my constituency shows.

Mine is a large rural constituency in the highlands and islands, but the Post Office decided to lump Argyll and Bute in with the Greater Glasgow area in its closure programme. I could not understand the logic of that at all. Originally, seven offices in my constituency were proposed for closure. That was bad enough, but it could have been worse and the customers of the other offices breathed sighs of relief.

However, their relief was premature: as part of the consultation process, the Post Office decided to spare four offices elsewhere in the Greater Glasgow area. They all happened to be in Labour-held marginal constituencies—something that, if it happened by chance, was a remarkable coincidence.

Those reprieves in Labour marginals meant that an extra four post offices were proposed for closure in a further so-called consultation process. One was the office serving the village of Clynder in my constituency. We still do not know the outcome of the further consultation, but the Clynder office is a typical village post office. The hub of the local community, it is in the same building as the village's only shop. Closing it is therefore bound to have an effect on the shop's business, so there are sound economic reasons for keeping it open.

[Mr. Alan Reid]

If the Clynder post office closes, it will—like all such closures—be to the detriment of village life. I simply do not understand why that office must be closed in order to spare an urban post office in a completely different environment. If the four post offices in Greater Glasgow that were originally considered eligible to be saved deserve it, that is fine and they should be saved. However, the Clynder office—which only last October was deemed worthy of staying open—should not be closed simply as a means to achieve the Government's artificial target of 2,500 closures.

The postmaster at Clynder, Douglas Nicolson, has given 40 years of loyal service to the local community. He is a source of help and advice to all his customers. Such benefits cannot be measured in profit-and-loss terms, and I hope that the Post Office will relent and save the office at Clynder.

Although some post offices in my constituency are facing the axe, that does not mean that the others can relax. There is concern about the long-term viability of all the ones that have escaped the axe, especially those in small communities. For example, the post office in the small village of St. Catherines in my constituency suddenly shut its doors a few weeks ago. I contacted the Post Office and was assured that it is actively seeking someone to take over the business, but several other offices in the highlands and islands have been in a similar position for a long time. I am therefore very concerned that the St. Catherines office may never be reopened and that, gradually and over time, many other post offices in small communities in my constituency may also close.

The problem is that the Government must ensure that post offices are given enough business and support to remain viable. I hope that Ministers will provide an assurance at the end of today's debate that the offices that have escaped the axe in the current closure programme will have a secure future in the long term.

In that respect, the successor to the Post Office card account is vital to the future of our post offices. The Government must ensure that the Post Office retains the contract when the current one expires in two years' time. Only the Post Office has the rural network needed to deliver the contract, and there must be no repeat of the TV licence fiasco. Then, the contract was taken away from the Post Office and given to PayPoint, a company that does not have a rural network that can match the Post Office's. For example, several islands in my constituency have a post office but no PayPoint outlet, with the result that TV viewers there cannot renew their licences over the counter.

The future of the Post Office card account is a vital issue, but POCA must be given more facilities. It should be developed into a basic bank account with functions such as the ability to make cash deposits. That is the route that French and German post offices have gone down, and I hope that the Government will take this country down that route, too. A Post Office bank account with basic banking facilities would, I am sure, make the network sustainable and contribute towards meeting the Government's aims as regards financial inclusion. I hope that the Government will adopt that as the long-term solution.

As for today's debate, I will certainly support the motion calling for a suspension of the post office closure programme. If the programme were suspended, it would allow the Essex proposals to be investigated, and it would give councils and local community groups the time to explore opportunities for sharing services with the post office, put together business plans and secure funding. I believe that there is scope for making savings by sharing post office services with the services of councils and other local agencies. I hope that hon. Members will support the motion, as that will allow time for all the options to be explored.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): Not only do I have a constituency interest in the debate, but I worked for the Post Office for 18 years. Indeed, for a time I worked in the chairman's office, answering MPs' letters, and I am very glad that I am not there now, because I am sure that I would have had quite a few.

I received a letter from the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry), the shadow Minister for postal affairs. I ask him not to make a habit of sending me letters. I have enough problems with my own party's Whips without the Opposition trying to whip me, too. However, I will be supporting the motion; I have given the matter careful consideration. I support the wording, but I detect a whiff of hypocrisy from the Conservative party on reinvestment in the network. If the Conservatives were in government, postal services would be in a worse position. I know that because I had to fight, along with the Secretary of State for Health, who led a magnificent campaign, to save Morecambe post office—a Crown post office—and a post office in Lancaster from closure when the Conservatives were in power. Indeed, they tried to privatise Royal Mail and the rest of the Post Office, so I will take no lessons from them on what we should do to save the network. However, I have read the motion, and the wording mirrors my thoughts on the issue, so for that reason only, I will support it.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend speaks for many Labour Members who have engaged with the consultation and worked with local communities and local authorities only to be ignored, and who have had the support of Postwatch only for that to be ignored. I wrote to Allan Leighton, too, only to get a reply from the woman who sent out the original closure notice. The fundamental issue at stake is how Parliament holds the Post Office to account for a closure programme that makes no sense.

Geraldine Smith: Yes, I agree completely. The consultation has been a complete sham. I think that everyone in the House agrees with that. On the post office closures, I have not been able to get commercial information relating to my constituency from the Post Office. There is a village post office that is open for two mornings a week, and the village would settle for one morning a week, but the Post Office will not tell me how much that would cost. One of the post offices in my constituency, on Kellet road in Carnforth, is a viable office; I know that because I know the sub-postmistress personally. She has given me the information and there is no way that that office should be closing.

David Taylor: I declare an interest: I am from the fourth generation of a post office family, and have two post offices closing in my constituency in the next few days, including one in my home village. My hon. Friend talks about figures; the Government tell us that the average saving from each of the 2,500 closures is £18,000. That is a total of £45 million, which does not lop off a substantial amount from the subsidy that is allegedly needed to keep the post office network going. Does she agree that over the next few years, irrespective of what happens, there will be further economic closures—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is an abuse to take so much time on an intervention when we are very tight for time and many hon. Members who have been in the Chamber for the entire debate are waiting to speak.

Geraldine Smith: The key to helping the post office network survive is making sure that new business is found for it. We talk about the subsidy for the Post Office. Let us have fewer consultants across Government Departments. We could save a fortune.

It is wrong that viable post offices are being closed. That is clearly what is happening in some cases. That information is not being made available to Members of Parliament. As I said, I have asked the Post Office for the information but it has still not given it to me. That is wrong.

Another office in my constituency, Nether Kellet, is a village shop—the last shop in the village. If that office closes, the nearest one, although it may be within the recommended distance, is very hard to get to because there is no direct public transport. No thought has been given to the proposals by the Post Office. That is why we should take a step back and rethink them.

I have concerns also about the Crown office network and what will happen to that. Crown offices across the country give a reliable service to the public. The staff are highly trained and we must be careful that we are not franchising them out. We should ensure that they are protected.

I saw a press release from the Communication Workers Union and I agree with what it says. It calls on the Government "to suspend the deeply unpopular closure programme and provide lasting investment to secure the future of the Post Office network".

However, the union also says that it is "concerned that the Conservative Party does not have the best interests of the network at heart, as its policy effectively calls for it to be dismantled".

Let us have a bit of honesty in the debate. Let us not have complete opportunism from the Opposition.

5.27 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), who has already demonstrated in her career that she is a Member of principle. Tonight she is yet again doing the right thing, unlike many of her colleagues.

The Post Office proposes to close a third of the post office network in Bognor Regis and Littlehampton—five post offices in Bognor Regis and one in Littlehampton. The truncated consultation process has caused a real problem. We have had petitions and public demonstrations. We held a public meeting in Littlehampton which someone from the Post Office attended, but when a big public meeting was held in Bognor Regis, where five post offices are to close, no one from the Post Office was able to attend. Why? Because they were busy attending public meetings in London. If that consultation period had been longer, the Post Office would have had people available to come to Bognor Regis.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree with the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) that the length of consultation does not make much difference if the consultation was a complete sham?

Mr. Gibb: My right hon. Friend makes a telling point. The view is shared by many people in Bognor Regis and Littlehampton that the whole consultation process is a sham and that no notice will be taken by the Post Office of the views of local residents. The fact that no one from the Post Office attended that public meeting in Bognor Regis compounds that view. The Select Committee said of the process:

"The lack of transparency also leads to a misunderstanding of the nature of the consultation among local residents, and has engendered the belief that the public consultations are a sham."

The branches proposed for closure in my constituency are in areas where a high proportion of the residents are elderly or very elderly, by which I mean over the age of 85. The Craigweil-on-Sea branch serves a population in which 38 per cent. are retired and the Aldwick branch serves a population in which 36 per cent. are retired. Nearly 40 per cent. of the residents of Aldwick and Craigweil are over the age of 65 and 5 per cent. are over 85.

In Littlehampton the Beach branch in Norfolk road serves a population in which 27 per cent. are retired, more than a quarter are over the age of 65 and more than "one in five people have a Limiting Life Long illness."

The people who use the Norfolk road branch tend to be very elderly people who live close by and who can just walk the short distance to the post office and the grocery store, but no further. As the Select Committee report said:

"We have had numerous complaints that proposals failed to take account...of high concentrations of elderly or disabled people living close to offices scheduled for closure."

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): My hon. Friend is making an excellent point. I speak for Henley, where we face closures in Stanton St. John and Crowmarsh Gifford, but the closure of post offices affects the elderly population not only in rural communities; I also have direct experience of the issue in London, where elderly people are being deprived of vital services. By closing post offices, we not only deprive the elderly of those services, but rip out the lynchpin of the local economy. That applies not only in the villages, for which—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to respect the fact that we must have short interventions.

Mr. Gibb: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that important intervention. He will make a great advocate for London, and I wish him all the very best.

[Mr. Gibb]

It is clear that the Post Office has failed to take into account high concentrations of the elderly and very elderly. The very elderly tend to have abandoned the use of a car, owing to failing eyesight or poor general health, and they struggle to make their way to their local shops and post office on foot, by wheelchair or by scooter. Travelling to the next nearest post office will be impossible for many elderly residents. The next nearest post office to Craigweil is at Rose Green, and getting there would mean walking nearly a mile along a route parts of which have no footpath.

Residents in the Beach area of Littlehampton will find themselves having to use the main Crown post office in Littlehampton if the Beach branch is closed. As well as being difficult to get to from there, Littlehampton's Crown post office is notorious for its lengthy and time-consuming queues; that is consistent with other Crown post offices around the country. The Select Committee said:

"Queuing times at Crown Offices were longer than in most franchised operations (a consideration for frailer customers)".

If the Beach branch is to close, I hope that Post Office Ltd will give an undertaking to put extra staff in Crown post offices and provide seating and help for elderly and disabled customers.

Public transport in Bognor Regis and Littlehampton is very poor. Many of the bus services that do exist are infrequent and depend on subsidies from West Sussex county council; those are often reviewed and services are often withdrawn. If the Hawthorn Road and South Bersted branches closed, a large area of residential Bognor Regis would be devoid of any post office branch. Part of that area encompasses two of the most deprived wards in west Sussex; only one third of residents in Pevensey, for example, own a car. Given poor public transport, there is great reliance on post offices remaining local. Closing those two branches would present real difficulties for many residents in the area.

Like many towns in the area, Bognor Regis and Littlehampton have grown from smaller communities that have merged over time. The Beach Town area of Littlehampton was a separate town until development joined it to the rest of Littlehampton. The small parade of shops in that area is a community in itself. If we lose the post office branch run by Bharti and Raj Shah at the back of the grocery store, and if the grocery store goes as well, we will lose the hub of a community in Littlehampton. The same will happen if we lose the post office in Craigweil, which has a parade of shops near the sea and which is cut off from other parts of Bognor Regis. If we lose the shop and the post office, which is run by Barbara and Robin Doe, the whole hub of that community will go as well.

In conclusion, the proposed closure plan for the post office network of Bognor Regis and Littlehampton involves a third of the branches—almost double the national figure of 18 per cent. The area has a much higher proportion of the elderly and very elderly, who are the section of the population most dependent on the existence of a locally sited post office. Although the Post Office will have recorded the proportion of retired people living in the area, the closure programme has not taken into account the numbers of very elderly people. I urge the House to support the Opposition motion this evening, to suspend the compulsory closure of the sub-post office network.

5.34 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). Many of the characteristics of his constituency also apply to mine, in that we have the third highest number of over-85-year-olds of any constituency in the country.

The first few words of the amendment say that the Government

"recognises the vital social and economic role of post offices, in particular in rural and deprived urban communities".

Let us see how they live up to that pledge in the Cotswolds. With a nationwide loss of 18 per cent. of post offices, the Cotswolds region is losing 12 of its branches—four completely and eight through outreach. That is a quarter of its post office network. Many local businesses depend on their post office. The bus service in the Cotswolds is, in many cases, almost non-existent, so this will hit the elderly and vulnerable particularly hard. Eleven of those 12 post offices—I would like the Minister particularly to listen to this point—have a shop attached to them. If the story first broken in The Daily Telegraph is true and the Post Office intends to restrict the business that those shops are allowed to offer as a result of the post office closing, because it might duplicate what the post office originally offered, that would be a further devastating and possibly destabilising blow wreaked by the Government on the highly rural areas in my constituency.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): My hon. Friend's description of his constituency mirrors much of the experience in mine, where local shops would also close. Moreover, the absence of alternative financial services outlets, with very few banks, means that the post office provides access to financial services for some of the most vulnerable in our community. With that gone, the whole financial inclusion agenda is in serious trouble in rural areas.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: As always, my hon. Friend makes pertinent points on behalf of his constituents. He looks after them very well in this House, and he has done so again on this occasion. I entirely agree with what he said.

The closures have resulted in the biggest single constituency campaign that I have dealt with in 16 years as a Member of Parliament. I have received more than 500 letters, all of which have been summarised, and 12 separate representations had been made to Post Office Ltd at the end of the closure of the consultation period at the beginning of this week, with copies sent to the Minister. I have organised eight well-attended public meetings, and we had a march in the centre of Cirencester at which 500 residents turned up to demonstrate about the fact that if a vast number of extra people have to go to the Crown post office in Cirencester, it will not be able to cope.

I want to provide the Minister with a brief rural tour of the Cotswolds to demonstrate some of the problems with the consultation, beginning with the very northern and southern edges of my constituency, on the Worcestershire-Warwickshire boundary in the case of Weston-sub-Edge, and on the Wiltshire boundary in the case of Meysey Hampton. The problem there is that because the consultation was done for different areas in different parts of the country, and neither Worcestershire, Warwickshire nor Wiltshire has yet been reviewed, residents are having their post office closed without knowing what the future of the post office in the adjoining county is going to be. I believe that the Government and the Post Office have deliberately staggered the closure programme on that basis to avoid the national outcry that would otherwise take place.

I should like now to go to the most rural part of my constituency—Temple Guiting and Guiting Power. Those two villages expected that one of their post offices would close and were completely taken aback when they both closed. One of those post offices has just two hours of outreach. I have made representations to the Post Office and to the Minister about the alterations that could be made to that outreach. Will he comment on how it is going to be funded, how long it is likely to last, and what provisions there will be to review it once it is in place and we find that it is not working as well as it might? Those two villages will be joined by residents from Longborough, who are extremely vociferous about their closure, and Blockley, where they are trying to form a co-operative village shop in order to keep their post office open.

In the highly likely event that any of the residents affected by all five closures find themselves needing a post office out of outreach hours, they will be forced to go to Bourton-on-the-Water, Stow or Moreton-in-Marsh. I defy the Minister, in the middle of a summer afternoon with a large influx of visitors, to find a car-parking space within two miles of those post offices.

I come to two other rural post offices—those of Sherborne and Aldsworth. One of the young schoolchildren in Sherborne managed to get 200 names on a petition in just two hours, such is the strength of feeling in that village.

In the limited time left to me, I want to talk about Cirencester, which currently has three branches: one Crown post office, and two sub-post offices. The two sub-post offices are Stratton, which serves 5,400 residents, and the Beeches, which serves 12,300 residents. In the case of Stratton, at my well-attended public meeting of 250 people—I hope that the Minister will bear this in mind—the sub-postmaster, John Lafford, reported two amazing facts. These are on the public record. In January alone, he had a turnover of £468,000—in just one month—and he was offered a payment of £100,000 if he took the post office closure payment, but he wants to stay open because he enjoys serving the community. What a way to go about a closure programme. The Beeches serves 12,300 residents, with another 750 new houses about to be built, but it is scheduled for closure. Surely the Government can think of a more sensible programme than closing such profitable post offices, which is really the politics of the madhouse.

If the closures go ahead, and the two closest post offices to Cirencester—Rendcomb and Colesbourne—are also closed, a population of 19,000 people in the town of Cirencester and the surrounding 21 villages, across 100 square miles, will be left with one inadequate Crown post office. I do not know of anywhere in the country where such a monstrous proposal is in place. I ask the Minister if he will seriously reconsider the proposals, particularly in the case of Cirencester.

I end on this note. Much has been made in this debate about the services that have been run down in our post offices, but I want to ask the Minister what positive proposals he has to introduce new services. I think that I was one of the first Members to mention the idea of having a broadband connection in every post office. If such a connection were provided, a huge amount of information would be available to all my constituents. It is amazing that even elderly constituents are becoming more computer literate every day—a surprising factor. With a little invention, the Post Office could offer a lot of other things. It could offer ATMs, which could be further refined so that they were compatible with the Post Office benefit card; benefit claimants could then draw cash from their own post office. A lot of services could be provided by the Post Office, and as other hon. Members have said, it should be much more free in the amount of services it allows sub-postmasters and mistresses to offer.

In closing, I say to the Minister that the consultation is flawed. I am not a luddite. The system cannot remain exactly as it is, and it needs some rationalisation, but the way in which the Government have dealt with the consultation is flawed. It is wrong, and the wrong branches are being closed. I ask him to think again, particularly about the two branches in Cirencester.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I shall be very brief. Any member of the public reading the Opposition's motion would find it strange that anyone could vote against it, particularly those who are concerned about their own post offices and what is happening in their constituencies. The suspension of the compulsory closure of sub-post offices while all the issues are reassessed is common sense, and no one should feel that they are being disloyal to their party or the Government in voting for it.

All of us feel strongly about the closure programme, and, as many hon. Members have said, this Parliament is ultimately responsible for the matter. I would have preferred a Government motion calling for such a suspension, which we could have supported, but it is an Opposition one, and I shall support it. As chair of the all-party group on post offices, I have done everything in my constituency absolutely by the book. London is in the middle of its very short consultation period—I am not sure whether that makes a lot of difference. A suspension would give us more time to oppose the closure of particular sub-post offices. I have gone through all the criteria for my Lambeth Walk post office on Vauxhall street. I have measured everything, had Postwatch down and held a public meeting. The local community is totally involved and supportive.

Huge amounts of regeneration are coming into our area about which Royal Mail and the Post Office did not know. We are presenting all the information, including the deprivation figures and the fact that there are eight sheltered homes within a few hundred yards of the post office. It would be a disgrace if, under the existing criteria, the post office did not stay open. I will wait and see.

[Kate Hoey]

I have done everything by the book and I am sure that that applies to many colleagues. By voting for the motion, we send a little signal, which tells the Government that they are responsible for determining the figures—arbitrary figures that have been plucked out of the air.

Today, all sorts of ideas have been expressed about possible changes, including legal action that might happen in London, proposals that Essex and other local authorities have made, and the Government using the Post Office more and instructing the BBC to allow television licences to be bought in post offices. Many things can be done, but we need more time. The motion is sensible and I hope that many of my colleagues will join me in the Lobby tonight.

5.45 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): I am pleased that we are holding a debate on a subject of considerable concern to my constituents and I am glad that I can make a brief contribution to it.

I was disappointed in the Secretary of State's speech, which failed to deal with the genuine concerns of all our constituents about the changes in the postal service. I congratulate my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State on a constructive and logical approach to examining those issues and highlighting the flaws in the action that is being taken.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) made a speech that I strongly supported, which covered most of the issues that face suburban and Greater London post office closures. We hope that the Government will listen today and propose a rethink. We also hope that the Post Office will suspend the closure programme to consider the possible alternatives. For example, we have discussed Essex county council's proposal, which could ameliorate the problems.

In the past few years in Bexleyheath and Crayford, we have lost many of our sub-post offices—in Barnehurst, Lesnes Abbey, Brampton and on the boundary between Barnehurst and Collier's ward. Today, we are threatened with yet another closure in the Brampton ward of my constituency. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge, we have experienced the closure of a popular and busy post office and its relocation to the upstairs of WH Smith in the centre of the town. It has just opened, and we were genuinely worried about the relocation because of the lifts, the staff, the location and mobility problems for those who are disabled or have children in pushchairs and prams. We will wait and see how it works out.

I want to highlight the Brampton road post office, which is threatened. Its closure is subject to consultation. It opens for 51 hours a week and completes between 750 and 990 transactions a week at its two service positions. It has level access, provides euros on demand and has an external ATM facility. There is unrestricted parking and a bus stop 100 yd away. Many of those who use the post office are pensioners who do not own a car and do not find mobility easy. The closure of the branch would cause genuine hardship to people in and around the area that I represent in Brampton. There are alternative branches, but they are a considerable distance away—in Long lane, which is more than a mile away, and Wroughton road, which is two thirds of a mile away. They are open for less time and do not have easy access via buses.

On Friday 22 February, we held some meetings in my local office with representatives of Post Office Ltd to discuss the proposed closure. I made strong points about the disadvantage it would cause local people. Of course we understand that the Government have been responsible for reducing the Post Office's opportunities to serve the community—that has been well discussed this afternoon, so I will not repeat those points.

One of the issues raised by Melanie Corfield, who is head of external relations for the south-east, was the opportunities for new products that the Post Office wants to promote. One of those, which was in its business plan, was financial services. The Post Office extolled the new bond backed by the Bank of Ireland, which it hoped people would buy, thereby creating new development services for it. However, I made the point, strongly and forcefully, that it was difficult for people to get to post offices and therefore difficult for them to use the new services. If post offices are not in communities, there will obviously be a disincentive for people who do not have cars or easy mobility to take up those new opportunities.

There are serious concerns about closing branches without considering the needs of local communities. Many local businesses are also concerned about the loss of a facility that they use. I had meetings with many local shopkeepers and businesses that were great users of the services offered by the Brampton road branch. They were concerned about how their businesses would suffer if the branch closed.

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Evennett: I intend no disrespect to the hon. Gentleman, but we do not have much time and I know that everyone wants to get in. I therefore feel obliged not to take any interventions.

The decisions to close local post offices are misguided and will ultimately damage the Post Office's business and its reputation. The consultation exercise, which I raised in an intervention on the Secretary of State, is flawed and a sham. Previous consultations, which were well supported by my constituents who want to keep the branch open, have been ignored and rejected by the Post Office. Logical and reasonable arguments about why a post office should remain—because of business, pensioners, transport, distance or community—have all received a blanket rejection.

It is no wonder that people feel disengaged from community political activity, when they feel that their voices are not being heard. The fear remains that the Post Office and the Government, who control the service, are out of touch. Both will suffer if we do not place a moratorium on the closures and consider the alternatives. The issue is important throughout the country, no more so than in my constituency and across suburbia and Greater London. The Government should think again.

5.53 pm

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): I shall try to be as brief as I can. I start by declaring an interest. I own a building that contains a post office that is due to be closed under the network change programme.

Five post offices in my constituency face closure. I disagree with every decision, as one would expect, but in every case I can find flaws in the process and many reasons why the post offices should not close. Two of the post offices proposed for closure are in urban areas; one of them is in Thatcham, an area that suffered the worst flooding in south-east England last July. The community faces not only the closure of its post office, but an enormous influx of new housing, through the redevelopment of an Army base that was vacated some years ago. It seems quite bizarre that the community in south Thatcham should face that closure.

Other branches are in rural settings, including in the village where I live. I have been using that post office since I could walk, and probably since before then. The anger and frustration at the lack of thought and understanding, and—as I shall explain if I have time—at the lack of humanity behind the process has been profoundly felt by the many thousands of people throughout the community who will be directly affected and by the many more who will be indirectly affected.

I had a pyrrhic victory in this process at the start of the consultation, in which we virtually got the consultation period extended. In an act that perhaps exemplifies the incompetence with which all this has been done, the Government decided that the six-week consultation period should include Christmas. Post offices are, of course, extremely busy at that time, and people have other things on their mind.

I would love to use my few minutes to rant and rail against what I perceive to be the wickedness of this decision. That might be cathartic, but it would not be particularly illuminating. To me, this is about much more than the provision of postal services or of post offices in communities. It is about the communities themselves. Those who oppose the motion tabled in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) today will be demonstrating a complete lack of understanding of what makes a community, and of the complex web of relationships and interactions that are the fabric of those communities.

Later this year, the Sustainable Communities Act 2007 will come into force. I was proud to be a sponsor of that legislation. This is precisely the kind of issue that it was intended to address, and it had universal support across the House. It seems bizarre that the Government, knowing that the Act is about to come into force, cannot delay this process so that local communities can be empowered to make these decisions. That was precisely the purpose of the Act.

The closure programme fits into a pattern. I have bored the House at length on such matters in the past. In fact, my first faltering utterances in this place were about the loss of shops, churches, pubs—for which the Budget sounded another death knell last week—and sporting organisations. I spoke of how they had all been sucked out of smaller communities and moved into towns, and out of smaller towns into larger towns. Every community suffers as a result, as its life blood is sucked out.

We could shrug our shoulders and say, "Well, this is the way of things." That is very much what the Government have done. They have said that the internet has come in, that these post offices are not doing very well, and that that is just the way of things. Well, no. This is about vulnerable people, as has been pointed out by Members on both sides of the House. I have only to stand in the post office queue in Newbury—the queue is considerably longer following the suburban post office closure programme in 2005—to see just who those people are. They are the people who cannot buy online. They are the people who pay their soaring heating bills with hard-saved cash. In the Government's eyes, these people are inconvenient, because they will not conform. They will not go on the internet. They will not leap into a car and drive to the next town when their post office closes.

People who live in rural communities and have the temerity to need services—which are, of course, now more expensive and harder to deliver—are also considered inconvenient. I am sure that there are those not far from this building who would like rural communities simply to be places where people sleep, rather than places where real life takes place and where services need to be delivered.

I want to address the important issue of the access criteria. This has really frustrated me. The criteria have been calculated on an as-the-crow-flies basis. They do not take into account road networks or public transport facilities. The Government's need to hit their closure targets while also meeting the access criteria means that profitable post offices will close, simply because they are in the wrong location. I could take the Minister to post offices in my constituency that are not profitable but will survive. I will not do so, because they would probably then be zoned for closure as well. The lunacy of all this is that profitable post offices in my constituency are going to close. The access criteria, which involve drawing a straight line "as the crow flies", are utterly devoid of any understanding of how human beings really live and co-exist.

As we have heard, the consultation has been a sham. In our case, it has been a fig leaf for a decision that had clearly already been taken. In my last few seconds, I must ask the Minister to address the one-for-one issue. Some weeks ago, I heard him say in this Chamber—I have heard it again today—that the figure involved was up to 2,500. In this building, I had a briefing from the people who were processing the network change programme in my constituency. They said, "If you managed to save a post office in your constituency, that would be fantastic, but we would have to find another one."

Let me finish with a big plea for the bullying of postmasters and postmistresses in my constituency to stop. If they have put in a pay point, replacing the loss of a post office, they have done so for the vulnerable in the community. Nobody else but the most vulnerable is going to use it. They should not be threatened for doing that; the bullying must stop.

6 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I shall be very brief, but I want it put on the record that I will vote for the Conservative motion this evening. I can see nothing wrong with it. I read it through two or three times in case I was missing something. I see nothing in it that my friends or colleagues on this side cannot vote for. I listened with interest, as I always do, to my friend from Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), who spent 18 years working in the Post Office. She will be voting with the Conservatives. I am pleased to see my friend from Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), who chairs the all-party sub-post offices group and will also be voting with the Conservatives. There is no need for anyone on this side to feel at all frightened about the prospect of voting with the Conservatiyes. Let me explain that it is the only option left open to us. It is the only option we have left to stop or suspend the closure programme.

Let me tell you this, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I participated in a Westminster Hall debate with my Lancashire colleagues, including my friend from Morecambe and Lunesdale. In Lancashire, we face 59 closures and many of my friends spoke about that in the debate. I spoke, too. If I did not vote for the Conservative motion now, I could not look my constituents in the eye; I simply could not, because I railed against the closure programme in that debate. It is no good my colleagues, tucked away in Westminster Hall, speaking with great passion on 4 March only to fail to support the motion before us tonight. My own constituency is losing six post offices. Since I have been its Member of Parliament, we have lost 10. We started out with 28, so the post office network in my Pendle constituency will have been more than halved, which is unacceptable.

Now is not the time to slag off the Conservatives—[HON. MEMBERS: "Go on!"] I spend so much of my life doing that, I know, but this is not the time. Let me say this, however. The Conservatives would get more support from the Labour Benches if they were more open with us about the level of subsidy that they would put into the post office network. My friend on the Front Bench here has told us—he told us in Westminster Hall on 4 March as well—that only 4,000 post offices are commercially viable. We have a network of 14,000, which is going down to 11,500, so post offices will always need to be subsidised.

I believe that post offices are a social good. They are not just about selling people stamps. The network could not be recreated; if it were smashed, it could not be put together again. There are all sorts of exciting, innovative things we could do with a revivified post office network. Let me finish on this point. I hope that my friends swallow the prejudices of decades or whatever and do the right thing, which is to support the Conservative motion.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con) rose—

Mr. Prentice: I give way to my friend over there.

Mr. Burrowes: In that context, will he invite all three Enfield MPs, who have been united in wanting to save the area's six post offices, to join together in the Conservative Lobby this evening?

Mr. Prentice: Anyone who is serious about trying to save the post offices in their constituency—whether it be in Enfield or anywhere else—has to vote in favour of the motion.

6.3 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): We learned three weeks ago how many closures Somerset would face. The figures are very clear: in the present Somerset county council area, 30 will close, with another seven downgraded; in the historic county of Somerset, a further 18 will close, making a total of 55 closures across Somerset. Anyone who wants to know what villages are involved could find them in my early-day motion 1036.

I shall concentrate on the seven direct closures in my constituency—in Bayford, Bower Hinton, Holcombe, Keinton Mandeville, Kingsdon, Sparkford and Yeovilton—and two that will be replaced by a van service in Charlton Horethorne and North Cadbury. I feel that I have been fighting the same campaign for 20 or more years—in the House, previously as a county councillor or before that as someone involved in local community politics. It seems to me that we are seeing a constant reduction in the post office network.

I know that there were 3,500 closures under the Conservative Government, but I think that the main reason for that was neglect. Now it is happening by design: we are deliberately closing down large parts of the rural post office network. I hear Labour Members talk of the "stability" of the network. It is a strange sort of stability that closes 6,500 sub-post offices. At medical school I used to be told that there was a difference between stability and morbidity. What the Government are proposing is the stability of a corpse. Through a process of bullying and moving business away from post offices, they have created circumstances in which they can say that those post offices are not profitable and must be closed down. I thought that we had won the battle for rural post offices back in 2002. How wrong I was—that was only a temporary lull before the storm that we now face.

We know from what has happened so far that public opinion is not enough. We can collect all the signatures that we like. Four million people signed a petition against post office closures, but it did not mean a thing. We can organise local petitions—every parish council in my constituency signed a petition that I presented to the House—and they do not mean a thing. All our local petitions and letters do not mean a thing, because the Government have decreed that the closures will go ahead.

I do not think the Government understand why we fight so strongly for local post offices. There are all the social reasons which we have heard already today. We have heard about the people who do not have the comfortable option of getting into their second Volvo to drive to the next town because they do not have that second Volvo, or even the first, and could not drive it if they had it because they are elderly or infirm. Those people cannot find a substitute for the local post office. They do not want their money to be paid into a bank account, because they have never worked on the basis of a bank account. I think the yuppie Ministers have forgotten that there are people in this country who still budget on a week-by-week basis with cash in hand. That is the way those people want to stay, and they need their sub-post offices.

There is, for instance, the community aspect of post offices. The post office is the centre of many village communities, and in many instances it is all that we have left. It is not just postal services that are affected, but all the other activities that are centred on the post office, which is often the last shop in the village. I have been considering the effect of the planned closures in my constituency. As a result of the closure in Bower Hinton, people will have to walk two to three miles to Martock, down a steep hill which they will have to climb up when they return. The post office is the last shop in Bower Hinton, so that is in danger as well. When those people arrive in Martock they will find a very successful little post office, but one with permanent queues which is unable to provide any further capacity. Where is the logic in that? Where, moreover, is the environmental logic? We are supposed to have a joined-up Government who take the environment seriously. Where is the environmental logic in people having to drive for miles to reach a post office?

Holcombe has sheltered housing directly opposite the post office, but apparently Post Office Ltd was not aware of it. The post office has always provided a prescription service for the local surgery, and that too will go. As for Kingsdon, I went to a public meeting there at 9 o'clock on Saturday morning. More than 100 people were there; practically everyone in the village had gone to make their point. They were irate, because one of the things that the Post Office had said in the letter it had sent was that there was an alternative in Yeovilton. There are two problems with that alternative. First, it is on the royal naval air station base. People could not get past the two large Marines with machine guns at the gates, but even if they could, Yeovilton is one of the other post offices that are due to close, so it is not a great alternative.

Charlton Horthorne and North Cadbury have been offered a van alternative. Vans are great—I would love to see mobile post offices dealing with many of the communities that have already lost their post offices—but the problem is that there is no commitment beyond three years, so we will lose our permanent post offices in return for the promise of a mobile service that may disappear.

We have six weeks in which to make all those points, and we have been told that we will not have a result at the end of that period because of local elections. As we are not due to have any local elections in Somerset, we understand perfectly well that this is another example of the Government trying to cover their backs.

The key issue is whether we regard post offices purely as commercial undertakings or as a public service. I regard them as a public service. When I hear people say that a particular post office has a small number of customers, I think that for those people it is an essential service, and it does not matter that they live in the country rather than, as would be convenient, in a big city. They should have access to the services that they need. When I am told that post offices have to make a profit, I wonder whether that will soon apply to our schools, roads and our military involvement in Basra. Must they make a profit, or else be closed down? Perhaps we should look at those post offices as a genuine people's post office. What an insult to run that campaign, when the post office is anything but the people's post office. It is the Minister's plaything, and it provides a profit for Post Office Ltd.

We do not ask for much in our rural areas, but we rely on our village hall, our village school, our village shop and our village post office. I do not think that is too much to ask, and we should keep those post offices open as a genuine people's post office and a service for the people of this country.

6.10 pm

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): Given the limited time available, I shall refrain from criticising the illogicality and stupidity of the network change programme, because any credibility that it ever possessed has been comprehensively demolished by Members on both sides of the House.

I shall focus my attention on the impact that the programme is likely to have on my constituency. The closure programme for north Wales has not yet been announced, because of the politically motivated purdah imposed by the Post Office. It will be announced in July this year but, given the pattern that is evident across the country, post offices in my constituency will certainly close. I should like to draw the House's attention to circumstances in the southern part of my constituency, which largely consists of scattered villages. They may well fall within the three-mile limit of the rather silly access criteria in the programme, but as few people fly as the crow does, they are, in fact considerably further apart. I should like to use the village of Pentrefoelas as an example. Its post office will not necessarily close, but the post office in the village of Llanarmon yn Ial may well close, as may post offices in Llanfalteg, Llansanan, Llangernyw and any other village in the immediate vicinity.

Pentrefoelas is not untypical, and its post office is operated by Mr. Mark Tuck and Ms Sonia Taylor. It is a profitable business, and it is combined with the only shop in the village—it, too, is profitable—and a small guest house, which is also profitable. Unless those three profitable businesses are operated together, there is not sufficient business to maintain an income for the postmaster and his wife. Pentrefoelas is a village of 300 people, most of whom are elderly and many of whom do not have motor cars. The nearest village is Cerridgydrudion, which is about 6 miles away by road. If the closure programme hit Pentregoelas, the people who live there would be obliged to travel by road to Cerridgydrudion. The comments of some of the residents Pentrefoelas are telling. Miss Rita Davies, who is 79, said:

"The nearest post office from here is Cerridgydrudion, which is six miles away. I would have to get a community taxi, costing in the region of £5, as the bus service is not very good."

Mrs. Linda Bolger said:

"As a single parent with five children and no transport, I rely heavily on the post office to cash my giros, and the local shop for buying bread...The closure would affect me greatly."

Perhaps most tellingly, Mrs. Maureen Rice said that the closure of the post office

"would mean the end of village life."

In the past few years, rural communities in Wales have suffered a great deal as a result of the downturn in agriculture, most recently following foot and mouth disease. They have sustained school closures, and they have experienced rising fuel prices. In fact, over the past few years the stuffing has been knocked out of village life in rural Wales. The rural post office—in most cases, the only shop in the village—is the last bastion of rural life in many parts of Wales, but the residents of rural Wales now see it being removed. That will have an effect not only on the cohesion of communities, but on other things in Wales, too, such the culture and the

[Mr. David Jones]

Welsh language, which is very important. In those circumstances, I find it odd that the Government's amendment to the motion purports to recognise

"the vital social and economic role of post offices, in particular in rural and deprived urban communities" because in my constituency it is precisely those communities that will suffer at the hands of this programme.

I am glad that some Labour Members will join the Conservatives in the Lobby this evening. It is evident that many more than those who have spoken in the debate support the general thrust of the motion; in fact, 35 have already signed early-day motion 997, and, as we know, several Ministers, including Cabinet Ministers, are lobbying actively for the retention of post offices in their constituencies.

This is probably the single most important issue I have experienced since I was first elected to this place. It has attracted more consternation, anxiety and worry than almost any other. I am glad that there are Labour Members of principle who will join us Conservatives in the Lobby this evening. I hope that many more do, and that the Post Office receives a signal from the House this evening that this sham programme is utterly unacceptable and that it is damaging to the social fabric of this country, and that the Post Office and the Government will have to think again.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): As time is very limited, if Members limit their speeches to three minutes, more of them may be able to catch my eye.

6.17 pm

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): I begin by referring to a letter from the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry). It was addressed to me, but at the top of the letter it says, "Dear Gordon". I think the hon. Gentleman must be confusing me with the Prime Minister. If I did not find it amusing to be sent such a ridiculous letter, I would find it offensive.

Many Members have talked about the impact of technology on the use of postal services—for example, people can now buy their road tax disc over the internet. However, I recently went to a post office in London to try to buy my television licence, and I was told that I had to go to a PayPoint. It is ridiculous that the Post Office is not still doing a deal with the television licence people so that we can get our licences at post offices.

I do not think any Members are in favour of post office closures, but what we are in favour of is the best use of resources and maximising the economic and social benefits for our constituents. I can therefore see that the many Members representing rural constituencies who have argued for the retention of post offices have a strong case. In urban areas such as mine, I can perhaps see a case for the closure of the odd post office. Some post offices in and around Preston might be unprofitable, but it might also be too far to the next one. In particular, I make reference to Deepdale Road and Acregate Lane post offices and Moor Nook post office on Pope lane; they are popular and used by many people, but not all of them are profitable. The Opposition motion refers to 2,500 post offices being outlined for closure. I do not think there is any case for closing that many, but there would be a case for closing some of them. I would not expect this process to result in the closure of every post office that has been earmarked, and I include among them my own in Preston.

Let me refer to another example of a petition, this one containing hundreds of names on the Manchester Road post office. I understand that there is a sign in its window saying, "Say no to closures". However, when my office rang that post office, its postmaster told us he does not want a campaign against closure. He is angry about people going round with a petition campaigning to keep his post office open, because he wants to take the £60,000 offered to close the post office in his property. There are two sides to the story. It is important that hon. Members value post offices and the services that they provide, but the case for no closures cannot be made.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I shall be as brief as possible in order to allow colleagues to make some brief remarks. It was encouraging to hear that hon. Members in all parts of the House appreciate the importance of the branch network of the Post Office, given its social function as well as the Post Office functions. We seem to have complete consensus on that. Rather less encouraging has been the fact that the only vision that many, but by no means all, Labour Members seem to have for the future of the post office network lies in taxpayer subsidy. The whole point of the motion is to suspend the closure programme so that we can examine the possibility of providing additional business opportunities or additional functions for post offices, in order to expand what they are doing, rather than shrink them, as has been happening over the past few years.

In 2004, my constituency suffered three closures as a result of the absurdly named "urban reinvention programme". Somebody—I do not know who—was probably paid a large sum to think up that name, which actually translated as, "We're going to close your post offices." My constituency now faces another three closures. The customers who suffered because of one of the first closures were sent to one of the post offices that is in the second round of closures. The distance to walk is much too far, in particular for elderly people. They cannot possibly walk 1 mile on a hill and then have to walk 1 mile back again. For elderly people or for young mothers with buggies and toddlers such distances are simply too far. I have spoken to a lot of elderly people who miss the social aspect of going to the post office every week. They now have to rely on neighbours, friends and family to go to the post office for them because it is no longer accessible for them.

I should like to express my extreme disappointment in Postwatch. A week or so ago, London Members had a meeting with the Post Office—

Mr. Douglas Carswell (Harwich) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a fundamental inconsistency in the Government's plans? On the one hand, they argue that more than 2,000 post offices need to close for what they claim are rational economic reasons, but on the other hand, the decision about which post offices to shut is not made on the basis of whether the individual post office is itself viable. As a result, viable post offices, such as those at Walton-on-the-Naze and Kirby Cross in my constituency—I am sure that my hon. Friend's constituency contains similar examples—are being shut. Is that not totally inconsistent?

Angela Watkinson: My hon. Friend is right. I was expecting customer representation from Postwatch, but at the meeting to which I referred its representative set out the Government and the Post Office's plans and the reason for them. I began to think I was in the wrong meeting, because there was no pretence of representing the customer. Fortunately, I had another meeting to go to; otherwise it would have got quite heated. I do not know how much Postwatch costs—it is paid for by the taxpayer—but whatever it is, the money would be better spent on supporting the branch network.

The consultation has been mentioned, and I discussed that with Postwatch and, subsequently, the Post Office. Both of them admitted that the consultation was not about whether people wanted their post office to close, because one could anticipate 100 per cent. of people saying that they did not want their post office to close. Postwatch told me that the post offices would be closed even if there was a 100 per cent. response. The Post Office said that the consultation was being undertaken to tease out whether or not the right ones were being closed. There is a great misunderstanding among post office users about the meaning of the consultation. The consultation is a sham, people feel cheated and I have no confidence that the petitions I am raising will have any more influence that the ones that I raised during the urban reinvention programme.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): Of necessity, I shall be brief, as I have to address the issue of six potential post office closures in my constituency in just three minutes. We have 62 post offices, more than any other constituency in Wales, and I want to talk about the social effects of closure on local communities.

The irony is that, sitting in the post offices in Devil's Bridge and Pontrhydfendigaid are awards recognising the services given by the post offices to the local community, including services to the elderly and other businesses. They have also had a joint partnership with the Dyfed Powys police promoting the police force in what is a scattered community. The timing of this closure programme flies in the face of the Sustainable Communities Act 2007, which should empower local people to make decisions on their own post offices and to reflect on the services that they need. The timing is also against the National Assembly's re-enactment of a post office development fund, which will come into effect next year, after the post offices have gone. Commendable efforts have been made by county councils in England, such as Essex, and they warrant consideration.

I am especially concerned about those businesses in which a post office and a shop operate together, such as in Talybont, Devil's Bridge, Llanfarian, Llangeitho, Llanddewi Brefi, Talgarreg and Pontsian. As the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) said, once the post office or shop goes, the heart of the community is taken away. The village hall, the pub and the garage have probably already gone, and little is left. It is an issue of social cohesion.

My constituents have no alternatives. I look at the criteria and I am told that 95 per cent. of people live within three miles of an alternative. I had an e-mail from a constituent today whose nearest alternative will be a round trip of 15 miles, if she wishes to access basic core post office services.

We hear a lot about urban deprivation, but the rural deprivation factor has not been taken into account. West Wales and the valleys are a convergence funding area for good reason. Large tracts of Ceredigion are also Communities First regions, comparable with any other deprived area in the country. We face three closures in those areas.

We have heard about outreach. My hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) talked about the three-year limit on the provision of services, but we are losing three outreach post vans. They were a sop to the community three years ago, but we are now losing them.

Greg Mulholland: My hon. Friend mentions several good reasons. The Far Headingley post office in my constituency is another profitable post office that will close. Services such as outreach have not been taken into account, and nor has the effect on local businesses that will also suffer. It is absurd that we are closing profitable businesses and failing to consider the effect on the community.

Mark Williams: My hon. Friend is right. In Ceredigion, we have the largest proportion of small businesses of anywhere in Wales, and they rely on the services of the post offices, including the expanded service that hon. Members have mentioned. It is also important to note the lack of public transport. It simply is not an option in large tracts of rural Wales, as well as much of England. Some 11 per cent. of rural households have no access to a car.

The most dispiriting aspect of the debate—and I have been here since the start—is the sham consultation. Tomorrow night, in the community of Talybont, there will be a huge public meeting. I have started petitions and had meetings with the Post Office. I have been told that there is no domino effect and that if we save one, another will be closed. The most dispiriting aspect is that I will be collecting signatures and talking to managers, and the signatures and the words will fall on deaf ears. That is why the motion is important, and why a moratorium is critically important. That is why we have to continue to make the case. It is just like Beeching: in 30 years' time, people will be asking how we allowed this to happen.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): It may be that the Conservative motion is opportunistic and cynical, but I happen to agree with every word of it. In my constituency, the consultation on the closure of two post offices in Walnut street and Francis street—I do not have time to go into details of the devastation that would be caused by those closures—was a sham. Postwatch was dreadful, and the Post Office itself was appallingly ill informed about the post offices and the likely effects of closure. They made no serious attempt to engage in any meaningful dialogue with those who were to be affected. As a consequence, all involved felt entirely frustrated by the process. In my constituency, it came on top of the closure of a Crown post office that has been moved into the basement of a local newsagent. That has compounded the difficulty for those who want to use those vital services.

I will support the Conservative motion. I will not be able to support the Government amendment. The amendment calls for "a viable and sustainable network for the future" but means, in effect, further closures that could be avoided at remarkably little additional cost. It could save those post offices, which are undoubtedly vital community services in urban areas as much as they are in rural areas.

6.30 pm

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby), who gave the shortest and probably the best speech of the entire debate.

This has been an important, well attended and articulately argued debate. It is of great interest that not one person stood up to defend the closure programme and how it is proceeding. Some Labour Members stood up and told us that things are going badly wrong in their constituencies but then said, "Let's just keep on doing it." Indeed, the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter)—I am glad to see him back in the Chamber—spent the second half of his speech telling us how badly things were going, having spent the first half condemning us for saying that there should be a suspension on those grounds. As the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) said, this is the last chance. There are no options left for trying to stop this misguided closure programme.

We all agree on the crucial role of the post office and its vital role in communities up and down the country. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) spoke about the particularly important role that it plays in so many rural communities. My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) said that the issue was causing as much concern now as any that he can remember. He spoke, he said, as a retailer of 120 years' experience. I had not realised that he was as old as that. I knew that he was wise, but that puts it in perspective.

It is right that we should use this occasion to pay tribute to sub-postmasters and mistresses up and down the country. They serve their communities with tremendous dedication and work hard for long hours. They serve those communities well and they want it to be recognised that they do not just run businesses. They are part of the social fabric of their communities, too.

Only two things have been missing in the debate. First, no voices have been raised in support of the closure programme. Secondly, we have not heard those Labour MPs who have been so eloquent in their local newspapers and on their websites but did not come to repeat those words today.

The motion does not suggest that we do not need change. Of course we need change. We recognise that. The post office network needs to move on to reflect the way that people live their lives. The motion is also not about an absolute solution for the post office network. That is a serious long-term issue, which will take a long time to sort out. The motion recognises that the closure programme is failing, that it is opposed by almost every Member of Parliament in their constituencies and by almost every national newspaper. If it is not suspended, it will result in massive, permanent, unnecessary damage to our communities.

I pay tribute to the hon. Members for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson), for Pendle and for Leicester, South. They have said that they will vote with us tonight. That is not an easy decision, and I recognise that. It is undoubtedly the right decision, however.

Let me make a couple of other points absolutely clear, too, particularly in response to the comments made by the Secretary of State. We are committed to putting £1.7 billion into the post office network over the next three years. We have said that we will honour the Government's spending commitments when we come into government. That is part of the process. We would expect the amount to be less if more post offices can be kept open, because part of that figure includes the compensation package. We are also committed to spending £150 million a year on the continuing subsidy, although the central point of our approach is that we should allow the post offices to develop new businesses and new income streams, so that the £150 million can be used to keep more post offices open.

The Secretary of State made many points. If he were really convincing about his closure programme, though, I wonder why it is that half of his Cabinet colleagues are openly campaigning against it. He talked about what happened under the Conservatives, when 3,000 post offices were closed in 18 years. That compares with the 6,000 that have been closed in just over 10 years of this Labour Government—a rate of closure that is three times as high as previously.

However, the fundamental difference is that the closures under the previous Conservative Government were voluntary, whereas the current ones are enforced. People are having their businesses taken away from them, and they have no choice and no way to stop the process.

The Secretary of State also said, rather proudly, that there was no subsidy for post offices when the Conservatives were in government, but the figures are clear. In the last few years of our time in office, the Post Office made a profit of between £22 million and £35 million a year. It did not start losing money until 2000, when this Government had had the chance to interfere for a bit. Since then, it has been losing £50 million, £100 million and nearly £200 million a year. The Government do not recognise the difference between the conditions that prevailed when we were in power and those that obtain today.

The Secretary of State also said that there are no constraints on the businesses that post offices can carry out, but he should come with me and talk to sub-postmasters. They want to offer PayPoint but have been told that they cannot. They want to work with carriers other than Royal Mail—for example, FedEx, UPS and others—but they have been told that they are not allowed to. Moreover, they must face the problem that Royal Mail will go to their biggest customers and persuade them into direct deals that cut post offices out by undercutting the stamp price that those offices are allowed to charge.

The Secretary of State missed the fundamental point about the constraints being placed on future business, about which so many colleagues spoke in the debate. It is bad enough for people to have their post office taken away, but it is obscene for the Government to put in place measures that will serve to close down the whole shop as well. To tell postmasters and postmistresses that they may no longer operate the national lottery, operate PayPoint terminals or offer the facilities that they have spent years understanding is to do massive damage to the communities that they serve.

It is one thing for the Post Office to say that people may no longer buy a stamp from a shop, but to say that they will no longer be able to buy their bread and milk there is to go way beyond its powers. In addition, many of the services offered by post offices will simply be moved to the shop next door, if there is one. That means that people will not migrate naturally from the post office that has closed to the one a few miles away; instead, they will simply go to the shop next door.

Also discussed were the talks about the one-for-one issue, and the implications of that approach. Perhaps the Secretary of State should look at those figures as well. So far, 671 closures have been announced in those areas where the consultation process has been completed. As a result of what has gone on, 26 offices have been reprieved, and 19 replaced by other post offices being added to the closure list. So seven out of nearly 700 post offices have genuinely been reprieved. Earlier today, the Prime Minister said that that proportion was about 10 per cent. of the total, although I think that it is about 1 per cent. However, if he makes it 10 per cent., maybe that explains why the economy is in such a mess.

Many hon. Members have spoken of their concerns about the consultation process. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden) said that six weeks might be appropriate for a matter that was not controversial but that it was otherwise too short a period. My hon. Friends the Members for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond) and for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) spoke about the factual errors that had been made, and the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) mentioned the people who wanted to close their post offices but who were not being allowed to do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner)—it is a great pleasure to see him speaking in this Chamber again—spoke for many when he said that there was a great sense that the decisions had already been made.

Excellent contributions were also made by my hon. Friends the Members for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) and for Upminster (Angela Watkinson)—although I suspect that the way that my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West reeled off the names of his villages was a nightmare for the Official Report.

Other hon. Members also contributed to the debate through their comments on their websites and elsewhere. For example, the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) says on his site:

"There are no direct bus routes to either of the alternative branches".

He states that one of them is "on a red route! Your decision concerning Meads Lane is in my opinion driven by short term cost cutting dogma."

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson) intervened in the debate and told us why she would not vote for our motion, but on her website she says:

"We really believe that these closures will affect the most vulnerable people in our community, particularly those who are elderly, disabled or those with young children."

However, she will not vote with us to stop that happening. The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer), a Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, said:

"We shall oppose this as we believe the local Post Office is an essential part of any community."

The Under-Secretary of State for Innovation, Universities and Skills, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy)—a Government Minister—said:

"I hardly think that six weeks is long enough to have a meaningful dialogue with the community about these changes."

Perhaps most deliciously of all, the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), who in other days would have been supporting us, said in the Grantham Journal:

"this week, the Post Office broke new ground among public bodies in demonstrating either complete internal confusion or deliberate public two-facedness."

If anybody would recognise two-facedness, it is he.

When we put our points about the consultation process to the Minister, he said, "It's Cabinet Office rules; we've got to stick to them," but that same Minister decided to disregard those rules, which said that a consultation process should last 12 weeks, rather than 6 weeks, so one thing applies in the run-up to local elections and another during the consultation process. It is little wonder that the many people in our constituencies who have gone to public meetings on wet, dark wintry nights, who have signed petitions, who have written letters, who have gone on marches, and who have done everything that they can to preserve the facility that they care about, feel let down by the process.

There has been a lot of debate about the access criteria. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire talked about the fact that the distance as the crow flies does not reflect the true distance. My hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) and the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole talked about bus routes, and how the buses do not go in the right direction, meaning that a journey takes much longer than would have been the case. Again, Labour Members have argued the point on their websites and in their local newspapers. Not all of them have been so assiduous, however; on his website, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said of his local post office closures:

"Member's of Ed's staff visited the Postmaster at Adwick on Ed's behalf".

[Charles Hendry]

Well, I bet they got the bunting out for that one. How privileged local people must have felt that their Member of Parliament was taking the issue so seriously. The Minister of State, Department for Work and Pensions, the right hon. Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms), formerly Minister with responsibility for small business, said it was important to pick "the right one and not the wrong ones".

My goodness, one can see why he was made a Minister, and perhaps why he was moved on.

The problem with the access criteria is that they are fundamentally flawed. It is simply a matter of somebody at a computer deciding, as a matter of geography, which post offices should close and which stay open. They have failed to take account of major new housing developments and, worse still, they have not paid sufficient attention to hills, public transport links or unsafe roads. It will therefore be vulnerable people, older people and people with disabilities who suffer most. They are the people who depend most on their local post offices, and who will lose out most when the changes are made.

Let us be in no doubt: this is not the Post Office's policy. This is the Government's closure programme, because they decided how many post offices should close. They decided what the funding package and access criteria should be, and they decided which rules apply to the businesses that many people may continue once their post office has closed down. The Government can, if they wish, tonight instruct the Post Office to stop the programme.

We want a Post Office fit for the challenges of the 21st century, a Post Office not stuck in the past but able to take full advantage of the business opportunities present today. We welcome change, but we have a vision for the post office network; it should be sustained by new business, freed from the restrictions that tie it down today, and increasingly become a hub for local council and government services. However, that is not what the change programme is delivering; it is dismantling an important, much-loved service. We do not object to change, but we do object to the change that the Government are proposing, the flawed access criteria, the shortened consultation process, the lack of vision for future business and the appalling restrictions on future business activity.

At the end of the day, what people say on their websites and press releases will not save a single post office. If Labour Members of Parliament genuinely want to save their post offices, they have one chance, and that is to vote with us today.

This comes down to a question of trust. If we want people to have faith in their politicians, they must believe that politicians will not say one thing in their constituency on behalf of their communities, and vote against those words in the House of Commons. Constituents will not understand how MPs told them that they were on their side, but when they had the chance to vote against closures, they failed to do so. MPs will have failed their constituents, and they will have failed to live up to the standards that people should rightly expect of their Member of Parliament. Worse still, they will have turned their back on the elderly and others who are most in need. That betrayal of the most vulnerable people in their constituency will haunt them for the rest of their career.

The Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs (Mr. Pat McFadden): We have seen from the debate today the strong feelings that post office closures can arouse not only in the House, but in local communities. I understand that, as do the Government. That is why the Government support the post office network with such significant investment, and why we have done so over many years.

There is the subsidy of £150 million a year, without which thousands more post offices would be under threat. There is other support in the package of £1.7 billion up till 2011—support to cover losses over and above those that the subsidy covers, support to enable new outreach services to provide post office services in new ways, and other support that adds up to significant backing for the Post Office up to 2011. That was acknowledged by some in the debate, including my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster).

The reason why we do that, as the Secretary of State said in his opening speech, is that we do not see the Post Office as a purely commercial concern. We appreciate its social and community role. Without the backing that the Government give to the Post Office, which was not there when the Conservatives were in power, a commercial network would consist of only about 4,000 branches. So when the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) says that it is not just a commercial service, we agree. That is why we have put so much public backing behind it.

Even with the high level of subsidy, because of the decline in custom and the level of losses, some offices are having to close. I understand that that is unpopular, but sometimes government is about taking difficult decisions.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): The Minister visited a post office in my constituency last week which is housed by WH Smith in Kings mall, but is he aware that the other WH Smith housing a post office in my constituency was threatened with closure the very same week that it opened, owing to a planning application to demolish the building? Does he further think it is acceptable that the whole of London W14—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Just one point at a time.

Mr. McFadden: I visited the post office in WH Smith and spoke to customers there. That post office is operating well.

It is understandable that some people wish that the closures did not have to happen, but we are mindful of the amount of funding that taxpayers can put in to support a service that is facing profound change in terms of technology, how people live their lives and pay their bills, and competition.

Those issues used to matter to the Opposition, but faced with a difficult decision, what have they chosen to do? They have chosen to try to make it go away. They have chosen to say that the closure programme should stop. Thousands of post offices closed while they were in power. The sub-postmasters never got a penny in compensation. Today the Opposition have chosen to try to make the problem go away.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Will the Minister tell me how many villages in the Vale of York will be more than 3 miles away by car from the nearest post office?

Mr. McFadden: I shall come to the access criteria later.

Funding is a critical weakness of the Opposition motion. We have seen three different positions on funding in the debate. In his opening speech, the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) was not clear at all that the Conservative party was committed to matching our funding. The hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) said that the party was clear on that, but if the motion goes through tonight the Conservatives will have to not only match our funding, but increase it. There have been three different positions on funding in one debate; that is the critical credibility problem with the motion.

Simon Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I will not for the moment.

The divide is about whether we support the Government's investments or whether, like the Conservative party, we are utterly incoherent on financial support for the Post Office. The decision to close any post office is, of course, unpopular; worse, however, is the knowledge that when the Conservative party faces a problem, it simply asks for it to stop with an utterly incoherent financial position.

Anne Snelgrove: I have been listening to the debate today with great interest. Will the Minister tell me how voting for the Conservative motion would save a single sub-post office in this country?

Mr. McFadden: My hon. Friend asks a good question. Voting for the motion will not save post offices because the Conservative party has acknowledged that post offices have to close. All the motion would do is delay the decision, put sub-postmasters under further uncertainty, and then, the Conservatives have said, the closures would have to continue.

Let us consider some of the challenges that the Post Office is facing. Every day it is open for business, it loses £500,000. It has lost 4 million weekly customers in the past few years. Some of the least used post offices are subsidised at up to £17 per transaction.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): The Minister says that some post offices cost £17 per transaction. Perhaps he could do what Allan Leighton could not do during a recent conversation with the sub-postmistress of Yatton Keynell in my constituency. When she asked him how many post offices made a profit, he said, "I don't know—I'm just waiting for my bonus when I give up my job at the end of my time." Will the Minister tell us how many post offices make a profit? Why is he closing them too?

Mr. McFadden: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening, he would have heard me say that the commercial network is made up of about 4,000 post offices.

Alan Duncan: In the process of deciding which post offices should close, what is the principal criterion—profitability or access?

Mr. McFadden: The thing driving the closures is, of course, the loss of custom and money. That is what is behind the need to rationalise the network.

Eight out of 10 pensioners now choose to have their benefit paid directly into the bank; among new retirees, the figure is nine out of 10.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I am afraid that I want to make progress.

People have a choice about how to pay their car tax, and 1 million a month choose to renew it online—half of them outside the normal office hours of 9 to 5. More people are paying bills by direct debit and there is, of course, the issue of competition. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) made a serious speech about competition and its challenge to the Post Office. Unlike Conservative Members, he realises that that is a big challenge when it comes to winning business such as bill and television licence payment.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I want to make progress. [Hon. Members: "Give way!"] I have given way a few times, and I would like to make progress.

The Opposition say that they want to make the issue go away. The issue is not just about the profitability of the post offices, but about what the Opposition would do about how benefits are paid. Are they really saying that they will turn back the clock and pay benefits and pensions by girocheque when the vast majority of people choose to pay them directly into the bank? Doing that would add a further £200 million of costs a year. If they are not saying that, why do they not accept that the Post Office faces those major challenges?

Let me turn to some of the specifics raised in the debate.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McFadden: I am afraid that I want to make progress.

Many Members raised the issue of consultation, including my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden) and for Brigg and Goole, the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), and my hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) and Hastings and Rye. I acknowledge that there has been dissatisfaction and disquiet about the consultation process. Representations have been made that we should extend it from six weeks to 12, but six weeks was the period used during the last period of post office closures and is the period agreed between Postwatch and Post Office Ltd in their code of practice—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but there is too much noise in the House. We have had a full debate and the Minister is entitled to make a reply that can be heard.

Mr. McFadden: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Many hon. Members talked about the consultation, which is about how, not whether, this is to be done. The Select Committee on Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform picked up on that in its most recent report, and it was right to do so. Post Office Ltd must be clearer that that is the question before the people, because that is what is producing some of the frustration in local communities. Hon. Members have expressed confusion about this. Let me quote the letter that was sent to all hon. Members back in July, before the process began. It said that the consultation "would not concern the principle of the need for change of the network, nor its broad extent and distribution...rather consultation will be seeking representations on the most effective way in which government policy can best be implemented in the area in question".

Simon Hughes: Given that the Minister will not change his policy on delaying consultation, will he at least instruct the Post Office to ensure that it gives all the information to Members of Parliament so that the individual merits of every post office can be in the public domain and we can win an argument on the basis of the facts?

Mr. McFadden: As I have said, the Post Office needs to be clearer about the consultation and about the question before people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone and the hon. Members for Newbury (Mr. Benyon) and for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones), among others, mentioned the access criteria. Let me be clear. Those criteria represent a minimum, and Government funding is to fund the network to a much higher extent than that minimum would require. In plans so far—

Dr. McCrea rose—

Mr. McFadden: I am afraid that I do not have time to give way again.

To give some sense of perspective, let me say that 99 per cent. of people will either see no change in the post office that they use or be within a mile of an alternative post office. If we followed the advice of Conservative Members by abandoning the access criteria and closing only the post offices that are least used, vast areas of rural Britain would be without post office provision at all, and those are precisely the areas that hon. Members say that they are interested in.

Some local authorities, for example in Essex—not in Swindon, unfortunately, despite the efforts of the local MPs—have expressed interest in taking over post offices scheduled for closure. We have said that the Post Office should sit down and discuss that seriously with those local authorities. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has written to the chief executive of Post Office Ltd today saying that that should happen, and if local authorities are interested they should have those discussions. The Post Office will expect to recover all costs, but that is a serious conversation that should take place.

On commercial freedom, let me quote the general secretary of the National Federation of SubPostmasters, who said

"why would the government want to use taxpayers money to give someone compensation for something that they are continuing to do".

They do not lose all compensation. An adjustment is made—

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question, put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises the vital social and economic role of post offices, in particular in rural and deprived urban communities; notes the decline in post office customer numbers in recent years and the financial losses of £174 million incurred by the network in 2007; further recognises the effect of changes such as direct debit facilities and increased use of the internet for payment and communication; commends the Government's action to support the post office network with investment of up to £1.7 billion up until 2011, including an annual subsidy of £150 million; further notes that this subsidy did not exist under the last government and that without it thousands more post offices would be under threat; and urges the Government to continue working with Post Office Limited to ensure a viable and sustainable network for the future.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the leave of the House I shall put motions 3 to 5 together

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuantto Standing Order No. 118(6) (Delegated Legislation Committees),

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

That the draft National Assembly for Wales (Legislative Competence) (Education and Training) Order 2008, which was laid before this House on 6th February, be approved.

FEES AND CHARGES

That the draft Department for Transport (Driver Licensing and Vehicle Registration Fees) (Amendment) Order 2008, which was laid before this House on 18th February, be approved.

GOVERNMENT RESOURCES AND ACCOUNTS

That the draft Government Resources and Accounts Act 2000 (Audit of Public Bodies) Order 2008, which was laid before this House on 26th February, be approved.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Committees),

ELECTRONIC COMMUNICATIONS NETWORKS AND SERVICES

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 15371/07, Commission Communication, Report on the outcome of the Review of the EU regulatory framework for electronic communications networks and services in accordance with Directive 2002/21/EC and Summary of the 2007 Reform Proposals; further notes the Government's support for the European Commission's objectives and most of the Commission's proposals to revise the regulatory framework for electronic communications and services in pursuit of open competition; but acknowledges the Government's intention to continue to analyse both the case for a veto on national remedies and establishing a new EU Market Authority in order to consider whether alternative methods could better achieve results.—[Tony Cunningham.]

PETITIONS

Clatterbridge Hospital (Wirral)

7.27 pm

Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): I wish to present a petition signed by 1,470 residents of Wirral who feel that there is an overwhelming need for a minor injuries unit and an out-of-hours service in south Wirral. The north of the borough is covered by a facility in Wallasey and the centre by a unit at Arrowe Park. People in south Wirral do not feel that they receive the same degree of attention as those elsewhere in Wirral in that and other respects.

The petition reads as follows.

The Petition of residents of Wirral,

Declares that, there is a local and pressing need for a Minor Injuries Unit and an Out of Hours service in South Wirral, and that the Clatterbridge Hospital Site is a prime location for such facilities.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Minister for Health to call upon Wirral Primary Care Trust to commission a Minor Injuries Unit and an Out of Hours service on the Clatterbridge Hospital site.

Climate Change

7.28 pm

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): I wish to present a petition signed by 1,210 of my constituents and other people throughout the city of Bristol. It concerns climate change, and more specifically the Climate Change (Sectoral Targets) Bill, which is nearing the end of its proceedings in another place and will shortly be presented to this House for further consideration. The petitioners specifically ask for an amendment to be tabled by Her Majesty's Government to introduce a target for the reduction of Carbon Dioxide emissions by at least 80 per cent. of the 1990 levels by 2050, to include in this target emissions from aviation and shipping, and to require intermediate annual targets for the reduction of emissions.

Following is the full text of the petition:

[The Humble Petition of residents of Bristol,

Sheweth

That they bear witness to the threats of climate change, and believe that firm action is needed to reduce emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House appeals to Her Majesty's Government to bring forward an amendment to the Climate Change (Sectoral Targets) Bill, to introduce a target for the reduction of Carbon Dioxide emissions by at least 80% of the 1990 levels by 2050, to include in this target emissions from aviation and shipping, and to require intermediate annual targets for the reduction of emissions.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.]

[P000154]

Admiral John Byng

7.29 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I have the honour to present a petition with historic overtones.

Some 250 years ago, Admiral John Byng was court-martialled and executed on the quarter-deck of his ship for a perceived naval failure. It was his execution that gave rise to Voltaire's satirical phrase in "Candide", which has been passed down to us today as "In England they execute the occasional admiral pour encourager les autres".

Born and buried in the village of Southill in my constituency, Admiral Byng's memory, and the sense of injustice among those who feel that he was convicted when it might have been the Government in the dock for providing him with inadequate ships and men, have led the petitioners—consisting of family and friends and some 600 signatories—to seek redress so that the wrong of his court martial and sentence can be finally righted, and the stigma of his unjust fate may be removed from his family with the sensitivity and understanding that have become more acceptable in modern times than in the past.

The petition states:

The Petition of the friends of All Saints Southill, the parishioners of Southill, Byng family members and the supporters of Admiral John Byng, Declares that the conduct at his trial and the verdict of his trial in December 1756 and January/February 1757, which resulted in his execution on 14th March 1757 was unfair and unjust. Further declares that he was made the scapegoat for the inadequacies of the Government and his Naval Superiors at the time, whom the Petitioners believe to have been responsible for the loss of Menorca to the French.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Ministry for Defence and the Ministry for Justice to review the trial and the verdict of that trial, resulting in Admiral John Byng being declared innocent posthumously; his Honour should be restored for him, his family and supporters.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

Organ Donation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

7.31 pm

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak tonight. I am increasingly of the opinion that Adjournment debates are like buses—you wait for one a long time, then two or three come along at once. The House may be aware that I secured an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall last week on the important issue of the banning of looped blind cords. Tonight, I wish to raise another important issue, and although I am certainly not complaining about the opportunity I have been given, some of my staff are.

To get down to business, tonight's debate is on an important issue. It has been in the headlines recently, but I am concerned we should not allow the sometimes divisive issue of organ donation to slip off the radar. I have been working closely with a local paper in my constituency, The Alloa Advertiser, since the end of January to try to promote the positive benefits of an opt-out system, and to encourage donors to sign up to the existing system to ensure that those in need of organs are given the best possible chance of life. As I said a few moments ago, there is a national focus on the issue, but as with everything, it is transient. We need to keep focused on this issue, as people's lives depend on it.

Perhaps I should spend a little time outlining why we have a severe shortage of organs. We are living longer, and conditions that would have killed us some years ago are managed and controlled. That is a good thing, but it creates a twofold pressure. First, some of the conditions with which we live require transplants and, secondly, as we live longer, fewer people are dying, which in itself creates a reduction in the number of organs for transplant. In addition, road deaths are less than half what they were in the 1970s despite, as we all know, a great increase in the numbers of cars and, indeed, a population increase. It is great that our roads and our cars are safer—and we must strive to make them even safer—but the statistics highlight a great pressure on available organs.

I believe the current system is too restrictive, as it does not meet the increasing demands placed on it. Quite simply, the organ donor rate in the UK is unacceptably low, with most European countries having a much higher rate than us—some of them twice or even three times the UK rate. We have reached a point where there is public demand for change. I believe that there is a desire for change in the House, too, which is demonstrated by early-day motion 967 in my name, which has attracted the signatures of 52 fellow Members. There are more than 7,000 people in the UK on waiting lists for organ donations, and more than 400 people die each year still waiting—more than one person a day. In Clackmannanshire, which forms part of my seat, four people have died in the past five years waiting for transplants. Bodies are buried or cremated complete with organs that could have been used to save lives, not necessarily because the deceased objected to donation, but simply because they never got round to signing up to the organ donor register or informing their relatives of their wishes.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): As my hon. Friend knows, I used to work in the health service, and it was traumatic for relatives to hear us explain the death of someone in a road traffic accident or of someone who suffered a coronary, and then to hear us ask whether we could take organs for the benefit of other individuals. That is unacceptable in this day and age.

Gordon Banks: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. What he says is true and important, and I shall come on to explain how a soft opt-out system would make the initial conversation between the organ donation co-ordinators and the bereaved family more palatable. A new soft opt-out system would go a long way towards alleviating the stress my hon. Friend mentions.

While many of us say we would be prepared to donate our organs, not many of us have done anything about it. Studies have shown that 90 per cent. of the population support organ donation, yet only 25 per cent. are registered as donors. In Clackmannanshire, the figures reveal that 13,497 people are on the organ donation register, but if we equate that to the 90 per cent. statistic there are still about 30,000 potential recruits. People are more likely to need a transplant than they are to become an organ donor. Given that this research shows that the majority of people would be willing to donate, presuming consent rather than presuming objection is more likely to achieve the aim of respecting the wishes of the deceased person.

I have had an interest in this area for a while, and certainly long before I entered Parliament. Colleagues in the Scottish Parliament have campaigned relentlessly on the issue, particularly Dr. Richard Simpson and Lord Foulkes. I carry an organ donor card, but I have been concerned for a while that not enough has been done to encourage people to sign up and to make people aware of the desperate need for organs in the UK. For example, my wife, who works in the NHS, would be very willing for her organs to be used, but she has not got—and is unlikely ever to go about signing up for—a donor card. I suspect there are many people in that situation.

The lack of awareness of the demand for organs must also be addressed for the sake of the thousands of people on the waiting list. I have met a couple of people in my constituency who are on the list. Sarah Murray from Sauchie is 23 years old and suffers from cystic fibrosis. She has been waiting 18 months—well above the average waiting time—for a double lung transplant, and she told me about the difficulties that she daily faces. Simple tasks such as housework or walking the distance between two lamp posts are difficult, if not impossible. She has lived with this disease all her life, and it has affected her schooling and means she is unable to work. She has not had the opportunities that most of the rest of us have had. She may have gone on to university. Who knows what potential might have been released? A transplant will release that potential.

I spoke last week in my other Adjournment debate to which I referred earlier about wasted potential, and here I find myself raising it again. The decisions we make on issues such as organ donation will allow so many of our young people to realise their potential. Sarah has always wanted to be a nurse, but has been held back by her condition. A transplant would give Sarah the opportunity to study nursing and pay back to the very system that saved her.

I am glad that the Government are making moves to tackle the chronic shortage of organ donors by welcoming the findings of the recent organ donation taskforce report. Let me be clear: I also support the report's findings, but I firmly believe we need to move to an opt-out system as soon as possible. The report raised some important issues, and over the past few weeks I have been questioning the Department on a wide range of matters relating to organ donation. I hope the Minister will be able to address some of them. I know that the Prime Minister has agreed in principle to adopt the report's recommendations, which if implemented could see a 50 per cent. increase in UK organ donors. However, changes may be some months away, so I believe it is important that we lay down some strong foundations now.

There should also be an increased role for GPs in discussing with patients the option of organ donation. I have been visiting my GP for over 50 years and not once has the issue been discussed. I know that this must be handled carefully, but I firmly believe that we must address the role of GPs.

Funding of £11 million has been made available for 2008-09, with significant additional funding identified for subsequent years. In response to a written question on 29 February the Minister informed me that discussion with stakeholders has started to agree what further action, such as research, public awareness campaigns, training and work force requirements, would be needed to enable each recommendation to be implemented. I hope that the Minister can tell the House in greater detail how the discussions are progressing.

We must couple the implementation of an opt-out system with the recruitment of extra transplant co-ordinators to ensure that all suitable organs are harvested. The taskforce report has called for 100 co-ordinators to help relieve the strain on the existing co-ordinators, many of whom work shifts in excess of 24 hours without a break.

If a change is to take place, we need to ensure that an adequate level of investment and expertise is utilised. Unless we have the people who are properly trained, and transplant co-ordinators who are available 24 hours a day, we will find ourselves in a very difficult position.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): May I take the opportunity to pay tribute to the wonderful work of the late John Cox, his wife Rosemary and their daughter Christine following the death of Peter Cox? They were instrumental in persuading the then Government to set up the national register of donors. One of the reasons insufficient organs are available is that even if the deceased has expressly consented to organ donation, his or her relatives can posthumously block the donation and refuse consent. The relatives' power of veto should be reconsidered in order to increase the supply of organs.

Gordon Banks: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. I favour a soft opt-out where the family retains the ability to be consulted, but where we come at it from a position of presumed consent as opposed to a presumed lack of consent. Countries such as Austria operate the system that he mentions. It has a high level of uptake and availability of organ donations, so he makes a strong argument.

There is a need for investment in the short term, but the sooner the extra money is found, the better, as there will be long-term savings for the national health service and improvements in people's quality of life. I recognise that increased funding for transplants has been allocated by the Government: heart and lung funding has increased by almost £8 million since 2002; liver funding has almost doubled since 1997; and pancreas transplant services' funding has more than doubled since 2004 to more than £8 million. That investment is very welcome.

Last month, I visited the renal unit at Falkirk and District royal infirmary and found out that it costs the NHS on average £400 per treatment. If people require three treatments per week, as my constituent Anne Duncombe does, we are talking about more than £1,000 a week, possibly for many years. The cost benefit of a kidney transplant is staggering—the NHS is £241,000 better off over a 10-year period for every transplant patient. No one has to be an economist to see the real financial value to the NHS of a transplant, never mind the ability of the recipient to work, pay taxes and improve their quality of life.

Dialysis is not just a financial burden; it can often mean 18 to 20 hours per week to people if time for treatment, travelling and so on is taken into account. The renal unit at Falkirk and District royal infirmary is treating more and more patients from throughout the Forth valley owing to the ever-increasing demand for organs. The unit has almost doubled in size since it opened in 1999. It now treats 100 dialysis patients, but only one in four of them each year receive the kidney that they need.

A lot of money could be allocated elsewhere if a successful opt-out system were launched. Each region should have a dedicated team ready to operate when needed to remove organs, and there should also be a national database prioritising organs that are urgently required, particularly for children. Another important point is that we must ensure that any attempts at political separation in the UK do not detract from the need to have a UK-wide solution to the organ donation issue.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Like me, my hon. Friend represents a Scottish constituency. I am sure that he is fully aware that health is devolved to the Scottish Executive. Can he tell us what their view is on his proposals?

Gordon Banks: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. The transplant situation in Scotland is governed by the Human Tissue (Scotland) Act 2006. There are noises from the Scottish Executive that they are minded to favour a soft opt-out, but we will have to wait to see whether they deliver. The situation in the rest of the UK is governed by an Act passed in 2004, and my hon. Friend will note the two-year disparity. We cannot allow such a disparity if the situation is changed in the rest of the UK and Scotland is left behind.

Limiting the availability of organs to one region would have some serious implications. As with so many matters, we are stronger as part of the Union, and in this case a UK-wide system increases the likelihood of an organ becoming available. Who will be the one to tell my constituents that their chance of receiving an organ transplant has been drastically cut, because we can harvest them only from Scotland? I hope that no one ever has to utter such words.

Therefore I am pleased that the NHS Blood and Transplant Authority has commissioned work to develop and design an electronic system for offering donor organs throughout the United Kingdom. I understand from the Department's reply to one of my written questions that this system will be ready to go live in September this year. I am sure that the Minister will agree with me that this is an important step forward.

The organ donation taskforce took note of the systems being implemented by some of our European neighbours, such as Spain, where a change in the law and the necessary reform in the health service has boosted the number of organs available for transplant. The organ donation rate in Spain is 35 per cent., compared with 13 per cent. here in the UK.

It is important here to distinguish between the number of people carrying cards and on the register, which is 25 per cent., and the number of organs used in transplant, which is 13 per cent. There could be many explanations for this disparity. We may die in the "wrong way", organs from potential donors may be incompatible with those in need at that time, and many people carrying donor cards may be young people who are encouraged to sign up when they apply for their driving licence. Their organs are unlikely to be available for many years to come. So a 25 per cent. base of card-carrying donors delivers only half that number of organs for transplant.

Hard-hitting campaigns are being launched here in the UK, particularly the "Live or die? You choose" campaign, which is on our television screens now. I praise the work of the NHS Blood and Transplant Authority, but there is a limit to how effective such campaigns can be when our organ donation system is so fractured.

Every hon. Member will know that changes in the law can often be slow and cumbersome, but the longer we wait, the more lives we put at risk. I encourage all hon. Members to put this message across in their local media, so that we can raise the profile of this issue. Members could promote their constituency office as a place where people could come along to sign up to become organ donors; launch campaigns in the local press and highlight the plight of those waiting for organs; go out and meet those in their constituency who are waiting for a transplant; and look at the facilities and speak with staff at their local hospital. It is only by putting across the human side that we will encourage more people to come forward as organ donors. We need to raise awareness and encourage the public to sign up to help others in need by giving them the gift of life.

Some hon. Members will be aware that in my Adjournment debate last week I highlighted the issue of the dangers associated with looped blind cords and the tragic death of a toddler in my constituency, Muireann McLaughlin. Muireann's parents, at a time of tremendous grief, decided to help to give the gift of life to another when two of Muireann's heart valves were donated. That ties in with recommendation 12 made by the organ donation taskforce that there should be some way to recognise the brave decisions of parents in such situations.

As with any issue, there is always an opposing view. I understand and sympathise with that view, and whether it is held on moral or religious grounds it is equally valid. There should be a database of people who do not want their organs to be used for transplant, giving people the opportunity to opt out. If someone felt strongly enough, I am certain they would ensure their name was on the database. It sounds tough and harsh, but so are the deaths of 400 people per year, many of whom are children.

It is not a case of nationalising organs, as has been suggested in the past. People waiting for organs get very angry at those who take that view. It is a case of trying to save lives using all means possible. With a soft opt-out, donation would become the default position. The introduction of a soft system of presumed consent would represent a shift in emphasis in favour of donation without major changes to practice. It would respect the wishes of potential donors and the sensitivities of their families.

To sum up, I hope that I have put a case that outlines the need for a change to our system of organ donation. I urge hon. Members to sign early-day motion 967, which is in my name, and urge the Government to move to an opt-out system with the necessary structural changes in the service as quickly as possible. There are enough organs in the UK to satisfy demand, and it is simply the system that holds us back from transplanting them into those who need them. It is my hope that the Minister will address the issues I have raised, and also propose some time scales for when we can look to take the organ donation taskforce's proposals forward.

As I mentioned earlier, the longer we wait the more lives we put at risk. As a responsible country, we cannot and should not allow this.

7.51 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Dawn Primarolo): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks) on securing this evening's debate. I commend the hard work and dedication that he continues to demonstrate in his constituency and as an advocate for the issue.

I hope that in the time that I have to speak, I can reassure my hon. Friend on the issues that he raised. Transplantation is one of medicine's great success stories. As my hon. Friend knows, the Government are absolutely committed to increasing the number of organs available for transplantation so that many more people can benefit from that life-saving procedure and, as he so graphically said, release the potential of the individuals who have that potential thwarted because of the limitations caused by their being unable to secure a transplant.

The current situation, whereby 8,000 individuals require a transplant but only 3,000 operations a year are carried out because of the lack of available organs, reflects not only the points made by my hon. Friend but those made by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine), who illustrated from his professional experience the added difficulties and strains in the health service. The situation is worse than that. Some 4,000 patients are never put on the list. Practitioners are reluctant to list patients whom they believe are never likely to receive a suitable organ because there is such a limited supply of organs for transplant.

I, too, want to pay tribute to the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris)—the late John Cox and his wife Rosemary—who have done so much to advance the achievement of a sensible situation in the UK.

The gap highlighted between the number of those who require transplants and the number of available organs led my right hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), when she was Health Minister, to set up the organ donation taskforce. The taskforce's membership was drawn from a wide range of specialties and interests, including media, diversity issues and the voluntary sector. It undertook a thorough and productive period of research to identify the barriers to organ donation and how they might be overcome. Like my hon. Friends, I carried a card for a long time and I am on the register. So few people appreciate the simplicity of the registration process and how it makes organs available.

The taskforce looked at evidence from Europe and the US, but especially from Spain. The evidence from Spain was very important because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire noted, Spain has the highest rate of organ donation in the world, at around 33 per million people. In contrast, the UK has one of the lowest donation rates in Europe.

In addition, many aspects of the Spanish model have been successfully imported to other areas, such as northern Italy and certain parts of South America. It is therefore clear that we need to look at the formula that is used in Spain.

The taskforce has recommended that the UK adopt the sort of broad-based approach to be found in Spain. It said that there needs to be investment in infrastructure and that the UK must ensure it maximises its potential for donation rates. That includes establishing a UK-wide organ donor organisation as part of the NHS blood and transplant service, a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire made.

The taskforce also said that we needed a dedicated and strengthened network of organ retrieval teams to work with hospitals' critical care teams. It added that the number of front-line co-ordinators working with families and the hospitals that donate and receive organs should be doubled to around 100—exactly the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston. Moreover, it said that all parts of the NHS should embrace organ donation as usual business, not as an unusual event, and that is precisely the point that my hon. Friend made about GPs.

Other recommendations from the taskforce were that donor activity in all health trusts should be monitored, and that all clinical and nursing staff likely to be involved in treating potential organ donors should receive mandatory training in donation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire rightly spoke about funding, and the House will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced on 16 January that all the recommendations from the taskforce would be accepted. To enable their implementation, extra funding of £11 million has been made available for 2008-09, with more to follow in future years.

Organ donation is an area of medicine that necessitates a high degree of co-ordination across the UK. For example, an organ donated in Glasgow, Cardiff or Belfast may be transplanted into a patient in London, or vice versa. It is therefore essential that a UK-wide approach is maintained, and that is the strong message that we have received from the taskforce. All the Ministers in the four UK health Departments have welcomed the taskforce's recommendations, and are implementing them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire rightly touched on the need to oversee the delivery of the recommendations. I am therefore pleased to announce that Professor Sir Bruce Keogh, the medical director of the NHS, has agreed to head the group tasked with taking forward their implementation. We have already held discussions with a number of organisations so that early progress can be made.

My hon. Friend mentioned matters to do with presumed consent that are outside the taskforce's original remit. Under the current system, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West noted, families do not have a legal right of veto over a decision made by a donor when he or she was alive. Any system that we put in place must be aimed at helping people who wish to be donors to have their wish carried out, and that is something that will need to be taken into consideration.

Clearly, the taskforce's work does not end there. The UK's chief medical officers will need to take the work forward, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that he has asked the taskforce to consider the potential impact of introducing an opt-out system for organ donation. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that he thinks now is the time for a public debate on the matter, and that we should move forward.

I have sympathy with those who want a change to the opt-out system as a step towards putting into practice the wishes of the many people who we know support the idea of donation in principle. It is important that when we develop that idea we find ways to move towards a system that helps people to donate and helps their wishes to be fulfilled, but also takes into consideration the views of others who may not wish to be covered by presumed consent. That needs to be done delicately, swiftly, and accurately if we are to meet the objectives of my hon. Friends present today.

I am delighted that all UK Governments have been able to commit to taking forward the recommendations. I am delighted that the taskforce, with its considerable expertise, is turning its attention to an opt-out system of presumed consent. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire, I look forward to the day, which I hope will come soon, when we have an agreed procedure that satisfies all, regardless of their views on organ donation, and that ensures that we match the Spanish rates and so help people to live fulfilled lives, rather than lives that are wasted because organs are not available. I commend the work of my hon. Friends to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute past Eight o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Electoral Registration

1. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): What percentage of the electorate in (a) Greater London, (b) England and (c) Wales are registered to vote. [195458]

Peter Viggers (Gosport): The total number that could be eligible to vote is not known with accuracy, and I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's question in the form in which he put it. As of 21 December 2007, about 5.5 million people were registered to vote in local government elections in Greater London, and the other figures were 38.5 million in England and about 2.25 million in Wales. Past research by the commission suggests that the level of non-registration—for technical reasons, I must give the non-registration figure, rather than that for registration—in England and Wales was between 8 and 9 per cent., and in London it could be between 10 and 20 per cent., depending on the area.

Simon Hughes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that helpful answer, confirming what many of us know and fear—the high level of non-registration, particularly in London, but also elsewhere. Given that it is only a few weeks before the latest date for getting on the electoral roll for the coming May elections in England and Wales, will he talk to his colleagues on the committee and in the Electoral Commission about the much-promised campaign to get people to vote, which was meant to happen each spring? Even if it has not happened this year, will he talk to his colleagues to provide some momentum in the remaining available days? People need to be encouraged to vote.

Peter Viggers: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The last date to register is 16 April. He is right to ask about the commission's campaign to encourage registration. A significant advertising campaign will be launched after Easter on television and radio, in the outdoor press and online, supported by coverage in the local media. It would help to have a larger number registered, and the Electoral Commission believes that individual registration would encourage that.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): The hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) anticipated my point; I was going to ask whether the committee had considered the implications of the Slough judgment, which called for individual voter registration. The present system does not work and is open to fraud.

Peter Viggers: Since 2003, the Electoral Commission has been urging individual registration. When giving evidence to the Select Committee on Justice earlier this week, its chairman said:

"If it's a matter of where I'd put the priority in terms of urgency...I would choose individual registration first and consolidation of electoral law afterwards."

The Slough judgment significantly highlighted the defects in the registration system, and the Electoral Commission has made strong representations to Government about that.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Further to the point made by the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), is the problem not the non-registration of people who can vote but the registration of people who cannot vote? Have the Government given my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) any indication that following the Slough judgment they are prepared to revisit the issue of individual registration?

Peter Viggers: The commission's view is that the registration system in Great Britain does not provide adequate safeguards against fraudulent registration and thus against fraudulent voting. Names can be added to the register by others, and not enough information is collected about those on the register to establish whether they really exist and are really resident at the address in question. Fraudsters can undermine the electoral process by obtaining and casting postal votes using falsely registered names. As its chairman's evidence to the Justice Committee this week indicated, the Electoral Commission is making strong representations to Government. I have not yet heard their response.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Parish Ministry (Funding Support)

2. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What criteria are used to determine areas of need in relation to the allocation of funds via the Archbishops Council in support of parish ministry. [195459]

The Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): Parish ministry support is targeted on low-income dioceses, their share calculated according to a formula that takes into account the income from the historic resources within the diocese, the income levels of the local population and other factors including attendance and electoral roll numbers.

Ben Chapman: The averaging of wealth and well-being results in the masking of some areas and strands of deprivation. Some dioceses that are perceived as being relatively well-off receive less than others. Chester, for example, has done well in terms of parish mission initiatives. What does my hon. Friend plan to do to maintain that creditable list?

Sir Stuart Bell: My hon. Friend is right about Chester diocese being relatively well resourced, but it does receive less from the Church Commissioners than other dioceses do. I congratulate Chester diocese, through my hon. Friend, on its long list of parish mission initiatives. That was supported last year by the mission development moneys that the commissioners made available. I wish the diocese well in its future work.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman ensure that the Archbishops Council allocates funds to investigate bat damage in historic churches? It is a real issue across the country, and it needs to be examined. The Archbishops Council could do that, and it should get in touch with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to ensure that we are not hidebound by foolish regulations to protect bats. I want to protect bats, but we must strike a balance between bat conservation and the needs of historic churches.

Sir Stuart Bell: English Heritage has recognised that, in addition to the public health issues, bat droppings are highly damaging to monuments, brasses and other fixtures. When bats get into the main body of a church, fixtures must be covered and then uncovered for worship and other activities. We recognise the need to conserve the environment, and the Bat Conservation Trust must be considered, but the Church recognises the potential damage to church contents from bats in the belfry.

Women Ordinands

3. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What percentage of ordinands ordained in the last 12 months are women. [195460]

Sir Stuart Bell: Some 47 per cent.

Tony Baldry: Is it not noteworthy that the first two people whom Jesus met after the resurrection were Mary and Martha? When will the House of Bishops make proposals that will enable the General Synod to resolve that the head of a woman is as worthy of the hands of apostolic succession as is the head of a man?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his reference to those historical events. This is the first Maundy Thursday that we have had Church Commissioners questions, and I wish you, Mr. Speaker, and the House a happy Easter.

General Synod has already agreed that the legal obstacles to the ordination of women bishops can be removed, and a legislative drafting group, chaired by the Bishop of Manchester, is trying to identify possible ways of doing that, including arrangements for those who are conscientiously unable to accept the ministry of women bishops. It has consulted widely. We hope that the General Synod will refer to the matter again in its July meeting.

Church Thefts

4. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What recent discussions the Church Commissioners have had with clergymen on thefts from churches. [195461]

Sir Stuart Bell: The Archbishops Council has had extensive discussions with parishes and dioceses about the most significant type of church theft, which is the theft of lead from church roofs. This is a serious problem and the Church is working with the police and insurers to try to solve it.

Miss McIntosh: I welcome the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) to his new position on the Front Bench—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It is obviously a popular appointment.

Everyone who lives in a rural community has a role to play in being vigilant and trying to prevent such thefts. I am especially concerned about the financial impact on churches, and it will continue to be a problem as long as lead and other mineral prices remain as high as they are. Can the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) say anything about the impact on insurance premiums and the general life of the church, given that predicament?

Sir Stuart Bell: Guidance on those matters can be found on the websites of Churchcare and the Ecclesiastical Insurance Group, and is also available from the National Churchwatch scheme and Church House. Ecclesiastical Insurance has invented a marking product called SmartWater that can trace recovered metal to its owner and link the thief to the scene of the crime. A free security marking system is also available to parishes. We are trying to keep our churches open and to keep people coming to them, but we recognise the difficulties and dangers involved. We hope that the methods being introduced by Ecclesiastical Insurance will help to reduce theft, in both rural and city areas.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The theft of lead and other metals from churches in the Kettering constituency is a growing problem, and there was recently a theft from Wheatley parish church. At what level among senior police officers have the Church Commissioners been having discussions? What discussions have been taking place with senior representatives of the scrap metal industry to control the lead and other metal that is brought to scrap yards for recycling, and to find out where it has come from?

Sir Stuart Bell: All thefts are reported to the police, with whom there is close liaison. I hope that it is of some slight comfort to the hon. Gentleman that, although the problem of stolen lead is getting more serious, the amount of theft of other church fixtures has declined. He asks a pertinent question about scrap metal, and we hope that the marking product being introduced will help us, with the aid of scrap metal merchants, to track both the material that has been stolen and the people who stole it.

Bishoprics (Funding)

5. Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): What recent discussions the Church Commissioners have had with the House of Bishops on the funding of bishoprics. [195462]

Sir Stuart Bell: Following consultation with the House of Bishops last year, a system of global budgets for funding bishops' office and working costs was introduced at the beginning of this year. The revised system will give bishops greater discretion in how the money is spent within agreed guidelines.

Mark Pritchard: It is a shame that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) has left the Front Bench, as I was looking forward to hearing some straight talking for a change.

I thank the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) for his reply to my question. Does he agree that bishops do vital work in local communities, and will he join me in thanking the Bishops of Hereford and of Lichfield, and the two suffragan bishops who work under them, the Bishops of Ludlow and of Shrewsbury? Will he give a commitment to the House and to my constituents in both dioceses that those bishops' funding will be safeguarded and that their valuable work will continue to be recognised?

Sir Stuart Bell: I recognise the role that bishops play locally, nationally and internationally. It is important that they are properly resourced and it is part of the Church Commissioners' duty to provide that support. In 2006, we spent £24.5 million on bishops' ministries, although we have other beneficiaries and must balance our obligations. The commission recognises the work done by the specific bishops that the hon. Gentleman listed, and the work of all bishops. We congratulate them on the role that they play in their dioceses.

Bishops' Historic Residences

6. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): What consideration the Church Commissioners have given to the future of the historic residences of the bishops of the Church of England; and if he will make a statement. [195463]

Sir Stuart Bell: The suitability of every see house is considered when the incumbent bishop reaches the age of 62. By way of a statement, the pre-retirement review process enables constructive dialogue with the bishop, his family, his diocese and a range of other interested parties, and helps us provide a suitable home, workplace and base for his ministry.

Robert Key: Does the Second Church Estates Commissioner agree that it is part and parcel of what the Church of England is that we accept responsibility for looking after the buildings in our care, be they see houses or ancient parish churches? Given that 20 per cent. of this country's listed buildings—and 40 per cent. of all our grade 1 listed buildings—are maintained by the Church of England Christian community, would not the Church Commissioners be better employed in seeking a new settlement with the state about how the cost of maintaining those national treasures could be shared?

Sir Stuart Bell: It may be Maundy Thursday, but I am reminded of a phrase that Jesus used: words often fall on stony ground. Any suggestion that the Church and the state might work together, with the state providing more money to the Church, will, I suspect, fall on stony ground.

In respect of work carried out in historic residences that are also bishops' palaces, we have of late maintained Rose castle and Auckland castle. As commissioners, we provide and maintain a residence for each diocesan bishop, so we fully understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. The Church will have to look after its own and not rely on the state. We shall continue to do the job we have been doing. We understand the historical context as well as the need to be up to date and to serve our parishioners, which is what the commissioners are trying to do.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Crown Prosecution Service

10. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): What assessment she has made of the Crown Prosecution Service's response to information on crime scene profiles received from the Dutch authorities in January 2007. [195477]

The Solicitor-General (Vera Baird): The Dutch authorities submitted 2,159 crime scene profiles from unsolved crimes. When my noble and learned Friend the Attorney-General became aware of issues surrounding the disk, she ordered the Crown Prosecution Service to conduct an urgent inquiry into what had happened. The inquiry has three strands, two of which will be concluded by the end of this month. I shall not be able to comment on numbers of DNA matches, or anything like that, because of ongoing operations.

Sandra Gidley: The Solicitor-General has said in the past that, unlike what happened in recent cases of official negligence, the data have not actually been lost, but how does she know? If the CPS did not know it had the disk in the first place, how can it possibly reassure us that the disk was never copied illegitimately, or that something similar did not occur?

The Solicitor-General: The full facts about where the disk was and how it was handled will become clear from the outcome of inquiry. The hon. Lady should not overlook the fact that this was an excellent example of international co-operation between UK law enforcement offices and those abroad, which is capable of taking off the streets a lot of criminals who would not have been taken off the streets if we did not have our strong DNA database and excellent international relationships with our European partners.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Is not the real lesson that the Government cannot be trusted with sensitive data? They do not know the value of such data and cannot keep them safe. How will the Solicitor-General achieve a real cultural change in the way the Government handle data?

The Solicitor-General: I remind the hon. Gentleman that no data have been lost in this case, so he really should take a calming pill. He should set his feet slightly more firmly on the ground and take his head slightly further out of the clouds. There is an inquiry and it will produce outcomes in due course. It should take only a moment's thought to appreciate that when we delivered our DNA data disk to the Dutch, it was taken by an Association of Chief Police Officers officer. It was handcuffed to him and he was escorted by another officer. When the data came to the CPS, which is—as again a moment's thought would have told the hon. Gentleman—remote from ownership of our database and not the appropriate recipient, it came with no destination except "CPS, Ludgate Hill". The hon. Gentleman is going too far in his criticisms; he needs to wait until he knows a few facts; a little knowledge is a terribly dangerous thing.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I am a little troubled by the length of time the inquiry is taking. On the face of it, if some of the background facts that have already come into the public domain are correct, it would seem that the answers to the inquiry are probably fairly simple, yet as the Solicitor-General will appreciate, particularly from the question she has just received, some of the disquiet centres on the fact that we still do not have the inquiry report. Will she assure the House that it will be brought forward as quickly as possible? I am a little troubled about the length of time it is taking given that the facts seem fairly simple.

The Solicitor-General: Probably the most important fact for me to confirm is that the results of the matching process have been returned to the Dutch. We have completed the inquiry into where the disk was at any given time, and by the end of the month it is expected that the CPS will have looked at responsibility for that. The third strand, to which I have just alluded, is the one on which our ACPO officers and the Dutch police are now able to take matters forward. We will produce the results as soon as we can.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): Does that incident not illustrate a more important point about the use of the DNA database? If reports are to be believed, the incident came about because the Crown Prosecution Service could not cover the absence of a prosecutor. Does that not show that resources would be better spent on using the data that we already have more efficiently and effectively, than on endlessly expanding the DNA database to include more and more innocent people, who have less and less likelihood of being involved in crime?

The Solicitor-General: We are determined to use the DNA database in the most effective way, so that it can stamp out crime that would otherwise not be detected. If that is not how the Liberal Democrats see an appropriate criminal justice policy going forward, so be it. The hon. Gentleman's factual basis for his question is wrong. He, too, must wait until he has a little bit more knowledge than the tiny amount that he has at present.

Transnational Bribery

11. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): When the Government plan to introduce legislation to reform the law on transnational bribery. [195479]

The Solicitor-General: Last year, the Government asked the Law Commission to undertake, as a priority, a fresh review of options for reform of bribery law and to prepare a draft Bill. Those processes are under way, and they cover both domestic and foreign bribery. The commission produced a consultation paper on 29 November, and its review and Bill should be complete by the autumn. Obviously, we will then have to look at the final proposals, but we will seek to introduce legislation as soon as parliamentary time allows.

Hugh Bayley: When the Government published their next steps paper on reforming bribery law last year, they confirmed that the Attorney-General's consent for prosecution for all bribery offences, including transnational bribery, was to be replaced by the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions, or the Director of the Serious Fraud Office. That was a very wise decision. Is it still the Government's policy?

The Solicitor-General: As my hon. Friend knows, there has been a review of the Attorney-General's role, which included consideration of the issue of consents, and until we announce our conclusions, which we will do shortly, I am not in a position to say more. However, my hon. Friend has hit on an interesting point. The Attorney-General's consent is required under the Prevention of Corruption Acts. In 2003, it was proposed in the Corruption Bill that we retain that requirement, but the Joint Committee providing pre-legislative scrutiny, of which I was a member, suggested that it should not be retained. The Law Commission proposes that it remain in place for domestic cases, but not for cases with an extra-territorial element. I should be very glad to have conversations with my hon. Friend on that interesting theme, but I cannot comment on what the outcome of the consultation on the Attorney-General's role will be.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): But is it not entirely improper for a Minister of the Crown with political responsibilities to decide whether people should be prosecuted for corruption? Is it the case that the Attorney-General has again stayed an international corruption case on the basis of political considerations?

The Solicitor-General: I cannot talk about individual cases, but I am not at all aware of the facts that the hon. Gentleman puts forward. I am aware of a number of ongoing cases, one of which awaits a decision, and one of which is coming quite close to conclusion. A number of others are being run by the Serious Fraud Office. No doubt their results will be made public in due course. I do not recognise the description of the case that he raised.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): It is an offence to suborn a police officer, for instance by bribing them to provide information to a national newspaper, yet one editor of a national newspaper has admitted that she has done so, and one former editor of a national newspaper, who now works for the Conservative party, has said that he, too, has paid police officers for information. No prosecutions have ever been brought against a newspaper for paying police officers for information, yet the practice often undermines the criminal justice system. Should there not be reform of the law, so that bribery is dealt with severely?

The Solicitor-General: Bribery must be dealt with severely, from wherever it emanates—and it will be. There are always headlines about cases, but then there is an important, second process called investigating to see exactly what is in the claim. Then there is a process called evaluating to see whether there is a 51 per cent. prospect of securing a conviction. I can assure my hon. Friend that those duties are carried out rigorously.

Fraud Prosecution Policy

12. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When she next expects to meet representatives of the small business sector to discuss policy on prosecution of fraud. [195481]

The Solicitor-General: My noble and learned Friend the Attorney-General met the Federation of Small Businesses in February, when she attended its annual dinner. Earlier, I went to a scambusters conference, which was attended by small business representatives, including the chair of the FSB, John Wright, who lives in Redcar, as it happens, and whom I know extremely well, so there is no difficulty at all about that communication. I think that the FSB is pleased that our strategy will be to engage small business in the process of disrupting, preventing, investigating and prosecuting fraud.

Mr. Bellingham: I thank the Solicitor-General for that reply. It is good news that she is engaging with small firms. Is she aware that the small business community is reporting an increasing number of internet and banking scams? The scam normally involves the firm in question receiving an e-mail from the third-world country saying that funds need to be transferred and asking whether it can help in doing that. Right hon. and hon. Members will be staggered by the number of firms that are taken in by that. Obviously they are very naive, but it is a serious issue that needs to be dealt with. What will she do about it?

The Solicitor-General: One of the tasks of the embryonic national fraud reporting centre will be to perceive the nature of frauds as they develop. It will put together intelligence packages that it will then distribute to try to help businesses to spot the fraud before it happens, and to disrupt it in order to ensure that people are not taken in. The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on an important point.

WOMEN AND EQUALITY

The Minister for Women and Equality was asked—

Domestic Workers (Trafficking)

15. Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): If she will meet non-governmental organisations to discuss the treatment of trafficked female migrant domestic workers. [195485]

The Minister for Equality (Barbara Follett): I have already met a number of non-governmental organisations to discuss the trafficking of female migrant domestic workers. This disturbing issue was also raised at a round table event with representatives of non-governmental organisations that I held in October.

Mr. Steen: Is the Minister aware that many hundreds of women come into Britain every year with unscrupulous employers who beat them, bludgeon them, scare them, frighten them into submission and say that if they go to the police they will be deported? To ensure that domestic slavery does not continue to raise its head in Britain, as I believe it already has, will she consider the Home Office's proposal to prevent visas from being transferred from unscrupulous employers to other employers if the women escape?

Barbara Follett: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue, which has not been aired much in the House. I also thank him for the work that he continues to do on this horrible issue. I will agree to speak to the Home Office—in fact, I speak to the Home Office quite often about the issue. The hon. Gentleman will know that the primary aim of Pentameter 2, which was launched on 3 October, was to recover victims of sexual and domestic exploitation. That work needs to go on and I welcome his support.

Women's Representation

16. Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to increase the representation of women in political life. [195486]

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Harriet Harman): The law that we introduced to allow political parties to use women-only shortlists for selection has been one of the most effective ways of increasing women's representation. On 6 March, I announced our intention to legislate in the new equality Bill to extend the right of political parties to have women-only shortlists until 2030.

Gordon Banks: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer. On the Labour Benches in this House, more than a quarter of our representatives are women. In Holyrood, one in two Labour MSPs are women. Those overall averages, however, are unfortunately brought down by the representation of women in other parties. Only 25 per cent. of the SNP's representatives in Holyrood are women—

Mr. Speaker: Order. A supplementary question must be short. The Minister might try to answer the question.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We want improved representation of women so that the issues of concern to women in this country are reflected not only in the House of Commons but in our local councils, too, in our devolved Parliament in Scotland, in Wales, and in London. It is notable that although we have fewer Labour Members in the Scottish Parliament than the Scots Nats, we have twice as many women Members. Women in Scotland are properly represented by Labour women. The other parties say that they support women's representation but they must get their act together and do something about it.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): If it is so important for the Labour party to have more women in Parliament, can the Minister tell us how many male Labour MPs have agreed to cut short their parliamentary career to give up their seat for a woman? If, as I suspect, the answer is none, can we abandon all this political correctness regarding getting more women into Parliament and just concentrate on people being selected on merit?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman raises the question of merit. Does he think that this Chamber was meritorious and representative when it was, as it was when I was first elected, 97 per cent. men? Then, it was said that it just so happened that all the men in the country were the best people, and they had to be in this House of Commons. The fact is that we have to bring about change so that women are fairly represented. We have made progress on that in our party. We now have 96 Labour women MPs, and the hon. Gentleman's party still has only 17. It is in the interests of everyone in this country and of our democracy that there is fair representation in this House of Commons.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): In Wales, 47 per cent. of those in the National Assembly are women, which is one of the highest records in the world. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this was achieved only by the efforts of Labour in Wales, by bringing in twinning, and by being bold and acknowledging the fact that we need people who actually represent the communities whom they represent?

Ms Harman: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend, and there are three really important issues here. First, it is only with positive action that there has been a difference and an increase in women's representation. Secondly, it is Labour that has taken the lead—whether in Scotland, Wales or other parts of the UK. Thirdly, women's representation has made a difference for women in this country, ensuring that women representatives have been able to put issues of concern such as domestic violence, child care and flexibility at work on our political agenda.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): What message does it send that, of the Ministers who are women, a disproportionate number of them are not paid, compared with that of male Ministers? Should my right hon. and learned Friend not have a word with the Prime Minister, saying that there should be parity of treatment—equal pay for work of equal value—or is the real question whether Ministers should be paid at all?

Ms Harman: The message that it sends is that, while we have made progress, a great deal more still needs to be made.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Historically and regardless of political parties, local government has attracted proportionately more women to participate in it than this House has attracted. What lessons does the Minister think we can learn from that, and why does she think that that has been the case?

Ms Harman: In fact, the representation of women in local councils is only about the same as that of women in this House. Historically, there have always been more women in local councils than in this House, but because of the positive action that we have taken, and which has been taken in Scotland and Wales, this House has overtaken that figure. Many of the people who work for local councils are women, providing important local services, as are many of the people who depend on local councils' services because they are caring for young children or older relatives, or are involved in schools or local social services. Because such services are so important to women in local communities, it is quite wrong that we still have so few women in local government. We need to make progress on that, too.

Domestic Violence

17. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's policy on assistance for victims of domestic violence. [195487]

18. Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's policy on assistance for victims of domestic violence. [195489]

The Minister for Equality (Barbara Follett): I welcome the number of men asking questions in this House today during women's questions. Although there are women here, none of them is asking a question on the Order Paper.

Delivering support for victims of domestic violence is at the heart of the Government's recently published action plan for tackling violence. Over the next three years, we are committed to ensuring that they and their families have access to the help that they need, including with accommodation, specialist counselling and legal and financial advice.

James Duddridge: Will the Minister undertake to review the assistance provided after the police attend a domestic violence incident? Although the forms and bureaucracy may be appropriate during the first visit, they are perhaps unwieldy and not particularly action-oriented if a second visit by the police is necessary.

Barbara Follett: I will look into the matter. I welcome the hon. Gentleman raising it in domestic violence month. As Minister for the East of England, I know that we have had an increase in reports of domestic violence in Essex, but I am glad to say that I would count that as a success, because it means that women are now willing to come forward, rather than suffering in silence.

Mr. Newmark: Does the Minister share my concern that according to Home Office figures, domestic violence almost trebled from 241,00 to 658,000 incidents reported in the past year alone, yet the conviction rate for domestic violence is a paltry 5 per cent.?

Barbara Follett: No. As I said in response to the previous question, we count that as positive because—[Interruption.] Well, it means that people are coming forward to report such incidents. For a long time people were too frightened to report, and we are providing support. There has been an increase in convictions in Essex, as I know from my position as Minister for the East of England.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): On the subject of violence against women, some women who suffer from domestic violence find support through rape crisis centres. In the past week I have visited the rape crisis centre in Newcastle and the rape and sexual abuse centre for Merseyside, both unable to provide as full a service as is needed locally because of uncertainties about their funding. On Tuesday the Minister for Women announced in a press release £1 million funding for rape crisis centres. That looked very similar to the announcement nearly two weeks ago by the Home Secretary of £1 million to tackle sexual and domestic violence. Can the Minister confirm that that will indeed be additional money? Can she also confirm over what period the money will be available and exactly how much will be available? Will she guarantee that every penny will go to rape crisis centres?

Barbara Follett: Once again, I welcome the right hon. Lady's interest in the matter, which I share. Like her, I have been visiting rape crisis centres and, with my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Women and Equality, I am concerned to ensure their sustainability. That is why we announced the emergency fund. I can confirm that that is new money and that it is long term. We want to make sure that the centres are sustainable. I hope to improve capacity in rape crisis centres and to get them working with the new sexual assault referral centres, which I think is the way forward.

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): To continue the theme of uncertain funding, in my local area there is a women's refuge which, each year, has to go out with a begging bowl to the district council, primary care trusts and so on. What more support can be given to refuge centres, and what can be done to encourage local councils to take up their responsibility and ensure that they make a major contribution to those centres, which are desperately needed?

Barbara Follett: This is where the new sub-national review gives us an opportunity. Under the local area agreements, we can perhaps influence funding, as long as the sexual and domestic violence sector is ready and able to input into those local area agreements. However, at present only 37.8 per cent. of local authorities have a refuge—that is not good enough—and only a third provide services for victims of domestic violence. In Warwickshire, which is Conservative-controlled, funding for the refuge was cut by half, and in Conservative-controlled Ealing, the funding for Southall Black Sisters is being withdrawn.

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): I welcome the Government's announcement that over the summer they will consider the issue of women who are trying to flee domestic violence but who have no recourse to public funds because of their immigration status, but will the Minister commit to putting emergency funding in place now, because abusers will not wait for Government policy and these women need urgent help right now?

Barbara Follett: Like the hon. Lady, the Government are extremely aware of the acute problems faced by this group, and that is why applications for indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom made by victims of domestic violence are prioritised, and where the applicant is destitute we are now waiving fees. It is also why we will shortly be announcing details of a new scheme under which victims of domestic violence with indefinite leave to remain may be able to have their housing and living costs met, but there is more work still to be done in this area.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for North Devon, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Drinking Water

24. Mr. John Spellar (Warley) (Lab): What the Commission's policy is on the provision of drinking water at meetings held in the House; and if he will make a statement. [195468]

Nick Harvey (North Devon): The Administration Committee last considered the issue of the provision of drinking water in Committee and meeting rooms in March 2007 and concluded at the time that the current practice of supplying bottled mineral water should continue, but I am pleased to report that the Department of Facilities is re-examining the issue with the intention of providing further advice.

Mr. Spellar: I congratulate the Cabinet Secretary and the Evening Standard on coming aboard my long-standing campaign to increase the use of tap water against the use of bottled water. The hon. Gentleman's reply is welcome, but I urge a little more urgency on him. This is a major environmental issue and a substantial cost issue. Will he now take steps to give instructions to the administration that tap water should be available at all meetings and in all dining facilities as a proper alternative to bottled water, hopefully with a view to phasing out the use of bottled water?

Nick Harvey: I agree with the gist of what the right hon. Gentleman says. Tap water is widely available in the catering outlets in the estate, but I can assure him that this is being treated with some urgency and that the Department of Facilities is expected to report back soon after Easter.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I share a little concern about this because the water that we all drink comes from my constituency, so I hope that instead of some stringent adherence to the latest political correctness we will be presented with a choice in the future. Can we be reassured that there will be a choice? Tap water should be available, but not at the expense of choice.

Nick Harvey: I will not pre-empt the outcome of the Department's investigation. We will have to wait and see, and decisions will be taken on the basis of cost and environmental considerations when we have the report.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

Parliamentary Questions

25. Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): What assessment she has made of the completeness of information given in answers to parliamentary questions. [195469]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Helen Goodman): As I have stated in the past, the Leader of the House keeps the quality of Ministers' answers to written parliamentary questions under continuous review.

Mr. Jones: On the assumption that every Whitehall Department has now abandoned the traffic light system that was formerly used to filter out embarrassing questions, will the hon. Lady confirm that she will use her good offices to urge the Treasury to provide me with an unambiguous answer to questions that I have tabled today about the use of No. 11 Downing street by charities, including the Smith Institute, rather than the obfuscatory ones that I have received hitherto?

Helen Goodman: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, all Ministers understand the importance of answering parliamentary questions fully, truthfully and in a timely manner. He has only just tabled those questions, so I am sure that he can expect an answer in accordance with the usual timetable.

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): As regards answers to questions put by Members of Parliament, the House will be aware that it is Government policy to have more out-of-hours GP services. However, when I tabled a written question to the Secretary of State for Health on the number of GPs who operate the service, I was told that that information was not collected centrally. The Government must have the information centrally in order to have made their policy in the first place, so will the hon. Lady urge the Secretary of State for Health to provide the relevant information, or alternatively will she confirm that the policy was made on the hoof without any supporting evidence?

Helen Goodman: Obviously, the hon. Gentleman is aware that questions can be answered only within certain cost limits. However, I undertake to get in touch with the Secretary of State for Health and raise the hon. Gentleman's concerns.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Will the Deputy Leader of the House talk to the Leader of the House to see whether we could have a much more efficient system to monitor, check, report back on and improve the quality of written answers? I suggest that either the Modernisation Committee or a sub-committee, on a cross-party basis, could do quarterly reports on what the standards should be and whether they are met.

Helen Goodman: The hon. Gentleman is aware that we are waiting for a report on written questions from the Procedure Committee. It will be more appropriate for us to consider the issue that he has raised when we have received that report.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Is the hon. Lady aware that many hon. Members believe that if they table difficult questions for the Government, the Government respond to the question that they wish they had been asked, rather than the one that actually was asked? Will she confirm that in the folder with the answers for written questions is a note from the permanent secretary reminding Ministers that the answers have to be factually correct, fit the requirements of the question and be produced swiftly? That was the practice during the Major Government.

Helen Goodman: As I explained in my previous answer, the 1997 parliamentary resolution on ministerial accountability was incorporated into the ministerial code. It is absolutely specific:

"Ministers have a duty to Parliament to account, and be held to account, for the policies, decisions and actions of their Departments and...Agencies".

Oral Statements

26. Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): What the criteria are for deciding to announce Government policy by means of an oral statement; and if she will make a statement. [195470]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Helen Goodman): In deciding whether to make an oral statement to announce Government policy, the Government will take into account the importance of the issue and the other business before the House.

Mr. Holloway: Has the Deputy Leader of the House or the Leader of the House ever had cause to speak to the Home Secretary, since she entered the Cabinet, to discuss the methods employed by the Home Office to announce policies?

Helen Goodman: We do discuss with Ministers how oral statements are made, to ensure that the House is kept properly informed of policy developments.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): If my hon. Friend is talking to Ministers about statements, she could emphasise to them that they are better made in the House than on the "Today" programme.

Helen Goodman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I do not know whether he is aware of the fact that in the 70 sitting days of this Session, there have been 39 oral statements, and that we gave notice of 20 of those. That means that 20 were flagged up on the Order Paper. Obviously, that leads to media stories and speculation, which are clearly outside the Government's control.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for North Devon, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Parliamentary Recording Unit

27. Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): What the rules are governing the use of material provided by the parliamentary recording unit. [195471]

Nick Harvey (North Devon): The rules largely date back to the regulations that govern the admission of cameras to the Chamber. The Member may use only material featuring themselves or a reply from a Minister to their question, and contributions to the debate on an issue raised by the Member. The clip should display the portcullis logo, and the Member should acknowledge copyright and ensure that the material is not downloadable. Members may use recordings of proceedings on their own parliamentary website, but not on any third party hosting website.

Jo Swinson: Parliament should be embracing new technology as a way to reconnect with the public. Is it not about time that we ditched the ridiculous ban on parliamentary clips being shown on YouTube? Sites such as YouTube are popular and accessible; if there is a copyright issue, will the House authorities review the current contracts and bring Parliament into the 21st century?

Nick Harvey: Copyright is only part of the point that I am making. Obviously, the costs of the pictures recorded in the Chamber are also part of the contract. The other issue is to do with the manipulation of pictures taken in this Chamber. That comes back to the issue of the rules that govern the admission of cameras into the Chamber. At the moment, the rule is that the clips can be streamed to be viewed in real time, but not downloaded in such a way that they could be manipulated later.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

European Union (Scrutiny)

28. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What plans she has for new procedures to enable the House to conduct the scrutiny function for national Parliaments set out in the treaty of Lisbon. [195472]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Helen Goodman): As I said to the House during the debate on 26 February on the Bill to enable ratification of the EU treaty,

"We will work with both Houses to ensure that there is an effective mechanism, and we will also ensure that there is an opportunity for a decision before the Lisbon treaty comes into force."

I also said that we would examine this alongside the review of "the new scrutiny arrangements that we established last month." [Official Report, 26 February 2008; Vol. 472, c. 977.]

On 13 March, the Lords European Union Committee published a report, "The Treaty of Lisbon: an impact assessment", setting out its views on the yellow and orange card mechanism. We will take that into account, alongside the findings of the forthcoming inquiry by the Commons European Scrutiny Committee.

Mr. Heath: I think that it is fair to say that opinions differed on the treaty of Lisbon, but the one thing that was welcomed in all parts of the House was the additional powers of scrutiny conferred by the treaty—not on the Executive but on Parliament, giving Parliament the chance to constrain some of the activities of the European Union when it did not show subsidiarity. Will the hon. Lady ensure that we have an appropriate mechanism that does not just send this to some Committee a long way away from the Floor of the House where nobody knows exactly what is going on, but gives this House and this Chamber centrality in the issue of what should be decided at European level and what should be decided by this Parliament?

Helen Goodman: The hon. Gentleman makes some reasonable points. As I said, it will be a matter for each House to decide how it plays its cards. Of course, the European Scrutiny Committee will maintain its role in making an initial scrutiny of the documents, and we anticipate that the explanatory memorandums produced by Government Departments will highlight the subsidiarity point more fully than is the case currently. Furthermore, when we come to look at this we will consider a number of issues, including the role of the whole House, what to do during long recesses, and the scope that there may be for inter-parliamentary co-operation through the CCSAC mechanism.

Parliamentary Questions

29. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What assessment she has made of the completeness of information given in answers to parliamentary questions. [195473]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Helen Goodman): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave earlier.

James Duddridge: The Minister will be aware that certain Ministers within each Department take lead responsibility for written questions. Do those Ministers meet and share best practice, and is there a document that outlines that best practice, or do Government Departments operate in silos, given that certain Departments are much better than others?

Helen Goodman: As the hon. Gentleman understands, where Government Departments have shared interests and shared policy responsibilities, of course they carry those forward together and discuss not only policy development but what appropriate announcements should be made to this House.

Topical Questions

30. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the procedure for topical questions. [195474]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Helen Goodman): There is no formal assessment. However, the new approach appears to be working well.

Mr. Hollobone: May I urge the hon. Lady to undertake an assessment to highlight some of the problems that we are having with topical questions? For example, under the old system, in any typical 60-minute departmental Question Time each Member of this House had the opportunity to ask one question. Now, it is increasingly the case that some Members get the chance to ask two questions, while others lose out altogether.

Helen Goodman: Obviously, who is called during topical questions is a matter for the Speaker. However, I think that there was a consensus that the introduction of topical questions would help to ensure that questions that had arisen very shortly before Question Time could be answered fully. Notwithstanding the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, by and large most hon. Members are happy with the current practice.

Topical Debates

31. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): If she will take steps to pass responsibility for the arrangements for the selection of matters for topical debate to the Chairman of Ways and Means; and if she will make a statement. [195475]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Helen Goodman): My right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the House announced a review of the operation of topical debates in a written ministerial statement on 7 February. The hon. Gentleman can submit his views to that review. The results will be published before the summer recess.

Mr. Robathan: These are my views, so I hope that the Leader of the House will take note of them. I suggested the Chairman of Ways and Means in my question because I know that you are very busy, Mr. Speaker. The point is, however, that topical debates are currently decided by the Government based on what they feel like—what announcement the Prime Minister made on Monday—instead of issues of topicality. If these debates are to be topical and useful to the House of Commons, we should have issues that can be debated seriously in this House, that mean something and that are topical, instead of some Government stooge debate. We need proper debates: ones that the House wants, not ones that the Leader of the House or the Government want.

Helen Goodman: The hon. Gentleman should take a more balanced view of the matter. On 7 February, the topical debate was on NHS staffing—a suggestion of his colleague, the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May). We have also discussed Holocaust memorial day, Kenya, preventive health services, availability of financial services for low-income families, the health consequences of the availability of cheap alcohol, future prospects for apprenticeships and climate change. The first topical debate was also based on a suggestion from his right hon. Friend; it was on immigration.

Business of the House

11.30 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the forthcoming business?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Ms Harriet Harman): The business for the week after the Easter recess will be:

TUESDAY 25 MARCH—Opposition day [8th allotted day]. There will be a debate entitled "Iraq Inquiry" on an Opposition motion followed by motion to approve the Local Government Finance Special Grant Report (No. 129) (House of Commons Paper No. 256)

WEDNESDAY 26 MARCH—Second Reading of the Local Transport Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 27 MARCH—Topical debate: Subject to be announced, followed by motion relating to the parliamentary contributory pension fund, followed by motion relating to the Seventh Report of the Standards and Privileges Committee.

FRIDAY 28 MARCH—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the week commencing 31 March will include:

MONDAY 31 MARCH—Motion to approve a Ways and Means resolution on the Housing and Regeneration Bill, followed by remaining stages of the Housing and Regeneration Bill, followed by motion to consider the Northern Rock plc Transfer Order 2008.

TUESDAY 1 APRIL—Second Reading of the Counter-Terrorism Bill.

WEDNESDAY 2 APRIL—Opposition day [9th allotted day]. There will be a debate on a Liberal Democrat motion. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 3 APRIL—Topical debate: subject to be announced followed by motion on the April recess adjournment.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for 3 April and 24 April will be:

THURSDAY 3 APRIL—A debate on the report from the Foreign Affairs Committee on Global Security: Russia

THURSDAY 24 APRIL— A debate on the report from the Culture, Media and Sport Committee on ticket touting.

The House may wish to be aware that earlier today I issued a written ministerial statement announcing publication of "Post-legislative Scrutiny—The Government's Approach". It will provide that three years after this House has passed legislation, there will be a process of scrutiny to enable us to be sure that an Act did what we intended.

Mrs. May: I thank the right hon. and learned Lady for giving us the forthcoming business and I look forward to future discussions on the important subject of post-legislative scrutiny and the way in which Government proposals operate.

All hon. Members will have been concerned by recent events in Tibet. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition welcomed the Prime Minister's decision to meet the Dalai Lama when he is in London, but many hon. Members still want an opportunity to discuss the issue. Can we have a topical debate on Tibet next week?

This week, the National Audit Office released figures showing that Britain's climate change emissions are 12 per cent. higher than the levels cited in Government figures. We have also learned that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—the Department responsible for reducing Britain's CO_2 emissions—is the worst performing Department for energy efficiency. May we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs explaining why the Government have made so little progress on cutting CO_2 emissions, and why his Department is setting such a bad example?

Last year, we proposed amendments to the Statistics and Registration Services Act 2007, which would have significantly reduced the scope for political manipulation of data. The Government rejected them; now we know why. The Statistics Commission has lambasted Government Departments for politically driven misuse of statistics—otherwise known as spin. One of the worst offenders was the Children, Schools and Families Department, and last week it was at it again: hiding school admission figures and attacking schools for demanding money for places based on nothing more than unverified desk research. May we have a debate on the use of Government statistics?

On Monday, Dame Carol Black's report, "Working for a Healthier Tomorrow", revealed the shocking true cost to the economy of Labour's failure to tackle worklessness caused by sickness—£100 billion. After 10 years of a Labour Government, Dame Carol labelled the number of people on incapacity benefit as "an historic failure of healthcare and employment support", so may we have a debate on that historic Government failure?

In 1997, the Government's pledge card promised smaller class sizes and the Prime Minister is now promising personalised learning for every child, but it seems that no one has told the Schools Minister, who yesterday told a conference that class sizes of 70 were acceptable, so may we have a debate on Government policy on class sizes?

In the past few weeks, a number of hon. Members have called for a debate on London. This week, another scandal has hit the Labour Mayor of London. We have now discovered that Ken Livingstone has not registered a single donation with the Electoral Commission for the past seven years. His campaign team insists that all moneys raised come through the Labour party, so do not have to be declared, but his official website asks for cheques to be made payable to the "Ken Livingstone campaign fund". What on earth is the Mayor trying to hide? May we have a debate on London?

Last night, 64 Labour MPs voted to support post office closures despite campaigning in their own constituencies to keep post offices open. Are not those double standards the very reason why so many people are turned off politics? Post offices are often the linchpin of local communities, so may we have a debate on sustainable local communities?

[Mrs. May]

Finally, in yesterday's debate on the Post Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Alan Duncan) quoted a poem that had come into his possession from Downing street. I would like to suggest another version of that poem:

At Downing street the other day
I met a man sent on his way.
Close to Gordon for many years,
The PM's rants brought him to tears.
But for all this he didn't care,
He was pleased to see his master there.
He'd been important once, you know,
Now Carter told him, "You must go!".

Misusing Government figures, wasting taxpayers' money, reneging on promises, Ministers campaigning against their own Government, chaos at No. 10: is not that why no one trusts this Government on anything any more?

Ms Harman: I do not know about the right hon. Lady's constituents, but I know mine are more interested in sound money than in soundbites, and they would prefer competence to her version of comedy.

The right hon. Lady asked about Tibet, and she acknowledged that the issue was raised with the Prime Minister by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday. It is a matter of continuing concern to the Prime Minister and to the Foreign Secretary, and no doubt hon. Members will have further opportunities to raise questions with the Prime Minister—and, indeed, with the Foreign Secretary in oral questions next week. I note the right hon. Lady's proposal to make Tibet a subject for a topical debate.

The right hon. Lady asked about the Government's approach to climate change, and I would remind her that the Government are taking unprecedented action to tackle carbon emissions. Through the Climate Change Bill, which will come before the House for debate shortly, we propose to set in law a ceiling on carbon emissions, which is unprecedented in the world. As well as Government Departments scrutinising their carbon emissions, we in the House also need to ensure that we reduce waste and energy use. My hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House is to work with the House authorities on that, so I invite hon. Members to put to her their proposals on how the House can become greener and more energy-efficient. We, too, can make a contribution and lead by example.

The right hon. Lady talked about statistics. Public confidence in the independence of statistics is very important. The Government have made changes in that respect. The Statistics Board will be overseen by the Public Administration Committee, which will reassure her and the House.

The right hon. Lady talked about school admissions and class sizes. May I remind her and the House that a third of children in primary school were in classes of more than 30 when we came into government? That number is now down to 2 per cent. We now have 30,000 extra teachers and 130,000 extra teaching assistants. We have the best ratio ever between teachers and children in classes. The Schools Minister did not say that he thought that there should be 70 in a class.

Mrs. May: He said that it was acceptable.

Ms Harman: He did not say that; he just remarked on an innovatory way of dealing with—[Interruption.] Well, I am just telling the right hon. Lady and the House what he said. He has been misquoted. Government policy is to have more teachers and teaching assistants, smaller class sizes and more investment in education, and we have been getting on with providing that.

The right hon. Lady mentioned worklessness. We have been concerned to ensure that we have a strong and stable economy with more jobs, and I am glad to report to the House that the figures published yesterday show a record number of jobs in the economy. In the last quarter, the number of jobs in the economy went up again, but there is a problem in terms of those who are on incapacity benefit, who perhaps want to and could work. For many years, when her party was in government, people were encouraged to go on to incapacity benefit to conceal rising unemployment. Although the number going on to incapacity benefit is reducing, a large number have been on that benefit for a long time. Therefore, through jobcentres and private and voluntary organisations, we must look to every individual, ask what their capacity is and see whether the many programmes available can help them into work.

The right hon. Lady threw around some allegations about the Labour Mayor of London, which gives me the opportunity to say that I am confident that all the declarations have been properly made. I seem to remember that the Tory candidate for Mayor of London—despite the fact that he represents an Oxfordshire constituency—was on one of the Electoral Commission lists of people who had not made declarations and had to make them late. I might be wrong, but that is my recollection.

The right hon. Lady mentioned post offices. As she will know, we had an extensive debate on that subject yesterday on an Opposition motion, which gave everybody an opportunity to discuss the issue. Were we to follow her Government's policy of not providing a subsidy to the Post Office, we would not have 11,500 post offices continuing in business as will now be the case; we would have only 4,000. If the country is to have 11,500 post offices, it is important that the right ones stay open. That is why the consultation is so important, and that is why I have put forward the case to the Post Office that the Gibbon road post office in Nunhead should be one of the 11,500 that remain open.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House confirm that although investigations and decisions are already taking place on party political expenditure and many suggestions are being made about curtailing Members' expenses, there is one big gap in the programme? It is high time we took the opportunity, possibly through a statement, to make sure that Members of Parliament have one job and one job only. There are more than 100 Tory MPs lining their pockets on the side, including some on the Front Bench. It should be one Member of Parliament, one job, with no conflict of interests. The climate is right and the press will deal with it, so let us get on with it.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend has made a good point. Being a Member of Parliament is an important job, and our constituents expect us to give it our committed attention. I expect my hon. Friend's point to be the subject of debate in the House, and I am glad that he has raised it.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Today is the fifth anniversary of the invasion of Iraq. A Bill is about to be presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) calling for an inquiry into what happened in Iraq, and next week a debate using Opposition time will raise the need for such an inquiry. Will the Leader of the House talk to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Defence to ensure that after next Tuesday's debate it will be announced, in the light of the views expressed by Parliament, that we can have—in a way that will meet the wishes of Parliament—the sort of inquiry into the events of five years ago and since that I think the country deserves and needs?

May we also have a debate on a separate but linked issue, that of coroners' inquests generally and inquests into the deaths of service personnel in particular—not least in order to ensure, on behalf of the families of people like the late Private Jason Smith, that the Government do not seek to intervene to prevent coroners from speaking as they find, and that the relatives of the victims of events such as the 7 July bombings do not discover that the inquests into their loved ones' deaths took place behind closed doors without the possibility of public and general knowledge of how their relatives died?

Yesterday we had what I thought was an excellent debate on post offices, to which 83 Members contributed, and since the Queen's speech there have been six Adjournment debates, more than 70 oral parliamentary questions and nearly 250 written questions on the subject. As Members are still hugely concerned about the failure of their local consultation processes to deliver the right results, will the Leader of the House establish whether the topical debate the week after next could deal with post office closures? The time allowed for yesterday's debate was clearly not sufficient. Given that the Government lost 19 of their supporters, who voted with the Opposition, and that the majority is now down to 20, will she also establish whether they can come up with a more satisfactory response to the widespread concern that exists through the House?

I support the request from the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) for next week's topical debate to deal with Tibet, but may we have a debate on China generally before long? In this of all years there is a huge interest in relations between the United Kingdom and China, which really ought to be aired on the Floor of the House.

The hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) confirmed earlier that according to the best available figures, one elector in 10 in England and up to one in five in London may not be registered. Six weeks before the elections in England and Wales, we also know from the judge who disqualified a Conservative councillor in Slough on Tuesday that the postal vote system is "lethal to the democratic process".

May we please have an urgent debate in the next couple of weeks so that, once and for all, we can not only encourage people who should be on the electoral register to put their names on it, but change a system that allows widespread abuse because we do not have individual voter registration in this country?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman asked about Iraq. As I announced, there will be a debate on Iraq next week, in which Members will be able to put their points about inquiries. I remind Members, however, that we have already had four inquiries into the events leading up to the use of force in Iraq, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that an inquiry will be held when we have completed the process—which is well under way—of withdrawing from Iraq, on the basis that its security forces and police are able to provide security for the people of Iraq. As well as bearing in mind the very regrettable loss of life, I ask Members to remember the sight of people queuing to vote in elections, which were made possible by Saddam Hussein's removal. Members should also recall that there was a 70 per cent. turnout, showing the enthusiasm of the Iraqi people for their new democracy.

The hon. Gentleman asked about coroners' inquests. It will be possible to raise questions about how inquests deal with material that has national security implications in the Second Reading debate on the Counter-Terrorism Bill on 1 April.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned post offices. That will remain an important issue right up until the end of the consultation process when the Post Office announces its decision. As he reminded us, there was a full day's debate on the matter yesterday, so I cannot say that there will be further parliamentary time to discuss it, especially as there are a number of important Bills coming forward that the House must be able to scrutinise.

The hon. Gentleman asked about Tibet and China. He will have heard that the shadow Leader of the House suggested it as a subject for a topical debate, and we will consider that.

The hon. Gentleman raised the important point of the number of people who are eligible to vote but who are unable to do so because they are not on the electoral register—he mentioned the statistics that show that one in 10 electors outside London and as many as one in five in London may not be registered. He will know that we passed the Electoral Administration Act 2006 to place a duty on electoral registration officers to do everything they can, including using data that they hold, to ensure that everybody in their area is properly on the electoral register. The question he raised, however, was whether enough has been done to ensure that everybody is entitled to vote. I know that he shares my concern that the people who are least likely to be on the electoral register are those who are young, those who are black, and people who live in rented accommodation or in inner cities. We cannot have the continuing unfairness in our democracy that people are more likely to be on the electoral register and able to vote if they are over 50, live in a non-metropolitan area, own their own home and are white. That is a problem.

I will continue my discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Justice to see whether we can tackle the twin problems of under-registration and bogus registration, and whether measures can be put in place to use the data that Government and local government hold. I know there is a lot of concern about the cross-use of data, but it can be used for good purposes, such as to ensure that those who are entitled to be registered are registered, and that nobody who is not entitled to be registered gets themselves on the register for the purposes of electoral fraud.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): May we have a wider debate on the Coroner Service? A draft Bill on the subject was presented in the last Parliament, followed by a Select Committee report on that Bill. The issue is high on the political agenda, particularly for many military families who are suffering long delays in getting the answers they need. Those delays are the result of an archaic system that is long overdue for reform.

Ms Harman: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important to improve the Coroner Service so that bereaved relatives can get answers to their questions, particularly when those relatives have died abroad. I also agree that improving the Coroner Service is part of our military covenant. We will publish our draft legislative programme at the end of May setting out what will be in this year's Queen's Speech, and I know that my hon. Friend will be hoping and expecting that a coroners Bill will be included in that draft legislative programme.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): The 100th anniversary of the formation of the Territorial Army falls on 1 April. I for one am very proud to serve in the TA and would resist any efforts by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to make me leave it. May we have a debate to celebrate its 100th anniversary, because this House has a long association with it—not least, for example, through Colonel Macnamara, to whom there is a memorial on the wall here, and who was the commanding officer of the Royal Irish? May we have such a debate to send a clear message to the TA that the House of Commons supports it?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman will have heard my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister paying a heartfelt tribute to the Territorial Army in Prime Minister's questions yesterday. I take on board the hon. Gentleman's proposal for a debate on the TA, and I will consider it as a subject for a topical debate.

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House consider making time available for a discussion of the recently published Network Rail document on the rail utilisation strategy, so the House can welcome the inclusion in that document of the Leamside line, recognising the social and economic benefits that that line, as part of an expanding UK rail network, would bring to the constituencies of many Members representing the north-east?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend underlines the importance of the economic regeneration of the region in which his constituency lies. Transport links are crucial to that regeneration. He has mentioned one of them, and I will raise that with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. He might also apply for an Adjournment debate on the issue.

Mr. Speaker: I call the hon. Gentleman on the Liberal Democrat Benches—John Hemming.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I am very small and insignificant—who am I?

On Monday, a group of six non-governmental organisations launched a document relating to grandparents' rights and how they tend to be excluded from family proceedings by the rules in both private and public law. May we have a debate on the operation of family law, and specifically on the role of grandparents and members of the extended family, such as great-grandparents, uncles and aunts?

Ms Harman: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman might ask his parliamentary colleagues to put that forward as a subject for an Opposition day debate, as his party has one coming up. I strongly agree with what he says, and we should recognise that many families could not cope without grandmum and granddad pitching in. When in the past we have provided support for families with children, we have been criticised by some as the "nanny state"; as we are putting much greater emphasis on, and giving more recognition to, the role of grandparents, I hope we are subsequently called the "granny state" and I would be proud if that were to happen.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Instead of having a debate solely on Tibet, may we have a wider debate on UK relations with China, which would of course cover Tibet, but also how we might engage constructively with the Chinese on a range of issues from climate change to their activities in Africa and their support for the Burmese regime?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend makes an important point and I will see whether there is an opportunity for such a discussion. As he says, UK relations with China are very important in many contexts such as our concern about Darfur, the global economy, climate change and our relations with it as an emerging and strongly growing economy. I will raise this matter with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement to the House on the future of Operation Stack, the wretched and ill-conceived system that parks thousands of lorries on the M20 whenever there are problems at the channel ports, not only thereby causing huge misery to my constituents and everyone else in Kent, but blocking one of the principal freight routes into this country? Kent county council has made a suggestion for a new lorry park, which would help alleviate the situation, but that will not happen unless the Department for Transport takes a positive view. Therefore, it is important that we hear that the Secretary of State will get behind the idea, and for once take some effective action to get the traffic flowing.

Ms Harman: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman table a written or oral question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, if he has not already done so. In any event, I shall raise the matter with her and ask her to write to him.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole) (Lab): Can the Leader of the House find time for a debate on police service reorganisation? Earlier this week, Humberside police authority backed its chief constable's plan in the next few years to reduce the number of police officers by 300 and to increase the number of support staff by 400, thus, he says, releasing 20,000 hours of extra policing on to the streets. That is clearly a complex formula, and I shall be meeting the chief constable to discuss it. He says that it results from the Flanagan review, which the Home Office undertook earlier in the year, so I think that the formula will go to other police forces around the country. All hon. Members would find a debate on it most opportune, so can the Leader of the House arrange one?

Ms Harman: I shall bring my hon. Friend's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. A great deal more has been invested in the police, with the sole purpose and intention that neighbourhood policing should be rolled out from 1 April in every community in this country. Obviously, we want good police community support and good civilian back-up in police stations, but that is no substitute for good neighbourhood policing, and I shall bring the matter to my right hon. Friend's attention

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Earlier this week, stung by well-argued and widespread criticism, the Government announced by means of a written statement and a White Paper that they intended to abolish the Learning and Skills Council. They are to replace it with a series of other quangos and bureaucrats. That has not been debated in the House, but it certainly should be, so that the case can be made for a deregulated system of further education that can raise skill levels in this country, elevate practical learning and give better life chances to millions of the people whom we represent.

Ms Harman: Obviously, we are concerned to ensure that every young person—and, indeed, every adult who wants the opportunity to continue their education—in every part of the country is given the opportunities that they have not necessarily had in the past. That is why we are increasing the education leaving age to 18—I hope that the hon. Gentleman supports that—and why we are dramatically increasing the number of apprenticeships. I shall look into the specific points that he made and ask the relevant Secretary of State to write to him.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that in excess of £8 million has been spent on upgrading the press facilities in this House. Will she inform the House what evidence there is to suggest that taxpayers are getting value for money?

Ms Harman: The amount spent by this House on facilities for the Lobby is published on an annual basis, so on the basis of that transparency, it is for the public to judge whether they are getting good value for money.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): May I tempt the Leader of the House to be a bit more enthusiastic about having a debate on Tibet? She merely says that she notes that it might be a subject for a topical debate, but that is not very enthusiastic. Can she tell me any subject that is likely to be more topical next Thursday than what is going on in Tibet?

Ms Harman: The important thing is to give the House the opportunity to debate something that is of absolute topicality in the week in which it is to be debated. It would not be right for me to announce today the subject of next week's topical debate. I deal with the question of Tibet with absolute seriousness, and the Prime Minister set out the approach yesterday. I note that the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) has joined the other hon. Members who have expressed their concern and proposed it as the subject of a topical debate.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): May I follow up the point made by the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) about electoral fraud? We have heard about the case involving the Conservatives in Slough, but this affects all political parties, including the Liberal Democrats and even the Labour party. I make a plea that we urgently address the concerns of the Electoral Commission and Sir Christopher Kelly, the newly-appointed chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, because the issue will not go away. May I also make a plea for individual voter registration?

Ms Harman: Again, my hon. Friend makes an important point, which I shall bring to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Justice Secretary. It is fundamental to our democracy—both our local democracy and the legitimacy of this House—that everyone who is eligible to vote is able to do so because they are on the register and that nobody who is not entitled to vote is on the register and thus able to corrupt the system.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): On 24 October last year, a special debate took place in Westminster Hall on illegal immigration. The Home Office Minister present in that debate made a commitment that the Border and Immigration Agency was liaising with chief constables to ensure that when illegal immigrants jumped off the back of a lorry they were not simply asked to make their own way to Croydon to get their claims processed. Yet in recent weeks incidents have taken place in both Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire in which illegal immigrants have been set free. Can we have a Home Office statement about what the Government policy is on these lorry-drop immigrants?

Ms Harman: I shall ask my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of her letter in the House of Commons Library. As I said last week, the allegations made about the Cambridgeshire case were simply not true; I do not know about the Bedfordshire case, and shall raise it with my right hon. Friend, but those other allegations, which were so concerning, were simply not based in fact.

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West) (Lab): Is the Leader of the House aware that Sheikh Hasina Wajid, a former Prime Minister of Bangladesh and leader of the Bangladeshi Awami League, has been languishing in jail for the past eight months on trumped-up charges without the prospect of any kind of trial? In addition, she is seriously ill and has been refused hospital treatment. Will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that the British Government make appropriate representations to the Government of Bangladesh and get Sheikh Hasina Wajid released as soon as possible?

Ms Harman: The issue that my hon. Friend raises is a matter of concern to the Foreign Office and it is being kept under consideration. I believe that it has been raised with the Bangladeshi authorities by this Government.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I welcome the announcement by the Leader of the House that we will have a topical debate next Thursday, but it is the first one for some time. Last Thursday, I was told that we could not have one because of the Budget debate, which ended early, and that we could not have one today because of the Commonwealth debate, which I hope will run until 6 pm. Should the question whether or not we have a topical debate really rest on the whim of the Leader of the House?

Ms Harman: Topical debates take place in Government time, so this is not about a whim. We did not have a topical debate on the day when the other business was the Budget because the Opposition, and indeed a number of other hon. Members, said that they would rather the Budget be the subject of the whole day's debate and that we should not take an hour and a half out of it for a topical debate. The right hon. Gentleman points out that that debate went short, but it is not always possible to predict these things. When the Opposition ask us not to have a topical debate and instead to devote the time to the Budget debate, we take the suggestion seriously.

The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned international women's day, when we did not have a topical debate. We did not want to take one and a half hours out of the debate on international women's day, in which many speakers contributed to a very good debate. Many hon. Members have asked for issues associated with Commonwealth countries to be the subject of a topical debate, so it would seem counter-productive to cut into the Commonwealth debate with a topical debate lasting an hour and a half.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I am reviewing the question of topical debates. If we decide to suggest any change, we will make the proposals before the summer. This is not an exact science, but I assure him that my concern is to do what the House wants in respect of ensuring that there is an opportunity to debate something topical that the House has not had the opportunity to debate in a given week.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): May we have a debate on the oleaginous and supine approach of BBC news editors to BBC management? Did my right hon. and learned Friend notice this morning, in bulletin after bulletin, how they went on about Formula 1 being won by the BBC? The question that they did not ask was how much the licence payer would have to pay for something that could and should be provided on commercial television, with the licence money being diverted to promoting real, competitive sports, rather than the wealthy industry that is Formula 1. Is it not time that BBC news editors were brought to book? They should be probing BBC management rather than crawling to it.

Ms Harman: I will raise the points that my hon. Friend makes with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. I am sure that the top brass will have heard those comments loud and clear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Perhaps I should observe that hon. Members should make some effort to relate their question to next week's business.

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): Local shops and businesses produce a huge amount of waste that usually does not get recycled. Local councils, including Haringey, are not taking up that issue. The Government have not considered it since 2003, and it might be useful if the House had a debate about how we support local councillors in addressing the huge swathe of business recycling that is not being done.

Ms Harman: Many local councils, and certainly Labour councils, have been working very hard, with the support of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, to increase recycling rates, but I will raise the points that the hon. Lady makes with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I welcome the Prime Minister's statement about Tibet yesterday, and I am especially pleased that he will meet the Dalai Lama when he comes to the UK in May. I had the honour of meeting the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala towards the end of last year, and I am sure that we all admire the peaceful lead that he provides in this difficult situation. I echo calls for a debate, but will my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the House have any role in helping to arrange for the Dalai Lama to address both Houses of Parliament when he comes to this country?

Ms Harman: I will look into the point that my hon. Friend makes, because I am sure that it will be of interest to many hon. Members. If there is any outcome, I will write to her and place a copy in the Library so that all hon. Members can see what the arrangements are.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware of the grave concern across the House about the expansion of Heathrow and the third runway. It certainly has great implications, both good and bad, for my constituents. An interesting independent report, which was published this week, questions the economic assumptions made by the Department for Transport, and environmental groups have also expressed grave concerns about the detailed evidence that the Government are using. I raised this issue with the Leader of the House about three weeks ago, when she said that there had been a large number of responses to the consultation. Can she give us an assurance today that there will be a debate in Government time about this important issue?

Ms Harman: I cannot make an announcement at this point about how the response to the consultation will be dealt with, but as I said there have been a very large number of responses to this consultation, and they are being carefully reviewed by Departments.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may have seen the report prepared for the TUC by tax expert Richard Murphy, setting out the case that £33 billion is lost through tax fiddles. She may also have seen a report by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, showing that VAT losses from fraud are £14 billion and that losses from tobacco smuggling alone are £3.5 billion. Could we have a full debate on all the losses to the Treasury and how the public purse is being ripped off, so that we can address ways to counter that?

Ms Harman: I know that this issue was raised in the Budget debate earlier this week. The Treasury is very concerned to make sure that taxes are fairly applied and that those people who are in a good position to pay them do not avoid doing so.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): May we please have an early debate in Government time on night flights into and out of East Midlands airport in Leicestershire? Last year, there were 20,000 night flights, between the hours of 11 pm and 7 am, and that figure will increase to 27,000 by 2016. I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) not to hold his breath, because there has been a marked lack of interest from the Government and the Department for Transport in that issue, despite the fact that there has been huge public disquiet about the activities of East Midlands airport and the disturbance and environmental damage caused by night flights there.

Ms Harman: There is certainly no lack of interest in the Department for Transport in the question of noise from airports. If the hon. Gentleman requires further responses from the Minister concerned and the opportunity to debate further, he can apply for an Adjournment debate on the subject.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Next week is the last week in the Government's financial year, and it looks as if the York Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust will end the year by clearing its deficit and the North Yorkshire and York primary care trust will have reduced its deficit and achieved a recurrent balance. However, I remain concerned that the financial pressures in the NHS mean that some treatments will be less available to NHS patients in York and North Yorkshire than in other parts of Yorkshire and the Humber. May we have a debate at the end of the financial year to consider the financing of the NHS in Yorkshire?

Ms Harman: Perhaps I could suggest to my hon. Friend that he too apply for an Adjournment debate. He will be well aware, as will the whole House, that we have more than doubled the investment in the national health service. We want to ensure that not only are the finances well run but services are continuously improved for people, wherever they live.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): May we have a debate on tourism, given that this is Easter weekend, when roads are clogged and people are going on their holidays? There is an enormous differential in funding between Scotland, England and Wales for tourism, but there is also a problem with funding all the way up. Every level of local authority except parish councils has funding for tourism. If we want to encourage more tourists—we have the Olympics coming in a few years' time—we should discuss the best way to provide what people want, which is an experience of Britain. We need to provide that in a proper and sensible manner.

Ms Harman: I welcome the fact that the hon. Gentleman is focusing on the tourist industry in this country and, in particular, his welcome for the increased investment that the Government have put into the tourist industry and our focus on seaside towns. I will raise the points that he has made with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that today is the fifth anniversary of the commencement of the invasion of Iraq, and that this year it will be seven years since the war started in Afghanistan. I appreciate that we will have a debate next week on the inquiry into the events leading up to the war in Iraq, but will the Leader of the House make Government time available for a serious debate on our foreign policy objectives as a whole, including the war in Afghanistan, given that the Ministry of Defence predict that we will be there for another 30 years? Have we not taken a wrong turn with both those conflicts, and should we not be looking for a more peaceful, just world in the future, instead of one of eternal wars led by Bush?

Ms Harman: I point out to my hon. Friend that there will be a debate on Tuesday 25 March in Westminster Hall on our mission in Helmand province. Perhaps that might provide an opportunity to develop his points further.

Mr. Adam Holloway (Gravesham) (Con): May we have a debate on policing? The great improvements in police performance in Gravesham are largely due to the outstanding leadership of the area command team, but the bar for serious crime and antisocial behaviour is rising. For example, police are often unavailable to deal with shoplifting incidents.

Ms Harman: I shall take on board the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that we should make policing the subject of a topical debate, but he will know that police numbers have been increased, in Gravesham and elsewhere. Local government and the police have been focusing on antisocial behaviour, which is something that all local authorities and agencies are working together to tackle. However, I shall bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government.

BILL PRESENTED

IRAQ WAR INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Davey, supported by Mr. Nick Clegg, Nick Harvey, Willie Rennie, Sir Robert Smith, Mr. Don Foster, Paul Holmes, Mr. Paul Keetch, Mr. Michael Moore, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. Alan Reid and Sir Menzies Campbell, presented a Bill to make provision for the establishment of an inquiry into the war on Iraq; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 9 May, and to be printed [Bill 91].

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Act:

Appropriation Act 2008.

The United Kingdom and the Commonwealth

12.20pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Meg Munn): I beg to move,

That this House has considered the matter of the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth.

I am delighted to open this debate on the UK and the Commonwealth. I intend to set out the continuing importance of the Commonwealth to this Government and this country.

The House will know that last week was Commonwealth week. I want to thank the members and staff of the UK branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association for their work and for hosting the 57th Westminster seminar. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary recently reaffirmed the Government's commitment to the Commonwealth. Indeed, this month the Prime Minister highlighted the Commonwealth's importance to a meeting of all the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's heads of mission.

The Commonwealth is an extraordinary global network of countries big and small, rich and poor, and it represents more than a quarter of the world's population. If it works together, the network has the potential to shape a better world for us all.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): This House of Commons was bombed in 1941 and rebuilt after the war. The Dispatch Box on which the Minister is leaning was a gift from New Zealand, the Table in front of which she is standing was a gift from Canada, and the Chair in which Mr. Deputy Speaker is sitting was a gift from Australia. Given that the Commonwealth has played such a central part in Britain's heritage, why are the Government advancing proposals to get rid of the ancestry visa that is so important to people in New Zealand, South Africa, Australia, Canada and elsewhere around the world?

Meg Munn: First, I salute the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the Chamber. That he has learned all that in his relatively short time in the House is a credit to him. The Government's proposals in connection with visas are exactly that—proposals. I understand that the consultation closed on 10 March, and that representations were received from Commonwealth countries. Representations were also made to me, and they have been passed on to the Border and Immigration Agency.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Will the Minister give way?

Meg Munn: I shall make a little progress, but I assure the House that hon. Members will have plenty of opportunity to contribute to the debate.

The UK is by far the largest contributor to the Commonwealth secretariat budget, and we are proud to remain so. In addition, we spend seven times that amount supporting other Commonwealth programmes on development, youth and education. I think that hon. Members on all sides of the House are looking forward to hosting the Commonwealth games in Glasgow in 2014.

Don McKinnon steps down in the next two weeks as Commonwealth secretary-general after eight years in the job, and I want to record the Government's gratitude for his deft stewardship of the Commonwealth secretariat. He has modernised its working practices, developed links with other international organisations and dealt with some very tricky political situations, not the least of which is that in Zimbabwe. We look forward to welcoming Kamalesh Sharma as his successor.

One of the Commonwealth's great advantages is that it is able to cut across traditional alliances and regional blocs. We should like to see it develop a more active role in identifying and helping to defuse potential conflict situations. It can also be a very positive force on important world issues, such as tackling radicalisation and climate change and advancing human rights and good governance.

Last year, when I was Minister for Women and Equality, I had the honour to represent the UK at the meeting of Commonwealth women's affairs ministers. The meeting looked in detail at issues of gender equality and provided an opportunity for countries with shared values to learn from each other's experiences and to support each other's development.

It struck me at the time that it is not necessarily the richer countries in the Commonwealth that are in the forefront on gender equality. For example, many of the newer democracies have much better records on women's representation. As I look across at the Opposition Benches I am sorry to say that, with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson), only men are present for this debate.

The Commonwealth plays a vital role in giving small and poorer states a voice on the world stage. The Commonwealth-sponsored Office of Small States in New York, to which the UK is a major contributor, is a fine example of that. It gives a number of very small countries a presence next to the UN headquarters that they would otherwise not be able to afford.

Our historic links to many of the smaller nations remain important and are reinforced by our membership of the Commonwealth. As the Minister with responsibility for South East Asia, the Pacific and the Caribbean, I know how much those countries value that relationship.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): Given the region for which she has responsibility, will the Minister tell the House what the Commonwealth secretariat and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are doing to address the deteriorating situation in the Maldives? Democracy there is fragile, to say the least, and campaigning for the elections to be held later this year is not allowed to be based on either the Copenhagen or the Commonwealth-Harare criteria. Will the Minister ensure that our mission in Sri Lanka has a more impressive presence in the Maldives than it does at the moment?

Meg Munn: The Maldives are the responsibility of Lord Malloch-Brown, but he has discussed the matters that my hon. Friend raises with that country's president. The Commonwealth has offered technical assistance to help to bring all sides together so that the reforms are kept on track. My hon. Friend is right to raise those concerns, and I shall ask my noble Friend to give him further information.

Simon Hughes: The Minister will know how much I welcome this debate, which I hope will become a regular annual event. She identified how the Government support activities such as those undertaken by the Commonwealth secretariat, but does she agree that the Foreign Office's decision to withdraw money for Commonwealth scholarships has been sorely felt? That budget has been cut by £10 million, and many scholarships are now unavailable. Will she go back and discuss that cut with the Foreign Office to see whether the programme can be restored?

Meg Munn: I shall respond to the hon. Gentleman, who, if he is unhappy with my answer, can return to the question later.

We have reviewed our funding for scholarships and fellowships to ensure that it is in line with overall foreign policy goals. We are proposing a smaller and better organised programme that will focus on those people from a wide range of backgrounds who will be the leaders of tomorrow. The Commonwealth scholarships and fellowships plan has been used to fund awards for the eight most developed Commonwealth countries—Australia, the Bahamas, Brunei, Canada, Cyprus, Malta, New Zealand and Singapore—but they are not the countries that need the money the most.

Meanwhile, the Department for International Development is increasing its combined contribution to that fund and to the Commonwealth shared scholarship scheme by £1 million, which means that its total contribution for 2008-09 will be £15.93 million. The money will go directly to fund scholarships for developing countries—that is, those countries that will really benefit.

I want to say a brief word about the candidates from the eight countries that we were funding previously. Candidates from Cyprus and Malta come under the European Union's Erasmus programme, but candidates from the other six nations are eligible to apply to the Chevening scholarship scheme. Several are also eligible for Chevening central partnership scheme scholarships, co-sponsored by an outside organisation and a UK university. I hope that gives the hon. Gentleman some reassurance that there will be continuing support for countries where students can least afford to study in the UK.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was delighted to meet Caribbean Heads of Government at Kampala in November, where they held positive discussions on trade, among other issues. Meanwhile, we look forward to hosting the UK-Caribbean ministerial forum in London in July. It is a key event for the UK-Caribbean relationship. The agenda will include security, climate change and economic development in the Caribbean.

The Commonwealth is unique among international organisations in having the Commonwealth ministerial action group, of which we are a member. The group has the power to suspend members who have breached the Harare principles of democracy and good governance that guide all member states. We are hopeful that in future the group will do more as an early warning mechanism, providing peer pressure and mediation support in conflict situations.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): The Minister has just referred to good governance, and earlier she talked about the UK's powerful influence in the Commonwealth, so why is the UK not doing more to put pressure on South Africa to deal with the terrible situation in Zimbabwe?

Meg Munn: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue, and I am sure other Members will want to talk in more detail about Zimbabwe during the debate. We talk regularly to South Africa about the issue. South Africa is experiencing directly the problems arising from the situation in Zimbabwe. Millions of Zimbabweans are coming across the border to South Africa and they have to be supported there. South Africa is taking part in the process to try to resolve things in the region. I freely admit that there has not been as much progress as we want, but we talk to South Africa; it is not a failure of our Government.

Last November, the Commonwealth ministerial action group responded to the state of emergency in Pakistan by setting five conditions to be met within a given timetable. When the conditions were not met, it suspended Pakistan from the councils of the Commonwealth. I think that was helpful in Pakistan. The attempt by violent extremists to derail the democratic process was faced down by the Pakistani people. They showed courage, and in doing so have given Pakistan the chance to build a stable, secure and prosperous future. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said that Pakistan should return to the fold of the Commonwealth and I hope we can see that process through in the coming weeks.

In November, the Commonwealth Heads of Government in Kampala acknowledged that climate change is rapidly becoming a defining global issue of our times and a natural focus for the organisation. It was appropriate that the theme of this year's Commonwealth day was "The Environment—Our Future". The states comprising the Commonwealth are enormously significant, bringing together a critical cross-section of countries—major greenhouse gas emitters, emerging economies, energy producers and poor and vulnerable states. Climate change affects the member states differently. Some perched only just above sea level, such as the Maldives, which my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) has already mentioned, find that their very existence is at stake. Others, including many African states, face higher energy and transport bills, together with the loss of agricultural production measures that will threaten their economic future if they remain unaddressed. In the Pacific island countries even minimal sea-level rises could cause conditions that are likely to force people from their land and create a generation of economic migrants on Australia's doorstep.

Last October, I took part in the Pacific island forum in Tonga. Like so many Commonwealth member states, the people of Tonga and those of neighbouring islands are directly on the front line of climate change. As they live on low-lying islands their whole way of life is threatened, and some fear they may have to abandon their homes if sea levels rise or catastrophic weather events become more frequent.

As the Lake Victoria declaration recognises, climate change threatens the vital national interests of all Commonwealth countries. We all face the same dilemma: how to grow and develop our economies while not destabilising the climate and thereby wrecking the foundations needed for our growth, stability and development. The Commonwealth Heads of Government at Kampala committed to helping each other, especially the poorest and most vulnerable, to carry out an assessment of the impact of climate change on their economies and development. The assessment is to include how we integrate climate resilience, as well as the transition to low carbon, in our development plans.

The Government believe that the Commonwealth's very diversity has a role to play in combating radicalisation. The UK supports, and helped to fund, the Amartya Sen report "Civil Paths to Peace". We think that the countries of the Commonwealth can take forward ideas from the report and continue and expand work in communities to prevent radicalisation from taking hold.

The secretary-general was asked to form a small group of Commonwealth Heads of Government to discuss international institutional reform and make recommendations before the next Commonwealth Heads of Government in 2009. The UK was one of the member states that encouraged that initiative. Effective international institutions are vital in establishing the rules, predictability and norms that underpin multilateralism. The Commonwealth, representing as it does such a diversity of global interests, is a natural forum in which to forge new thinking about how to adapt governance and its functioning to new times.

We believe that the Commonwealth can go from strength to strength. The interest from prospective new members is an indication of the continuing dynamism of the institution, and the UK welcomes the membership report that was adopted at Kampala. Rwanda in particular is keen to join, and discussions about membership have already begun with the Commonwealth secretariat. We welcome the prospect of Rwanda joining.

The Commonwealth matters greatly to Britain. Last November, when the next secretary-general, Kamalesh Sharma, accepted his appointment, he described the Commonwealth as a "great global good". That is certainly the view of the Government.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): What a pleasure it is to be opposite the Minister again. These little meetings across the Dispatch Box on Thursday afternoons make a middle-aged Conservative MP's life a little lighter. I am sure that is also true for my male colleagues on the Benches behind me—they may lack femininity, but I suspect that they make up for it with robust style.

As the Minister said in her introductory remarks, Commonwealth day was last week, on 10 March. The Commonwealth is a unique body; it is a voluntary association of states that does not rely on geographical links, treaties or constitutions to hold it together. Its 53 member states—African, Asian, Pacific, European, Caribbean and North American—vary in geography from island to landlocked, and in size from India, with more than 1 billion people, to Tuvalu with just over 11,000. As the Minister has said, one of the Commonwealth's great strengths is that it gives a voice to smaller countries that often are not heard or that are unable fully to bring their voices to bear in various international forums.

The Commonwealth is not just governmental. It is underpinned by a myriad weave of informal and non-governmental links that can often do much more than official hierarchies and intergovernmental structures. In the words of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), it is a "kaleidoscopic institution". With its unique global, multi-ethnic, multicultural, multi-religious nature, and its emphasis on consensus and multilateralism, it has a key role to play in fostering peace and good relations over a large part of the globe.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I am sure that my hon. Friend, like me, listened with great interest to the Minister's comments—all 16 minutes of them—so he will probably share my surprise that not once did she mention the contribution being made by Commonwealth citizens in Iraq and Afghanistan. I hope that he will join me in commending the fine work of those soldiers. He may also share my surprise that 635 Commonwealth citizens were serving in the British Army in 1998, but that today the number is 7,615. Although those soldiers are excellent, does he agree that it is surprising that the British Army has failed so badly in recruiting UK nationals to serve in our Army?

Mr. Simpson: Having served in the senior service, my hon. Friend has much experience of such matters, and he makes a good point. As the Minister is from the Foreign Office, she may not have believed that the point is relevant, but I think it important and will touch on it later in my remarks.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is significant virtue in incorporating members of the Commonwealth in the British Army? It gives Commonwealth members valuable experience that they may not have had, as they may have small armies in-country. Also, we want to learn more about the challenges that individuals face in Commonwealth countries, and that is a very good means of doing so.

Mr. Simpson: There are two aspects to consider. The recruitment of Commonwealth citizens to the British armed forces is a necessity, and there is no doubt about that. At the moment, we cannot recruit into the British armed forces, and particularly into the Army, enough people to meet our combat requirements. I agree that Commonwealth men and women undoubtedly make a contribution to the British armed forces and take that contribution back to their country. When I was an instructor at Sandhurst, I experienced the contribution that Commonwealth personnel made there and at our other training establishments. That is not to resile from the fact that we face a manpower problem, to put it crudely.

The Commonwealth covers a quarter of the habitable surface of the Earth and accounts for 30 per cent. of its population. The population of the enlarged EU is about 497 million; the population of the Commonwealth is 2 billion. Members of the Commonwealth do not just speak the same language—English—but share a language of institutions, Parliaments, and legal and educational systems, a point made forcibly by the last Commonwealth secretary-general. As the Minister has said, the Commonwealth is still expanding and developing. There have been five new members since 1990, and others want to join, including Yemen, Algeria and Rwanda.

When looking back over the history of the Commonwealth, I came across two or three small historical facts, and being an old historian—or at least a long-in-the-tooth historian—I thought that I would lay them before the House. First, Ireland was, of course, a member of the Commonwealth until it became a republic in 1949. Although I can understand the sensitivities of the Irish as regards Great Britain, the monarchy and so on, it is open to the people and Government of Ireland to become members of the Commonwealth. Many hon. Members would regard such an application, if Ireland desired to make one, with a great deal of warmth. The Republic of Ireland would contribute massively to the Commonwealth.

Andrew Mackinlay: I hope to catch the Speaker's eye later and develop that argument. The tragedy is that the British Government, from pride or other considerations, will not take the initiative to invite Ireland to join. As it is a shared Commonwealth, Britain could act with the big players—the Prime Ministers of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and so on—and take the initiative on the sensitive but sensible idea of welcoming Ireland back into the Commonwealth.

Mr. Simpson: It is obviously a two-way process, and I am sensitive to Irish public opinion, but I am sure that the Minister will take that point on board. Given what my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) and the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) have said, we should recognise the tens of thousands of Irish citizens who serve in the British armed forces, and we should recognise that Irish citizens made an important contribution in both world wars to defending democracy and developing the Commonwealth.

The second example that I want to raise is the United States of America. It obtained its independence in 1776, but parts of what is now the USA were effectively within the British empire until about 1846. By every criterion, the United States of America could become a member of the Commonwealth. If it did, it would certainly contribute something, and joining would be useful to it in its attempts to view the world on a multinational basis, as members of the Commonwealth come from the four corners of the world.

If the House will indulge me, I will set out another little-known historical fact. If the United States of America had not been established and the colonies had not sought to secede, or if the British generals had been more competent and the French had not stabbed us in the back—[Interruption.] I see that the Whip, the hon. Member for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy), is nodding his head in agreement. He comes from the educated side of the Whips Office—I know that he can read and write. If the United States of America had not obtained its independence, slavery would have been abolished long before the civil war and much loss of life would have been prevented.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): We should be aware that the American ambassador to NATO recently invoked Washington and Lafayette as the basis for a potential Franco-American relationship. In that regard, is it really possible to imagine a future President Clinton, Obama or McCain bending the knee to a British Head of State? I think not.

Mr. Simpson: There are other republics in the Commonwealth, and the issue does not pose a problem for them. I thought for one moment that my hon. Friend, who normally responds to any mention of France or the EU, was going to mention the French. Another interesting point about membership of the Commonwealth is that in 1940, Winston Churchill, then the newly appointed Prime Minister, suggested fusion with the French empire as a way of keeping the French in the war. The French decided not to go down that path. In 1955-56, the French considered becoming members of the Commonwealth, so there is an interesting link there. The Commonwealth is a dynamic organisation. It is not particularly restricted, and it is in many respects unique.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): The United Kingdom allows Commonwealth citizens to vote in UK parliamentary elections. I think that that is anomalous; I would like to see UK citizens voting in UK elections. As a master of little-known facts, does the hon. Gentleman know whether any other Commonwealth countries give the franchise to Commonwealth citizens?

Simon Hughes: Yes, quite a few.

Mr. Simpson: Yes. I cannot list them, but there are a number of them. The Commonwealth is partly a uniquely English institution—

Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw) (Lab): British.

Mr. Simpson: When I was a Whip, Whips kept quiet, but now all they want to do is talk—I have been told that it is called "doing an Ed Balls". I take the point made in the sedentary intervention—of course I mean British. I apologise for offending the sensitivity of the Scottish Whip.

Simon Hughes: On the intervention by the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), I understand, from briefings that we have been given, that Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, St. Christopher and Nevis, Guyana, Dominica, Antigua and Barbuda, New Zealand, Malawi and Namibia allow citizens of other Commonwealth countries to vote in their elections, so about a fifth of Commonwealth countries have a reciprocal arrangement.

Mr. Simpson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those details. The Commonwealth is a great asset to the United Kingdom. All the member states except Mozambique have experienced direct or indirect British rule, or have been linked administratively to another Commonwealth country. The Commonwealth is one of Britain's three key relationships or circles of influence—Europe, the transatlantic relationship and the Commonwealth. My right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) said at the Conservative party conference in 2006:

> "Our country enjoys a unique position—the place where America, Europe and the Commonwealth meet."

More than 7,000 individuals from Commonwealth nations have served in the armed forces since 2007, a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury.

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): Given my hon. Friend's comments about Britain's unique position in the Commonwealth, does he share my concern that there is a danger that Britain is taking its position in the Commonwealth for granted, and does he agree that we must forever be vigilant to ensure that we continue to cultivate our relationships with other Commonwealth countries? If we do not do so, countries such as Canada and Australia will try to take that pivotal role away from us.

Mr. Simpson: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is correct. Successive British Governments have been very sensitive to the fact that although it was originally the British Commonwealth, it is now the Commonwealth. Her Majesty the Queen is head of the Commonwealth and is in a unique position. She is, in her own way, one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the Commonwealth. If one talks to Commonwealth Heads of State now, they find it awe-inspiring that Her Majesty will refer to leaders of their country whom she met 40 or 50 years ago. She is an historical continuity.

The important factor, as far as the Commonwealth is concerned, is that we have a leading role but are not necessarily the formal leader. Indeed, that kind of role is a great strength to us. Any attempts by Britain to try to replicate the role that we had 50 years ago would be disadvantageous.

Mr. Vara: Perhaps I can clarify my earlier remark. Given Her Majesty's role at the moment, there is much talk among some of the other countries—I have mentioned Australia and Canada—to the effect that when, in due course, Prince Charles becomes King of England, they will not accept a British Head of State as head of the Commonwealth. They are thinking about manoeuvring in their own people on a rotating basis, which is certainly an argument. My comments are particularly directed towards the future, and we should not take our current relationship for granted.

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend may be right, but I suspect that the matter is rather like reforming the House of Lords: ultimately, failure to agree means that the status quo continues almost indefinitely.

We recognise that the UK's important relationships involve more than NATO, the EU and our transatlantic partners. The Commonwealth adds something specific for Britain and for our foreign policy and trade. The African members of the Commonwealth are also members of the African Union. The south-east Asian Commonwealth members are also members of the Association of South East Asian Nations. Cameroon, Vanuatu, St. Lucia and Canada are all members of La Francophonie as well as Commonwealth members. Finally, Canada, like the UK, is a member of the Commonwealth, the G8 and NATO, to name but a few of our shared associations.

We also recognise that the UK has an historical predicament relating to the Commonwealth, which was accurately and colourfully summed up by the former secretary-general of the Commonwealth, who said that if Britain

"uses us too much, it reinforces the very wrong assumption that it is still the British Commonwealth. If it holds back, it is accused of ignoring this invaluable asset which others have tried to copy, and which so many others would give their eye teeth to have in their foreign policy armoury."

He also recalled reminding a British official at a Commonwealth meeting that

"at one or more times in their history 52 Commonwealth countries have had their teeth knocked out or their shins kicked by a British Government, and they don't forget."

A strangely unique relationship, with good and bad sides, came out of our empire.

What do the Conservatives want the Government to do in the future as far as the Commonwealth is concerned? First, despite what the Minister said, we need to reappraise our future role in and attitude towards the Commonwealth. In June 2007, the former secretary-general of the Commonwealth said:

"In the course of my political years...I have dealt with Foreign Secretaries Hurd, Rifkind, Cook, Straw and Beckett. Naturally, they had nothing but the UK's interests at heart. Within that, they have always been warm towards the Commonwealth, but that warmth hasn't always permeated down to all officials."

There was no mention of the Commonwealth in the Foreign Secretary's announcement of a new strategic framework for the Foreign Office, which was made on 23 January 2008. Perhaps the Minister will explain that oversight.

Will the Minister assure the House that when a new White Paper outlining the Foreign Secretary's new strategic provision for the Foreign Office is finally published, it will include the Commonwealth and go into some detail rather than just including an honourable mention? Does she agree that the 60th anniversary in 2009 of the adoption of the London agreement of 1949, which founded the modern Commonwealth, is an important time to take stock and consider our relationships for the future?

The Foreign Secretary announced on 13 March that the Foreign Office is to stop funding Commonwealth scholarships, as a number of hon. Members have pointed out. In her speech, the Minister outlined the alternatives. However, although I recognise that the Foreign Office budget is under enormous pressure, it sends the wrong signal for the Foreign Secretary to say that that funding, which is in the small change category of the budget, must be reallocated towards the important subject of climate change and global warming. That sends entirely the wrong signal for the sake of a relatively small sum of money. I recognise the fact that the Foreign Office, working with other bodies, has managed to come up with the money, but it would perhaps have been better if the Foreign Secretary, who is interested in education and has a good track record on that subject, had been able to lobby the Prime Minister, who places enormous stress on education, about the importance of the issue.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Is there another priority for the Government on the Commonwealth? The Minister made the point that the Government are trying to explore ways to make the Commonwealth more of a force for good around the world, but she did not outline the measures that have been taken or what has been asked of our Commonwealth partners. Will my hon. Friend address that issue and the question whether we can do more as a country to encourage the Commonwealth to be a force for good across the world? Perhaps it could use its influence, or perhaps it could physically put together a force for good, to make a real difference in many humanitarian and economic trouble spots.

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend has made a good point. Of course, there is the danger that if Britain were seen to lead on that proposal, a number of members of the Commonwealth would resile from it. It might mean that members of the Commonwealth would think about the operational objectives and size of and support given to the secretary-general of the Commonwealth and the Commonwealth secretariat. In the past, the post was almost at the level of a golf club secretary rather than an important chief executive. The new Commonwealth secretary-general, particularly as he comes from India, is likely to make a difference. Those are the things that we should be teasing out, and hon. Members may well have other ideas on the subject.

One important aspect that the Minister mentioned is the role of this House. The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association has made an important impact on many countries in terms of parliamentary democracy. I know that some of the more cynical Members of the House see the CPA as the sun and surf exchange, and that has undoubtedly gone on. However, a number of hon. Members, including me, have been involved in parliamentary workshops of one kind or another. We should pay tribute to the work of many colleagues and of our CPA secretariat, which has played an important role. It is not for me to suggest how the new secretary-general should act, but that is the sort of thing that he and his colleagues should consider. My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) has made an important point.

A number of hon. Members have discussed the more difficult relationships within the Commonwealth. In particular, one thinks of the continuing problems in Kenya, where, fortunately, it looks as though a compromise deal has been made. The Commonwealth undoubtedly played an important role behind the scenes, which involved not only our Government but many neighbouring Commonwealth Governments. Sadly, the Commonwealth has not had such an impact and influence on Zimbabwe. I understand the major problems faced by the Government of South Africa, and Members have mentioned the impact of refugees and the fact that President Mugabe is still seen as an icon in the struggle against colonialism. Nevertheless, some Commonwealth countries have failed to take full-frontal measures to persuade President Mugabe that he is isolated and that what is happening in Zimbabwe is a tragedy not only for the country but for the whole of southern Africa. Of course, we fully support the Government in their efforts to maintain the bar of high standards in democracy and other aspirations. Many Commonwealth countries have effectively been suspended before, in some cases, being readmitted. Pakistan is an obvious example.

My party and I are warm and firm supporters of the Commonwealth, which is a dynamic organisation. It enables countries from all round the world to come together and discuss many things, and it also means that Britain still has a way to influence events outside the international forums of which we are a part. The Commonwealth is an international asset, and we should celebrate it and look forward to its 60th anniversary in a year's time.

1.2 pm

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I congratulate the Government on deciding to have a full day's debate in Government time on the Commonwealth. I congratulate the Minister on making a fine speech, and the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on making a thoughtful and fine speech. I also congratulate the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), who lobbied for a debate such as this to take place.

As other Members have said, the Commonwealth is the only international forum, apart from the United Nations, that has member states in every continent of the world—rich states, poor states, G7 and OECD members, and many countries that, sadly, are still least-developed countries. It has small island states such as the Maldives and some of the Pacific islands—the Minister referred to them—that are threatened with extinction as a result of rising sea levels. It has high mountain states such as Canada, Pakistan and India, and it has states in the tropics and the Arctic. Because of its geographical and economic diversity, the Commonwealth is uniquely well placed to understand and deal with problems associated with global warming and the global economy.

Many characteristics within the Commonwealth draw this diverse family of nations together. We have to a considerable extent a shared language and a shared education system. Many millions of students in other Commonwealth countries take A-levels and GCSEs; some still take O-levels, which I know will be seen as a positive thing by some educational traditionalists in this Chamber. Many Commonwealth universities started off as colleges whose degrees were validated by British universities. The university of Durham played a particular part in this respect. Many universities in this country still maintain and are still developing close academic links with universities in other Commonwealth countries.

We have to some extent a shared legal system. Many Commonwealth countries base their legal system on the principle of common law. I am always surprised when I go abroad to see in Ministers' or Attorney-Generals' offices copies of British law reports. They have them because questions determined in the British courts are used as legal precedents in their own countries.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): It is interesting that although in many ways, our legal and education systems are shared across the rest of the Commonwealth, we do not necessarily have that arrangement within the United Kingdom. Scottish law is quite different from English law in a variety of areas, and A-levels and GCSEs tend to be replaced by standard grades and highers in the Scottish system.

Hugh Bayley: With respect, we do have a shared system. Nobody is saying that Canadian law, Kittician law or Jamaican law are the same as British law—of course they are not. They are probably more different from British law than English law is from Scottish law. Indeed, there may well be more differences between their education systems and ours than there is between the English and Scottish systems. I stand corrected, but there are similar characteristics in the education systems north and south of the border, just as there are similarities with other Commonwealth countries.

We share to a considerable extent our culture and history. Kipling, Doris Lessing and Ben Okri are all great authors who are read and admired throughout the Commonwealth. We also share to a considerable extent links of kith and kin. Using that phrase often brings to mind the courage and heroism of sons and daughters—sons particularly—of British émigrés to Australia, New Zealand and Canada, who in two world wars rallied to the flag and came to fight to maintain the freedom of this country. We must remember, too, that many Indian and West Indian citizens—West Indian subjects—and Africans also came and fought for Britain during the two world wars.

Nowadays, we mean something very different by kith and kin. There are many Indians and Africans living in this country who came from other Commonwealth countries, and their links of family and history are just as strong and important to the Commonwealth as the links of those who are the sons and daughters of émigrés from this country. Of course, people also inter-marry. I am married to a woman who was born in a Commonwealth country—in the Nevis part of St. Kitts and Nevis. Of course, this is not uncommon and it is part of the cement that binds the Commonwealth.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): I accept that there are similarities across the Commonwealth, but does the hon. Gentleman not accept that there are distinct differences in the political anthropology of the various countries? In some countries, the main pattern of political loyalty is through the tribal structure, rather than through a class-based or devolved class-based structure. Perhaps studying those variations within the Commonwealth could inform the Government on how better to handle situations in, say, Iraq or Afghanistan, which also have a tribal—or biraderi—political structure, rather than a class-based one.

Hugh Bayley: It is important to realise that tribal—certainly ethnic and religious—differences have been a factor that has marked, and still does to some extent, politics within the United Kingdom. As the chair of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association's UK branch, I should point out that we have on a number of occasions brought delegates from other Commonwealth countries to Northern Ireland to talk to politicians and others there about how one can use politics constructively to create a bridge between those from different ethnic or religious backgrounds. So I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the Commonwealth is highly diverse. How could it be anything else, being an association that encompasses more than a quarter of the world's population? However, we have things to learn from each other, which is one of the values of a commonwealth.

Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman will know as well as anybody, given his family arrangements, that many Commonwealth citizens who are now part of the community in the UK have retained their Commonwealth citizenship. The debate about the rights of people to vote or to become British, for example, should take into account generations of people who have come and settled in the UK and contributed here, but who still technically may not be British citizens because they have kept their link with another part of the Commonwealth in another part of the world.

Hugh Bayley: That is one of the issues that we must grapple with. When we in this place determine our immigration and nationality rules, it is important that we take account of the links that the United Kingdom has with other Commonwealth countries. However, we need to take account of those links with all Commonwealth countries, and not pick and choose.

I relate that comment to what I said earlier about kith and kin. That is not just about links between white people within the Commonwealth. It is about family links between people from a wide range of cultures, nationalities and ethnic backgrounds. That is one of the features that makes the Commonwealth so special and gives it a vitality and relevance to the present, which it would not have if it was simply a reflection of a colonial past more than 50 years ago.

At the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association seminars that we hold in London, one sees that shared heritage bubbling to the surface. One sees people wishing to learn from each other. Delegates from Commonwealth countries that have suffered from ethnic or tribal conflict want to learn from us about how we dealt with difficulties in Northern Ireland, and from South Africa about how people from different races have been reconciled in the new multi-ethnic South Africa.

The one thing that unites Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegates more than anything else when they meet is a shared commitment to democracy. Countries cannot belong to the Commonwealth, unlike the United Nations, without a commitment to democracy and the rule of law. Pakistan was suspended from the Councils of the Commonwealth at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in November last year.

I must correct what the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said—Pakistan has not yet been readmitted to the Commonwealth, but it has held elections and it is well on the path to readmission. I look forward to the day when Pakistan is readmitted as a full participating member of the Commonwealth, as I look forward to the day when Fiji and Zimbabwe meet the conditions for full participation in the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth is a family of nations and we do not sever the links, even when we have differences that are so severe and significant that they lead to a country being suspended.

Zimbabwe still receives a great deal of aid from this country because there is a humanitarian need to support the Zimbabwean people. Indeed, as the state of Zimbabwe's economy has deteriorated, UK aid has increased. In 1997-98 we provided £13.7 million of aid to Zimbabwe. In 2006-07 we provided £33 million of aid. Zimbabwe needs help. A third of the population—about 4 million out of 12 million—receive food aid from the World Food Programme. Life expectancy for women in Zimbabwe has fallen to below 34 years. One child in five dies before the age of five. There are 1.8 million orphans or other vulnerable children.

But British aid and aid from other countries can make a difference. The Department for International Development has provided £35 million of aid to Zimbabwe since 2002 to respond to the catastrophe of HIV/AIDS, and will provide a further £47 million over the next three years. Zimbabwe is the first country in southern Africa to see a fall in the HIV prevalence rate: two years ago it stood at 20 per cent. and now it is down to 15.5 per cent.

The Commonwealth matters enormously to the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk made the point that there are more than 7,000 Commonwealth citizens in the UK's armed forces, and the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) observed that that number has increased sharply in the past six or seven years.

John Hemming: The number has increased from 360 almost twentyfold. Will the hon. Gentleman hazard a guess as to why? Do we have a crisis in the recruitment of British nationals, for instance?

Hugh Bayley: The subject has been addressed. There are difficulties, undoubtedly, in recruiting UK nationals to the armed forces, in part because of recent conflicts, and in part also because we have full employment, and it is always harder to recruit soldiers at a time of full employment. All of us in the Chamber would agree that the Commonwealth provides a real service to the UK because it enables us to recruit people whom we need in our armed forces.

Dr. Murrison: I agree. We owe a great debt of gratitude to Commonwealth citizens who serve in the armed forces. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we need to be a little bit careful? If there is a rich seam, so to speak, of potential recruits to the British Army, it is less imperative for the Government to make sure that the terms and conditions for indigenous recruits are good to the standard that will attract them into our armed forces?

Hugh Bayley: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise that as a potential problem. I would be shoulder to shoulder with him in making the case for the very best terms and conditions for all members of the armed forces, whether they are UK nationals or nationals of other Commonwealth countries—or, indeed, from Nepal. Without that commitment, we will not have the armed forces that we need, with the support and commitment from their members that are currently displayed. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we must not fall into the trap of creating cheaper armed forces staffed by foreigners. Despite the huge commitment that 7,250 Commonwealth citizens make to our armed forces, they are a relatively small minority out of, I think, a little below 200,000 members of the armed forces.

Mr. Keith Simpson: There are 100,000 service personnel in the British Army.

Hugh Bayley: So about 150,000 in the armed forces.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): We all agree that we want our armed forces to have the best possible terms and conditions, but nothing should take away from the bravery and commitment of the Commonwealth soldiers who serve in our armed forces. I remind the House of the most recent winner of the Victoria cross, the first person to win the Victoria cross in a very long time, for extraordinary gallantry, who was from Grenada in the Commonwealth Although we want good terms and conditions, soldiers from the Commonwealth have served and continue to serve with outstanding gallantry and to the highest standards in the world.

Hugh Bayley: I utterly agree. Private Beharry has given tremendous service to this country and acts as a role model for young people from all cultures and races in the UK. We are rightly proud of him and the contribution that he and other citizens from Commonwealth countries make to our armed forces.

One of the lessons that we should learn from Iraq and Afghanistan is that there are limits to what military power can achieve. The UK also needs to exercise soft power, influence within the world, and the Commonwealth provides enormous opportunities for the exercise of soft power. Before last years CHOGM in Kampala in November, the UK set out a number of objectives for the conference to win support from other Commonwealth countries for the UK's and the EU's position on climate change, to win support for the Prime Minister's call for action that he made in July 2007 for implementation of the millennium development goals, and for there to be pressure on President Musharraf of Pakistan to step down as head of the armed forces, to lift the state of emergency and to hold elections in Pakistan. When the Prime Minister made a statement to the House on 26 November on his return from Kampala, he was able to report that progress had been made on all those fronts. Of course, the progress in relation to Pakistan had been to suspend Pakistan from the Councils of the Commonwealth, but that does matter, especially in a club, society or association such as the Commonwealth. As a result of that we have seen President Musharraf stepping down as the head of the armed forces in Pakistan and elections taking place. I am sure that Pakistan will soon be readmitted to the Commonwealth.

One area where the Commonwealth is particularly important is in development assistance. The UK won support from other countries in the G7 and EU in 2005 for doubling aid to Africa, and in 2006-07 86 per cent. of all UK aid to sub-Saharan Africa went to Commonwealth countries—£2.5 billion out of a total of £2.9 billion—and 63 per cent. of all UK aid worldwide went to Commonwealth countries. That is logical and sensible. We are providing aid for countries where we are best able to help. I am pleased that during the last decade aid to the Commonwealth has increased greatly. In 1996-97, some £669 million of British taxpayers' money was used in aid in other Commonwealth countries and by last year that had risen to £3.083 billion, almost a fivefold increase in aid to the Commonwealth, and that money is well spent.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk made the point that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's budget is under pressure as a result of decisions taken in the comprehensive spending review, and the reduction in the budget for the Foreign Office took place, in part at least, to fund an increase in spending by the Department for International Development. I should like to see DFID respond to that by increasing its own policy commitment to and involvement with the Commonwealth. DFID has a small team of officials in charge of its Commonwealth policy, which needs to be expanded. It is based in East Kilbride but it needs to work with others in the Commonwealth secretariat, which is based in London, and to work more closely with Commonwealth high commissioners who are based in London and with us in Parliament. Some of those staff need to be moved to DFID's London headquarters.

In the past, DFID left politics to the Foreign Office and concentrated on the technical job of providing development aid and of education and health policy. It has developed a globally respected reputation for the quality of its development work, but development policy does not just take place in a vacuum. Development depends upon good governance, especially when aid is being provided in the form of budget support direct to a Government's Exchequer. The Commonwealth is a particularly important driver for good governance, and so should be seen as a key partner for DFID.

The DFID White Paper published at the end of 2006 set out three new priorities for the Department: improving the standard of governance in developing countries, and especially the capacity of Parliaments of developing countries to hold the Governments of those countries to account; to make progress on climate change; and to achieve reform of international institutions. The Commonwealth is in a uniquely well-placed position to help achieve British objectives on all three of those fronts. DFID therefore needs to invest more in its relations with the Commonwealth, and to put in as much effort on co-operation with the Commonwealth as it does with other international institutions, such as the World Bank or the EU.

Between 2001 and 2005, UK aid to Commonwealth countries increased by £1.3 billion, but using the leverage that we have over the EU, aid from the European community and other EU states to British Commonwealth countries increased over those years by £3.65 billion, more than twice as much as the British aid increased. We got something extra for Commonwealth countries because of our participation in the EU. DFID needs to invest in its relationship with the Commonwealth, just as much as it does with other international institutions.

I speak as the current chair of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association UK branch, which seeks to make its contribution to strengthening the Commonwealth and supporting Government initiatives in the Commonwealth. In 2005 when the UK Government had made Africa one of its two priorities for the Gleneagles G8 summit, the CPA UK branch held a conference in co-operation with the Inter-Parliamentary Union and others to bring together parliamentarians from G8, EU and Commonwealth countries to look at how we in our respective Parliaments would progress-chase our leaders on the commitments made at Gleneagles and within the EU.

In most years the CPA holds four seminars to work on similar themes. This year we will be holding five. One will be on governance and another on parliamentary practice and procedure, which the Minister mentioned. We have just held one seminar to drive forward policy in Commonwealth countries on climate change and one on how we can work more closely together to deal with the problem of international trade in illicit drugs, and later this year we will be holding a conference looking at what we can do together to improve development co-operation policy.

Dr. Murrison: I am interested to hear about the gatherings with which the hon. Gentleman is involved. When he has his symposium on climate change, will he be sure to invite the Commonwealth War Graves Commission, which I visited on Tuesday and which told me that one of its chief problems at the moment with the many sites that it looks after around the globe is the issue of climate change, which rather surprised me? I am sure that it would make a sound contribution to the gathering that he describes on climate change.

Hugh Bayley: The climate change conference took place just before the UN Bali conference on climate change at which its findings were presented, but I invite the hon. Gentleman to come with the Commonwealth War Graves Commission to talk to the CPA UK branch about climate change and other issues that it may wish to raise and with which it thinks we should be involved. We would be willing and happy to meet.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk—with his tongue in his cheek, I hope—said that in the past the UK branch of the CPA had a reputation for surf and sun. I assure him that that has changed; we are no longer an exchange club for Members of Parliament, but a serious player in Commonwealth policy and politics. I should pay tribute to Mr. Speaker and the Lord Speaker for agreeing that from April—the week after next—the House of Commons Commission and its Lords equivalent, rather than the Treasury, will fund the activities of the CPA UK branch. That is an important step forward in making our parliamentary body independent of the Executive, and it will enable us to deliver more for Members of both Houses of Parliament.

The CPA UK branch has taken a step forward in participating in an organisation called the Westminster Consortium, which brings together a range of bodies that provide advice, assistance, training and resources to Parliaments in Commonwealth countries, to help strengthen their capacity to hold their Executives to account. The other bodies include the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which I also chair, the National Audit Office, the Clerks Department's Overseas Office, and others.

Together those organisations have made a bid for money from DFID's global transparency fund to do work to strengthen the capacity of Parliaments abroad. The consortium has parliamentary functioning work in hand at the request of the Parliaments of Guyana, Uganda and Kenya. The Kenyan Deputy Speaker came across a couple of weeks ago, and the Kenyan Speaker will come to the UK next month to discuss what we can do to help the Parliament of Kenya deal with the problems that arose following the country's elections.

It seems clear that the fundamental problem in Kenya was that the elections were not run by an independent electoral commission. A day or two after the president of the electoral commission of Kenya had announced that President Kibaki had won the election, he said that he had done so under duress. That is hardly surprising, as a year or so before, the President had packed the commission with a partisan team of his own supporters. If the next Kenyan elections are to have credibility among the Kenyan citizenry and the international community, they will have to be run by an independent electoral commission.

The law on the commission needs to change, and the people with the responsibility to make law in Kenya, are, of course, those in its Parliament. It is a hung Parliament; no party has an overall majority and its members represent a wide range of different parties and different points of view. It is important that they should exercise their authority over the Executive and ensure that a newly formed electoral commission of Kenya has representation from the whole spectrum of political parties and, I would advise, from Kenyan civil society too—although that is their decision, of course, not mine.

In some developing countries, Parliaments are intimidated by powerful Presidents, and if we in the Commonwealth genuinely subscribe to the democratic principles that underlie our membership, it is important that we work with colleagues to ensure that Parliaments have the strength, capacity and confidence to challenge the Executives in their countries and hold them to account.

Many other Members want to speak and I have probably spoken for too long, but I should like to mention one other piece of work, in Sierra Leone. It was commissioned by DFID and implemented by the Westminster Foundation for Democracy. A few years ago, Sierra Leone was a country destroyed by conflict and violence. The United Kingdom—including, of course, its armed forces—played an important role in bringing that conflict to an end and developing the capacity of the civilian Government.

Before the elections in Sierra Leone last year, the Westminster Foundation for Democracy was asked by DFID to work with each of the political parties in the country to help them present their cases to the electorate in policy, rather than ethnic or tribal, terms. To begin with, we worked with all the parties; towards the end we spent more time working for the four largest parties. We helped them to use techniques common in this country. Pledge cards were produced so that politicians could explain in an emblematic, totemic form to their electorate what they would seek to do if elected. We persuaded the Sierra Leone Broadcasting Service to run an "Any Questions?" programme. In Africa, it is quite a unique idea that members of the public should be able to question members of or candidates for Parliament about what their policies would be and what they had done in the past. It was a tremendous success.

The training was done on a cross-party basis; trainers came from the Conservative, Liberal Democrat and Labour parties. We asked each opposition party to consider what it would do in its first few weeks of government if it was elected. Then we asked President Kabbah's ruling party what it would do if it was not elected and became the opposition party. What would its role be as the leading opposition party? In the elections, something happened which is unusual in Africa: there was a revolving door—the ruling party was voted out and another party was voted in. The country had been involved in the bloodiest conflict just a few years ago, but it did not go back to that. The door revolved—a new party went in and the old party came out and took up its role as an opposition. That shows the genuine things that can be done by parliamentary capacity building, and that is immensely easier to do in a Commonwealth country.

I said that I would sit down, and I will. The final thing that I want to say is this. Don McKinnon provided outstanding leadership as the secretary-general of the Commonwealth in the past eight years. I offer him my best wishes for whatever he does from now on and give my congratulations to Kamalesh Sharma, the new secretary-general. I wish him good luck in keeping the Commonwealth in good shape in the years ahead.

1.38 pm

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), who has done excellent and serious work as the chair of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. His speech was very well made. I hope that he did not mind my intervention too much; as the only Scot in the Chamber at the time, I felt a duty to make the point that I made.

I offer my apologies, as I will not be able to stay for the whole debate due to a commitment arranged some weeks ago. I intend to be back for the wind-ups. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on his tenacity over several weeks in lobbying to get this debate, and I congratulate the Government on agreeing to have it in their time. Given that Commonwealth day was last Monday, the debate is timely.

Last week, I had the wonderful experience of going on a trip to the United Nations organised for parliamentarians by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—so I was in New York on Commonwealth day. On that day, the British deputy permanent representative to the UN was hosting a reception to celebrate a new report about peacekeeping. At the reception were a variety of ambassadors and figures from member states of the UN and, particularly, member states of the Commonwealth. It was particularly moving that the Ugandan permanent representative to the UN read out a statement as part of a celebration of Commonwealth day. When I talked informally to representatives from a variety of Commonwealth countries, I was struck by the great value that they too placed on this association, this network, this great organisation and this lasting set of relationships. It is important that our debate is underscored by that.

Any debate entitled "The United Kingdom and the Commonwealth" will be wide-ranging, and it is welcome that so many different issues have been raised. I would like to confine my remarks to a few key points—the importance of the Commonwealth and the roles that it can play in resolving conflict and tackling climate change, and the rights of Commonwealth citizens in this country.

We have already heard about the great importance of the Commonwealth. Two billion people live in Commonwealth countries, of which there are 53 across the globe, with a great mix of north and south, and a diversity of ethnicity, race, religions and cultures that are different across the countries and within them. They cross all the continents of the world, going from very large countries with huge populations, such as India, to very small island states.

The Commonwealth provides a welcome alternative international forum for discussing a range of issues. We have already heard about the millennium development goals and about climate change. While we have our formal structures through the EU and the UN, it is complementary to have, alongside those international governance structures, different groupings of countries coming together and engaging in dialogue.

We know about the great contribution that people from the Commonwealth make to the UK, with many thousands of Commonwealth citizens living and working here and contributing day in, day out, as doctors and teachers, or setting up businesses. They are choosing to make Britain their home, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey said, not always necessarily taking up British citizenship, which can create difficulties.

Ms Abbott: In the context of the very live debate that is taking place about citizenship and nationality, how immigrants have to be encouraged to feel British, and so on, no group of immigrants is more passionate about Britain and more passionately proud of being British than those from the Commonwealth. I think that the generation who came from the West Indies in the 1950s are almost more proud of Britain than those of us in this Chamber, and I would like to place that on the record.

Jo Swinson: I welcome the hon. Lady's intervention. I will pick up on that point when I come to the rights of Commonwealth citizens. There are many reasons why somebody living in Britain might want to retain the links with their home country and therefore not take up British citizenship, and that should not necessarily be to their detriment as regards their rights in this country. As we have heard, 7,000 of our armed forces come from Commonwealth countries. Strong links are created by the people from the Commonwealth who live here but retain family connections in other Commonwealth countries, and by the UK citizens who go and live in other Commonwealth countries, which is becoming increasingly important. All those factors help to bind the countries together.

I am pleased that the Minister mentioned the Commonwealth games, which are due to be held very close to my constituency, in Glasgow, in 2014. We are very much looking forward to that. Sport, like other cultural activities, provides an opportunity for countries to come together and share experiences. We should not underestimate the value of events and institutions such as the Commonwealth games.

In preparing for the debate, I did some research and managed to print off from the website a list of the Commonwealth countries, as well as their flags, which will no doubt stand me in good stead for pub quizzes or "Trivial Pursuit" questions. Looking down that list, I was struck by the sheer diversity of countries. Many of them I have visited and are very familiar and commonly talked about; some are more remote and far flung, and my opinions of them, like those of many other Members, I am sure, come from what we see on the news, read in the newspapers and, personally speaking in the case of Botswana, from the fabulous literature series "The No. 1 Ladies' Detective Agency", which paints vivid pictures of that African country. I have to put my hands up and confess to some ignorance, because when I saw the state of Kiribati listed, I scratched my head and was not sure where it was. I have asked several people since and have not managed to get an answer. The Minister may be able to fill us all in on that one and stand us in better stead for trivia quizzes.

Meg Munn: I will happily respond. It is pronounced, so I am told, "koobats", and it is a Pacific island. I met a delegate from there when I was at the Commonwealth meeting of Women's Affairs Ministers. As my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) said, it is a low-lying area and one of the many islands that are at risk.

Jo Swinson: I thank the Minister for informing us of something that some of us may not have known before.

Several countries on the list have been in the news often recently. That is where the Commonwealth has had an important role in safeguarding peace and security and sometimes stepping in and playing a role in resolving disputes. Kenya has been mentioned already. For many years, Kenya was a great success story in Africa, with a burgeoning economy and a stable political system. Indeed, the elections in 2002 were widely praised for the fair and free way in which they were undertaken. It was in that context that we all saw, to our horror, the events unfolding late last year and early this year, with violence and people being killed and having to flee their homes as a result of the conflict after the disputed elections.

However, we have also seen, and should take heart from, the value of international diplomacy, with the action taken not only by Kofi Annan but by a variety of countries behind the scenes, including Commonwealth countries. That has managed to bring Kenya back from the brink of disaster and, it is to be hoped, to create a platform for a peaceful resolution of the tension and to prevent further violence. We are still in the early days of the power-sharing agreement between the two parties, but we all hope that we will be able to secure a stable future for Kenya, that it will get the constitutional reform that is needed, and that the Commonwealth states will be able to continue to support it and see it returned to its former role as a successful figurehead country that manages to be an example to other countries in the region.

Another somewhat fragile state is Pakistan. In the aftermath of the assassination of Benazir Bhutto we have had many debates and questions in this House. It caused a great deal of concern, particularly in the run-up to the elections on 18 February. It is pleasing that those elections passed off with relatively little disruption. The new political mix marks quite a change in public opinion in Pakistan, with the parties of Sharif and Zardawi working together. There may be some hope that Pakistan has a somewhat brighter future, although, again, we are very much in the early stages. I welcome the Minister's comment that the Commonwealth hopes to be able to support Pakistan to fulfil the conditions needed to become once more a full member of the Commonwealth and embrace democratic representation and the rule of law.

Sierra Leone is another great success story for international co-operation. The strong links between the UK and Sierra Leone through the Commonwealth were clearly part of the motivation for the UK to intervene to end the crippling civil war that was taking place in that country. At the end of last year, I had the great privilege, along with the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), who I hope will share those experiences with the House later, and the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), of travelling to Sierra Leone with the Westminster Foundation for Democracy as one of the later parts of the project that the hon. Member for City of York described. I did not really know what to expect from a visit to the third poorest country in the world, which had been ravaged so recently—within the past five or six years—by a devastating civil war. I had not expected to find the great positivity, which was absolutely everywhere, whether in the smiling faces when we went into the Parliament building or in the streets with the coconut sellers and the bustle that was going on. There was such a sense of optimism, given the horrors that every family has experienced, as we learned when we spoke to people when we were waiting for the ferry or travelling around. Everybody had lost a brother, a father, an uncle, a mother or a daughter in the civil war, if not several relatives, yet they managed to have this wonderful outlook. That can-do attitude will take Sierra Leone far, but we have to recognise that it has been made possible by interventions. Indeed, they feel strongly full of thanks for the UK's intervention, and the Department for International Development is still the biggest development agent working out there at the moment. I am sure that we will hear more from the hon. Member for Crosby about Sierra Leone because I know that she is a frequent visitor to that country.

While we can recognise the successes internationally, we also, sadly, need to recognise where we have failed. Zimbabwe is a case in point. The hon. Member for City of York shared some horrifying statistics with us: inflation, depending on which figures we believe, stands between 7,000 per cent. and 13,000 per cent.; four out of five people are living below the poverty line; and a quarter of people have had to flee their homes. It is a truly horrific situation brought about by the destructive impact of Mugabe's regime. It was right that, in 2003, the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting—CHOGM, which is an interesting and amusing acronym—focused on the role of Zimbabwe and considered whether suspending it would be the right way to bring the Commonwealth's influence to bear. Of course, at that point Mugabe decided that he would take Zimbabwe out of the Commonwealth. It is regrettable that we have not been able to gain greater influence on that country, and that we have not used our abilities to talk to neighbouring countries to get them to bring more pressure to bear, because it is the people of Zimbabwe who are suffering.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I agree that it is sad that the Commonwealth has not been more involved in Zimbabwe. Does the hon. Lady agree that it is also sad that the African Union, and South Africa in particular, did not press for Commonwealth observers at the elections being held last week? That would have helped to give some credibility to what will be a totally flawed election process.

Jo Swinson: The hon. Lady is quite right. Indeed, Human Rights Watch has produced a report and concluded that the elections will be deeply flawed because of factors such as people not being allowed to register to vote, dead people being allowed to register and the repression of opposition parties. The situation there is very difficult. One chink of light may be the former Finance Minister, who is challenging Mugabe and could provide another way forward. Perhaps that is a vain hope, but the electoral process has to be the bedrock of a country's stability. When that is flawed, as we saw in Kenya, the consequences can be dire. Zimbabwe is one country in respect of which we cannot bask in the glow of success of what we have achieved internationally, and I press the Government to use every available channel open to them to take further action.

The theme of Commonwealth day 2008 was "The Environment, Our Future", and it is right for an international organisation such as the Commonwealth to focus on climate change. I am a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, which is undertaking an inquiry into the international context after Kyoto. One of the things that we have found is frustration caused by the UN negotiations—how slow and bureaucratic that process can be. After speaking to some of those who take part in such negotiations, one begins to wonder whether we will ever find a solution and get international agreement.

We have to welcome, therefore, any other international bodies that can be used as a forum through which to push for progress, to encourage countries to take UN negotiations more seriously, and to allow unilateral action by countries, or groups working together, to cut carbon emissions. Most importantly, in the context of Commonwealth countries, that may allow for good adaptation measures. Countries such as India have an important role to play and I hope that it can be encouraged, as a rapidly industrialising country, to consider how it can learn from our past mistakes and create a far lower carbon economy than we have managed to.

Scientists tell us that it may not be possible to keep to a 2° rise in temperature; the figure may end up being higher. The impact of such change will be felt most harshly in many of our Commonwealth friends. Indeed, the small island states—the Tuvalus and Vanuatus—and some of the larger states, such as low-lying Bangladesh, are under great threat. Australia is already experiencing extreme weather patterns and just a small change will make those events more extreme, with really difficult consequences. Thankfully, its Government are now looking more seriously at what they can do to address climate change, after almost a decade of denying its existence.

I feel that the world is beginning to wake up to the threat of climate change, but the analogy that I would use is that rather than its being a case of someone rolling over in bed, looking at the alarm clock, thinking, "Oh my goodness! I've slept in," and rushing out of the door to act immediately, it is more like someone waking up, having a stretch and a yawn and thinking, "Maybe I'll go and have some breakfast." The sense of urgency demonstrated by all the international institutions, and even, I would contend, by this Government, does not seem to match the scale of the challenge that we face. I urge the Government to act with a sense of greater urgency on this issue and, importantly, use their influence with our Commonwealth partners.

I turn finally to the rights of Commonwealth citizens in the UK. We have all spoken about the importance of the Commonwealth, and I am sure that we will hear more on that, so it is right that we think seriously about how we show Commonwealth citizens living in the UK that they are valued members of the community and that we value the network that is the Commonwealth. As the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) mentioned, the proposal to get rid of ancestry visas has come back twice in four years. That is very worrying.

Meg Munn: I am glad that the hon. Lady referred to that because I would like to correct something that I said earlier. I mixed up my consultations—the consultation on the visitor visa finished in March, and the consultation on the ancestry issue does not finish until May, so there is still plenty of time for hon. Members and others to respond.

Jo Swinson: That is a welcome clarification, and I hope that the consultation responses will show that it is important to retain ancestry visas in order to keep our links with Commonwealth countries. I also hope that as a result of the consultation, the Government will decide that that is the right way forward.

Simon Hughes: The Minister was helpful in making that correction. Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be useful if all colleagues found out how many Commonwealth citizens were in their constituencies? In mine, probably about one in five of the community are such citizens. We have an obligation to ensure that those resident in this country understand the proposal, because if they understand it, the Government will get a significant response.

Jo Swinson: My hon. Friend makes his point clearly and well.

The other issue concerning the rights of Commonwealth citizens in this country is their right to take part in our elections. The recent review of citizenship by Lord Goldsmith, which was published this month, seemed to question whether that right should be retained. I think that it should be. It is important, and I would go further. As we have heard, many Commonwealth citizens work and live in the UK and contribute to our society, and for a variety of reasons, they retain citizenship in their own country. Often, they do not know that they are eligible to vote in this country. Rather than just preserving that right, which we should do, we should make a concerted effort to ensure that people are aware of it so that they can play a full role in the democratic process of this country. I urge the Government to promote that right, rather than remove it.

The Commonwealth is a hugely important organisation and a key part of UK heritage. It is also a vital part of the UK's future.

1.59 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson), with whom, as she said, I shared an excellent visit to Sierra Leone. I shall talk about that visit in a few moments. I would like to offer my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), the chairman of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, and of the Westminster Foundation for Democracy. My involvement with both organisations has been tremendously positive and it is the reason why I am speaking today.

I am going to talk about my experiences of a specific country. That may seem rather mean when so many are available, but as I look around the Chamber and see other hon. Members in their places, I know that others will willingly cover other countries. I shall talk in depth about Sierra Leone.

I first went to Sierra Leone in 2003 at the request of the then MP for Bridgend, Mr. Win Griffiths. I do not know whether friends and colleagues will recall him; he was a stalwart of the Back Benches, always sat at the back, and he was chairman of the all-party group for Sierra Leone. The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association had been kind enough to fund a visit and Win Griffiths was looking for Members to go.

It is true that Sierra Leone has a significant amount of both sand and sea, but the problem is that it does not have very much else, which does not it make it a very attractive proposition. I had to have 17 inoculations to go there, which quite frankly would have put off most Members, and the warnings that came with the various malaria drugs alarmed everyone in the family. The requirement to carry insect repellent everywhere put the tin lid on the suggestion that this was some sort of beano that we were all going on. It was quite a serious undertaking. Win Griffiths particularly wanted me to go on the trip because there were huge issues to do with genital circumcision in Sierra Leone, which was just beginning to be talked about, and he felt that it was right and proper to have a woman accompanying him, so I went.

Sierra Leone had just emerged from a civil war in February. As my hon. Friend the Member for City of York said, it was a devastating war. It is an extraordinary country, amazingly mineral-rich with plenty of diamonds and sapphires, but in many ways, that has proved to be its undoing. If we reflect on the antecedents of the civil war, we can see there were huge issues around the control of the diamond and sapphire mines. They were fantastic repositories of wealth, but even today, very little of that wealth permeates through to the people of Sierra Leone. There are several companies involved, but they play no role in reinvesting the benefit that they have taken out of the country. With international help, the UK has contributed to returning Sierra Leone to peace, but it remains one of the poorest countries in the world.

Mr. Keith Simpson: The hon. Lady is making a powerful speech, based on her experiences. I would like to put it on record from the Opposition side of the House that, although many people criticised the previous Prime Minister Tony Blair, I believe he was quite right to take the decision to use British armed forces to intervene in Sierra Leone. It provided a perfect example of proper intervention against an appalling regime and of the sheer professionalism of our armed forces, some of whom are still there doing training. I just wanted that put on the record.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: What a lovely and generous thing for the hon. Gentleman to say. That was very true. All over Sierra Leone, many children are called Tony Blair. When he went to receive the country's highest award, he was greeted by a group of children who had been named after him. Undoubtedly, when British citizens go to the shores of Sierra Leone, they are greeted with tremendous love and affection. The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire also felt that. Without a shadow of a doubt, these people realise that we helped them to exit from a horror acknowledged by a war crimes tribunal as one of the worst, if not the worst, that this world has ever seen. The degree of mutilation that took place during those 10 years beggars belief.

I was saying that Sierra Leone is vying to be at the bottom of all the tables of statistics. In the World Health Organisation's statistics, for example, the country is held to be 176th out of 177 countries, but it is right at the bottom of others. Perhaps the most significant statistic is that Sierra Leone has the worst maternal and child mortality in the world, with one in four children dying before their fifth birthday. Even today, it is a very grim place to visit, yet the degree of optimism that ones sees while walking through the streets is truly uplifting and inspiring.

Ms Abbott: I am listening with interest to my hon. Friend's speech. I have never visited Sierra Leone, but it is worth putting on record the fact that before the horrors of the civil war, the country had some of the best standards of education in west Africa because of its history as a state in which freed slaves originally settled. Freetown, in particular, had very high standards of education, which makes its plight now even more tragic.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: My hon. Friend is quite correct. In fact, our nations share a great love of education and a desire for all our children to do well. If we were to transfer ourselves to Freetown, families, mothers, brothers and sisters would be having exactly the same conversation about what school to send their children to and what they were going to do when they grew up. I know that the Sierra Leone Government are very keen to capitalise on their former reputation and develop their educational provision. We have a role to play in helping them to do that.

On the subject of conflict, nearly a quarter of the population—5 million people—were either displaced or forced to flee during the war, but the good news is that, following the very successful recent election, 12 members of Parliament who are citizens of the UK have now gone home. That is a tremendous accolade for a country so soon out of its civil war, and it augurs well for the future. As was mentioned earlier, the Westminster Foundation for Democracy funded the visit and we had the opportunity to meet some constituents who are now serving in the Sierre Leone Government. That was very encouraging, too.

About 10,000 children, some as young as eight, were forced into the various armed forces, but once again there is another good news story. I want to tell everyone here that 53 per cent. of the Sierra Leone Government's budget comes courtesy of us: that is, 53p in every pound paid to a Minister there comes from British taxpayers. That is a staggering commitment. I can well hear some people wondering why we are doing that, but the only answer is that people must visit Sierra Leone to find out. If they went, there would be no argument about why that funding was necessary.

That is not the sort of funding that we provide to all our Commonwealth brothers and sisters, because there are various agreements about which countries throughout the world we should support. We have been fortunate enough to be allocated, or to agree to support, Sierra Leone in considerable measure. Next door, in the Côte d'Ivoire, there is French support and Liberia has the US, for example, so everyone is bearing a share of the responsibility for supporting vulnerable countries that are either in conflict, post-conflict or now considered to be fragile states.

The consequences of the war are, of course, still being felt and will, in my opinion, be felt for generations. It is not possible simply to recover from a civil war, in which terrible atrocities and the rape of a nation were committed, in just a generation. That is impossible. A huge number of people who were either murdered or sent out of the country comprised the technical capacity required to grow the country back after the war. Growing that technical capacity is a matter of great concern to me.

I have already said that the UK has spent large amounts and supported the nation enormously. Military intervention was requested by the then President Kabbah, and Tony Blair, the Government and the House responded magnificently. The civil uprising was put down very quickly. It was a war that was waiting to end; there were no protracted problems. Crucially, a plan was in place to manage the peace. When we reflect on other wars being prosecuted in different parts of the world, it is the absence of a peace plan that makes people despair so much. In Sierra Leone, however, they got the peace plan right. We negotiated and received support from the UN for a peacekeeping mission. We assisted and advised the demobilisation and integration programme through which 50,000 former combatants were disarmed and given the opportunity to start a life.

A good half of those former combatants were young people—over 50 per cent. of the population in Sierra Leone is under the age of 15. There are arguments about life expectancy, but it ranges from 32 to 40. It is not unsurprising, therefore, that the rebel armies were full of children. I have visited dozens of schools in Sierra Leone, and children who are former murderers—some of them have murdered their own parents, some have raped their own parents, and some of them have done both—can be found in the classroom. They were taken back, not ostracised, by the very communities in which they committed those terrible crimes. They were embraced as victims of a terrible time, and have been brought back into the fold. Let me give hon. Members one salutary fact: Sierra Leone has not one child psychologist to deal with any of the trauma that those young people have experienced. An atrocity has simply been put to one side, and the country has got on with the future.

The British Government have donated a huge amount of aid to Sierra Leone. We helped to set up the special court staffed by the British, Americans and people from all over the Commonwealth and the EU, to try to bring justice to people who had had terrible crimes perpetrated against them. As has been mentioned, members of the British armed forces still serve in Sierra Leone, and act as expert advisers to the Sierra Leonean army. Many members of that army now serve in the British armed forces to take back good practice. As I said in an intervention, however, it is a two-way street—we also learn about the challenges faced by countries the size of Sierra Leone and how better to position our armies, so that when we fight, and support countries, in similar conflicts, we can share the experience gained.

The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire mentioned the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which is an excellent foundation. Will my hon. Friend the Member for City of York tell us whether the Speaker has agreed to fund just the CPA, or will the Westminster Foundation for Democracy also be funded?

Hugh Bayley: The funding that comes from the House of Commons Commission and the House of Lords is for the CPA. The Foreign Office provides grant in aid to the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, and other bodies fund particular programmes of work—for instance, DFID funds work on Sierra Leone.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: May I therefore extend, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my warm thanks to the Speaker for agreeing to take the CPA under his wing? That is quite right and proper. I also thank the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for its support for the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which does extraordinary work.

The foundation has taken to Sierra Leone a number of delegations of Members of Parliament, not just from this House but from the Scottish Parliament—we were fortunate to visit with Mr. Iain Smith, a Liberal MSP. We sat down with newly elected members of the Sierra Leonean Parliament to talk to them about what it was to be an MP, both in power and in opposition. That was an extraordinary event, simply because 72 of the 120 MPs elected in the recent elections were brand new—many of them had never engaged in any political activity before. Many of them had got in on the ticket, signed up to a particular party, got through the election and found themselves members of Parliament.

We had a Herculean task, in which we failed dismally, in terms of the number of subjects that can be covered in three days. The notion that we could be taught everything about our roles in three days is a little farcical, and yet for the Sierra Leonean members of Parliament, we are the only show in town. Nobody else is riding in to help them with the difficult task of managing themselves in government and opposition. There were many conversations about the Americans possibly doing something, but the Westminster Foundation for Democracy was it. The Speaker and Deputy Speaker came to see us and said that such education was tremendously important because the people of Sierra Leone want to retain democracy and peace. The democratic process is the way for them. I commend the foundation and applaud its aims and objectives. I hope that the FCO continues to sponsor it, because if members of Parliament do not understand their role, there will be serious problems in government.

Some of our conversations with colleagues in Sierra Leone were tremendously interesting. It is all very well to criticise some of these nations for being corrupt, but when one meets members of Parliament who receive a salary of £400 a year, have no travel or accommodation allowance, and some of whose constituencies are 1,000 miles away, it is difficult to tell them it is inappropriate to pay for children's education or somebody's funeral. They turn around and say, "But we earn more than anyone else in our community. Would you walk over a dead body in your community?" We found such conversations extremely challenging, because if that is the definition of corruption I would probably be equally corrupt in that sense. Sierra Leone has an acute shortage of money, and the Government need all the support that can be provided.

Let me deal with the role of DFID, which has done a tremendous job. After the war, the first priority was to get a grasp on democracy and all the civil governance organisations. Half the army had defected to the rebel groups, and half the police were in the pay of the rebel groups. As for the courts, one could buy one's way out of a murder charge quite easily because of the acute shortage of money—people are extraordinarily poor, living a hand-to-mouth existence on 26p a day. In Freetown today, we would find 1 million people shuffling around the streets because unemployment runs at 90 per cent. The role of the British Government was to secure those instruments of control, management and freedom that we all take for granted. They have done a fantastic job.

We have provided not only money but expertise because the support needed by the people of Sierra Leone and other Commonwealth countries cannot be bought with money alone. We had to send people from our Army to support the development of an army in Sierra Leone. We had to send judges from the UK courts. We had to ensure that they were paid from the British purse, so that they could not be bought by anyone with substantial funding who wanted to avoid a conviction for serious crimes. We had to ensure that the police were paid and had accommodation. In the first few months after the war, when I was in Sierra Leone, the British Army was responsible for taking food up country in a helicopter, to make sure that the Sierra Leonean army did not go raiding local villages because they were starving. That was tremendously important, because the Government at the time were struggling to cope with 2.5 million people in Freetown, a city built to accommodate 250,000. DFID's work has consistently been about supporting democratic governance and those instruments that secure the peace and safety of individuals.

DIFD has worked extensively with young people, including former rebels, and has worked closely with the Sierra Leonean Government's education department to develop a 10-year education plan. It continues to be extremely busy, and although we fund 53 per cent. of the Government's budget, it is not a great deal of money when so much needs to be done.

Gender is a major issue, as it is in many Commonwealth countries. The CPA has held a number of workshops in Freetown to advise on ways of increasing participation by and equality among women, and that work has been vital. I have done a great deal of community work in Waterloo in Sierra Leone. The headman there told me that every one of the women in his community had been raped during the war, yet none of them had brought any charges for sexual abuse or rape. That continues to be a common feature of women's lives in Sierra Leone. Tremendous liberties are taken.

I have already mentioned female genital circumcision and mutilation. It is not a Government requirement, or even a male requirement: it is performed by women on women, and is considered to be very much part of their cultural heritage. However, thanks to such organisations as the World Service, supported by the British Government and beamed into every home in Sierra Leone, a significant number of women have been sensitised on the subject of circumcision. Some now object to the procedure, and want an opportunity to be free of the problems associated with it.

The mercy ships, which are supported extensively by the United Kingdom, do a great deal of work in Sierra Leone on behalf of those women. When they were last in the country, 2,000 women who had been subjected to circumcision turned up. Two thirds of them were incontinent, and a third had been left sterile. DIFD's work with the women has been extensive. It has encouraged them to stand up for their rights, and has referred them to organisations that enable them to talk about their experiences. It is also beginning to help them with their literacy difficulties.

Only 10 per cent. of women in Sierra Leone can read, which makes developing a health programme a nightmare. We cannot arrange lessons for everyone. We can spread an awful lot of good information through the written word, but that requires people to be able to read. I should add that only 20 per cent. of men in Sierra Leone can read. The illiteracy levels there are the worst in the world, ranking bottom in the Commonwealth league. Making the country literate is a major challenge and a major opportunity for another fantastic organisation, the British Council.

We have not talked much today about the British Council's role in Commonwealth countries, but it is extensive. During the last few weeks a man called Stephen Kinnock has taken over the council's office there, because, as we all know, its office in St Petersburg has closed. That is very regrettable, but I for one was delighted that such an able individual was to be in charge of the office in Sierra Leone.

[Mrs. Curtis-Thomas]

The British Council has been working in Sierra Leone for 60 years, and was there during the trouble. It is a very challenging country in which to serve. During and after the war there were single-person postings, as with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. It is very hard for people and their families to be sent to a country with no running water and no permanent electricity supply, where life expectancy is the lowest in the world and where there is no functioning hospital. We should all be tremendously proud of people who can do a good job in such circumstances.

The British Council office staff are fantastic. For a long time they have provided the only library in the country. Last year 750 students took United Kingdom examinations, and 17,000 people used non-web-based resources to gain qualifications. The people of a country that was once very proud of its educational background have been given the opportunity to pursue their education through the British Council because we have chosen to support the organisation, and long may we do so. In many Commonwealth countries the council provides a first-rate education to international standards. The educational standards in Sierra Leone are not international, and its desire to create an educational platform as a source of business and income will be denied until that is sorted out, but the British Council is providing great opportunities.

Let me now deal with what I consider to be the only remaining serious challenges that face post-conflict and fragile states. Members will know that I am an engineer, and I hope they will forgive me for focusing on the role of engineering in the development of nations. As I said earlier, a country emerging from a conflict—a fragile state—is deemed to be a state that may tip back into instability for a number of reasons. The reason may be endemic disease or endemic unemployment, or it may be threats from other countries. However, some of those fragile states manage to overcome their crises.

The recent elections in Sierra Leone were very successful, and I congratulate President Kabbah and his successor on the exemplary way in which they conducted themselves. I do not think the people of Sierra Leone ever felt that they could aspire to the levels that they saw in Kenya, but when Kenya collapsed in front of them we could feel the pride of a nation that had managed to overcome such difficulties in its elections. As my hon. Friend the Member for City of York observed, it was like a revolving door: out went one party and in came another. When we visited the country to work on the educational programme, we witnessed the same sort of rivalry and banter between the opposing parties that I have witnessed in the House of Commons many times.

As I said earlier, now that the crisis is over in Sierra Leone, one of its main problems is mass unemployment. The fact that 90 per cent. of the population is unemployed worries the Government of Sierra Leone and many other poor countries enormously. The 90 per cent. is very age-specific. One does not see young people in work; employment is for people in their 20s and 30s. What can be done with approximately 1.5 million young men under the age of 16? It is immensely worrying. With unemployment at that level, much damage can be caused. Opportunism allows rebel armies, or any individual, to mass a force of instability.

I have been talking to our colleagues in DFID and the FCO, and I make the following appeal to the Minister: in countries such as Sierra Leone, we must move the DFID programmes on from negotiating civil contingency and civil stability to looking at how to develop employment opportunities. Without employment there is no income, without income there are no tax reserves, and without tax reserves countries such as Sierra Leone cannot get off their knees and do the sorts of things we take for granted.

I want more conversations of this kind to take place because the matter I am raising is of fundamental importance to our country, and if it is fundamentally important to us it is also fundamentally important in Sierra Leone. We think of skills acquisition as one of our twin top priorities, and that is no different in Sierra Leone. The difference between us and Sierra Leone is that we have huge investment programmes that allow young people to train on the job. There are no investment programmes in Sierra Leone at present, other than those funded by the Chinese and the EU. When the Chinese bring development into countries such as Sierra Leone, they will offer to build something for the country but they will bring in Chinese people from halfway around the world to build it. That is super because the facility is left in the country, but there is not a single qualified road engineer in Sierra Leone, so we can build a road—with a lovely ribbon to cut to open it—but nobody can maintain that road when we leave. There is also not a single town and country planner in the country, so even if we wanted to establish business parks, we would have nobody to design them. There is not one organisation that can repair water equipment either, so WaterAid has refused to go into some areas in Sierra Leone, despite the fact that water-borne diseases are the major killer of children under five, because there are no water technicians to repair the equipment.

I would like every piece of infrastructure development that we put into countries such as Sierra Leone to come with a requirement. We have invested in structures: we have built all the police stations—that has been done with our money. I have to tell Members, however, that they will be falling down within 10 years. I can say that because I have surveyed them, and I know that they have been built with salty sand. They cost £20 million to build, and we could ask, "Why have we allowed structures to be built with salty sand?" We have done that because there is no civil capacity in Sierra Leone that knew enough to say, "We shouldn't use salty sand to make mortar because when it rains all the salt leaches away leaving a friable brick." When we make investments in that country, we have an absolute obligation to improve technical capacity as well. I do not accept the patronising arguments that we should not enforce British standards in other countries, because that is demeaning in the extreme.

I have talked to engineers in Sierra Leone and they say, "Hold our hands and we will walk forward with you," because no engineer that I am aware of wants to do badly; we want to do well. However, there are no engineers in Sierra Leone to build up a society—to build the roads and the rest of the infrastructure. But there is British money. We are building there, and we should insist that for every pound of commitment—for every pound we put into a block—we deliver technical excellence as a result of that. We do that here: the mandate of—the mantra behind—the Olympic development programme is, "We want to build these fantastic facilities, but we want to build up the skills of the people in east London as well."

I agree with that, but let us take that model into Commonwealth countries. Let us make that a reality for them so that their further education colleges have somewhere to take their young students. Young people studying engineering at an FE college in Sierra Leone know what a brick is because it gets drawn on the board, and they learn how to build a brick wall by having it drawn out on the board. That is because there are no projects for them to work on. How good can anyone become when they have that sort of experience? I am interested in projects that liberate the potential of young people and connect further education and higher education with British investment. I want that to be extended to EU investment, too. The EU is currently building a road in Sierra Leone; the cost is £176 million, and it will be built by the Italians. Not one Sierra Leonean will be a part of that. That is wasted investment.

We can add value to our investment and help these countries to move on from instability and fragility to a stable state and a stable economy. We now fundamentally believe in our approach of skills, education and workplace for our country, and we must be prepared to take it out to Commonwealth countries, not only to give what we have, but to liberate British engineering companies into countries they have never been in before.

Lots of British companies—engineering companies such as Whitbybird, and others such as Cadbury—really want to engage in our millennium development programme. They want to give of what they have—their expertise. I want to say, "Come on, give us that expertise." We have a role to play in such countries, as do politicians, the Government and the private sector in the UK. It has a role to play in taking the best technical capacity in this country to our Commonwealth brothers and sisters, and allowing people to go. That concludes my remarks, and I thank the House for its indulgence.

2.35 pm

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on a fascinating speech. It was on an area about which I know nothing, and I am much the better for it. She concentrated on what the UK is doing for Sierra Leone. I want to concentrate on the links between Commonwealth nations, particularly those between the old Commonwealth and the UK, and the two-way aspects of them.

From the moment that I began to speak, it was clear that I have an interest to declare. I have dual nationality, and I carry a New Zealand passport as well as a British one—when I arrive at Gatwick airport, I choose the shorter queue. Everybody who has spoken has correctly pointed out that the Commonwealth is a unique worldwide family: it is international and colourful in every way; it is a fantastic mixture of races, religions, languages and creeds; and it is all based around the United Kingdom and the Queen. In saying that, I recognise that the near neighbours of New Zealand—that little island just a little way off—the Australians, have a few republican problems and republican moments. If asked, any New Zealander will explain that being an Aussie is a problem in itself.

I should explain that point a little. Those two old Commonwealth nations in the south Pacific have a huge rivalry. The insults and jokes between them are phenomenal. Every joke can be turned round and played back the other way, and many of the jokes are in vulgar taste. The two have huge battles, particularly in sport and especially in rugby, yet in normal work, normal life and especially in times of war, those two old Commonwealth nations work extremely closely together as part of the British Commonwealth, especially where it is appropriate to do so. Along with Canada and South Africa, they make up what I call the "old Commonwealth". They have a Commonwealth link reinforced by huge kith and kin links and a two-way flow of tourism and migration dating back for almost two centuries.

My direct knowledge is predominately about New Zealand, although I have lived in the UK for longer than I have lived there. I return to New Zealand occasionally for language and accent refresher courses. I shall give a touch of the history just to set the scene. New Zealand was originally occupied by a group called the Moriories, who were then followed by the Maoris. There are no Moriories left; fable in New Zealand says that the Maoris either interbred with them or ate them. The next influx into New Zealand came almost entirely from the United Kingdom. The early among them were a very rough and unpleasant breed of whalers, loggers and such people. They brought the unwanted disbenefits of the European at that time—syphilis, gonorrhoea, measles, flu, alcohol and firearms, so that for quite a while the Maori people were on an endangered list. As a percentage of the population, their numbers dropped drastically, and that situation did not turn around until relatively recently. The point has been made that the whites did not have it all their own way, because the Maori name for the white man is Pakeha, which is rumoured to mean sweet pig.

New Zealand's biggest influx of immigration over the past century and a half involved people who went there by their own choice—they were not transported there. One sees that when one wanders around New Zealand, because the names of places are a mixture of Maori, English, Scottish and Irish—there are also a few Welsh names—people drive on the left and predominately speak English, and New Zealand has a parliamentary system much like the one here. There are enormous similarities—

Andrew Mackinlay: One chamber.

Sir Paul Beresford: As the hon. Gentleman says, they have one chamber and, occasionally, that deficit shows.

They also have, like the UK, a minority language of no great international significance. In New Zealand, it is the Maori language, and here it is Welsh—I am sure that I will get some letters to aid my thinking on that. The similarity between the two languages is, of course, that if one is not au fait with them, the words are almost impossible to pronounce.

[Sir Paul Beresford]

When the UK immigrants moved to New Zealand, they wanted to make it like home, so they did some extraordinary things. I know that, because I come from an ex-farming community way up in the high country—"Lord of the Rings" country. One of the most extraordinary things was the introduction of animals that became pests, such as rats, rabbits, hares, pigs, deer and feral cats. All those need to be controlled and, living up in the high country and trying to help the farmers, I was very aware of that. I became aware when I came here that New Zealand does not have foxes, although it now has hobbits—people are not allowed to shoot the hobbits. I have not met any hobbits, although I have met a few trolls.

My parents' and grandparents' generations talked of the UK as home and of "going back". They still do, as do some of my generation, even if many of them have never left to go home or come back. They all have their close links with this country displayed in their houses. Most of them have a fantastic book or two sitting on the pine coffee table in their lounge, full of dramatic photographs. They are dramatic for two reasons. First, they all feature the UK's beautiful scenery, and, secondly, they were all—amazingly—taken on sunny days.

The close rapport between the UK, New Zealand and Australia is perhaps emphasised most in the farming community. There are very close links, including educational visits both ways between farmers, although they are perhaps more educational for the farmers from this country. I was intrigued when a colleague asked me if I could find a farm—thinking that it would be a farm in this country, as I belong to the National Farmers Union here—for his daughter to spend her gap year between leaving school and going to veterinary school. She wanted something that would stand out, I rang New Zealand and spoke to some of the farmers I know there. They were more than willing to take her—for reasons of kith and kin, as they pointed out. I found a farm for her, and she is over the moon. The farm does a lot of barley and Lucerne hay, and it has 1,000 head of cattle, 1,000 head of deer and 15,000 lambing ewes. That will be a striking addition to her CV when she goes to veterinary school.

The biggest example of kith and kin involves times of conflict. In the first world war, there was Gallipoli, which led to Anzac day. Remembrance day here is important—it is covered on television—and Anzac day in Australia and New Zealand is the same. The people in those countries remember the soldiers, sailors and airmen who fought for the UK as part of the Commonwealth. I found it hard to understand as a child. I remember when we lived in a little—I mean little—village to the north of the south island of New Zealand, which had a war memorial. In typical New Zealand style, it had public toilets underneath it and the walls were covered with the names of the soldiers who had died—hundreds and hundreds of soldiers from that little village.

I recently visited Monte Cassino, the scene of the battle for Rome in world war two. Between 17 January and 18 May 1944, four battles were fought there. The soldiers involved on our side were called allied troops but, with the exception of the Polish forces who finally went over the top, they came from Commonwealth countries. A total of 54,000 men from Britain, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India and Canada were lost, as well as a number of Gurkhas. The reality of what happened came home to me during my visit. The separate cemeteries contain many thousands of tombstones, and I was struck by the ages of the troops buried there. Most of them were in their late 20s or their 30s and 40s, and most would have been married with families. That explains why, in my village, there were a lot of single-parent families and ladies who remained single. As a child, I did not understand that there were no men because they had gone away to fight battles as part of the Commonwealth.

After the war, shoals of people from New Zealand and Australia came to the UK on six-week boat voyages. They fly here nowadays, and many if not all of them are skilled. They are doctors, dentists, nurses, farmers, accountants and lawyers, or experts in banking, finance or construction. Some stay, others move on to other parts of the world, and some go back. For decades, university graduates have been among New Zealand's biggest exports, and in the main they have come to this country. However, the UK has become a progressively less receptive home country over the past few years. Entry is slowly becoming more difficult, and I believe that that is to the UK's disadvantage.

People from New Zealand, Australia, Canada and South Africa are exactly the type of immigrants whom this country needs. In general, they have high skills, earn high net incomes and pay a lot of tax. They are almost invisible to the social services, and they integrate well into British society. After all, most of them have parents, grandparents or even great-grandparents who came, either directly or indirectly, from the UK. They share culture, language and heritage with people here and, although they tend to play slightly better rugby, they blend in and add value to the UK. That ability to blend in here was recognised at last Saturday's rugby grand slam game, as the Welsh national rugby team have a coach who comes from New Zealand. [Interruption.] I had to say that.

The UK is increasingly closing the door on Commonwealth immigration. Australians and New Zealanders never took advantage of their ability to go through the channel for aliens at airport immigration, even though it is often the quicker way through, but their degrees in medicine, dentistry, accounting and the law are not being accepted as they have been in the past. I find that extraordinary. Highly trained professional people who come to the UK are being required to sit extra exams so that they can work here, even though they all speak English and the quality of their degrees is every bit as good as the ones conferred in this country.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I have much sympathy with what my honourable colleague is saying, and I want to reassure him that the UK standards authority is not adopting a punitive approach. The requirement to sit extra exams is often to ensure that international standards are complied with. Moreover, some countries do not accept British qualifications, unless the people who hold them do top-up exams.

Sir Paul Beresford: That is an interesting intervention, but the requirement is not reciprocal. I do not believe that the standards in New Zealand, Australia, Canada and so on should differ from the ones that apply here. If degrees from the United Kingdom are acceptable in those countries—as they are—there should be reciprocation, especially as a disproportionate number of the medical, dental and legal teaching staff of UK universities are New Zealanders and Australians. The same applies in the United States and Canada, but without the same difficulties.

Andrew Mackinlay: It is the same for secondary schools.

Sir Paul Beresford: Indeed.

It is worth re-emphasising the contribution to the UK's academic background and academic progress made by the old Commonwealth nations. Lord Rutherford began the process, and it has continued. To refer to my original profession, at a time when the NHS is looking for dentists, and we are encouraging Polish and Indian graduates to come to the UK, we are shutting down on people from Australia and New Zealand, who could be every bit as good.

I am further disappointed to find that the UK proposes to cut visitors visas. At present, UK visitors to Australia and New Zealand can have six-month visitor visas. If the UK visitor finds work that is beneficial to New Zealand or Australia, they can apply for a two-year working visa without having to return to the UK to fill in the application form, which might lead to that person finding that the job has gone when they go back. The process is not reciprocated by the UK. First, the UK proposal to cut the period for the visitors visa from six to three months is an unpleasant slap in the face, and I hope the Government will rethink it. Secondly, will they also rethink the requirement that people must return to Australia or New Zealand to apply for an extension or change to their work permit?

Even more upsetting is the proposal to abolish ancestral visas, which are a real link and recognise the special status of the Commonwealth—they do not apply only to Australia and New Zealand. They were introduced in 1972 to allow a Commonwealth citizen aged 17 or over to come to the UK provided that they could show that one of their grandparents or parents was born in the UK and that they intended to take or seek employment in the UK. After five years, the person can apply for settlement. The Home Office Green Paper suggests abolishing the kith and kin visa. I understand that the New Zealand and Australian Governments are, to put it mildly, very unimpressed. The timing of the suggestion is rather bad. This is the centennial year of New Zealand's becoming a Dominion, yet the door has been closed even further.

The Commonwealth is very special for its people. In these difficult days, the United Kingdom needs to build on that family of nations and not destroy the willingness and desire to be in harmony with the United Kingdom in the Commonwealth.

2.53 pm

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this important debate. Like earlier speakers, I stress the importance in the 21st century of the UK Government's not undervaluing the potential of our links with the Commonwealth. In the past, when apartheid still ruled in South Africa, the Commonwealth, linking countries from north and south under the leadership of Sir Sonny Ramphal, was able to play an important and constructive role in the process that eventually led to the peaceful move from apartheid to a fully democratic Government in South Africa.

I listened with interest to the speech by the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford). In many ways his speech was moving, but when he spoke about the old Commonwealth he was, in effect, speaking about the white Commonwealth. To try to structure immigration and visa requirements so that they give the white Commonwealth privileges that are not available to the new Commonwealth is not tenable. It is, however, important to keep our links with the Commonwealth.

I remember when the ancestral visa to which the hon. Gentleman referred was introduced. That was before I was a Member of Parliament, but I used to work in the Home Office and took a particular interest in such issues. It was then called the patriality clause, and the point about the patriality clause was that at a time when the Government were bearing down on Commonwealth immigration generally, it allowed persons from the old Commonwealth—the white Commonwealth—access to this country that was denied to the Commonwealth as a whole. While I support the feeling behind the hon. Gentleman's speech, the outcome of his proposals would be different sets of regulations for the old Commonwealth and the new Commonwealth. That would not be tenable, nor could I explain it to my constituents from new Commonwealth countries.

Sir Paul Beresford: I was concentrating on the old Commonwealth, but in fact the ancestry visa conditions apply across the Commonwealth; that is my first point. Secondly, the hon. Lady ought to understand, as she would if she had ever been to Australia or New Zealand, that many of the immigrants that go from this country to Australia or New Zealand are not white.

Ms Abbott: I am aware that in principle the ancestral visa conditions apply across the Commonwealth, but in practice the people best placed to take up the ancestral visa have always been people from the old Commonwealth, who are more likely to have had parents and grandparents who were born here. In practice, if we look at the numbers, the people who have benefited from the old patriality clause and what is now called the ancestral visa were overwhelmingly people from the old Commonwealth. I say again that I understand the hon. Gentleman's feelings of sentiment as a New Zealander. I would contend that people from the Caribbean and India feel as strongly about Commonwealth links, in their own way, as people from New Zealand and Australia, and it is simply not tenable to sustain arrangements that give people from the old Commonwealth advantages over those from the new Commonwealth.

Simon Hughes: This is an important and topical issue. May I put it to the hon. Lady that there are strong views on the subject in the Caribbean communities in this country? The hon. and learned Member for

[Simon Hughes]

Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and I attended a meeting upstairs with representatives of the Jamaican community, and they were as troubled by the removal of the ancestry clause as those people whose concerns were reflected by the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford). The numbers may in theory make the issue of more interest to people from Australia and New Zealand, but in terms of strength of commitment, the issue is just as important to third-generation Caribbean people in this country.

Ms Abbott: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I think that the concern that he is speaking about is a more general concern that people in the Caribbean feel about the way that the tide of change in immigration and visa requirements has weakened their links to this country generally. The truth is that it would be very unusual for someone from the Caribbean to be able to take advantage of what was the patriality clause, and is now the ancestral visa. However, that was my response to the very interesting speech by the hon. Member for Mole Valley.

I want to talk about a particular group of countries in the Commonwealth—those in the British-speaking Caribbean. I should, I suppose, declare an interest, because my family are from Jamaica, I retain strong links of family and friendship with the region, I am the chairman of the British Caribbean all-party group and I write regularly for newspapers in the region. I have stronger ties to it, possibly, than many people in the Chamber.

The first thing to say about the Commonwealth Caribbean—this follows on from the previous speech—is that I would contend that people in the Commonwealth Caribbean countries feel as strong a tie to the United Kingdom as anyone from New Zealand, Australia or Canada. As I said in an intervention, I sometimes take exception to some of the debate on citizenship and nationality, in which it seems to be assumed that immigrants need to be coaxed to feel British, need to be taught how to be British, or need a period of probation before they can be fully regarded as British. I entirely accept that the Government are entitled to have clear and firm rules on immigration and nationality. I entirely accept that citizenship is a proper issue for debate.

I take exception on behalf of my parents and their generation to the notion that that generation of immigrants from the Caribbean needed to be taught about being British. In many ways, they were prouder of being British than anybody in this Chamber can imagine. In fact, one of their disappointments in coming to this country in the '50s and '60s was that the British people, whom they had put on such a pedestal and been taught to admire and revere, occasionally did not accord with their idea of British values and what Britishness was all about. That is the paradox. Those people so revered the British that when they came here they were disappointed that the British were not as British as they had been taught to believe. I make that point because that generation is passing away. We have a debate about nationality now that assumes that immigrants have a strangeness and insularity that is certainly not true of Commonwealth immigrants.

I want to put on the record my sense of sadness at the way in which the Commonwealth in general and the Caribbean in particular appear to have slipped down the agenda when it comes to the concerns of the Foreign Office and Ministers. There are a number of reasons for that. It is partly because a generation of Members of Parliament who had live and direct links with the Caribbean have passed away. Not many Members of Parliament now could remember the young Michael Manley and the young Caribbean politicians who came here to study in the '50s and '60s. There are no politicians on the Opposition Benches like Bowen Wells, the former MP for Hertford and Stortford, who had a passionate commitment to the Caribbean because of long-standing business links with the region. A generation of politicians who had those links with the Caribbean—for whatever reason, be it business, politics or personal experience—are no longer here.

In every conceivable way, the Caribbean has slid down the agenda: in the number of staff working on Caribbean matters in the Foreign Office and the Department for International Development; in the seniority of Ministers who take responsibility for Caribbean matters; and in the amount of aid that goes to the Caribbean. I can let the House into a secret. There were Caribbean leaders who used to say that they preferred John Major to Tony Blair, because at least with John Major they could talk to him about cricket.

Simon Hughes: And he had lived elsewhere in the Commonwealth.

Ms Abbott: He had. Anyway, I threw that fact in as a matter of general interest.

One of the other reasons why the Caribbean has slid down the agenda of Her Majesty's Government is that it is talked about in development and Foreign Office circles as a middle-income country. The notion is that Britain should focus on the poorest countries and not middle-income countries like Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados or Guyana.

I put it to the House that the global and general figures for income and GDP in the Caribbean mask poverty every bit as severe and savage as can be found in countries that are commonly regarded as poorer. Not only that, but the general figures that would indicate a middle-income country mask a poverty and deprivation that has a power to impact on this country in a way that poverty and deprivation in countries further afield cannot. If there is a dispute about guns and drugs in Kingston, it will be resolved on the streets of the inner city in Hackney, Brixton and Southwark. Whatever Ministers might feel about the relevance of Caribbean matters in 2008, in practical and community politics the links that bind the fate of the Caribbean region to the fate of this country's inner cities are very close indeed. It is not wise or sensible to say, "We've moved on—they are middle income. What is the significance of this now?" If they catch a cold in Kingston, they are sneezing in Hackney.

I want to say something else about the way in which the Caribbean has slid down the agenda. Wherever we go in the Commonwealth, we see that the people there take their links with Britain more seriously than, sadly, people in Britain now take their links with the Commonwealth. I have spoken in this debate in order to flag up my sense, which is reflected in some of the facts and figures, that the Caribbean and its concerns have slid down the agenda. I responded to the, in many ways effective, speech that we heard earlier on behalf of the old Commonwealth because it is very important that in talking about Commonwealth links, we always try to talk about the Commonwealth as a whole. As I said earlier, the strength of feeling about the British links is as strong in the Caribbean and other parts of the new Commonwealth as it is in Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

The first of the issues of concern to the Caribbean that I want Ministers to take on board relates to trade, the economic partnership agreements and the economies of the countries of the Caribbean. The British-speaking Caribbean as a whole consists of the islands that sugar made, and by that I mean islands whose social structures, economic and trade patterns and even patterns of transport links are all rooted in patterns that grew up under the mono-culture of plantation-produced sugar. Of course, the world has moved on and the Caribbean cannot continue to rely on what used to be called imperial preferences. It must open its markets and embrace the opportunities that free markets and free trade offer it, but we have to remember that—be it shipping or air links, the structure of financial services or even patterns of employment and education—it is still, even to this day, very much shaped and structured by the experience of a region that for more than a century was dependent on one or two major cash crops.

Money is available now to move the Caribbean forward to take advantage of the economic partnership agreements, but more needs to be done to enable that money to be drawn down from the European Union, and to ensure that that funding is not just sucked in by Governments and corporations, but actually helps the people on the ground who are suffering from the transition from the traditional crops of sugar and bananas. We cannot overstate the difficulties that some of the poorest people in the Caribbean are facing with the move from traditional cash crops to a completely different economic era.

I stress to Ministers that it is in our interests to ensure that the very poorest people of the Caribbean do not suffer unduly from free markets and free trade, not because it is a humanitarian thing to do, which it is, but because, even though the sugar and banana cash crop industries that we are seeing the end of are a declining part of the economies of those countries in income terms, they are still the largest employers of male manual labour in the region. If they are allowed to crash without sufficient attention being paid to the transition, we will not have cane-cutters in Westmorland, Jamaica, becoming computer inputters; banana farmers in St. Lucia will not become maids in hotels. The redeployment and the transition that take place will not be as imagined by civil servants, with men in their 40s and 50s suddenly becoming white collar workers. It will be a redeployment and transition into the drugs trade.

I have argued time and again in the House that Government need to make the link between the war against drugs and their policies in relation to trade, employment and economic development in the region. Unless we have meaningful policies for trade and economic development in the region, we will find it very hard to fight the drugs trade. What is an unskilled young man in one of those countries to do if the sugar or banana industry, where he or his father once found a living, is collapsing? That is the question to be asked. I am aware that funding is available from the EU to help with the transitional phase, but more attention needs to be paid to how easy it is to draw down that funding and whether it is reaching the people and the communities who most desperately need help in the period of transition.

The topic of immigration has come up in the context of ancestral visas. I am a little sceptical about the argument for them, because I know the history and what they were intended to do. Another issue is the arrangements that we are proposing in relation to nationality, which would almost force people to decide between taking British citizenship and abandoning the passport of their country of origin. Up till now it has been possible to be a resident of the United Kingdom and to have all the rights associated with that status, but still to hold on to a Commonwealth passport, with no diminution of rights.

Ministers, I think, do not understand why people would do that. Why would they want to be in this country for 30 or 40 years and still not apply for British citizenship? It does not make sense. That is what Ministers think, and that is why they are seeking to force people to abandon their Jamaican or Trinidadian passports and become British citizens. I should say that I forced my own parents to do that many years ago because I could see where things were going. It makes no sense, but it is about sentiment.

Some of the most loyal British residents are people who have held on to the passport of their country of birth, not because they lack commitment to Britain, not because they are not prepared to play a full part in British society, but for reasons of sentiment. It would be wrong to force people to give up the passport issued by their country of birth, on the basis of some notion that not getting British citizenship means that, in some sense, they lack commitment to this country.

One of the ways in which we have helped the Caribbean is through the work, help, support and funding that we have given to fight crime. That is valued throughout the region but particularly in Jamaica, especially the deployment of British officers to support the Jamaican police force. Mark Shields, who is very senior in the Jamaican police force and who at one time served in Hackney, is a hero in Jamaica and very well respected. The general support that we have given and the deployment of officers out there is valued, and long may it continue.

There are other issues in relation to crime in the Caribbean. An issue of concern in the Caribbean, which of course looks different from a British perspective, is deportation and the continuing stream of people of Caribbean origin being deported back to the Caribbean. I am not saying that we should not do that. Those people are criminals and it is right that, having served their sentence, they should be deported. However, the Government should give some thought to the help and support that they could give law enforcement in the region when those deportees return, often highly skilled and motivated from their time with the British criminal classes. Often the local police feel somewhat overwhelmed by such people. I am not suggesting that the Government should spend millions on resettlement, but there are practical measures that could be taken to support societies that sometimes find themselves overwhelmed by the stream of deportees.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The hon. Lady has taken a considerable interest in women detainees at Yarl's Wood in my constituency. As she says, some extra assistance and attention paid to the circumstances to which detainees sometimes return might encourage people who would otherwise be fearful of returning to do so. A little infrastructure would go a long way and might assist us with some of the problems in dealing with some of the fears that people have, which then result in their going through the long judicial review process and everything else. If we could think a little more about what happens when people return home, the process might be made easier to the benefit of all of us.

Ms Abbott: I entirely agree. A little infrastructure would go a long way to making it easier to return people and to get countries to accept deportees and would minimise the danger of those people ricocheting back to this country in all sorts of subterranean ways. I am not talking about vast sums of money or huge deployments of staff or persons. I am simply saying that a little infrastructure and support would be to our long-term benefit and to those countries' long-term benefit in enabling them to reintegrate those people, or at the very least to keep an eye on them and to supervise them to ensure that they do not further destabilise what in some cases is a fragile society, and certainly do not just come back through some route or another because there is no system of scrutiny, supervision or support of any kind. What incentive is there for people not to exhaust every appeal process if they know that they will be deported and end up on the pavement with nothing at all for them or their family? I put this to Ministers because I know that what happens to people when they are deported is a matter of concern to Caribbean Governments and other Commonwealth Governments.

I wanted to say a little about climate change issues, which are of particular concern to the Caribbean, which has seen more and worse hurricanes in recent years than before, and which is particularly at risk from rising sea levels. Climate change poses a particular threat to the tourist industry, on which so many of these islands now rely as their traditional cash crops collapse, and whatever support the Government can give the region specifically on climate change issues, from the types of insurance that are available for the private sector to the type of technical expertise on which it can draw, will be important. Being a small island state in the 21st century is a vulnerable existence, not only economically because crops cannot be produced with the economies of scale of other countries, but because of climate change.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: The Association of Professional Engineers is a marvellous organisation based in Trinidad and founded by a good chum of mine, Mr. Bob Yorke, which has some of the world's foremost experts on buildings for earthquakes and managing tidal waves, all brought about by the concerns about climate change expressed so eloquently today by my hon. Friend. It is doing the best that it can to attract engineers from all over the world to bring their expertise to bear in the Caribbean to help in the future.

Ms Abbott: I thank my hon. Friend for her expertise, which, with that of the person whom she mentioned, is very valuable. The Government can also help in making resources available for countries to take the fullest advantage of such expertise and to train people up—a point made earlier about capacity building. There is a need to build capacity in the region around those skills. Climate change for this region among others is not just an issue for next year or the year after, but for generations to come. Yes, there is expertise, but some of the countries need the resources and structures necessary to take advantage of that, and there is a real need for capacity building right there in the region. We heard earlier about the need for engineers and other technically skilled people in Sierra Leone, but I suspect that even in London there are Sierra Leone-born engineers and technicians. We have to provide a structure in which people from that country who have come here, been trained and got skills have some incentive to go back and contribute as they all want to.

As I said, I am concerned that the Caribbean region appears to have dropped down the agenda; I am also worried that the Government's correct concern about crime and the war on drugs seems to exist at a complete remove from their thinking about trade and economic development. We cannot fight a war against drugs in the Caribbean without paying close attention to what is happening in the economy and employment there and to the transition from traditional cash crops to a modern economy. Any war on drugs that does not take those things into account is doomed to fail. It is important to put that on the agenda.

I want to draw my remarks to a conclusion. As I said at the beginning, one cannot overstate the loyalty and love that the people in the Caribbean have for this country, and I think that that applies across the Commonwealth. The Government have made some important initiatives in respect of the Caribbean region. There is a Caribbean Board, for example, although sadly it appears to have lost its way in recent years; I know that the Minister attended a meeting recently. I would like the opportunity to talk to the Minister at a later date about the Caribbean Board and how it can be given support, because it could play an important role in linking with the Caribbean community in this country and in helping the Caribbean as a region.

As I said at the beginning, there are fewer MPs on both sides of the House with personal links to the Caribbean than there were in the '70s and '80s. As one of the three Members of Parliament with a direct link to the region, I could not let this debate pass without standing up and speaking up for the Caribbean. Once upon a time, the Caribbean was considered one of the jewels of the British empire; I consider it to be a jewel of the Commonwealth to this day.

3.22 pm

Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), who spoke passionately about the Caribbean. I have had the privilege of visiting the region on numerous occasions. Most recently, I was in the Cayman Islands, which are, of course, a British overseas territory; I believe that they were also once a colony of Jamaica, or closely linked to it.

The Caribbean is a part of the world with strong links to Britain. Every time I have been there, the people have shown enormous warmth to me as a visiting Member of Parliament and to Britain as a nation. I meet many people in my constituency whose origins are in the Caribbean. Many share so many of the same values: they are loyal to the Queen and the flag and are proud of being British, as the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington said.

It is important that we do not forget the Caribbean. It is the part of the world in which Britain has the highest concentration of remaining overseas territories—not only the Cayman Islands, but the wonderful island of Montserrat. I am proud to be the chairman of the all-party group on Montserrat, and we must not forget Anguilla, the British Virgin Islands and the Turks and Caicos Islands. There are a lot of territories in the Caribbean for which we still have responsibility.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) mentioned Bermuda. I am not sure that those islands would consider themselves as entirely Caribbean.

Ms Abbott indicated assent.

Andrew Rosindell: The hon. Lady and I agree on that. However, we should not forget Bermuda and all the overseas territories of the Crown.

I am delighted to have followed the hon. Lady and to have the opportunity to take part in this important debate. In the House of Commons, we debate so many things to do with international affairs. We spend an enormous amount of time talking about Europe and it is good that we are now spending a bit of time talking about countries with which we have close historical links and ties, and for so many different reasons.

The Commonwealth is born out of what our forebears achieved when they chose to sail around the globe to spread ideas, values, Christian beliefs and the English language, all of which made a huge impact on all the countries that were part of that British empire. I know that it is not politically correct to talk about the British empire, but I think that, of all the empires that have existed throughout history, ours gives us a lot to be proud of. We left good constitutional frameworks in many of those countries. We did a lot of good, as British people, and perhaps left a happier situation than was left by other countries that did not quite succeed in their colonial ambitions in the way that the United Kingdom did.

We have already had a debate about Welsh affairs for St. David's day, and now we are having a debate about the Commonwealth. I hope, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you will take back the idea that on 23 April we should also have a debate about England for St. George's day. This is an important opportunity to debate matters relating to the Commonwealth and the various parts of the United Kingdom, and I hope that we can do it on an annual basis.

The Commonwealth of nations is a proud organisation—enormously important and hugely diverse. I will not repeat much of what has already been said by colleagues on both sides of the House. I think that it is true to say that every one of us here today is strongly committed to the concept of the Commonwealth bringing everyone together—people of all backgrounds, all colours and all religions, from every continent in the world. The Commonwealth is developing. Most of its countries have very close links to Britain, but one or two other countries are now joining that do not have that same link. Mozambique is an example of a country that has chosen to join.

Last year, I was privileged to go to Madagascar as part of an Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation. That country has had some links to Britain, but for most of its colonial past it has been linked to France. The President of Madagascar has made it clear that he wants to move closer to and have much better relations with the United Kingdom and to promote English. The idea of joining the Commonwealth—I must admit that I fuelled that debate while I was there—met with huge support and great interest from everybody. I believe that the President would like that to happen. I hope that the Minister will take on board the appalling mistake that the Government made in closing the British embassy in Madagascar. At a time when that country desperately wants to develop closer relations and links with Britain, our Government shut down the British embassy—yet again, as a Labour Government have done that before. I hope that the Minister will decide to reopen that issue so that we can develop our links with Madagascar.

Systems of democracy, stability and freedom have been created in these countries on the basis of the constitution, Her Majesty the Queen, the monarchy and the Westminster model of democracy, which is slightly adapted and tweaked depending on the country concerned and which we are privileged to have as well. Most of the countries that have had British influence and are part of the Commonwealth—originally places that our forebears went to—have had a far greater chance of retaining, as they still do today, democratic values, stability, a constitution, the rule of law, and good education. There are all kinds of benefits to the people of those countries. As I said, we have a great deal to be proud of in what we have achieved.

Australia, New Zealand and Canada are three countries with which we have particularly close relations, but I also include India. Large numbers of people in this country are of Indian descent. I have many in my constituency; we have them in all our constituencies. What a great country that is, and what a country of the future it is. I am sure that the Minister agrees that it should be a priority in the next few decades that we work closely with India to develop our links in terms of trade and co-operation. Most people from India speak English and have close links to Britain, and we should work with that country as well.

Of course, 14 or 15 nations in the world today retain Her Majesty the Queen as head of state. The Commonwealth is diverse, but the countries that retain Her Majesty as head of state and continue with the British monarchy are the ones that we have the closest links to—a special relationship—and that should continue.

[Andrew Rosindell]

I commend the work in Parliament of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, and of its secretariat—Andrew Tuggey and his team, who work in Westminster House. They do a great job and work hard to promote relations between the Parliaments of all the countries of the Commonwealth. I have been privileged to participate in a number of international delegations to Commonwealth countries, and to host Commonwealth parliamentarians in my constituency.

In fact, a group of Commonwealth parliamentarians visited me the Friday before last—I have their programme here. I was delighted to take them around Romford market and thrilled to show them our brand-new hospital and one of the local churches, St. Alban's. We had representatives from Australia—the deputy speaker of the New South Wales Parliament—Jersey, New Zealand, the Turks and Caicos Islands and Montserrat, and an observer from Somaliland. What a great day that was, and how wonderful it was to bring parliamentarians from the Commonwealth to our constituencies. I hope that the next time there is a Commonwealth parliamentary delegation, those of us who have south-east London constituencies will invite them and give them an opportunity to see the work of British MPs on our home turf, as well as the work that we do in Parliament.

I am pleased to be involved in a number of all-party groups that do valuable work. I mentioned Montserrat, and as the Minister will know, I am the secretary of the all-party group on the Falkland Islands, and chairman of the Anglo-Manx all-party group on the Isle of Man. I am involved with the all-party groups on Gibraltar and the Channel Islands. All of those groups do great work in co-operating and fostering closer relations with our friends in those nations and territories. A lot of effort and finance is put into supporting the work of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association—which is wonderful—the Inter-Parliamentary Union and the American group, but we have special links with Australia and New Zealand. It is time that the all-party group on Australia and New Zealand—the Anzac group, of which I am secretary—was elevated. Perhaps there should be direct funding for work with Australia and New Zealand; it is so important that we strengthen our links with those two countries in particular. We spend a lot of time working with the United States, which is very important.

Andrew Mackinlay: That is funded.

Andrew Rosindell: It is funded, but the work that we do with Australia and New Zealand is not. Perhaps the Anzac group could be elevated, and the Foreign Office might like to consider that.

Hon. Members will remember my Adjournment debate of a year ago about relations with Australia and New Zealand. I passionately believe that among all the debates that we have about Europe and our future with the continent and our relations with the United States, it is a big mistake to forget the importance of countries such as Australia, New Zealand and Canada, with which we have the most in common. Of course we want to work with all Commonwealth countries on an equal footing, but no one can take away the fact that those countries have special links with us because of ancestry. It was British people from England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland who travelled to those countries and made them their home. Today, generations are descended from those British people, something which can never be taken away. There is a special link there, closer than the ones that we have with many other countries, perhaps.

I want to repeat some of the important things that have been said about the Government's current proposals. Like many hon. Members here today—I refer in particular to my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford)—who spoke eloquently on this subject, I am deeply concerned about proposals to remove the ancestry route from Commonwealth subjects. I refer to the early-day motion tabled by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), which has now been signed by 51 Members. What the Government propose would be a bad mistake, and I hope that they will draw back from changing the rules. I think that that would send out a terrible signal to our dear friends in those countries.

The recent Home Office Green Paper, "The Path to Citizenship: Next Steps in Reforming the Immigration System", suggests the removal of the ancestry route of entry for Commonwealth citizens with ancestral links to the UK who wish to migrate here. It says:

> "We need to determine the position of the 'UK ancestry' and 'retired persons of independent means' routes within the new system... We need to decide whether a Commonwealth national's ancestral connections to the UK are sufficient to allow them to come here to work without the need to satisfy a resident labour market test."

Hon. Members will understand when I say that I accept that the Government are only consulting at this stage, but I am fearful that the consultation may well prove to be similar to the current one on post office closures—and we all know that that consultation is a sham. I hope that the Minister will reassure me and others that the consultation is genuine and that if the majority are opposed to this change, the Government will not press ahead with it, but will leave well alone. I hope that we can all have that reassurance from the Minister later. Perhaps I am being uncharitable, but I suspect that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Home Office, if not the Government as a whole, may have predetermined a desired outcome—to remove the ancestry route. Let us hope that the Minister will tell us that that is not true.

I know that the Minister is aware of a number of concerns raised throughout the Commonwealth, particularly in Australia, New Zealand and, indeed, South Africa, about the proposed changes. As I have already said, I am secretary of the Anzac group, so I feel a particular affinity with those Commonwealth citizens who would have their historic right ripped away from them if the proposal were adopted. What a shameful decision that would be, especially when we consider that Australia and New Zealand lost so many of their people—they died for king and country—fighting for us, for the Commonwealth and for freedom in the second world war and the first world war. In that light, we should draw back from any changes, as altering the rules would be an appalling slap in the face. Once again, I hope that the Government will confirm that they will not press ahead with that idea.

Ms Abbott: I am moved by the fervour with which the hon. Gentleman addresses this subject. He will, of course, be aware that thousands of people from the Indian sub-continent also died in the first and second world wars and that many people from the Caribbean also volunteered to fight and die for this country.

Andrew Rosindell: I completely endorse that; we should remember those people as well. We have stood shoulder to shoulder with people in the Caribbean before and many such people still serve in the British forces today, as was mentioned earlier. I, the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington and all MPs—I know that the hon. Member for Thurrock agrees—are proud of all those Commonwealth citizens, whoever they are and whichever particular part of the Commonwealth they come from, who serve alongside British people and are prepared to sacrifice their lives in order to defend freedom and serve Her Majesty's armed forces.

I have met the Labour Prime Minister of New Zealand, the right hon. Helen Clark, before and I met her again in January when she visited the House of Commons. She has promised to take up the case of thousands of New Zealanders who could lose their right to live and work in the UK if the ancestry visa were abolished. She said:

"we believe the ancestry visa should remain, and are surprised that the issue has been raised".

I do not often agree with Helen Clark, but on this particular occasion, I entirely agree with her concerns.

Andrew Mackinlay: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) and have a considerable amount of agreement with them. Is it not a paradox, however, that many people in New Zealand and Australia are able to apply for an Irish Republic passport, by means of which they can live and work in London or even stand for this Parliament? A large number of folk can come here, work here, participate here and be enfranchised here not on the basis of a British passport, but by virtue of the paternal grandfather rights of Irish Republic citizenship. I shall elaborate further on that later.

Andrew Rosindell: That is a revealing point, and I hope that the Minister takes it on board. It is astonishing that people can come here via the Irish route, but might not be able to do so directly. Obviously, there are anomalies that need to be addressed. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention.

What do the Government hope to achieve by severing the historic ties with tens of thousands of Commonwealth nationals who currently have an automatic right, through descent, to live and work here? Immigration is a huge issue in this country, but if we are going to change the immigration laws, the last thing that most British people want to see is immigration from countries such as Australia and New Zealand curtailed. Many of our constituents would have views about immigration from other countries, but everyone accepts that immigration from those countries is welcome. I therefore ask the Government to reconsider.

New Zealanders, in particular, greatly value their connections with Britain, especially those whose grandparents were born here. I have been to New Zealand on several occasions; I was there in September. Of all the countries in the world that I have visited, it is probably the one that is most like the United Kingdom. Those people are deeply proud of their connections to Britain. Sadly, the republican movement in Australia is pretty strong these days, but thankfully it has not succeeded, and I hope that it will not do so. In New Zealand, that movement is much weaker, and no great desire exists to sever that link and turn the country into a republic.

If we make the mistakes that I refer to, however, we merely hasten the day when that constitutional monarchy that binds us together is undone. That will weaken the Commonwealth and our historic links with those countries. I hope that the Government will not make mistakes that could undermine not only Britain's friendship with those countries but the monarchy itself.

The British high commission has said that it receives about 4,000 applications under the ancestry route from New Zealand each year. The removal of that route of entry would be a great betrayal of our Commonwealth cousins, many of whose parents and grandparents fought in world wars to defend this country and the world from tyranny. The United Kingdom's relationship with our antipodean cousins in particular has always been strained by the geographical distance that separates us, at opposite ends of the globe.

Distance has been no bar, however, to the special bond that exists between our three great nations. We endanger that good will by even contemplating the removal of the ancestry route. Although the three countries often fall out over sporting rivalries, whether in cricket, rugby or sailing, our peoples have always shared a common heritage, bound together by a deep-rooted historical and cultural camaraderie. The friendship between the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, and, indeed, Canada, is unrivalled.

Every year, I am proud to attend the open-air Anzac service in Whitehall, followed by the service in Westminster abbey. I encourage all hon. Members to attend the Anzac day ceremonies this year. All Members of Parliament would be very welcome to that event, and it is important that we show we stand shoulder to shoulder with our kith and kin, who lost more per head of population in those wars than we did. We must remember those people and never forget their sacrifice.

We are all English-speaking peoples. We share the same ideals as free trading nations. We believe in democratic governance and a constitutional monarchy under the rule of law. British students travel to New Zealand and Australia and, as we know, their students come here. Almost every student from Australia and New Zealand looks forward to visiting the mother country to work or to stay for a long period, and many school and university leavers from those countries opt to spend their gap year in the United Kingdom. It works both ways.

Perhaps the most significant commonality, however, is the fact that all our nations share similar constitutions based on the Westminster model, and proudly uphold Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II as sovereign Head of State. All that has been furthered and helped by our common ancestry, as is exemplified so clearly in the ancestry route of immigration. As Members will know, the Immigration Act 1971 introduced rules specifying who could come to the United Kingdom and in what circumstances. The Act consolidated previous rules, and in 1972 the ancestry route as it now exists was created. Originally, settled status was given on arrival, but now those arriving through that route must follow the standard procedure of applying for indefinite leave to remain after five years.

In 2006, the last year for which figures are available, 8,490 people arrived in the United Kingdom expressly through the ancestry route, an increase of 230 on the previous year. In the last five years, 44,000 people have arrived in the United Kingdom expressly through that route. An estimated 1,112,000 Commonwealth citizens currently live in the United Kingdom, although not all will have taken the ancestry route.

Given what I must call our Government's abysmal record on immigration control over the past 11 years, it is appalling that they appear to have decided to block the entry of hard-working and legal Commonwealth immigrants, rather than targeting the rampant illegal immigration from across the globe from which we suffer today. I hope that that is not because they feel they must be seen to be acting to control immigration, and have concluded that the repeal of the ancestry route is an easy and uncomplicated option. I trust that the Minister agrees that that would not be the right reason to make such a decision. How can that decision be justified? Perhaps the Minister will tell us at the end of the debate.

I should like the ancestry route to be extended to great-grandparents, if not beyond. We must remember that these people are our kith and kin, descendants from these British islands who sailed the globe to lands far away to raise the Union flag and build a great empire. We cannot and must not betray those people.

I touched on the issue of immigration control earlier, and I want to return to it briefly now. As all Members know, on arrival at Heathrow airport citizens of the European Union are allowed to enter the United Kingdom through an almost unrestricted, uncontrolled area signposted "United Kingdom and EU nationals", while those entering from such countries as Canada, Australia and New Zealand are forced to enter through the section marked "Others". I raised that point in an Adjournment debate on Australia and New Zealand that I secured last year.

We have far closer relations and historical and cultural ties with Canada, Australia and New Zealand than with EU countries, and have more in common with them as Commonwealth nations. Moreover, they have stricter immigration and border controls than most if not all EU states. Yet we treat them almost as aliens, rather than as people to whom we are so closely related. I believe it is time we changed the rules and agreed special arrangements to allow citizens of Commonwealth nations such as Canada, Australia and New Zealand much easier entry to the United Kingdom and vice versa, and I hope the Government will give that careful consideration.

In my Adjournment debate of last year, I asked whether Her Majesty's Government would explore the possibility of developing a reciprocal immigration policy, mirroring that currently in place between the UK and other EU member states. As might be expected, the Minister who responded to the debate made a number of non-committal mutterings, but he did say that he would look into it. Sadly, however, I have as yet heard nothing further, but I hope that the Minister replying to the current debate will address the point. I am sure that such a scheme could be made a reality by amending passport, visa and immigration control procedures. That would benefit the people of those countries, but it would also be of great benefit to the UK.

I wish now to make a few remarks about the citizens of British overseas territories and Crown dependencies. We have not yet discussed these territories in our debate on the Commonwealth, but it is important that we do so. There is confusion about the status of British overseas territories and Crown dependencies within the Commonwealth. I visited the Cayman Islands only two years ago, as part of a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegation. It had suffered horribly as a result of a recent hurricane that had devastated the islands. When I was there, great concern was expressed by the Government and the citizens whom I met about the British Government's failure to go to their aid when they most needed it. It is a sad reflection on British Government policy that when a British territory is devastated by a hurricane, we are not there to assist. They did not need money; they had plenty of financial resources. What they needed was expertise: they needed British police to go there to help, and the assistance of the Royal Navy, but help was not forthcoming.

Sadly, when I went to Montserrat in 2003 a similar picture was painted of how little support the people there had been given following the volcano eruption of 1997. Much was made of the remarks of the now independent Member of Parliament, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), who was then the Secretary of State for International Development. She said they wanted golden elephants, but it is a British territory. Other countries with overseas and dependent territories look after them; they do not treat them as a nuisance—as foreign islands halfway around the world that they do not want to bother about—but that is how our Government seem to treat our overseas and dependent territories. It is time we treated them with greater regard than we have done in recent years.

What is the status of British Crown dependencies and overseas territories within the Commonwealth? They are not fully members in their own right. They are not allowed to send representatives to the Commonwealth Heads of Government meetings as equal leaders of countries, even though very small countries in the Commonwealth, such as Kiribati and Vanuatu, can do that; they can send a leader to CHOGMs, but Bermuda or Gibraltar, for instance, cannot send someone along on an equal footing, so they are disadvantaged in that respect.

What about great occasions such as trooping the colour? Every year I am pleased to attend that celebration of the Queen's official birthday, and I always look at the flags on display around Horse Guards parade. The flags of every Commonwealth country are on display, which is right, but those of the overseas territories and Crown dependencies are not. Last year, there was the absurd situation, commented on in the national media, that during the trooping the colour celebration of the Queen's official birthday, the flags of some territories that retain the Queen as Head of State—such as the Falklands Islands—were not flying, but the flag of Mozambique was.

Mozambique has never had the British monarchy; it has never had the same link as the Falkland Islands. That very weekend we were celebrating the 25th anniversary of the liberation of the Falkland Islands, yet no Falkland Islands flag was displayed on Horseguards parade, whereas the flag of Mozambique was. The Mail on Sunday made a big feature of that, and Baroness Thatcher was quoted as saying she was surprised that the Falkland Islands flag was not flown.

I have raised the point before, but I say again to the Minister that surely the cost of putting a few extra flagpoles on Horseguards parade would be a small price to pay for ensuring that all our remaining overseas territories and our three Crown dependencies of Guernsey, Jersey and the Isle of Man—perhaps I should also include Sark and Alderney to make it five territories—are represented at trooping the colour and on any other day when Commonwealth nations and territories are being celebrated.

Again, I must ask why countries that have also sent their young men and women to die fighting for this country are not able to have a representative to lay a wreath on Remembrance Sunday. Surely the British overseas territories should have at least one representative—even if it alternates and there is a different representative on each occasion—to lay a wreath at the Cenotaph in Whitehall once a year. How much extra would a wreath cost? I ask the Minister to examine the matter. I am sure that we would all chip in for the cost of a wreath, and I think that opportunity should be given.

Meg Munn: A wreath is laid on behalf of the overseas territories by the Foreign Secretary.

Andrew Rosindell: The Minister knows that I am aware of that. Since when should the Falkland Islands or Gibraltar be represented by the Foreign Secretary? I know that is what happens, but they are British territories. I do not understand what problem there is in changing the arrangement and allowing a different Chief Minister or a different Government representative from the overseas territories to lay that wreath in their own right once a year. It should not be done by the Foreign Secretary, who is elected to this Parliament and appointed by a British Prime Minister—the overseas territories have no vote in that. The Foreign Secretary may lay a wreath on their behalf, but they have not elected the Foreign Secretary. They have no Members of Parliament in this Chamber who contribute to a Government, who have a Foreign Secretary. I do not understand how the system has evolved. A simple change to allow the British overseas territories to lay their own wreath would be significant. I know that the Minister is aware of that because the territories have all raised the matter with her. Once again, I ask her to consider allowing that wreath to be laid by them rather than by a British Government Minister.

How about having an annual debate on British overseas territories and Crown dependencies? We make decisions on their behalf, yet nobody in any of those places has a vote in British elections. We sit here debating Gibraltar, as we did in 2002 when the joint sovereignty proposals were made by the then Government of Tony Blair, without the people of Gibraltar having any elected voice or legitimate voice present in this Chamber. I know that the hon. Member for Thurrock has raised this very point. There is a democratic deficit, given that so much is ultimately decided in this Parliament yet those people have no voice of their own.

The whole issue of overseas territories and Crown dependencies needs to be addressed. Perhaps there should be a small Select Committee to look at matters to do with overseas territories and Crown dependencies. Why does only the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs deal with them? Why is there not a better mechanism to address these very real issues?

Meg Munn: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office takes the lead on overseas territories, and I assume that is why the Foreign Affairs Committee decided to conducts its current inquiry into this area. Other Departments have responsibility for a range of issues in overseas territories—this is a Government-wide responsibility—so other Select Committees, such as the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, could specifically examine the issues in relation to overseas territories. There is nothing to prevent their doing that.

Andrew Rosindell: That is very helpful and I hope that that point will be taken on board. Issues relating to those great territories for which we have responsibility are often overlooked.

The Commonwealth is, as has already been said, a unique organisation, and we should be very proud of our role in developing it. As it develops still further, let us consider other countries that have a special link to Britain, although they may not have been part of the British empire. I am thinking especially of some Gulf states in the middle east. There is no reason why they could not decide to become part of the British Commonwealth. Hong Kong is of course now part of the People's Republic of China, but we have very close links there still, and it retains much of what we left. If the Chinese Government decided to allow Hong Kong to join the Commonwealth, why should we not encourage that?

Let us expand the Commonwealth further. I know that the hon. Member for Thurrock intends to say a few words in a moment about the Republic of Ireland, and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) mentioned it earlier. I would love to see the day when we could bring the Republic of Ireland into the Commonwealth of nations. Irish people have worked alongside the English, Welsh and Scottish to build this great Commonwealth. They sailed the world with us and helped to build democracies, constitutions and freedom in many other countries. I would love to see the Irish Republic take its place alongside the rest of us in the Commonwealth of nations.

Although I had not considered the point, my hon. Friend is correct to mention the United States of America. Why should it not have the opportunity to become part of the Commonwealth? That is a wonderful idea and I would certainly support that proposal. A future Conservative Government may wish to propose that to a future president. Who knows what the future holds?

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has no truer friends in the world than the Commonwealth of nations, especially Australia, New Zealand, Canada, countries in the Caribbean, India, the British overseas territories and all the nations that retain Her Majesty the Queen as Head of State. But we must develop links with the whole of the Commonwealth and value it for its diversity. We draw strength from it and we can be immensely proud of it. I hope that all hon. Members will continue to work with parliamentarians from, and the Governments of, all the countries in the Commonwealth to make this world a better place.

4.2 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I hope that hon. Members will bear with me, because I shall address the House without notes on an issue that I have been considering for some time. Before doing so, however, I want to pick up two points.

The hon. Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) mentioned overseas territories and Remembrance Sunday. I know that I speak for my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle)—he would have liked to attend this debate, but he has an overriding engagement in his constituency—when I say that it is churlish and silly of the Government not to grant the representatives of the overseas territories the right to lay wreaths on Remembrance Sunday. If the Minister gets her people to look into this, she will find that the London representative of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland used to lay a wreath. It was only after the federation broke up and Rhodesia declared independence that the Foreign Office started to lay a wreath on behalf of that territory. Putting aside the franchise issue, Gibraltar and Bermuda certainly have the same constitutional status as the old Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Constitutional status should be extended to all 14 or 15 other overseas territories, if they so wish, but Gibraltar and Bermuda have contributed so much to our armed forces and so on that they should certainly have it. It is silly for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to hold so resolutely to its position.

To elaborate on my earlier intervention, Ireland's constitution and citizenship rights mean that people with parents or grandparents born before 1949 in any of the Republic's 32 counties can claim Irish citizenship, even if those forebears moved to New Zealand, Australia or other Commonwealth states such as Canada and those in the Caribbean. However, the fact that the Irish Republic and the UK share a common status means that the descendants whom I have mentioned can come to London to work or even get elected to this Parliament.

My central point, however, picks up on something that the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) said earlier about the Irish Republic. Some hon. Members have said that Madagascar should join the Commonwealth, and I am one of those looking forward to Pakistan's return to the fold, but the great country of Ireland was one of the members of the original organisation and many Irish statesman contributed to what is now our modern Commonwealth.

I did not want to interrupt the hon. Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) earlier, but it is worth remembering that, although the Queen is head of the Commonwealth, the overwhelming majority of member countries are republics. That is significant when it comes to inviting Ireland to rejoin and fill its empty chair. The Queen is the Head of State for some Commonwealth countries, but that should not be confused with her status as head of the Commonwealth.

Who was the architect of that concept? Amazingly, it was Eamon de Valera. People often forget that he had the idea of countries belonging to an external association within the empire. His "Document No. 2" of 1921 made it clear that he was prepared to accept George V as the head of that association, but that he wanted Ireland to be a republic. That idea was subsequently swept aside. The Costello Government finally took Ireland out of the Commonwealth in 1948—the relevant legislation came into force in 1949—but it was in that period that the Indian Republic was accommodated and invited to enter the Commonwealth for the first time. Most Commonwealth states are republics, so it is clear that Eamon de Valera's concept of a family of nations was prophetic. The Commonwealth that ultimately emerged did not belong to Britain; it was mutually shared and owned by its members, exactly as de Valera had envisaged.

In the Irish Free State of the 1920s and 1930s, Patrick McGilligan, the external affairs Minister, Desmond FitzGerald, the father of Garret FitzGerald, and Kevin O'Higgins were responsible for driving much of the business of the Dominion Prime Ministers conferences of the period. They were the architects of what became known as the statute of Westminster, in which the charters of independence for Australia, New Zealand and the other countries that maintain the monarchical tradition have their roots.

The people who negotiated Dominion status in 1921 and 1922 were rooted in Ireland's republican tradition, and they helped to forge so much of today's Commonwealth tradition. When the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) rightly referred to the Anzac contribution in two world wars and other conflicts, I could not help but reflect on the fact that many of the people in the British armed forces who fought for our freedom were drawn from what we know nowadays as the Irish Republic. Indeed, if we look at the wall behind the Serjeant at Arms, we can see the red crest of Willie Redmond—a Member of the House of Commons and the oldest British officer killed on the western front. He was a proud patriot and an Irish nationalist, but he is remembered here. He represents thousands of others who fought in our armed forces, even in what is known in Ireland as the emergency—world war two—when about 50,000 Irish people were in our armed forces and merchant marine. The Irish are everywhere in the old Commonwealth and other parts of it; the Irish tradition is everywhere.

I am disappointed that in the past 11 years neither the Major Government nor the Labour Government realised that we should address the wrong that is Ireland's omission from the Commonwealth. The reply from successive Governments to my parliamentary questions has been that it is for Ireland to apply. That is disingenuous; it is not fraternal. We should tell Ireland that we want it to occupy the chair that it vacated. The best way to achieve that would be for the Prime Ministers of some of the big players, such as Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Jamaica, to take the initiative with the Taoiseach. They should say, "This is no longer the British Commonwealth. Of course, its genesis is in our common history, but now it is a mutual society of nations owned by Australia, Jamaica, South Africa and many other African states, the Republic of India and the Republic of Pakistan, when its suspension is over. It is ours, why don't you join us?"

Why do I want Ireland in the Commonwealth? The Irish Republic has a proud record of internationalism. It is one of the first countries the UN Secretary-General calls on for quality peacekeeping troops. They have no imperial baggage, and he can rely on them. The Irish punch above their numerical weight in the European Union, where they are highly regarded. Ireland will probably provide the first president of the European Union—perhaps to the disappointment of some people in London.

Ireland is a big player, but the one international organisation in which it does not participate is the Commonwealth. We have discussed the structures of the Commonwealth, but I would like to see an Irish team at the Commonwealth games, which is a rich festival of sport and, after the Olympics, one of the most important international sporting events.

Irish membership of the Commonwealth would be a small but not insignificant factor in the positive developments in the island of Ireland over the past 12 months. It would be a further contributory factor to cover differences in traditions that have caused aggravation, but in which people also find their common identity. A small number of people in the Irish Republic identify with UK Britishness, which they cannot currently express. When I raised the subject in a Westminster Hall debate, I received letters from people in the Irish Republic who cannot have read my contribution, because they believe that the Commonwealth is the British Commonwealth. If anyone reading Hansard should trespass on my remarks today, I emphasise the point that the Commonwealth is not the British Commonwealth; it is owned by all the other states, the majority of which are republics.

We should take the initiative at CHOGM and discuss with other members whether Ireland's chair, which has been vacant since 1948, could be occupied once more. Actually, I do not think that Ireland left; it has been left in a sort of halfway house, because when the Costello Government declared the Irish Republic in 1948-49, this House enacted legislation that said that all citizens of the Irish Republic had citizenship rights equal to those of people from the United Kingdom, could stand for election to local authorities and to Parliament, and could take ministerial office. A number of people who identified themselves as Irish have served in that capacity in this place. That was the precursor to the concept of Irish people being Commonwealth citizens, because the concept did not exist at that stage.

Our franchise is extended to United Kingdom people, citizens of the Irish Republic and Commonwealth citizens, who have the full franchise here and can be elected to the House—I believe that Commonwealth citizens have been Ministers. I urge the Minister to go back to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and ask for a proper brief. If she were to ask, "Is anything in the historical record that Mackinlay outlined incorrect?" the answer would be no—what I have said is absolutely correct, because I have spent some time studying the subject. I think that she will conclude that it is appropriate for the Prime Minister to discuss the issue with the other Commonwealth Prime Ministers and Heads of Government to see whether the situation can be remedied.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The personal connections that have been mentioned in the debate have, in some cases, been very moving. The advantage of having such a lengthy debate is that we can reveal a lot more than we normally do. I welcome the debate, in which particularly moving speeches have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) and the hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas), who gave an interesting account of Sierra Leone. I shall refer to Rwanda later, and we shall see some similarities.

First, may I say how proud I am of my connections with the Commonwealth? I was the sponsor Minister for Manchester and Salford in the mid-1990s, when John Major took the decision to back the Commonwealth games in Manchester. I am proud that a Conservative Government did that. I know that the games took place under the Labour Government, but John Major's decision to put the Government four-square behind them was the clinching factor in their coming to Manchester, and what a fantastic success they were, both for Manchester and the Commonwealth. I remember the extraordinary work by Frances Done, who did a great job on the administration, Robert Hough and, of course, the extraordinary Howard Bernstein—he is now Sir Howard Bernstein, partly as a result of work on the games.

It is appropriate that the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) is here, because I want to mention our long association with South Africa, which began in the dark days when South Africa was not a member of the Commonwealth. In 1986, we stood shoulder to shoulder at a demonstration in Crossroads, just before the tear gas started, and we returned many times in subsequent years. It was a great joy to us when the efforts of so many friends with whom we worked over the years—people who were struggling for peaceful change and reconciliation—came to fruition. One of the significant effects of the change in South Africa was, of course, to bring it back into the fold as a Commonwealth country. We were both at the first Commonwealth service held after the country came back into the fold. I am sure that the memories of those days and our friends in South Africa are as vivid to him as they are to me.

This year, my wife and I are looking forward to celebrating our 25th wedding anniversary in Ghana, where we will build houses with Habitat for Humanity, a terrific Christian-based charity that has done tremendous work providing houses all over the world. The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey will know about that from his constituency work, because like me, he is on the board of patrons of Habitat for Humanity Great Britain. I am very much looking forward to going to Ghana, as I have not been to west Africa.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I encourage the hon. Gentleman, when he goes to Ghana, to check out the work of Cadbury. Ghana produces more cocoa for Cadbury than any other country in the world. I know that the company is very proud of its work in Ghana, particularly the work it is doing to promote local projects, and specifically development projects. I encourage him to pop along and see that company. Who knows, Cadbury might be willing to support him and some of the interests that he is active in?

Alistair Burt: I thank the hon. Lady most sincerely for that suggestion. I am sure that in west Africa a day without chocolate would be like a day without sunshine. I shall certainly take her up on that offer. If Cadbury is not familiar with the work of Habitat for Humanity, I would certainly be keen to introduce the company to it.

As has been mentioned by many hon. Members, the significance of the Commonwealth is too often overlooked. It is possible that too many people in this country did not notice that 10 March was Commonwealth day. I want to make one or two remarks about the unique status of the Commonwealth, its growth and the role that I would like it to play in development in the future.

There are many references in newspapers and periodicals to its being fashionable in this country to criticise the Commonwealth and to see it as an organisation that is inherently anti-British and institutionally ineffective. It rather reminds me of the old joke about the bloke who goes into a hardware shop to ask for a particular sort of light bulb only to be told by the harassed shopkeeper, "You're the 20th person we've told today: there's no demand for it." We constantly say that the Commonwealth is undervalued, yet here we are talking about its life and vibrancy. Everywhere we go, we know that people are well aware that the Commonwealth is more than alive and well. It is not in any way a declining institution.

Perhaps we see the Commonwealth in a particular way in this country, but when one travels abroad, one sees how much it is welcomed. It is a little like the EU. We can be keen to criticise in the UK, but it is possible to see how important the EU is in the Balkans in providing a framework to settle the conflicts in a region that has been beset by them for too long.

I do not buy the idea of the Commonwealth as a declining institution. I am proud of its history, its origins and what it provides today. Colleagues have mentioned the unique aspects of the Commonwealth. It has 53 member nations, representing nearly 2 billion people in a vast, diverse grouping that transcends the north-south divide, a feat that can be matched only by the UN. It puts the rich countries, such as the UK, Australia and Canada, into contact with poorer nations in order to share best business practice and technology and to assist developing countries. It does so not out of pure economic or geographical interest, but out of a sense of relationship, which is so important in world politics. We see so many things happen in the world that are based purely on transaction and on "What's in it for me? What's in it for you? Let's do something together only if that is the relationship that we have." If there is something deeper—in the Commonwealth, there is—it means much more.

That sense of relationship, will be of great importance in a world that is becoming increasingly reliant on power blocs—a world of shrinking resources and potential global conflict. Whether it is the EU, north America or in terms of the increasing power of China, the world blocs are coming together. Something like the Commonwealth, which straddles those blocs, will be incredibly important in the future.

It is that backdrop that has made the Commonwealth's role in conflict resolution so important. We have discussed Kenya and the successes there and the worries about Zimbabwe, but let us not forget Sri Lanka, Kashmir and Cyprus. They are places where the Commonwealth can and should still have a role to play, using its unique background to try to deal with conflict resolution.

For a declining organisation, the Commonwealth has a remarkable number of people who want to join it, and that has to be the key test of a thriving group of people. Other colleagues have mentioned the fact that more countries that do not have a link to the old countries want to join. Mozambique has been mentioned. I want to talk a little about Rwanda, and say how much I welcome its application to join the Commonwealth, which has every prospect of success.

I and some 43 colleagues from the Conservative party—including eight Members of Parliament, among whom were my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), who organised the visit—went to Rwanda last summer on the largest international development programme ever devised by a political party in the United Kingdom. We were proud to do so, and we followed in the footsteps of other volunteers working overseas. We pay tribute to all those who do such work all over the world. We were working on projects with the support and backing of the Rwandan Government through the relationship with President Paul Kagame—a relationship that has been fostered by the present Government. We are the biggest international donor to Rwanda, and this country has a terrific relationship with Rwanda, which was much needed. The fact that it is a consensual relationship on both sides of the House is of great importance.

We followed a whole variety of projects. Work was done in rebuilding and renovating a school and an orphanage. We made sure that the projects were sustainable and had a legacy. We set up twinning with schools, and colleagues worked in Ministers' offices and in local government. There was a concentration on health. The remarkable Dr. David Tibbutt, a member of one of the teams working there—he is also the Worcester city council cabinet member for urban renaissance and a wonderful doctor—described the work that he was doing as follows:

"Kirambi Health Centre is about 2 to 3 hours drive from Kigali over difficult roads and numerous bridges...The geography of the 'land of a thousand hills' is a major obstacle to accessing healthcare: walking many kilometres is the main means by which people reach a clinic!

At the Health Centre we conducted six all-day clinics. Our visit had been announced previously in the Church. On the first day we were overwhelmed by 150 patients and managed to see about 100: the remainder had to be sent away as it was too dark...and there was no artificial light available. In all we saw 473 patients. It was interesting to note that a large proportion of the presented problems were of a musculo-skeletal nature: backache and arthritis. Such problems may seem trivial. However, put into the social context of many hours of daily hard work on the land and walking across hilly terrain it becomes clear how important the management of these problems is."

So we worked on health care and health projects in rural and city areas, and we of course looked at the legacy of genocide. The whole modern history of Rwanda is tainted by the genocide of 1994, and yet enriched by the extraordinary recovery in that country. The hon. Member for Crosby spoke about the recovery taking place in Sierra Leone from involvement in the civil war, and how forgiving some communities had been in the most difficult of circumstances. That characteristic has also been part of Rwanda's recovery, and it is an extraordinary lesson for us.

We looked at the work of the gacaca courts and how communities have come to terms with what happened in Rwanda. We should remember that one tenth of a population of 10 million people were victims of the genocide. A civil court system cannot deal with all this, so it has been done through local community courts. The shadow Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), put it this way when he went to see this work:

"that, for me, summed up Rwanda. Whilst there may not be a perfect reconciliation, there is no lust for revenge. As one survivor said to me, 'killing the people who carried out the killings would serve no purpose'. What there is is an accommodation, a common wish to move forward".

This sense of forgiveness and tolerance, in the most difficult of circumstances that none of us here can possibly truly comprehend, is the hallmark of what Rwanda is doing. It is still a poor country, but it is getting somewhere.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman with great interest. He spoke about volunteer groups in Rwanda working on health projects, and he made a passing comment about school twinning. Will he take the opportunity to congratulate the British Council on the number of twinning projects that it has established between Rwanda and schools in the UK, and in other countries in Africa? Will he also congratulate all the British citizens, including some of my own constituents, who are working on valuable health projects in Rwanda?

Alistair Burt: Absolutely. The British Council does fantastic work overseas, as more than one colleague has mentioned during the debate. We all recognise the need to deal with what is happening overseas, but only when we go there and see the scale of the difficulties do we realise that we should be doing more. When we introduce children to the problems that their brothers and sisters are experiencing around the world, that can be incredibly powerful.

School twinning and similar projects do a great deal, and it is a two-way process. Teachers get an opportunity to see the extraordinary skills of some of those working in the most difficult conditions. I remember a little village school that I went to see, where the facilities and resources were practically nil. The teacher had painted Pythagoras' theorem all around the blackboard because the school could not afford to have it printed out. He had painted it for his children on the walls. That is remarkable testimony to how extraordinary people are and what they will do with the most meagre resources to make things better.

Returning to the progress that has been made in Rwanda, the Minister will be delighted to know that 48 per cent. of Members of Parliament in Rwanda are women. Women play an extraordinary role there. There are 1 million widows, as a result of the genocide. The chair of the Conservative Women's Organisation, Fiona Hodgson, spent a great deal of time over the two weeks in Rwanda working with women right across the board, from those in prison to those in ministerial office. Their contribution to the recovery of Rwanda is so important.

That country has been through unparalleled troubles. Through their president and their Government, and through their own commitment and that of people from outside, the people of Rwanda are making something of themselves. What a wonderful addition to the Commonwealth they will make. They can contribute so much from their history and background, and I very much look forward to their joining.

My final point relates to future development. In the debate we have spoken about climate change, but we have not spoken a great deal about pressure on other resources, which is becoming frightening. Because it will affect the Commonwealth so much, I shall ask the Minister at the end of my remarks to what extent consideration of that problem will form part of the Commonwealth's drive for development in the future, and how the Commonwealth will react to the pressure on the resources of the planet and the way that they are being used.

I appreciate the help of Professor Chris Lever of Oxford university, who recently gave a presentation to Members of Parliament, in assembling some key facts. In 1927 the world population was 2 billion, in 1960 it was 3 billion, and today it is 6.5 billion. It is increasing by 70 million every year. It has doubled in about 50 years and by 2050 there will be 9 billion people on the planet, many of them in the developing world, and many in countries that are members of the Commonwealth.

Over that period, what has happened to the resources to feed those people and meet their other needs? If we consider the past 100 years and the impact on land, about a fifth of the world's topsoil has been lost through erosion and salination. About a fifth of agricultural land has been lost. A third of the forests have been lost. One estimate suggests that 50 per cent. of arable land may be unusable by 2050 because it has been over-irrigated and over-grazed.

Pressures are increasing and almost all the increase in demand will come from developing countries. The livestock revolution is changing the demand for cereals, which is affecting wheat prices as we talk today, and the House can imagine what the situation may be like in 30 years' time. The competition now between crops and biofuels will add to the problem. To feed 9 billion people in 2050 without allowing for additional imports of food, Africa will have to increase its food production by 300 per cent., Latin America by 80 per cent. and Asia by 70 per cent.

[Alistair Burt]

We are running out of water. Worldwide, more than 70 per cent. of food production is dependent on irrigation. The depletion of aquifers is occurring at twice the rate required to recharge them. Salination and desertification are major consequences of irrigation.

As so many of the effects of those uncomfortable truths will be felt in Commonwealth countries, to what extent is the Commonwealth taking a lead in combating those pressures on resources? This is not just about climate change or environment; it is about how a developing world that wants to catch up, and which in many ways has an absolute moral right to catch up, with everything that we have taken for granted for so long, will be able to do so, and how the world's resources will stretch to achieve that. What is the legacy for the grandchildren of the Commonwealth of those of us who are here today? I should be grateful if the Minister in her concluding remarks would consider that and what might be done in the future.

Despite the joke at the beginning of my speech, we are all aware of the importance of the Commonwealth, but it is probably true that there is a danger that the British people are at some risk of forgetting its historical significance and not appreciating its vibrancy for today. We must not forget that we fought two world wars together with Commonwealth countries, as the cemeteries in France and Belgium show. My hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley paid tribute to the Anzacs at Gallipoli. Gallipoli is remembered in very few places in the UK today, except Bury, my home town, which was the garrison town of the Lancashire Fusiliers, who famously won six VCs before breakfast, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) would inevitably know, and he would presumably be able to quote the names of all those who won them. Bury is intimately tied up with Gallipoli where so many men from the town died. Those links must never be forgotten, and that is why my hon. Friend spoke so movingly about the length and depth of the relationship between Australia and New Zealand and this country. There exists between us a deep historical and unique link that we would be foolish ever to forget.

But it is also clear from contributions from all parts of the House that as well as the past there is a present vibrancy to the Commonwealth as it considers its future and plays a more substantial role. I firmly believe that it may find its fullest and most important voice in development and resource issues, because so many of its citizens will suffer if we fail to deal with the threats of environmental damage and resource depletion that face us today.

4.38 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): I was caught off guard to be called now, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I naturally assumed that a colleague of greater seniority would catch your eye before me, but I am most gratified by your beneficence. It is a great pleasure to take part in the debate. We are a few days late for Commonwealth day. I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the Minister for myself being a few minutes late for her speech, but I was a little surprised that she sat down so soon after I arrived. Perhaps she will enlighten us with further thoughts when she responds to the debate, because this debate is about an important topic. The Commonwealth is always in danger of seeming like no more than a hangover from bygone days, a fading institution, and those who talk about it are often caricatured as latter-day blimpish figures harking back to the glory days of empire. However, the reality of the modern world creates potential for a 21st-century Commonwealth that far exceeds anything that most people associate with it today. We have heard a lot in this debate about kith and kin, historical and cultural relationships, and development. We have heard powerful speeches on those issues, but I wish to turn principally to the economic relationships.

Let me say at the outset that I do not claim originality for the fundamentals of this idea, which have been expounded in many articles and speeches by my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Howell of Guildford. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) has just graced us with a powerful and profound speech about the challenges facing the modern Commonwealth and modern world. However, I take exception to his assertion that the world is increasingly breaking into power blocs. Lord Howell makes the opposite observation: he has marked the transition of global trade and politics from the superpower blocs of the cold war to what he calls a "network world"—one in which global communications technology is progressively neutralising many of the limitations imposed by geography that we grew up with and accepted as fact. It is a world in which, to quote my right hon. and noble Friend:

> "Thanks to the extraordinary power and pervasiveness of the information revolution we live in an era now not of blocs and pyramid tiers of power and management but of networks and meshes, both formal and informal.
> By accident as much as design the Commonwealth emerges from a controversial past to take a perfect place in this new order of thinking and acting."

Alistair Burt: May I add to that argument? I completely understand my hon. Friend's and Lord Howell's point, which is perfectly sensible. What I worry about is that we see world conflicts beginning to centre around the availability of resources. Under that pressure, will what my hon. Friend has described break down and will people go back to the power blocs with which they are familiar—based on ties, geography and economics? We might have to contract to deal with the problems of the future.

Mr. Jenkin: I understand my hon. Friend's point, which is about protectionism. We must guard against that, because protectionism will lead to precisely that kind of unhealthy competition between nations, as opposed to the healthy competition that derives from a system of free trade.

The Commonwealth could rapidly become an ever more powerful alliance without the disadvantage of a single dominating state, as there is in NATO, or a dominating group of states, as there is in the European Union or the United Nations. Such an alliance could be bound together by common interests to do with promoting free trade, democracy and international security. Furthermore—we must say this deferentially and with tact—as an English-speaking alliance, much of the Commonwealth reflects British values of freedom, democracy and tolerance and retains a high regard for the United Kingdom and the role that we play in the world.

My central point today is that the Government, Parliament and the nation are not paying sufficient attention to the Commonwealth and that a more positive UK engagement with the Commonwealth would greatly benefit this nation, our trade, foreign policy and defence relationships, and the world.

The Commonwealth exists primarily because of trade, as did the empire that preceded it. Long before the Raj, the British were in India for trading purposes, and that was the case across the globe—British trade came before British governance. British governance has long since been confined to the history books, but the opportunity remains for British trade to flourish. As we have heard today, the Commonwealth comprises an amazing array of nations—rich and poor, large and small. The UK already trades extensively with Commonwealth countries. It is clear that Commonwealth countries, led by India and alongside China—with which the UK also shares a special relationship by virtue of our former colony, Hong Kong—are the coming force in the global economy.

EU gross domestic product is $14.5 trillion, slightly more than that of the US, which is $13.9 trillion. The combined GDP of the Commonwealth is already $7.8 trillion, or 16 per cent. of the global economy in 2006, and growing faster than that of the EU or the United States.

When we compare economic growth rates in Europe with those of the Commonwealth, it is painfully obvious that the Commonwealth presents the most fruitful opportunities for the expansion of British trade in the future. Since 2000, growth in the eurozone has averaged 2 per cent. per annum, but in Canada the average has been 2.9 per cent.; in Australia, 3.3 per cent.; in New Zealand, 3.4 per cent.; in South Africa, 4.2 per cent.; in Malaysia, 5.4 per cent.; in Nigeria—one of the growing number of African countries that is now a net exporter of capital, which is not what we expect—5.5 per cent.; in Singapore, 5.7 per cent.; and in India, 7 per cent. Many Commonwealth countries are becoming the motors of the global economy of the future. The Commonwealth also contains 13 of the world's fastest-growing economies. They also comprise, outside the US and Japan, all the key cutting-edge countries in information technology and e-commerce.

We are not yet making the most of these opportunities. In 2006, the UK exported £26.8 billion of goods and services to Australia, Canada, Malaysia, India, Nigeria, Singapore and South Africa—barely more than the £24.1 billion that we exported to Ireland alone. The combined population of these Commonwealth countries is 1.38 billion, compared with 4.3 million in Ireland. We share an affinity with Commonwealth countries every bit as potent as, say, with Ireland. I am much taken with the idea that we should invite Ireland to rejoin the Commonwealth, and I hope that that point, which was made by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), will be taken up by the Minister. These relationships are all the more potent because we can be the Commonwealth representative in the EU as well as being the Commonwealth representative as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council.

Hugh Bayley: One of the great benefits of the enlargement of the European Union is that three Commonwealth countries—Malta and Cyprus, as well as the UK—are now members of the EU, and we should be working together to deliver Commonwealth policies in Europe.

Mr. Jenkin: I do not quite see a Commonwealth axis emerging in the European Union, but I entirely agree with the sentiment expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

The point about the Commonwealth countries is that there is a natural commonality of language, law, accounting systems and business regulation that lends itself to trade between those countries. As these countries grow richer, is there any reason why they should be less attracted to British goods and services than, say, European countries? The Prime Minister tells us that 3.5 million jobs depend on trade with the European Union, but there is a danger that by focusing too narrowly on European trade we are ignoring the possibility of creating millions more jobs with our Commonwealth partners. Indeed, the Prime Minister himself has said that > "whenever the choice has been between protectionism and the open seas, Britain has chosen the open seas...we, the British people, have chosen to see the Channel not as a moat but as a highway to the rest of the world".

I commend those words, but there is a danger that we are missing that boat.

This prompts the question of what a British trade policy might be were we to develop more freedom under the EU customs union and therefore be less obliged to apply a purely EU tariff regime to all imports from Commonwealth countries. As the EU continues in relative decline and the Commonwealth and China roar ahead, how is the balance of advantage for British trade likely to shift in that environment? It is ironic, amid all the talk that we are hearing about aid, that the EU is in the process of imposing so-called economic partnership agreements on many Commonwealth countries—not, I imagine, something that the UK Government are entirely happy with. Many African, Caribbean and Pacific countries have refused to sign the pro-forma agreements offered by the European Commission, resulting in a tangle of separate and complex agreements for different, often neighbouring nations. We are therefore likely to see increases in tariffs on exports from some of the poorest countries in the world.

Much has been made of British and EU aid flows to Commonwealth countries, but in the longer term the trading relationship could be far more important than the aid relationship. I hope that our European Union partners wish us to be a good member of the Commonwealth as much as they want us to be a good member of the EU. That should not present any sort of conflict, nor should positive membership of one lead to neglect of the other.

Trade is vital to our prosperity. Napoleon derided the English for being a nation of shopkeepers only because the UK was so good at being a trading nation. But in these uncertain times, the Commonwealth offers a vehicle for political co-operation and international action that is unparalleled by any other global institution. The Commonwealth is an institution with members in all continents. It has more than 500 million Muslim inhabitants, for example, and it supports democracy throughout the globe. Freedom House, the US-based non-governmental organisation, produces an annual freedom index based on the political rights and civil liberties of each nation's population. In 2008, there are 54 countries outside Europe that Freedom House reckons to be free, and 26 are members of the Commonwealth. A further 18 Commonwealth countries are reckoned to be partly free and only five are judged to be not free. The Commonwealth, therefore, is a beacon for democracy and human rights in parts of our world where that light is sometimes at its dimmest. Six of the 11 free nations in sub-Saharan Africa and eight of the 16 free countries in the Asia-Pacific region are in the Commonwealth.

The geographical, racial, cultural and religious diversity of the Commonwealth is one of its great strengths. Its values are our values and we must remain fully engaged with it if we, other member countries and the rest of the world are to continue to benefit from it. The Minister mentioned climate change as an initiative to be pursued through the Commonwealth and we can do a great deal to address that agenda, along with the promotion of biodiversity, the saving of rainforests and other environmental initiatives.

As these nations grow in economic significance, so their influence, military and aid capabilities are likely to grow. We are already joined with Canada, Australia and other Commonwealth nations in military operations in Afghanistan, for example. Canada is a member of NATO; Australia is obviously not, but that suggests a huge potential for NATO to develop more formal association agreements with a range of non-Euro-Atlantic powers for the purpose of multinational operations. Some Commonwealth countries are already represented at NATO headquarters at Mons in Belgium. Perhaps there is even a case for the Commonwealth flag to be flown on Commonwealth peacekeeping operations.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify the type of Commonwealth countries that he thinks ought to be part of an economic trading agreement? Do they include, for instance, countries that could be classified as post-conflict or fragile states, and what sort of criteria would he expect to have in place that would allow those countries to participate in the trade that he is talking about and of which I know they would like to be a part?

Mr. Jenkin: I am an advocate of free trade, and ultimately, I would like a barrier-free world. The ideals of an open and free market that we have pursued in the European Union were ahead of their time. They foreshadowed globalisation, and the Commonwealth is an opportunity to extend such freedoms beyond the shores of Europe. I do not see that we need to categorise particular nations as post-recovery and so on. We have to be careful, however. The problem with the economic partnership agreements is that they require reciprocal liberalisation of a nation's tariff regime alongside that of the EU. That makes demands on some poorer countries that are impossible for them to accept. Their tariff regimes often provide an important component of their income and removing that would rob their Governments of their means of self-sustenance because they do not have a natural indigenous tax base. Secondly, they have fledgling industries that are often not very competitive, which would simply be swamped. We remember the business of the substitute milk products that flooded some African economies and destroyed indigenous production of food for children and babies.

As those countries emerge from being so far behind economically, the sort of agreements we need with them will have to tolerate a degree of protectionism for those economies until they emerge strongly enough to take part as full members of the global economy. I hope that that answers the hon. Lady's question. It was a very complex one, so I doubt that I have answered it as fully as it deserves.

I was coming on to the sort of defence relationships that could develop throughout the Commonwealth. I would point out that there may be a case for the Commonwealth flag to be flown over Commonwealth military bases in certain peacekeeping operations. If it is okay for the EU to fly the flag over military operations, why not the Commonwealth? We have more in common with many Commonwealth nations than with many EU nations, so we should not be confined by a narrow Euro-centric view of potential threats to our security or of the possibilities of resolving them through co-operation with nations beyond the EU or NATO. That should be attractive to the US and to European nations seeking to widen the burden sharing of multinational security operations as well as to those who want to encourage groupings to emerge that will counterbalance the tendency of the US to dominate militarily in the world.

There is a danger, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office directing too little of its attention towards the Commonwealth part of its remit. My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Howell of Guildford suggests that it should be called the Commonwealth and Foreign Office in order to concentrate the minds of Ministers and officials. Unlimited hours of officialdom have generated reams and reams of paper about our relationship with the EU—we are all guilty in this House, me included, of giving so much attention to that relationship—yet relatively little effort is devoted to the Commonwealth and the huge economic and political potential it represents in the 21st century.

It is, of course, right, given our role in the EU, that the FCO should be concerned with our engagement with that institution and our partners in it, but I would suggest that more attention needs to be paid to the Commonwealth and how that institution can be developed and strengthened. Otherwise, we run the risk of being too parochial, too narrowly European and not global enough in our outlook.

Other countries recognise the political and economic importance of Commonwealth countries and are investing in them. Some of that, such as the American engagement with India, is welcome. Other developments, such as the massive Chinese investment in sub-Saharan Africa, are not so welcome, and The Economist recently described that as marking the Chinese out as "the new colonialists". They are ruthlessly and single-mindedly exporting their population to many African countries in order to exploit their mineral and natural resources, often with little regard for the long-term environmental consequences or, tragically, for the human rights of either their own people or the indigenous populations.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: I rise to support that comment, because I have my own experience of what the hon. Gentleman is describing in respect of Sierra Leone and other west African countries, where the Chinese role is nothing but flagrant opportunism. Everything is being taken out and, as far as I can see, absolutely nothing is being put back.

Mr. Jenkin: At risk of extending my remarks further than necessary, I think that both Chinese and Russian involvement in the African continent presents a potential security threat. It is, of course, a gloomy symptom of that threat that the United States has felt it necessary to open an African headquarters for its military. One is horrified at the prospect of a sort of rerun of what happened in Africa in the 19th century, as dominance over the continent is effectively fought over by proxy by the superpowers once again. If we can possibly avoid that, we should. I submit that there is a huge role for the Commonwealth in trying to prevent that from happening. I ascribe no malicious intent to the Americans, who are reacting in the only way they can; otherwise, the continent will become an unchallenged space for China and Russia.

Engagement with the Commonwealth should therefore be at the front and centre of our foreign policy, beyond the borders of our own continent. Winston Churchill believed that the UK needed to be as committed to its relationship with Europe as to that with the United States and the Commonwealth. Of course, the world has changed greatly since Churchill's day, but it is striking how, after decolonisation, the Commonwealth as a network of powers is on the march once again. Economic growth and globalisation have the potential to transform the Commonwealth into a body of increasing importance. But I fear—I put this to the Minister—that a speech of just 16 minutes from a junior Minister is an indicator that the Government do not attach to the Commonwealth the importance that it will increasingly deserve. I very much hope that she will recompense us in her closing remarks.

5 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Had the Commonwealth not just appointed a new secretary-general, I would have just heard an extremely eloquent bid from the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) to be considered for that post. I was pleased that he put the case strongly for the Commonwealth to be recognised, valued, appreciated and objectively assessed for the huge benefit that it is and can be.

At nearly the end of an absolutely fascinating debate, I reflect on the fact that eight weeks ago I started my weekly pestering of the Leader of the House for a Commonwealth debate as near as possible to Commonwealth day, not just for this year but as a regular feature of parliamentary life. I hope that hon. Members feel that that request has been vindicated. I agree with colleagues' comments that Parliament could do even more to recognise the Commonwealth at around the time that it is recognised across the Commonwealth. There is absolutely no reason why we could not have a fixed point in the calendar—just as the second Monday in March is Commonwealth day—which could be protected, as other business can be, to allow us to debate the huge, historic, current and future benefit that we have as part of the Commonwealth and that the Commonwealth gives to the world.

A lively debate took place yesterday on the future of the post office network in this country, against the backdrop that many of the post offices that we value will be closed down, which many people regret. The good news is that no one in the House wants the Commonwealth to be closed down—absolutely the contrary. We ought not just to stand up for the Commonwealth, but to reflect on how beneficial it is, and to see whether we can build on its current state, which is already healthy, but it could be an even healthier contributor to the world.

Some particularly notable speeches have been made. I hope that the Minister will feed that back to the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues, so that when he leaves for his Easter holiday, he realises that he is the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, or the Commonwealth and Foreign Secretary, and not just one rather than the other. The hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) made a hugely impressive, extremely moving speech about the historic, practical, trade and cultural links between New Zealand and this country. It caused me to reflect that a number of parliamentary colleagues in my lifetime have had a Commonwealth background. Edwin Leather is the first one I remember having been a Canadian citizen and a Member of this Parliament. I am conscious that the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) has clear links to the Caribbean. We have had members with South African, Australian, Guyanan, Ghanaian, Pakistani and Indian links, as well as New Zealand links—and perhaps other Commonwealth links, too. Ours has become a Parliament that reflects the interchange of peoples, and I hope the Government and all their works understand that.

I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) make the case for us to be proactive in arguing for Ireland to return to the Commonwealth, a case that I support without reservation. The old reasons for difference have gone now. Yes, we are a monarchy and Ireland is a republic. We are a proud monarchy, and Ireland is a proud republic, but the reasons for the breakdown of relations in the first decades of the last century have gone, and we have moved on. Today the Queen was in Armagh, distributing the Maundy money for the first time in that part of the United Kingdom. That must be a sign that we are ready to return to what was a wonderfully civilised relationship. It does not mean that we must always agree with each other. It means that we can do what my brother did the Saturday before last—go to Croke Park and yell furiously for Wales to beat Ireland, as it very satisfactorily did. We have done that occasionally, and I remember Wales beating New Zealand and Australia as well at Cardiff Arms Park during my youth.

Many of us, however, experience such cultural links on a day-to-day basis. Earlier in the debate I estimated that probably a fifth of my constituents, or even a quarter, were Commonwealth citizens, or at least had been born in other Commonwealth countries. There are communities from Nigeria and Sierra Leone—many of those people came here because of the terrible civil war in that country—and from Ghana. Incidentally, we have an outlet for Ghana's Fairtrade cocoa in SE1, just over the river. There are also people from Cyprus, on both sides of the divide, and from Australia. I spent a very loud evening in a local hostelry at the end of last year hoping—unsuccessfully—that England would win the final of the World cup, surrounded by a large number of South Africans because the pub was frequented by people from South Africa. This is part of the warp and weft of our lives, and we are naïve if we do not pay it full heed.

[Simon Hughes]

As the hon. Member for North Essex pointed out, it is not a question of being pro-Commonwealth and anti-European, or pro-Commonwealth and anti the English-speaking world. We have three political traditions. We have the tradition of what was the empire, became the British Commonwealth and is now the Commonwealth, a fantastic quarter of the world with a third of the world's population: 2 millionpeople, from the biggest to the smallest nations. We have our continental neighbours, people with different languages but, by and large, a common Christian tradition, although other faiths have joined it. And we have the English-speaking world, which includes our link across the Atlantic.

We should value all those traditions, but in this place we spend far more time discussing European Union issues—not just recently, when we have been discussing them daily, but in general—than Commonwealth issues, and that is to our disadvantage. Our trade, educational, scientific and cultural advantages, and particularly the advantages connected with peace, conflict resolution, development and the reducing of inequality, are best dealt with in a Commonwealth context. My friend the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) rightly reminded the House that, in our early political days, both he and I were very much formed by our visits to South Africa when it was outside the club because of its terrible racist regime. We saw a willingness to understand that that could not be a permanent solution because it denied fantastic cultural opportunities to South Africa, which is now back in the Commonwealth where it rightfully belongs.

I pay tribute to those who work at the centre of the organisation. Our Queen has always seen her job as head of the Commonwealth as central, and I pay tribute to her unqualified support for it throughout her wonderfully long reign, but I also pay tribute to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, which does a sterling job in ensuring that bilateral relations continue, and to others who work for Commonwealth organisations.

Last week I went to a service in Westminster Abbey organised by the Council of Commonwealth Societies, chaired by my noble Friend Lord Watson of Richmond. I looked at the back of the service sheet for the observance of Commonwealth day: it was called an observance because it was a multi-faith event. There was a list of 30 organisations that had contributed to that one event—30 Commonwealth organisations. They included the Association of Commonwealth Universities, the Commonwealth Broadcasting Association, the Commonwealth Business Council, the Commonwealth Countries League and the Commonwealth Education Trust. There is a whole network of organisations that bring people together. I have had the privilege to be involved with two of them in particular: the Council for Education in the Commonwealth, which works for the advancement of links between our universities, and the Commonwealth Youth Exchange Council.

The Minister intervened to try to explain the FCO decision of last week to remove some of the funding for Commonwealth scholarships. She wanted it to be understood that they would still be available but from a different budgetary head, because the Commonwealth Foundation would now handle developing countries, and the old Commonwealth countries would—as it were—have to bid for funding in other contexts. It does not appear that that will provide as many opportunities in future. For example, it is my understanding that postgraduate scholarships will not be available. I ask her to talk to colleagues in the education Departments, and also to Members who have made representations that it is likely that the new system will bring fewer people from the Commonwealth to the UK.

May I add a plea to that? To my certain knowledge, the funding of the Commonwealth Youth Exchange Council has been frozen, or frozen in real terms, over many years, but it has done wonderful work in making sure that youngsters from the UK go to places as remote and far away as Tuvalu to learn what life on the other side of the globe is like. I went to a wonderful gathering it organised in Sunderland of young people from all over the world. It showed the sheer excitement, and the learning and benefit, that can come from people from so many different and diverse cultures coming together at such an early and informative stage of their lives. I hope that we will continue to support such organisations, and I formally ask the Minister to review the funding of those Commonwealth organisations that have had their funding held, or held in real terms, to see if we cannot give them more investment in future.

There is a statistic that I did not know until I discovered it in preparing for today's debate: apparently, two thirds of all schoolchildren in this country have a family member who either lives in or came from a Commonwealth country. If that is the backdrop to the UK of today, I hope we will build very positively on what are already strong links. It is a time of change: that, rightly, was the Minister's tribute to the outgoing secretary-general of the Commonwealth, who stands down in a few days—on 31 March. Don McKinnon has done a relentlessly professional diplomatic job in all his time in that post, and I pay tribute to him. We also congratulate the outgoing Indian high commissioner in London, who has been appointed to succeed him at the beginning of April. It was, indeed, the incoming secretary-general, Kamalesh Sharma, who said that the Commonwealth is a unique force for good; they were not originally his words, but he repeated them.

If we look back at who has been the chairman-in-office of the Commonwealth over the years, we realise what a high-powered organisation it is, and that we must never underestimate it. It must be said that some former chairmen-in-office have slipped from grace: Mr. Mugabe was the chairman-in-office before power went to his head in a very tragic way. However, other chairmen-in-office include such people as Lee Kuan Yew, Pierre Trudeau, Michael Manley, Jim Callaghan, Kenneth Kaunda, Malcolm Fraser, Indira Gandhi, Lynden Pindling, Margaret Thatcher and Brian Mulroney. They are all serious, internationally big players with a huge amount to contribute. We must never forget that this is not just a club of the former colonies, but an organisation with highly astute and respected political leadership.

On 12 March, there was in this place a half-day conference chaired by Baroness Prashar about the impact of the Commonwealth on Parliament and the constituencies. Among others, Lord Howell of Guildford, who has already been mentioned, spoke at that conference. He argued passionately that we should be more effective in engaging in the affairs of the Commonwealth and trumpeting what it does.

James Robbins, the BBC's diplomatic correspondent, who chaired a session at last week's meeting, was reported as saying:

"the key questions for this session: Why is the Commonwealth not as high profile as it might like, and how can it 'get the story out there' more effectively? The fact is, although the Commonwealth has a lot of good stories to tell, it often fails to tell them. Although the Commonwealth is a fantastic brand, it seems reticent about trumpeting its core values and successes, such as the irreversible shift towards good governance. The recent example of Kenya is a case in point—Commonwealth observers of the contentious elections were slow to denounce them publicly, allowing the EU to steal the limelight."

A set of things that the Commonwealth does goes unrecognised, but the world needs those things to work well. The programme of what the Commonwealth secretariat did in its last reported period contained 15 subject headings: good offices for peace; democracy and consensus building; rule of law; human rights; international trade; investment; finance and debt; public sector development; environmentally sustainable development; small states; education; health; young people; gender equality and equity; and capacity building and institutional development. That is a serious agenda for ensuring that the world is a better place, a better governed place, a more peaceful place and a place where conflicts are resolved more effectively.

As my main request to the Government, I want to echo the conclusions of last week's conference. These points were also made in a debate in the House of Lords last year. Ahead of next year—the 60th anniversary of the Commonwealth's creation—the UK Government should reassess how we can support the Commonwealth better and engage with it more effectively. I know that we make the largest contribution to the secretariat, but two thirds of UK bilateral aid goes to Commonwealth countries. That is a serious reason for ensuring that we examine the whole picture. While keeping an eye on a country such as Nigeria, which has the largest number of people in poverty of any African country, we must not take not take our eye off a country such as the Maldives, which must address governance issues and severe threats from climate change.

I want to flag up the issues at home and abroad simply by recognising them rather than detaining the House by developing my points at length. We ought to build up the duties of Commonwealth observers at elections. It ought to be a matter of course that such work is done by Commonwealth members for Commonwealth countries and that it is seen to be an important part of the democratic process.

I would like us to be more active abroad in offering Commonwealth support for resolutions of conflicts. We still have not resolved the conflict in Cyprus; the conflict in Kashmir, which affects India and Pakistan, remains unresolved; and we must also deal with the terrible and continuing conflict in Sri Lanka. Of course there are diplomatic difficulties in all cases, and Governments have perfectly understandable views about their sovereignty, but valuable Commonwealth resources could be deployed to better effect.

Climate change and environmental issues are huge threats to many Commonwealth countries. If ever there was a reason for those issues to remain at the top of the G8 and UN agendas, the same one would apply in respect of their remaining at the top of the Commonwealth agenda. I hope that we will never forget the health agenda, particularly the need to eradicate malaria and tuberculosis, and the battle against HIV and AIDS. That is not just an African agenda issue; it is also an agenda issue in Asian Commonwealth countries, Caribbean Commonwealth countries and elsewhere. It would be a valuable help if the Government were to make those issues a priority.

The Government would be wrong to do away with the rights in relation to citizenship that people have traditionally had because of their Commonwealth links. Other hon. Members have flagged up their concern, and I wish to join them today, although I will also join in the formal consultation response. I can tell the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington that the first people to protest personally to me about the prospective change were from the Jamaican community, not the New Zealand community or the Australian community. They see it as a lack of recognition of the contribution that they have made over generations to this country. We have to listen to their voices. We talk about community cohesion, but people have to feel valued. People who have been here for generations should not have to ask for that, but should have it as a right.

I would be very troubled if we took away the right to vote from Commonwealth countries, as Lord Goldsmith's report suggested. I understand that it could be viewed as anomalous, but people from the Commonwealth have stayed here and retained their original nationality because they knew that we gave them a special status, with which came the vote. I hope that we can retain that status and that we will soon have a full debate about those rights.

I also hope that we can make it a routine that before the Heads of Government conference—it was in Uganda last year—we have a proper debate about Commonwealth issues on the Floor of the House. Then when the Prime Minister returns, he can report to the House and take questions, just as he does after a European summit.

The Westminster Foundation for Democracy is a very valuable organisation. I have had the privilege of going to Sierra Leone and having some involvement with supporting the offshoots of its political parties, both here and there. There is a huge amount of work to be done, but the hon. Members for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and for City of York (Hugh Bayley) and others know how a little investment of money and time can give such encouragement to, for example, women who would not have thought of getting involved in politics, or to young people who have visions for changing the world but do not know how to go about it because they do not have the skill set. I want more researchers to share their experience with other countries. Parliamentary staff are now beginning to do that, as are people in local government, so good national and local leadership can be shared with other Commonwealth countries.

[Simon Hughes]

The message from this debate has been clear, although it has been put in different ways. There is huge affection for the Commonwealth and it is also highly valued. The Minister will have heard the message that we would like her to ensure that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office achieves a greater balance between the two parts of its responsibilities. We think that the Commonwealth is a very worthwhile body. It is a privilege to be part of such a wonderful worldwide organisation and it is a great force for peace and prosperity. I hope that the reaffirmation of that by this House of Commons will send a welcome message to the outgoing secretary-general and all his staff, and encouragement to the incoming secretary-general and his team. I hope that it also encourages us to ensure that we do not let these matters slide from the agenda for as long as they have done in the recent past.

5.23 pm

Meg Munn: This has been an excellent debate, with hon. Members presenting a wide range of issues, as I expected. It is difficult to do justice to the breadth of possible issues, even in a full afternoon's debate, but I was somewhat surprised by the churlish comments by the hon. Members for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) and for Westbury (Dr. Murrison).

My opening remarks set the context for the debate, and it is especially interesting that the hon. Member for North Essex chose to comment, given that he managed to miss most of them. I wished to reply to all hon. Members in my closing contribution, and it seemed right to ensure that Back Benchers had the maximum opportunity to contribute—we have heard some very good speeches as a result. I pay tribute to the persistence of the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), who has pushed for this debate. In his speech, he did justice to the case for the Commonwealth.

As I said in my opening remarks, I attended the meeting of Women's Affairs Ministers that preceded the Commonwealth Heads of Government talks in Kampala last year. I was able to experience at first hand the real benefits of talking to other Ministers in the Commonwealth, as we shared our experiences and looked at how we could continue to build our relationships. I assure the House that, as a Minister, I value the Commonwealth. My departmental colleagues do too, and we are conscious that the proper title is the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The word "Commonwealth" is an important part of that title, and it will remain so.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) has said that the Commonwealth is a diverse family of nations, and I cannot improve on that description, which really sums it up.

The hon. Member for Westbury, who is not in his place, talked about the important role played by Commonwealth citizens in our armed forces. I recognise that role and pay tribute to them, as I also pay tribute to Private Johnson Beharry, who was recently awarded the Victoria cross.

The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey spoke about peacekeeping, in which the Commonwealth plays an important role around the world. I want to put on record my appreciation of that work: the Commonwealth provides just over half of the world's peacekeeping forces, and the biggest contributors are India, Pakistan and Bangladesh.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) argued passionately in favour of Ireland resuming its membership of the Commonwealth. He is not in his place, but if he were, he would be disappointed by my reply, which is that Commonwealth membership is a matter for Ireland. That is not a comment on the British Government's view of the matter, because Ireland could always apply to renew its membership of an organisation from which it withdrew in 1949. I have not researched the history in detail, but I know that Ireland has the option of applying for Commonwealth membership.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron), who is also not in his place, challenged me to say how the Commonwealth is a force for good. I could point to a number of the speeches that we have heard this afternoon, but instead I shall say a little more about education. Various hon. Members asked about Commonwealth scholarships, but I hope that I have made it clear that we must prioritise resources.

That is not something that Opposition Members have to deal with, and even in their shadow policies they struggle at times to be clear whether resources would go up or down. In contrast, the Government have set out our priorities, and we believe it important to ensure that money benefits poorer countries.

I turn now to what the UK is doing for education in the Commonwealth in the wider sense, as scholarships are available only to people who have reached a certain level of education.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) was not denying that it was up to Ireland to apply for readmittance to the Commonwealth. He merely suggested that Britain might like to write to the Irish Government, asking whether they had considered making such an application and making it clear that they would be very welcome in the Commonwealth. Is that an impossibility as well?

Meg Munn: The Commonwealth is not the "British" Commonwealth, so it would be for a range of countries to take a view on that. If Ireland wished to apply, it would be to the Commonwealth secretariat. I am sure that Ireland would meet the criteria, and that if it did want to apply, we would have not objection. We are keen for countries that meet the criteria to join; for example, I shall talk about Rwanda later.

The Government will be spending £8.5 billion on education globally by 2015. At present, about two thirds of our bilateral spending on education is in Commonwealth countries. At the end of 2007, the Government announced a new package of support for education in Nigeria, totalling £106 million. Overall, the Government are providing £50.8 million to support scholarships and study awards over the next three years, increasing our funding to £17.5 million per annum by 2011-12.

In Commonwealth countries, the number of primary-age children out of school dropped by 18 million between 2000 and 2005, but 30 million primary-age children still remain out of school, of whom 17 million are girls. We should be extremely concerned about that. At CHOGM in Kampala, the Heads of Government committed to redoubling their efforts to deliver education for all: to enrol the 30 million children now out of school, to eliminate gender disparity in primary and secondary education, and to strengthen education systems in countries affected by conflict. The UK will continue to support the Commonwealth in meeting educational aspirations. I am sure that all hon. Members agree that support for children of primary age is particularly important, because if children are not educated at that age they will have no hope of taking a scholarship later on.

Hugh Bayley: I am sure my hon. Friend agrees that the main responsibility for getting children into primary school lies with the Government of their country. Our aid is important, but without the political will of a country's Education Minister and Head of Government things will not happen. Does that not describe what is so important about the Commonwealth? We in Britain have the aspiration that every Commonwealth child should go to school, and we have a club—an association—where we can talk to those in charge of the Government in countries where that is not the case.

Meg Munn: My hon. Friend is entirely right. Once again, he has demonstrated the benefits of the Commonwealth—

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas rose—

Meg Munn: Perhaps my hon. Friend will contain herself for a moment, as before I leave the issue of education, I want to pick up a point that she raised earlier. The work of the British Council is enormously important not only in Commonwealth countries but around the world. I know from my regular contacts with the regions for which I am responsible that those regions value British Council input. Indeed, there are often demands, particularly for help in spreading the learning of English.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: May I provide a word of caution? One of the learning and development goals is to provide every child with a school place by 2015, but if that means doubling classroom capacity so that children are in classes of 160 rather than 80, it will not produce well-educated children. Will my hon. Friend remember that point? We must insist on the fact that we not only want children in school, but want to ensure that the education they receive is of good quality, with some chance of providing them with employment.

Meg Munn: My hon. Friend is right that quality of education is important.

I want to address the important issue of the 60th anniversary in 2009, which several hon. Members have mentioned. It will be an occasion to celebrate, but as yet no plans have been made. As hon. Members are aware, the new secretary-general takes office within the next few weeks, and it would be strange to make plans for something as important as that commemoration and celebration before then. The UK Government are keen to discuss with fellow member states how to mark the anniversary; as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) has said, it will be a time to reflect on the progress of the Commonwealth's work over 60 years and take stock.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about Foreign Office strategy. One of our four policy priorities—we have focused on fewer priorities, as he will be aware—is effective international institutions, which is important for the Commonwealth, too. That builds on the work done at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting, where my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was one of the Heads of Government responsible for the new Commonwealth mandate on reform of the international institution. It is important to recognise—this responds to other hon. Members' comments, too—that under the Foreign Office's overall strategy, we will move resources from Europe to support our policy priorities. All those priorities are relevant to Commonwealth countries.

The hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) raised the issue of ancestry visas, as did a number of other hon. Members. As I said earlier, I have been lobbied on that issue by the New Zealand high commissioner, and I understand that he submitted a substantial document to the consultation. The high commissioner also raised with me the matter of visas for visitors and the need to return to New Zealand to reapply—a subject referred to by the hon. Gentleman—so the issue has been raised with us. The Foreign Office is in close touch with the Border and Immigration Agency, too. A consultation is being held, and no decisions have yet been made.

The hon. Member for Romford (Andrew Rosindell) mentioned an issue that he persistently raises and about which we have had a number of discussions—overseas territories. He spoke about the Cayman Islands and hurricane preparedness. I, too, have visited the Cayman Islands. As he will remember, Hurricane Ivan devastated the whole area, and the Royal Navy initially went to help another island that was suffering to a much greater extent in terms of the immediate need for humanitarian aid—fortunately, there were only two deaths in Cayman Islands. I know that there was huge devastation—I saw the pictures myself when I was there—and we are conscious of the importance of good preparedness for disasters in all our overseas territories, particularly those in the area to which we are referring. I am certain that our plans are much more developed than they were at the time.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned his concerns about the flags at the trooping of the colour and wreath-laying by the Foreign Secretary. I have offered to have further discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), particularly on wreath-laying. The issue was last looked at in 2004, as I understand it. I am happy to have further discussions, and I am happy for the hon. Member for Romford to join them, if my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley has no objections. I am sure that the hon. Member for Romford has had the issues concerning the trooping of the colour explained to him, and we can discuss that subject, too.

The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey raised the important issue of the Commonwealth Youth Exchange Council, and I pay tribute to his work as a council member. We support the excellent activities that the organisation undertakes.

[Meg Munn]

In particular we support the Commonwealth youth forum, which the council organises and which meets at the margins of every Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting. Representatives from the youth forum relay the conclusions of their discussions to Foreign Ministers at CHOGM, allowing the politicians of the Commonwealth to hear directly what its young people are saying. I also commend the council's work in creating strong, lasting links between young people in every part of the Commonwealth. The hon. Gentleman asked some questions about funding, and I am happy to get further information on the points that he raised. Perhaps he can give me details after the debate on areas of particular concern to him, in which case I could respond more fully.

Before I move on to give a little tour of the world, let me respond to the question, "What good is the Commonwealth doing?" which was asked by the hon. Member for Billericay. I referred in my opening speech to the report by Amartya Sen called "Civil Paths to Peace".

The Government were a major funder of the Sen report and in CHOGM in November Heads of Government mandated the secretary-general to work up an action plan to implement the recommendations from "Civil Paths to Peace". We are now engaged in putting together examples of best practice in countering extremism in UK communities. All member states are doing the same and the results will be pooled next year.

The hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey mentioned the rights of Commonwealth citizens and the right to vote. As he is aware, the independent report produced by Lord Goldsmith is before the Government, who are considering it. In fact, it is with the Ministry of Justice and no final decision has yet been made.

A number of hon. Members, unsurprisingly, mentioned climate change. As hon. Members will be aware, it is one of the four policy priorities for the FCO. The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) talked about the need for greater urgency. We are considering the issue very carefully, which is why we are moving resources into that priority in our missions around the world. At the initiative of the UK, Commonwealth Heads of State launched the Lake Victoria action plan on climate change at CHOGM. That major statement from a quarter of the world highlighted the urgency and gravity of the situation. The UK was delighted that the Commonwealth was able to commit in the action plan to the pursuit of ambitious solutions, in particular through the UN framework convention on climate change, to promote a better understanding of climate change and its impact and to address mitigation and adaptation challenges.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) mentioned climate change in relation to the Caribbean. I know that she is aware that I visited the Caribbean, because I was surprised to be told that a guest at a reception at the residence would be my hon. Friend. She will have seen the impact of Hurricane Dean, as I did. Thankfully, the human impact was limited, but one thing that I discovered that I did not know before was the impact on such things as coffee growing. Although the damage looked relatively minor, because the roots of the coffee plant need to be kept secure such weather could impact on coffee growing and therefore on Jamaica's trade for a considerable time to come.

When I visited the Dominican Republic and went on to the Cayman Islands, I was caught up in tropical storm Olga—I was not sure whether I was following it or it was following me. Although that storm was relatively minor compared with a hurricane, there were still deaths in the Dominican Republic. I saw at first hand what climate change and the increase in the number of storms means. The storm should not have happened, because it was December—the storm and hurricane season is supposed to end in November—so the changes in climate are impacting on these regions.

Ms Abbott: As well as the effect on the economy in terms of coffee growing, tourism and so on, another effect of climate change in such islands and small island states across the world is that people who have built their houses in exposed parts of their country have to keep rebuilding their homes year after year—sometimes after less than six months. We need to provide more support and the technical infrastructure to avoid such devastation.

Meg Munn: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I was just about to talk about some of the development issues that were raised so eloquently by the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt).

The Commonwealth has a fund for technical co-operation that is the development arm of the Commonwealth secretariat. It is a key area of activity. Recently, that fund was subject to an independent evaluation, which recommended that it should link programmes to national development strategies and to the plans and priorities of other agencies. The Government will work with the Commonwealth secretariat to help it to focus on better co-ordination with other development partners to allow a greater development impact. I agree with hon. Members that one way in which we can be most helpful to a number of Commonwealth countries and to our overseas territories might not be through direct financial support but through providing the technical support and guidance that is not necessarily available.

I am now going to try to cover the range of countries that Members took us round. I am somewhat relieved that we did not quite get to all 53, because I certainly would not have had time to respond on all of them. My hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) and the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire both spoke about Sierra Leone. My hon. Friend's speech was very powerful and extremely interesting. The UK is Sierra Leone's largest bilateral donor, as I think she said. We have given £210 million to it in development assistance, and this financial year the Department for International Development will give up to £50 million. Up to £15 million of DFID's annual assistance is in the form of direct budgetary support; the remainder is focused on a set of programmes that are improving governance, tackling corruption, promoting pro-poor sustainable growth and supporting basic service delivery and human development. It was heartening to hear from my hon. Friend and the hon. Lady about their direct experiences of discussions with the new parliamentarians. As I said in my opening speech, the work of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association is to be applauded. That parliamentarian to parliamentarian link should not be underestimated, and I was heartened by what my hon. Friend and the hon. Lady saw and told us about.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the special court—a tribunal created to prosecute those with the greatest responsibility for crimes committed during the country's civil war. We have provided £5 million toward its running costs. This year, the UK also contributed £13 million and 72 personnel to the UK-led international military advisory and training team. In providing us with that information about Sierra Leone, my hon. Friend and the hon. Lady have done us all a great service. However, it demonstrates that there is still a long way to go, and we need to maintain our involvement and to keep encouraging the move toward good governance and development in that area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington spoke movingly about the Caribbean. She set out her concern that it has slipped down the agenda, and I am sure that she is not surprised to hear me say, as the Minister with responsibility for the Caribbean, that I dispute this. I will be making my third visit to the Caribbean next month because I do feel that this is an important region. There is a range of issues that we need to tackle there, and support that we need to give. I do not think that my hon. Friend was in the Chamber during my opening speech, when I spoke about the Prime Minister's meeting with the Caribbean Heads of Government. We should also note the very important UK-Caribbean ministerial forum that will be taking place this summer in London, the agenda for which will focus on climate change and economic development.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) spoke very eloquently about how the social and drugs problems in the Caribbean finish up in our own cities. What is the prospect of the United Kingdom's providing the Caribbean guardship that we used to provide on a far more extended basis for anti-drug work in the Caribbean, which we do not seem to have the resources to provide now?

Meg Munn: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I will come in a moment to the issue of drugs and crime, which I was going to cover in any case.

Ms Abbott: On the forthcoming UK-Caribbean forum, such forums are very much enjoyed by the Caribbean Heads of Government who go to them, but people have noted that nothing seems to come of them.

Meg Munn: I am disappointed to hear that, and I should be interested to have some more detailed feedback. I will certainly give my commitment, as the Minister currently responsible for our relationships with the Caribbean, to seeking some positive and tangible outcomes from that forum.

My hon. Friend also spoke about the Caribbean Board. I agree with her assessment that now is a good time for us to look at its role and to consider whether, in its current format, it is the best way for Ministers to be informed about issues relating to the Caribbean by the wide range of people with Caribbean backgrounds and experience who live in the UK. My hon. Friend knows that I am always keen to hear from people outside London, as well as from those who have easier access to Ministers. We are actively exploring wider opportunities around the country and perhaps also in Scotland to talk to Caribbean people throughout the UK and hear their views. I should be interested in her ideas about that.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is extremely concerned about the issue of crime and drugs. Hon. Members know that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Middle East, who has many other areas of responsibility, takes the lead on drugs and crime, and visited Jamaica in the relatively recent past. A great deal of work has been done to disrupt the drugs trade and deal with the crime issues. The UK provided £96 million directly and indirectly to the Caribbean in 2006-07, including £36 million directly through DFID programmes and resources to the Caribbean Development Bank. That covers some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington about the importance of developing the economy and opportunities for young people to work.

Ms Abbott: On the interception of drugs, my hon. Friend knows that one of the major sources of drug problems in the Caribbean is cocaine, which comes across from south America and is then shipped out. It comes across on fast speedboats, which are faster than anything that the Jamaican defence forces have. As I said earlier, we could do a lot more to offer them support in the form of equipment to intercept those speedboats.

Meg Munn: I shall look further into the issues that my hon. Friend raises. We have had some success in disrupting the drugs trade but it is a serious problem. We are also working in some south American countries to try to stop production. The role of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Middle East is important in that respect.

As part of the support that we give, we waive £5 million to £6 million of Jamaica's debt annually and we provide 13 per cent. of the EU contribution to Jamaica. Major projects include assistance to the programme to reform the Jamaican police force, programmes related to social development, support for the public sector reform programme and assistance to the private sector to enhance the competitiveness of Jamaican exports.

The hon. Member for North Essex spoke about broad trade issues and about economic partnership agreements. The economic partnership agreements that have been negotiated, particularly in the Caribbean, are important as they will increase access to EU markets and can bring positive benefits to the economies of Commonwealth countries. I am aware of the tariff issues that he raised. There have been detailed discussions to try to reach a satisfactory outcome. A good Doha deal would benefit Commonwealth countries, rich and poor alike.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the evidence is overwhelming that, given the right support and context, trade is a hugely powerful driver of economic growth and poverty reduction. Forty-three of the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries did not sign economic partnership agreements. Of those, 32 are least developed countries that will now trade under the "Everything but Arms" initiative, benefiting from duty-free, quota-free access to EU markets. For the other 11 countries that did not sign an EPA, we expect minimal, if any, trade disruption.

I shall deal briefly with Kenya and the role of the Commonwealth there. The Commonwealth observer mission played an important role in highlighting deep flaws in the Kenyan elections and denying them legitimacy. The ensuing crisis brought to the surface long-standing grievances about matters including democratic governance.The Commonwealth has fully supported the Kofi Annan mission to broker a deal and it is good that the Annan process has worked and that there is agreement between both sides. It is important that Commonwealth expertise, including on electoral reform, is now fully engaged in supporting the implementation of that power-sharing agreement. As we all know, the important thing was not only getting the agreement, but ensuring that things changed as a result.

I am delighted that Kamalesh Sharma will be the next secretary-general of the Commonwealth. We already have a good relationship with India over Commonwealth issues, and I am sure that having the secretary-general there will be positive for the Commonwealth. I look forward to that relationship deepening even further. The next Commonwealth games are in New Delhi in 2010. The Prime Minister recently visited India for the UK-India summit and had discussions on trade and education, with the Prime Minister highlighting a development assistance package of £825 million. There was also a focus on achieving the millennium development goals, counter-terrorism and climate change.

I am sorry that during my brief break from the Front Bench I missed most of the speech by the hon. Member for Mole Valley, but I will certainly read it in Hansard, because it was praised by many hon. Members. The UK Government value the special relationship with both Australia and New Zealand, and the reciprocal arrangements in place. We recognise that large numbers of Australian and New Zealand nationals regard their ancestry as British, so we take seriously the comments made by hon. Members, and as I have said on more than one occasion, the consultation is still open and no decisions have yet been made.

A less positive subject that some hon. Members referred to was Zimbabwe. Obviously, Zimbabwe is no longer a member of the Commonwealth, but the plight of the Zimbabwean people should and does remain a pressing issue for many Commonwealth countries. The elections are only a few days away and there are real concerns that the people of Zimbabwe will not be able freely to exercise their democratic rights. Neither the UK nor the Commonwealth has been invited to observe the elections as we are cast as unfriendly, but we continue to monitor the situation closely.

Rwanda provides a more positive story, and the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) paid tribute to the much greater representation there of women than any of our parties have. They top the league. Obviously, the decision on Rwanda's membership lies with the whole membership of the Commonwealth. The criteria for membership were reviewed at the 2007 Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting, where Heads decided to retain the requirement that applicants should have a constitutional link with an existing member, but they accepted that in exceptional circumstances applications could be considered on a case-by-case basis, and that paved the way for Rwanda to join in 2009 at the next Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting at the latest.

As I said in my opening speech—and I was echoed by the hon. Gentleman—the Commonwealth cuts across traditional alliances and regional blocs. It matters greatly to the United Kingdom. It is not a matter of nostalgia and thinking about how things were; it is recognising that the Commonwealth is important on the international scene today. The Commonwealth is respected by others for what we do and the way in which we do it. It is positive about the future and others want to join it. Working together, we can ensure that the Commonwealth remains relevant, working with and for its entire membership in responding to the key challenges of the 21st century. We in the UK will play our full part in this important work.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House has considered the matter of the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth.

Border and Immigration Agency

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David.]

5.59 pm

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I thank Mr. Speaker for allowing me to take this slot in the Chamber and I also thank the Minister, who has been working hard to address the issues that I plan to raise; I want to put that on the record.

I requested this debate to bring to the attention of the House the performance of the Border and Immigration Agency, particularly in respect of two of my constituents. Their circumstances are quite different and they are unknown to each other. Unfortunately, both have been caught up in trying to get straightforward answers to simple questions—from what I think is the United Kingdom's most opaque and unhelpful bureaucracy.

I shall first deal with the case of Mr. Gerard Nkomo Nsenga and then with that of Mrs. Chatellon Matibag. Mr. Nsenga is Rwandan. He, his wife and their two children entered the United Kingdom as refugees in August 2002 and claimed asylum. His wife and children were granted indefinite leave to remain on 4 October 2002, but he was refused. He appealed, and after an interlude of missing paperwork—sorted out for him by the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby), in whose constituency he was then resident—he came before a tribunal of the immigration appellate authority on 15 August 2003. There, a Mr. McVeery, appearing for what was then called the immigration and nationality directorate, told the court that the Department's refusal of Mr. Nsenga's asylum was an error and that his application was no longer being contested.

On that basis, Mr. Nsenga withdrew his appeal without a hearing and he was subsequently granted leave to remain in the United Kingdom. For reasons that are certainly obscure to him, that was not the indefinite leave to remain that his wife and children had been granted, but a three-year discretionary visa. That visa gave him the right to take up employment. Mr. Nsenga is a qualified mechanical engineer with a master's degree; he also holds a private pilot's licence. He is a mature and senior professional and obtained a post almost immediately as a plant manager with P. Hughes Construction Ltd, which is based in Nottingham. As part of his work, he was required regularly to visit locations in Portugal and Ireland, although he was primarily based in Manchester and Liverpool.

The Border and Immigration Agency recalled that he submitted an application for further leave to remain on 3 August 2006, and there is no dispute that his application for renewal was in good time. However, from that moment on, Mr. Nsenga has been plunged into a bureaucratic nightmare, which Mr. Kafka would have recognised only too well. To make his application, Mr. Nsenga had to submit his passport and other supporting documents to the Border and Immigration Agency. That meant that until it had reached a decision, he could not travel abroad. In turn, that meant that he could no longer fulfil his duties at work, so he lost his job.

An industrious person, he started to apply for jobs that did not require overseas travel, but by then his three-year visa had expired, so prospective employers wanted evidence that he was qualified to work in the United Kingdom. The Border and Immigration Agency remained in possession of his passport—in fact, it still has it. The only proof that the agency is willing to provide of Mr. Nsenga's right to work in the United Kingdom is a letter with no official stamp, no photograph and no recognisable official signature. The letter says:

> "To clarify, Mr Nsenga has permission to take employment and may use this letter as proof of this."

That would be laughable if it were not so scandalous. The agency itself spends much of its time rejecting such letters, allegedly written by the Pope or Prime Minister, or—on this occasion—by Emily Miles of the case resolution directorate. Not surprisingly, prospective employers have been dubious about accepting that letter, especially as the Home Office now makes them liable for employing anyone who turns out to have dodgy paperwork. My constituent is left stranded with a dodgy-seeming letter that anybody could have run up on a decent photocopier, and with no passport or papers.

Mr. Nsenga went to Jobcentre Plus with his magic letter, where he was told that Jobcentre Plus could not offer him any post because it did not accept the validity of the letter and did not recognise his right to work. The all-powerful letter of authority to work not only does not work in the private sector, it does not even work with another Government agency. Mr. Nsenga bought a house and has a mortgage to pay. He and his wife now have a third child, born here, six years old, and of course a British citizen. Sadly, she is very unwell and needs expensive medical attention. Mr. Nsenga's savings are depleting rapidly and he has had to suspend payment for some of the treatment for his daughter.

Repeated requests to the Border and Immigration Agency to accelerate Mr. Nsenga's application on grounds of exceptional circumstances have been refused, despite his situation. In January, I asked the Minister a parliamentary question that related to this. He will know that his reply said that there were no specific guidelines to case workers to take account of the economic and social consequences of decisions such as this, and went on to say that 90 per cent. of applications are decided within 70 days. Mr. Nsenga has been waiting for more than 70 weeks—one year and seven months. But there is no rush—the BIA aims to sort it all out by July 2011, just another three years and four months.

I believe that the Minister may be able to help me, and my constituent, on this occasion, and I thank him very much for that, but I want him to consider carefully two particular points. First, given that there are, according to the last published figures, some 20,000 people in Mr. Nsenga's position, will he arrange for the agency to issue a proper validity document to those who are left in limbo, potentially for another three years, so that they can be productive members of society and not reduced to destitution, as Mr. Nsenga and his family have been? If he will not do that, is he not honour-bound to introduce guidelines relating to the social and economic impact of the delays on applicants, along the lines of my parliamentary questions, so that cases can be prioritised in the meantime to take proper account of the damage that delays are doing?

Secondly, will he give an absolute assurance that any constituent who approaches a Member of Parliament will not thereby put themselves at a disadvantage? Many of those who present themselves to me—Mr. Nsenga is one of them—tell me that staff at the BIA routinely say, "Of course, if you complain to your MP your case will be taken out of the queue and put back towards the rear, delaying your approval further." Bearing it in mind that there is not a queue but what seems to be a series of heaps, that has a ring of truth to it. Indeed, the letter sent to MPs, though skilfully worded, says almost exactly the same thing. Can the Minister assure us that there is not, and will not be, any hidden penalty for having the temerity to talk to an MP about one's case?

The case of Mrs. Chatellon Matibag is entirely different, except that she and her family are also trapped in one of the agency's many Catch-22s. She came to the United Kingdom from the Philippines, as part of the highly-skilled migrant programme, to work as a senior care worker. She began working as a senior care officer at a home run by Southern Cross Healthcare in October 2003. Her family is here with her and her daughter is in the reception class at one of my local schools. Her visa was due to expire on 24 September 2007, and she was told that she would not be able to extend or renew it because of the new Home Office rules introduced in August 2007, which stipulated, among other things, that senior care workers must be paid a minimum of £7.02 per hour. I first became aware of her situation when I received testimonials on her behalf from the family and friends of some of those she had been caring for in the home where she worked. There is absolutely no doubt about the added value that Chatellon has brought to this country and to those in her care.

The rule change, which had its biggest impact on Filipino workers, was hugely disruptive and controversial. The Minister is only too well aware of the criticisms and representations made on many levels, and I shall not rehearse them this evening. Following a meeting arranged by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) between the Minister and MPs on 11 December last year, new guidance was issued on 18 January regarding transitional arrangements for senior care workers, which was designed to get the Government out of the public relations hole into which they had tumbled.

The new rules allowed a 12-month extension of a current work permit for workers whose previous permit was still valid or had expired within the previous 28 days and even at the same rate of pay as the previous permit. The importance of the 12-month extension was that, at the end of it, workers such as my constituent would have accumulated sufficient service in the United Kingdom to be qualified to apply for indefinite leave to remain. The rules say that if the permit had expired more than 28 days previously, new applications would be treated under the revised guidelines. In this case, Mrs. Matibag, who lost her job in September 2007 as a result of the guidance introduced in August 2007, had lost that job more than 28 days before the rules were published. When prospective employers contact the agency to see whether they can employ Mrs. Matibag, they are told that too much time has elapsed and that they cannot do so.

I contacted the Border and Immigration Agency for clarification on that point on 26 February and was informed that an internal e-mail mentioned additional guidance introduced on 15 February that superseded the 18 January guidance. Perhaps inadvertently, that new guidance was sent to me on 27 February. Headed "Out-of-time applications for Senior Care Workers", it states:

> "Senior Care Worker applications should only be treated as First Permissions"— in other words, as completely new applications—

> "if the OSN's previous work permit expired more than six months before the new application was received."

I think that OSN means overseas national. Later the same day Mr. Jackson, of the operational policy unit at the BIA in Sheffield, e-mailed my office to add:

> "the Border and Immigration Agency is temporarily accepting extension and change of employment applications for those Senior Care Workers whose previous work permits expired more than 28 days ago.
> Caseworkers are applying the maximum discretion possible on out-of-time applications, and each case is being considered on its merits."

I wrote to the Minister on the same day, 27 February, pointing out that the guidance that I have quoted was internal, informal, discretionary and unpublished. As such, it is impossible for any applicant to take advantage of it. An employer who checks with the agency before recruiting someone or submitting an application is simply told of the 28-day rule, not the six-month rule that is actually in operation. Of course, at a job interview, an employer will not have the same interest in pursuing the case as the person on whose behalf they are applying.

Mrs. Matibag's six-month grace period expires on the 23rd of this month—Easter Sunday, which is three days from now. I still have not had a reply from the Minister to my letter of 27 February, but I am looking forward to hearing what he will say. My questions on behalf of Mrs. Chatellon Matibag are simple ones. Does the Minister believe that it is good enough for discretionary guidelines to be concealed from applicants and their potential employers to the extent that they are, for all practical purposes, nugatory? If he accepts that that is not good enough, will he undertake to instruct the agency to take into account the lack of transparency of these guidelines when assessing applications from people such as Mrs. Matibag, who could easily have complied with them? She has been offered jobs that she has not been able to take up because of her status. She could easily have complied, but found herself out of time solely because the guidelines were never made public.

Thirdly, bearing it in mind that we have come to the end of the last working day before my constituent's time is up, will the Minister accept from me here tonight a verbal application on her behalf, which will be reported and recorded in Hansard? If he were minded to take account of the points that I have raised, the case could be followed up with the relevant paperwork.

I believe that both Mr. Nsenga and Mrs. Matibag have been very ill served by the Border and Immigration Agency and its processes and procedures. The Minister has an opportunity to put that right. I very much look forward to hearing him give a proper account of the workings of the agency, particularly as it has impacted on my two constituents, and to his giving them both an Easter present that he can be proud of.

6.15 pm

The Minister for Borders and Immigration (Mr. Liam Byrne): First, I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Andrew Stunell) in tonight's Adjournment debate. I am also grateful to him for taking the time and trouble earlier today to brief me personally on the cases. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I always try to make myself available to discuss individual cases with hon. Members and to resolve issues wherever I can. I represent a constituency with quite a large number of immigration cases, so I look at this system very much from two different ends. I am especially grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising these two particular cases. They are not only constituency cases, which are always important in and of themselves, but they raise wider issues that are worthy of debate in this place. I shall try to deal with both the personal and the wider issues to the best of my ability.

I do not usually discuss details of personal cases on the Floor of the House, but given the hon. Gentleman's entrée, he will not mind if I depart from that convention today for the benefit of the record. The hon. Gentleman reprised almost all the chronology of the first case—that of Mr. Nsenga—rather eloquently and it very much accords with my chronology, which is a good start. Indeed, I understand that the individual's wife and children claimed asylum slightly before he did—on 2 August 2002. They were from a different country and they were recognised as refugees and granted indefinite leave to remain in October 2002. The individual's circumstances were different from those of his wife and children; the fact that he was married and was the father of the children does not automatically bring with it the right to humanitarian protection. However, in the course of hearings that concluded on 15 August 2003, the status of discretionary leave was awarded on the basis of article 8 of the European convention on human rights. The agency considered that on grounds of the right to family life, it was right to grant three years of discretionary leave. Even though it was not considered that asylum was appropriate in his case, a different right to discretionary leave in the UK was relevant.

As the hon. Gentleman said, a further application for leave was filed in time on 3 August 2006. Here, I think that some delays did indeed creep into the system. The House will know that something like 450,000 files—files, not people—exist, as was announced to the House a while ago by the former Home Secretary, and I have made it my business to ensure that we resolve those problems from the past as quickly as possible.

The hon. Gentleman raised the important issue of how these cases are prioritised in the guidelines. He submitted an important parliamentary question in January. The guidelines that we operate do not extend to economic and social factors, although whether they should is an interesting question. The guidelines on which we operate were set out by the Home Secretary and they include possible harm to British society and savings to the British taxpayer. As I say, the question whether the prioritisation guidelines should be wider is worth considering. Certainly, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that no penalty or delay is injected into a proceedings through a reference or referral to a Member of this place—that would be quite wrong, and I would run into problems in my constituency if the agency started acting in such a way.

The urgency of the applications was recognised, not only in and of themselves, but because the hon. Gentleman was acting on the individual's behalf. Consideration of the case began in February, and the work is almost complete: only two checks are outstanding, one being an up-to-date police national computer check, and the other a mandatory war crimes check, because the applicant is from Rwanda. If the subject is given a green light on both, a satisfactory solution to the case can be found early next week.

The wider point is identity management, which is extremely important. The House will know that during consideration of the UK Borders Act 2007 I made it clear that the existing modes of proving identity were completely inadequate. About 60 or 70 different bits of paper or card can be proffered by a foreign national to attempt to prove their identity and right to be in the UK. That is a hopelessly outdated system, which I plan to begin sweeping away in November, when we introduce a single much more secure document called an ID card for foreign nationals, which will be rolled out on a compulsory basis. That will give all foreign nationals the chance to prove their identity in a much simpler way.

In the meantime, it is important that we make it easier for businesses and people in the public sector to understand whether the identity presented by somebody is valid. That is why a very successful inquiries service is available to employers who have any doubts about identity. That service will get bigger as ID cards are rolled out.

The second case is perhaps a little more complicated. It concerns a Filipino national who has worked very hard in this country as a care worker, and whose leave expired on 24 September 2007. Although the work permits regime needed to be implemented in a robust way, to ensure an adequate defence against wage undercutting or displacement of resident labour, I asked for a number of transitional measures to be put in place. That was important to ensure continuity of care in the social care sector, which might have been put in jeopardy. The transitional arrangements allowed a waiver of some of the minimum requirements of the job. As the hon. Gentleman said, they allowed an exceptional in-country extension to be granted for 12 months to give people time to make up their leave to settlement. The discretion was provided to consider cases six months after leave had expired.

The lion's share of people in senior care worker posts whose employers were seeking to re-employ them benefited from those transitional measures. According to facts and figures that I saw a few months ago, about 80 per cent. of people were satisfactorily accommodated within those arrangements. In a work permit application, the key is that the application must be submitted by an employer rather than an individual. The employer is, therefore, in pole position, so it is important that individuals in question do indeed have a job in order for their employer to apply for leave.

The wider point, however, is that custom and practice inside the agency, in relation to considering cases for up to six months after leave has expired, should be a matter of record. I am therefore glad to have the opportunity to read that into the record today. I will also review the news given by the hon. Gentleman that—certainly in this case—custom and practice was not communicated to employers when they called. I need to understand whether that was happening on a general basis, or just in this specific case. I have made it clear to the agency today that it must ensure that callers are given to understand that. Given the exceptional circumstances in this case and the fact that the six-month period expires on Sunday, I shall be happy to treat the hon. Gentleman's representations this afternoon as a barrier to any further action before I have a chance to consider the case in more detail next week. The nub of the issue, however, will remain the individual's need to find an employer with a job offer. I shall be happy to discuss the matter with the hon. Gentleman personally over the coming week.

Andrew Stunell: I thank the Minister for what he has done. I know that he has spent a good deal of time on this case, and I very much appreciate what he has said. If he can confirm that, if I can produce my constituent and a job offer in the next week, that will be considered outwith the six months, I shall be very content indeed.

Mr. Byrne: I am more than happy to consider the case in the manner that the hon. Gentleman suggests. I think that entirely reasonable and appropriate, and I hope that it will deliver a satisfactory solution to both of us over the next few days.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes past Six o'clock till Tuesday 25 March, pursuant to Resolution [26 February].

[MR. CHRISTOPHER CHOPE in the Chair]

Disabled People (Poverty)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.30 am

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): It is a pleasure, Mr. Chope, to introduce a debate on disability poverty with you in the Chair. I am pleased that the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mrs. McGuire), who has ministerial responsibility for disabled people, will respond to the debate.

As we all know, there have been significant reductions in poverty in the United Kingdom over the past 10 years. For example, there are 600,000 fewer children in poverty. Child poverty doubled during the previous two decades, when the country acquired one of the worst records of child poverty among the major European nations. I do not doubt for a moment the Government's commitment to reducing poverty, any more than I doubt their commitment to improving the life chances of disabled people. However, much more needs to be done—very much more. That is particularly so, given the Government's targets to reduce child poverty and fuel poverty, both of which suggest not only that much more needs to be done but that it needs to be done more quickly.

The immediate reason for seeking a debate on this issue was not another pre-emptive Budget bid—a rather late one—but the fact that in January Leonard Cheshire Disability produced a report entitled "Disability Poverty in the UK". I strongly recommend that report to those who may not have had the chance to read it. I shall begin with three observations made in that report. First, official statistics show that three in 10 disabled people—or 3 million people—live in poverty. Secondly, disabled people are twice as likely to live in poverty as non-disabled people. Thirdly, official figures seriously underestimate the extent of poverty among disabled people and their families. Why is that? Most obviously, it is because the data do not take account of the additional financial costs of disability.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. It is a privilege to be in the same Chamber as him, my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke), and my hon. Friend the Minister. Over the past 10 years, they have been three of the best campaigners on the subject. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) has acknowledged, the excellent Leonard Cheshire report points out that disability poverty is not only about financial poverty but about poverty of opportunity and aspiration.

A constituent e-mailed me yesterday evening. He said that > "it can be forgotten that a person with a disability has ambitions just like everyone else".

He was told that he was setting his sights too high at school by wanting to study at university. The e-mail continued:

> "The unfortunate fact is though, that this just underlines the bigotry that is very real and very present in our society. It certainly does a great deal of damage to self-confidence."

Such important issues are more difficult to tackle, but they are pervasive.

Roger Berry: I agree very much with my hon. Friend. They are real and pervasive issues.

One problem arises from the fact that, in order to fulfil their aspirations, disabled people often have to do things that others do not have to do. They may have to employ personal assistants, they may have to rely on personal care and home adaptations, and they may incur costs for the additional heating necessary to keep their homes warm. That package of things, which many disabled people have to take on board in addition to their impairment, can affect their aspirations. Given that they also have to face the prejudice that is sadly still prevalent in many parts of society, their aspirations can be deeply frustrated.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. On the important question highlighted in the Leonard Cheshire report—the extent to which poverty is deepened by the extra costs that disabled people face—will he come on to deal with the case to be made for a more objective and empirically sourced basis for the excellent disability living allowance? Important thought it is, the DLA does not meet the costs of disability facing most disabled people.

Roger Berry: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his intervention. He has made an enormous contribution in this field, and I shall come to that point later. First, however, may I make a general comment?

There are serious methodological issues in estimating the extra costs of disability. Leonard Cheshire Disability has made a good effort to come up with a modest estimate of those extra costs; it suggests something like an extra 25 per cent. above the costs of living of a non-disabled person, but I believe that that is on the conservative side. Other organisations, such the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, have over the years engaged in similar exercises and come up with higher figures. However, my right hon. Friend is right to say that the problem needs to be addressed.

If we take the modest estimate of the extra costs of disability proposed in the excellent Leonard Cheshire report, the number of disabled people living in poverty would increase from three in 10 to six. It is therefore important that we should recognise the significant extra costs of disability. We know from our constituency case work—and, no doubt, from family and friends—about the circumstances in which people on low incomes have to live, and I know of the strong feelings on the matter, both in the country and in the House. Early-day motion 637—a cross-party motion that I tabled with other Members in January—was a response to the Leonard Cheshire Disability report. It not only noted the publication of that report, but it expressed the view that the extent of disability poverty in the UK is unacceptable, and it called on the Government to give the need to tackle disability poverty a higher priority. The motion has attracted 218 signatures, and it is the seventh most heavily supported in the current Session.

I believe that those who are most deserving of praise in society are not the hugely rich, however important their contributions might be. The most deserving are those who live in poverty, who live on low incomes and who seek to do the best for their families and to make a contribution. Those whom we should praise, those whom we should support and those with whom we parliamentarians should engage most are disabled people and their families and carers, who live on incomes that Members of Parliament would find intolerable.

Although I have congratulated Leonard Cheshire Disability on its report, I wish to make a further point before moving on to other key issues. I do not seek to diminish the strength of the Leonard Cheshire report in saying that a number of the lines of argument deployed by the charity have been deployed by other organisations and individuals. Indeed, that strengthens the argument.

I have already referred to the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, but many arguments made in the Leonard Cheshire report echo those made, for example, by the former Disability Rights Commission, RADAR, "Disability Now"—the monthly magazine published by Scope, which last year published a range of articles on the circumstances of disabled people living in poverty—the Disability Alliance, which is specifically concerned with the income problems of disabled people, the Every Disabled Child Matters campaign, which is currently lobbying Members of Parliament, and the Prime Minister's strategy unit.

In his introduction to the strategy unit's report, "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People", published in January 2005, the then Prime Minister said:

> "Disabled people remain more likely to live in poverty, to have fewer educational qualifications, to be out of work and experience prejudice and abuse. They still routinely find themselves experiencing poorer services."

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentioned work, which is one of the key routes out of poverty, towards self-esteem and a better quality of life, and towards avoiding social exclusion. Does he look back, as I do, with nostalgia at the 1980s when we had the wonderful sheltered work scheme? In Poole in Dorset, I employed a number of disabled people and people with learning difficulties, and they added an enormous amount to my company. They brought more than they took from my company, and that enabled them to build their quality of life and to escape a little bit from poverty with a wage packet. Does he think that the Government should look at that scheme as a way forward?

Roger Berry: The issue of sheltered employment as opposed to mainstream employment, which has been the focus of the debate about the future of Remploy, is a very important one. Disabled people ought to have the opportunities that suit them best. I must say that I support Remploy's strategy to expand the number of places that they support in mainstream employment. That is precisely the reason why disability organisations, too, support the Remploy programme. In addition, one can create more jobs in mainstream employment than one can for the same expenditure in sheltered employment. The strategy of moving in that direction, which Remploy has pursued for a number of years, is right. I believe that many of the criticisms of Remploy's recent plans are fundamentally misdirected.

Before responding to the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), I was listing relevant organisations. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) is in the Chamber, and last week, the Work and Pensions Committee, which he chairs, published an excellent report entitled, "The best start in life? Alleviating deprivation, improving social mobility, and eradicating child poverty". Many of the arguments that Leonard Cheshire used in its report are echoed in that Select Committee report, although no doubt my hon. Friend can speak for himself later if I have maligned him.

The problem is not that the basic facts are disputed, nor that the Government are not doing anything—they are doing a lot. The problem is that we are not doing enough. I made the point earlier that tackling disability poverty is desirable in its own right, but at the same time we need to recognise that it is absolutely necessary if other Government targets are to be met—the targets on child poverty and fuel poverty are the two obvious ones. Of the 2.8 million children living in poverty in this country, about 1 million are affected by disability. They are either disabled children, or their parents or carers are disabled. That has enormous significance for a strategy to tackle child poverty, because unless disability poverty is tackled more vigorously, we will miss our targets on child poverty.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this very important debate. Does he agree that another area of higher cost is the cost of child care for disabled children? That is a serious impediment, given the supply and the cost of such care, for parents who are trying to find work.

Roger Berry: I agree with the hon. Lady. The cost of child care for disabled children is an issue that, for example, the Every Disabled Child Matters campaign, to which I have referred, stresses, among other matters. Child care is not only an additional cost; it is very often the most significant additional cost. When one contemplates such a scenario, the estimated 25 per cent. extra costs for a disabled family, as compared with those for a non-disabled family, seem, I repeat, a very modest assumption. In many circumstances, the additional costs for a disabled family are significantly higher.

The same is true when it comes to targets for reducing fuel poverty, particularly at a time when fuel prices are rising. As with child poverty, it is very difficult to believe that the Government's fuel poverty targets can be met without specific measures to help disabled people and their families. What is to be done? We all know that, broadly speaking, the most effective measures to tackle poverty fall under two broad headings: on the one hand, labour market policies; and on the other hand, policies in relation to the tax and benefit system. I have always argued, as the Government have, that improving the opportunities to work is undeniably the best route out of poverty for those who are able to work. That is why full employment matters; that is why a national minimum wage matters; that is why the new deal for disabled people matters, and why Pathways to Work matters. All those initiatives are important. Undeniably, for those who can work, work is the best route out of poverty. Today, however, one in three of working age disabled adults and their families still live in poverty, because 50 per cent. of them are not in jobs and for those who are not in employment, the levels of social security benefits are simply too low.

There has been significant progress on the jobs front. Fifty per cent. of working-age disabled people are in work, which is 10 per cent. more disabled people in work than was the case 10 years ago. There is therefore no doubt that measures of the kind to which I have referred have helped to provide more employment opportunities for disabled people, but neither is there any no doubt that more effort in that area is absolutely necessary.

It is difficult to know exactly why 10 per cent. more disabled people are in work now than, say, 10 years ago. Clearly, there are 2.7 million more jobs in the economy; there have also been special measures to support disabled people in getting into work. Legislation has been introduced to outlaw discrimination in the labour market, and I believe that employers' attitudes are changing. It is difficult to identify which of those factors has been the most important. My guess is that the rapid growth in the number of jobs overall and the specific labour market policies that have been introduced to enhance opportunities for disabled people have probably had the most impact. Thankfully, it is not much debated any more that more needs to be done to improve employment opportunities for disabled people.

However, there are still enormous problems. For example, the percentage of people of working age with a mental health condition who are in work is not 50 per cent. but 20 per cent. Similarly, the percentage of people with learning difficulties who are in work is not 50 per cent. but 25 per cent. Again, employment for people in these groups has increased, but not hugely, and they are still way behind most citizens in terms of their employment prospects and opportunities. So I strongly support the measures that are being taken—measures that should be taken—to provide more specialist and individual support for people in these circumstances.

We could debate some of the relevant programmes and the organisation of those programmes, but I do not want to do that. I think that we have got those programmes and their organisation about right, or we are getting them about right. In a sense, I am asking for more of the same there. However, the point that I would make about labour market policies is that we should not be stingy with the money. I realise that it is too late for a pre-Budget bid and some people have heard me say this before, so I hope that they will forgive me, but sometimes one repeats things because they are so obviously true.

For example, the access to work programme is referred to in the Leonard Cheshire Disability report and many of us have referred to it over the years. The Leonard Cheshire Disability report, like many other reports, calls for the Government to do more to increase awareness of the access to work programme and to increase its funding. I would not say that the access to work programme is one of the most closely guarded secrets in Whitehall, because I do not believe that people in Whitehall are deliberately not trying to promote it. However, it is astonishing that 75 per cent. of employers have never heard of the programme. It costs £64 million a year, which is more than four times as much as was being spent 10 years ago, for which the Government deserve credit, but that is about £8 a year for each disabled person of working age. It is not a lot of money.

More important, however, is what the Department for Work and Pensions gets back when it spends £1 million on access to work. I have it in writing that if the Department spends £1 million on enabling people to return to work or take up employment through the access to work programme, the Treasury will gain £1.7 million. Why? Because those people will no longer rely on the same benefits and will pay tax on their income. The Government therefore spend £1 million to get £1.7 million—it is investing to save, a no-brainer. If the Chancellor is short of a few bob tomorrow, I suggest that he puts a load of money into access to work.

There is, however, a more general point, because, in fairness, I have picked only a tiny part of the Government's package. To their credit, the Government have said that they will take 1 million people off incapacity benefit and that that will save the Treasury £7 billion. That is obviously quite a good idea, given that supporting people to get into employment means that they pay more tax and receive less benefit. Can we not perhaps ensure that we have joined-up government and that the benefits to the Treasury of active employment programmes are recycled to enable more people to get into work? I am sure that that is what the Government have in mind and that they will be nothing other than generous in funding employment programmes, but it is always good to make the obvious point.

Much more attention should be devoted to those disabled people who are not expected to work. In recent years, there has been enormous activity on the jobs front, and the Government deserve credit for that. Although I can see their strategy for helping people out of poverty through work, I have more difficulty working out precisely what the strategy is for tackling poverty among disabled people who are not expected to work. The benefits system is critical to the quality of life of those disabled people who are not in work and it determines whether they languish in poverty.

Many disabled people who are out of work find themselves and their families in poverty for two reasons. First, many do not claim the benefits to which they are entitled, and that is particularly true of families with disabled children. Secondly, disability benefits are, to put it mildly, not generous or adequate. Much more needs to be done to promote the take-up of DLA among disabled adults and parents of disabled children, and I hope that the Minister will mention that.

As we all know from our experience, our casework and the statistics, the inadequacy of benefits is such that many people are forced to live in great poverty. For example, someone who loses their job as a result of an impairment will experience a dramatic, life-changing loss of income. Similarly, most people do not have a good insurance policy that says, "If you lose your job because of an impairment, do not worry—you are part of a system that will ensure that your income is maintained." As a result, most people who lose their job because they acquire an impairment at work face a shattering loss of income. As Members of Parliament, we all know of people in such circumstances who have got into debt, lost their home and ended up in an appalling situation. I do not want to be misunderstood; we must, of course, do more to enable those who acquire an impairment at work to stay in employment—that is the first thing. However, we must also recognise that the social security system is the only thing that keeps many people out of poverty, and it is currently failing to do that.

I have another question for the Minister. We are moving into a new system, with employment support allowances and so on, and I hope that the Government will make sure that the higher rate of employment support allowance is enough to ensure that those who are not expected to work do not live in poverty. That is an important issue, which needs to be addressed, and I ask the Minister to comment on it.

Along with other right hon. and hon. Members, I have discussed the additional costs of disability. My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) specifically asked whether existing benefits were adequate to take into account those additional costs, and I do not believe that they are. Perhaps more significantly, however, the recent report by the Work And Pensions Committee makes it clear that they are not adequate. In conclusion 24, for example, the Committee unanimously said:

"We are very concerned by evidence that 1 in 5 families with disabled children have had to cut back on food. In and out of work benefits must be set at a level to cover the extra costs of living with disability and ensure a decent standard of living."

In conclusion 25, it said:

"We believe that Disability Living Allowance must be reviewed to ensure it more closely reflects the additional cost of disability."

I very much hope that the Government will take the Committee's comments on board, because most people would agree with them.

We are all aware of the arguments that have been used, for example, on extending the higher-rate mobility component of DLA to some blind people. There is also the issue of allowing people over 65 to claim DLA, rather than the less valuable attendance allowance. I have always found it distinctly odd that someone can claim DLA at the age of 64 and quite a few months, but that they cannot do so when they hit 65, even though they may have exactly the same mobility needs on their 65th birthday as they did the day before. There are real issues about reforming the benefits system, and DLA is one important issue that needs to be addressed. I therefore very much welcome the Committee's report.

One of the additional costs of disability, which I have already mentioned, is heating. Many disabled people face higher-than-average fuel bills because they are likely to be at home more and their impairment may require them to maintain a consistent temperature in their home. I do not believe that the existing rates of DLA cover that, even though we are often advised that they do. I am not the only person who does not believe that claim, and nor are the disability organisations the only organisations that do not believe it. The Work and Pensions Committee does not believe it, and in conclusion 27 of its report, it says—[Laughter.] I apologise if I am stealing the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North, but repetition, as I have said before, and as I am illustrating now, is always a good way to remind people of the essential points of an argument. The Committee said:

"We also recommend that the Government considers extending winter fuel payments to families with disabled children under five in receipt of Disability Living Allowance at the middle or higher rate."

My only criticism is that the Committee has not been ambitious enough. Over the years, many of us have argued that logic and fairness would suggest that winter fuel payments should be extended to all those under 60 who receive the middle or higher-rate care component or the higher-rate mobility component of DLA. Someone who is over 60 will obviously get their winter fuel allowance, whether they need it or not, but someone who is under 60 will not. People with high mobility or care needs demonstrably have a case for saying that their heating costs will be higher. If we are to have serious winter fuel allowances, they should seriously tackle the additional costs of disability. I hope that the Government will respond positively to the recommendation of the Work and Pensions Committee by saying that it has not been ambitious enough and that they would like to extend it further.

I come to my final point, Mr. Chope, because I am aware that a number of right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak. I want to make a quick comment about independent living, partly because the Government published an important report last Monday, which I welcome, and partly because the social care system is failing disabled people big time. While I welcome the Government's report about independent living and about giving disabled people the same choice, control and freedom as any other citizen, I have a caveat, which is that we are not being promised legislation—at least not yet.

My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Ashley has introduced the Disabled Persons (Independent Living) Bill in the other place on two occasions. It has been through the other place, but I do not anticipate its getting through our House, although I will do my best. The Bill identifies a number of areas in which legislation is needed. I hope that the Government will look at the matter again. As Members of Parliament, we all know that needs are not being met. We know countless constituents who are not getting the support that they need from the local authorities. We also know that the system is bureaucratic and wasteful. People have to fill out so many forms. They have to fill out forms for the benefit system. They face more paperwork if they need home adaptation and they have to have another assessment for personal care. If they have an assessment in one local authority area, they cannot carry that assessment to the area next door. Assessments are not portable.

The other day, I was talking to a disabled guy who lives in Lambeth, but wants to work in Southwark. I happen to live in Southwark, so I celebrate Southwark. None the less, the man wanted to move from one local authority to another. His perception was, "Goodness gracious me—he put it a bit firmer than that—if I go from Lambeth to Southwark, I will have to have my care needs reassessed. It will take time. I may not get the same package that I currently have in Lambeth. I do not know whether it will be better or worse." It is absurd that care packages are not portable.

As a former local councillor I can see merits in localism, but there are some areas in life in which localism is a fundamental problem. Saying to disabled people that they have to have a care assessment in their own local authority can make them feel imprisoned in their own immediate area. They feel unable to seek work elsewhere for fear of getting a less advantageous assessment, and unable to go to another local authority to live nearer friends and family. I genuinely believe that the inconsistencies in local authority provision and the lack of portable packages are a severe impediment to the freedom and choice that we all say disabled people should have. That is an area in which legislation may be necessary. There is a range of possible issues here, including the balance between national support and funding and arrangements for disabled people and local support. It is a mess at the moment. The problem is not easy to disentangle, but we need to move much more towards a national system that will make independent living a reality and that will give people the choice and dignity that they deserve.

In summary, to tackle poverty among disabled people we have to continue to do substantially more to increase opportunities for education, training and employment. We have to provide more generous in-work and out-of-work benefits. We need to simplify the benefits system, promote higher take-up and make rapid progress. I readily acknowledge the Government's significant achievements in tackling many of the unacceptable disadvantages facing disabled people. However, the strategy for tackling disability poverty, particularly in relation to the substantial number of people who are not expected to work because they cannot work, is still one that needs to be addressed properly. Only then will disabled people have the same choice, control and freedom as other citizens.

10.5 am

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): It is a pleasure to be here under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope, and also to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), who introduced the debate with an excellent and well informed speech. He and I have shared many a platform, been in many a debate, and supported many a Bill. We welcome my hon. Friend the Minister and acknowledge the role that she has played in many of the achievements in this area. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood said, much more remains to be done. I appreciate that many hon. Members want to speak so I shall try to summarise the main points that I want to make.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood dealt with the issues of poverty, which afflicts disabled people and their families. He quoted from the excellent report by Leonard Cheshire. I want to address most of my remarks to the evidence of poverty among disabled children and their families. I worry, as my hon. Friend does, about the poverty of opportunity. Although income and the right level of benefits are important factors, we must look at what is happening to public expenditure and seek to ensure that there is a desire to influence the quality of life of disabled children and their families in so far as we can do so. I welcome what he said about fuel poverty. I took part in a debate on that issue a few weeks ago and I initiated one in the Chamber last January.

In the review that I chaired last year on disabled children and their families, we made a specific recommendation that the allowance should be extended to disabled children and their families. Like my hon. Friend, I think that we would have gone further and addressed disabled adults, but that was not part of our remit.

When I was talking about poverty of aspiration in our debate in Westminster Hall on 16 January, I mentioned briefly the case study of a young lad called Stephen in my own constituency. Although he had received much assistance from North Lanarkshire council, his quality of life would have been better if the policy on short breaks, which involves resources from public expenditure, had been extended in a better way to suit him. I am very pleased that since that time, he has been given respite care in a place that suits his individual needs.

I thank North Lanarkshire council and my local newspaper, The Kirkintilloch Herald—that paper tends to give move coverage to such debates than, for example, the BBC in Scotland—for helping Stephen to ensure that he gets suitable short breaks. It is all about the quality of life. We all know the demands and would love to have more time to go into them. However, I want to move beyond that. My hon. Friend the Minister will know what is coming, as will the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett). During the all-party review of support for disabled and their families, the Government response was very welcome. They allocated an additional £340 million to England and specific amounts, based on the Barnett formula, to Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland—£34 million to the latter. Again, I am appalled that we simply do not know where the Scottish Executive have put that money, which was made available by the Treasury on the basis of evidence presented and following an excellent response by the Treasury and the Department for Education and Skills.

None of us should be taken in by the red herrings about ring-fencing and the rest. That money was expected to be spent not simply on local government services—important though they are—but on the NHS in Scotland and, specifically, on disabled children and their families. Unless we have accountability, transparency and a clear indication of where that money has gone, some of us will return to the issue again and again.

I know that others are keen to speak in this important debate, so I shall simply summarise the issues that I think remain to be addressed, important though the progress is that we have made. It is right that we consider the poverty and, in particular, the quality of life of disabled children and their families. When considering public expenditure in the health service, transport, employment opportunities, the arts and creative industries, and the rest, we should set our sights much higher and focus on the millions of disabled children in Britain, including those whose needs we have addressed. In that spirit, and with an eye on tomorrow's Budget—I know that the hour might be late—we encourage the Chancellor to consider how, in fiscal terms, he can influence the quality of life of disabled people, including by looking at energy companies, who have not done too badly in recent years, and asking them to make a contribution.

This has been a very worthwhile debate and I look forward to hearing the comments of my colleagues and the Minister. Again, I thank very warmly my hon.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

Friend the Member for Kingswood, who has done so much in the fight for the rights of disabled people. I am sure that he will continue to do so.

10.13 am

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) on securing this debate. Nobody in Parliament doubts his commitment over many years to the issues before us. I am delighted to see the Minister in the Chamber; she has often heard me say that she is the finest Minister for disabled people that we have ever had. In repeating those comments, I hope that one day she will reward my niceness to her.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) has left the Chamber, not least because he is a friend of mine, partly because he is from Keighley, which makes him a pure bred Yorkshireman—that is always good in my book. He talked about the 1980s, my memory of which is of continual recession, massive de-industrialisation and people, with and without disabilities, losing jobs in their hundreds of thousands—we touched 3 million unemployed twice. We also saw the return of the spectre of the 1930s and marches for jobs, but those marches were about white, able-bodied men getting jobs, not black and minority ethnic communities, disabled people or women. Nevertheless, it was terrifying to see that spectre return, because nobody thought that we would ever see it again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood mentioned that 50 per cent. of disabled people are in work, but that is a false figure. The more disabled a person is, the less likely they are to be in work. There are some horrific examples of blatant discrimination, particularly against people with mental illnesses, which I shall come on to later. I want to concentrate on work for those with disabilities, because I think that it is a basic, crucial civil right. Disabled people have the same civil right to work as anybody else, but there are too many barriers in the system and too much discrimination in society. In particular, there are too many barriers in the benefits system preventing people from accessing benefits. We need to do something about that. Particularly for families with disabled children, child care is crucial. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) referred to last year's package, which was extremely welcome, but for families, particularly with the most severely disabled children, the cost of child care is astronomical.

The child care tax credit, which is 80 per cent. of £175 a week, is a very welcome initiative, although the take-up has been very poor. However, £175 goes nowhere in providing child care for a disabled child. The Work and Pensions Committee report gave the example of a 60 per cent. premium on the going child care rate, if the child is disabled. We heard evidence of some institutions charging five times as much for child care for a disabled child as for an able-bodied child. Those institutions are clearly saying, "We don't want these children, so we will price them out." That is wrong and those institutions need to be taken to task over it.

The Select Committee's report on incapacity benefits a couple of years ago touched on parents of disabled children going to work, and considered Pathways to Work and various other things. We reported—and this was striking—that it is seldom the disability itself that prevents an individual from going to work, but other factors, around the home or whatever. A key factor for parents with a disabled child is that that child is more likely than other children to need regular doctors or hospital appointments, requiring the parent to take time off work. The Government have been good on family-friendly policies, but they involve the right to request leave, not automatic entitlements.

Scarier is the fact that a disabled child is 16 times more likely than an able-bodied child to be excluded from school. If a parent is at work and receives a phone call at quarter-past 10 saying, "We are going to exclude your child", they go to the school. That does not have to happen very often before an employer, understandably or not, thinks, "Hang on a minute, what's going on here? Something needs to be done about this." We need to take another look at the state education system to find out why those children are 16 times more likely to be excluded.

I want to touch on two things on which I think the Government have been particularly good in assisting disabled people back into work. I am really pleased to see my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) here, because I think that he changed the dynamics in that system during his time as Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. We should pay tribute to him. The first thing was that we changed the linking rules, which meant that someone could take a job and that, within two years, they could return to the benefit that they were on before, if it did not work out. That provides security for people with disabilities so that they can see whether employment works out for them.

The second thing that the Government did was to get rid of therapeutic earnings, which were an insult to disabled people, and brought in permitted work rules, which are more flexible. However, if we are going to have permitted work, we should have one rule, not four separate regimes—a point that I have raised before. It is insulting, too, to say that, under permitted work, the maximum that can be worked is 16 hours at minimum wage, which pays about £6 an hour. If those who have been on incapacity benefit for two, five, 10 or 15 years manage to find a job, I would tell them, "You go and do that job. Come back in three or six months and tell us how it is working out. Keep your benefit and whatever wages you get. Test it out and see if it works for you." If they manage to break that gap of many years, we must be much more flexible in how we operate the benefits system to allow such people to get back to work. There is no loss to the Treasury in doing so. There is the fantastic statistic that someone on incapacity benefit for two years is more likely to retire or die than go back to work. If people are making the effort, we should encourage them and not have artificial rules that restrict what work they can do and how much they can earn.

Returning to the issue of discrimination, we have the much improved Disability Discrimination Act 2005. We had the Disability Rights Commission and we now have the Equal Opportunities Commission. However, it is more than 30 years since we passed the Race Relations Act 1976 and, frankly, we have not abolished race discrimination. We have had the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 for about the same period and we have not abolished sex discrimination. The one advantage of disability discrimination—if I may be forgiven for putting it that way—is that sex and race discrimination are generally malicious, whereas disability discrimination is generally down to ignorance. There is therefore a better opportunity to work through that problem.

A couple of years ago, the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development carried out a survey in which 70 per cent. of companies said that they would not even interview somebody who disclosed a history of mental illness. That survey was released to all media outlets, but not one of them covered it. If the survey said that 70 per cent. of companies would not interview a black person, it would have been on the front page of every newspaper; it would have been the lead story on the BBC "Nine O'clock News" and so on. If 70 per cent. of companies said that they would not interview a woman, there would have been similar press coverage. Because the survey said that companies would not interview somebody who had had a mental illness, it was buried and did not go anywhere. That is a measure of how far society still has to go on this issue.

I find it appalling that Rethink, an organisation well known to everybody in the Chamber, led a consortium that submitted to the lottery fund a bid that received £17 million to work on educating employers, as it should not have been necessary to do so. The Government should have done a lot more to educate and train employers, and to punish those who do not alter their attitudes. It is tragic that it is left to mental health charities to make a bid to the lottery fund to do what the state should be doing in the first place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood mentioned access to work, which is a well chewed-over bone. It is the Government's best kept secret and the way in which it operates needs to be examined. These days, given that we are increasingly engaging with the private and third sectors on the delivery of services, the access to work budget should be devolved to the providers of job placement services. A formula can easily be worked out that would not be dissimilar to how the social fund is distributed to district offices. A sum could be retained centrally to deal with crises.

If we are serious about the new approach to getting people back to work, the providers need a range of tools at their fingertips. They do not want to have to wait for three to six weeks for a response from a Department somewhere else. They would have to be put on trust because abuse must always be guarded against, but we must be much more imaginative about how we administer and use the access to work budget.

Finally, I shall make just a couple of points, because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. It is important that we set the support allowance at a level that recognises that these individuals will never work again. That would send a real signal about Government commitment. I do not want to be particularly damning about colleagues in the Treasury, but for many months, rumours have circulated that the Treasury has been saying, "Five pounds and no more." That is an insult, and it will cause insurrection in the ranks. I do not want to issue threats, but nobody will tolerate that. I understand that the support allowances will be announced in the next few weeks. That will be seen either as a declaration of intent or as a surrender. I would much rather that the Government make it a declaration of intent.

Tomorrow, the Chancellor will make his Budget statement. We are all hopeful, and anticipate that further energies and moneys will be applied to the child poverty strategy. I hope to see particular emphasis on disabled children and poverty. The Government have a fantastic track record, but we need to keep up the momentum and take the issue forward because that community has been forgotten for far too long.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) on triggering the debate. Recently, there have been in this hall three debates on issues linked to today's debate about disability poverty: special educational needs, disabled children and the employment of disabled adults. The good aspect about such debates is that the issue is clearly on the agenda, but the bad aspect is that so much is yet to be done.

I congratulate all previous speakers on their excellent contributions. The hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), Chairman of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions, mentioned how discrimination against the disabled is in some ways almost acceptable. For instance, it is not covered by the media with similar outrage to discrimination against black, female, gay or Muslim members of society. It is sad that while we have made progress on so many other aspects of society, so much discrimination still exists.

I will comment briefly on the Leonard Cheshire report because it includes so much good work. I do not need to go into great detail, but I recommend that anybody who has not read it from cover to cover does so because it sums up the key issues clearly and concisely.

The right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) mentioned the clearly identified need for £340 million. It was identified on a UK-wide basis, and questions must be asked about where that money has been spent, or if it is going to be spent north of the border. Many Members have mentioned that the Budget statement takes place tomorrow. The Chancellor might ask why he should identify further funding if existing identified funding is not being spent. Indeed, questions must be asked in all parts of the House. I notice that no members of the Scottish National party are present to try to justify what they are doing. Once again, they are missing in action.

One of the big policy focuses in recent years has been poverty. Whether it has been the Make Poverty History campaign, or the Government's focus on tackling child poverty, poverty has become a major focus for policy makers. However, we have yet to see sufficient focus on tackling disability poverty, which is why today's debate is so important. With the Government having published "Independent Living Strategy" last week, now is the ideal time to re-examine disability and poverty, and whether we are doing enough to break the link between the two. In the same way that we must never accept that being born in a developing country inevitably condemns someone to a life of poverty, being born with, or developing, a disability ought not to mean that someone will live life below the poverty line. Poverty is not an inevitable consequence of disability, but looking at the statistics, one might be forgiven for thinking that it is.

[John Barrett]

Disabled people are twice as likely to live in poverty as non-disabled people—about 30 per cent. compared with 16 per cent. The challenge for policy makers must be to break the link between disability and poverty. Although we have rightly adopted targeted strategies for tackling child poverty, not enough has been done to target disability poverty specifically. I hope that today's debate represents one small step in the progress towards that goal.

Many disabled people continue to experience poverty of aspiration and opportunity due to physical barriers and numerous other barriers. However, we must be attuned to aspiration barriers in education, employment and access to services, too, because they are every bit as debilitating as any physical condition. In the debate about disability poverty, we must consider not only financial poverty but poverty of opportunity and poverty of aspiration. Disability poverty can develop as a result not only of low income but of poor-quality or inappropriate housing or lack of educational opportunities.

We are socially and morally obliged to tackle disability poverty, but there are also powerful economic imperatives for doing so. Addressing disability poverty is not only a matter of basic social justice; there is a clear economic case for it. Ending disability poverty would mean that more disabled people moved into the workplace, increasing net contributions to the Treasury through the tax system and reducing expenditure on out of work benefits. To use a broad estimate, if 1 million disabled people moved back into work, the Treasury could expect to gain up to £5 billion in income tax alone. The Chancellor would do well to listen to those figures before he addresses the House tomorrow.

As other hon. Members have mentioned, not only do disabled people tend to have smaller incomes, but many face additional costs due to their disability. The extra costs of managing an impairment vary according to circumstances, but they often include such expenses as mobility equipment, social care, treatment, child care, higher fuel bills and adaptations to the home. The Leonard Cheshire report on disability found that the average costs of those managing an impairment are about a quarter higher than the essential day-to-day costs of non-disabled people, and it is believed that that is a gross underestimate for many. Existing poverty figures and measures consistently underestimate the level of disability poverty. Researchers from the London School of Economics calculate that, if the additional costs of disability were factored in, the percentage of disabled people living below the poverty line could be as high as 61 per cent. It is essential to attempt to build some measurement of those extra costs into poverty indicators in order better to understand the true levels of disability poverty.

Disabled people are also far less likely to have significant savings and far more likely to be in debt than their non-disabled counterparts. The sheer scale of the gap between disabled and non-disabled people in terms of the likelihood of living in financial poverty means that specific action to tackle disability poverty is desperately needed. What is the Minister doing to factor the extra costs of disability into official calculations? Crucially, how will those work through to the benefit system?

Only half of disabled people are in work. I need not point out what a tragic waste of human potential that represents. Although work might not be the appropriate option for everyone, the correlation between being out of work and living in poverty is clear. Being in work can help to combat many aspects of disability poverty—not just financial poverty, but poverty of opportunity and aspiration—by providing social networks and an important boost in confidence through further training and skills, which helps individuals to play a greater part in society. It is the social as well as the more obvious economic benefits of employment that make helping disabled people find meaningful work so important.

We must banish the assumption, which has persisted for too long, that many disabled people either cannot or do not want to work. Disabled people continue to face barriers to employment, including discrimination, lack of support from employers, inaccessible public transport and inflexible social care arrangements. I am sure that the Minister will accept that, although progress has been made in those areas, it has been too slow. Even when disabled people find work, they are more likely than non-disabled people to be in low-paid, short-term jobs. We need to focus not just on employment but on suitable and sustainable employment.

For those who cannot work, we need a benefit system sufficiently sensitive to the specific barriers faced by disabled people. Too often, disabled people on benefits are the victims of the race to prove which party is toughest on so-called benefit scroungers. Those with the severest impairments face the lowest likelihood of employment, combined with the highest extra costs of disability. The welfare benefit system must support that group better. It must ensure that no one is written off and that those for whom a return to work is particularly difficult are not left to languish in poverty. No one should be abandoned to a life of poverty and benefits.

The application and appeals processes for benefit claimants can be daunting and complicated for the best of us, which leads many not to claim the benefits to which they are entitled. Those forced to leave work due to an acquired or worsening disability almost always face an accompanying drop in income. Often, partners must leave employment to become carers, leading to a further drop in income. Targeted help and assistance for that group is therefore essential. I support what has been said by previous speakers and appeal to the Chancellor to extend measures such as the winter fuel allowance in his speech tomorrow.

Transport is a significant obstacle faced by disabled people. To access services and engage fully with society, accessible transport is key. Poverty of opportunity and social exclusion are inextricably linked with inaccessible public transport. An accessible and integrated transport network is essential to tackling disability poverty, as it would facilitate improvements in the disabled people employment rate as well as their community engagement and quality of life.

The Government have acknowledged the scale of many of the challenges discussed today in their strategy document "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People" and the subsequent strategy published last week. Although I welcome much of what was included, I would be extremely interested to hear whether the Minister believes that the Government's ambitions can be translated into practical change on the ground for those who need it. The links between disability and poverty are maintained by continuing barriers in society—both physical barriers to accessibility and the barriers formed by negative attitudes and a lack of understanding about what disabled people can achieve.

The Government should make tackling disability poverty one of their key priorities. Doing so will require first a commitment to understand and monitor disability poverty and its causes and then the strategic development of social policy initiatives to eradicate it. Ending disability poverty is not just a way to drive down poverty throughout the UK and improve the nation's economic health. It is also an absolute necessity of social justice.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope. I congratulate the hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) on securing this debate. I know from our frequent meeting at the all-party group on disability and from his record over many years that he is an acknowledged expert on the matter. I listened to his words with great care and, not for the first time, found myself agreeing with much of what he said, although—I say this for the benefit of the shadow Chancellor—not with any of the proposals that would increase expenditure. I do not want to get myself into dreadful trouble, as I am sure the Minister would if she pre-empted the Chancellor's Budget speech tomorrow.

I join the hon. Member for Kingswood in mentioning early-day motion 637. The number of Members from all parties who have signed it increases daily. As he said, it is the seventh best supported early-day motion, which shows the interest in the matter across all parties. Our friends in the media would be wise to recognise that the issue is of great interest among parliamentarians. When they report debates such as this and the proceedings of the Select Committee on Work and Pensions on the subject, as well as when they write stories involving discrimination against disabled people such as those mentioned earlier, they might consider whether they cover them to the extent to that they would if they were reporting issues affecting others.

I should like to draw attention to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) about child poverty. It is perfectly true, as he says, that the Government have made some progress, although it is worth pointing out that they are likely to miss their child poverty targets for 2010. It is also worth saying that the latest figures published, those for 2005-06, showed that what progress they have made has gone into reverse and an extra 200,000 children now live in poverty. Does the Minister think that the Government will hit their 2010 child poverty targets? It would be useful to get that on the record.

As the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said, it is true that there has been some progress in getting people with disabilities into the workplace, although not as much as the Government or indeed any of us would wish. In looking at the statistics produced by the Office for National Statistics on working-age people with work-limiting disabilities, I am afraid that I could not go back to 1997. The data do not go back that far, although I know that Government Members like starting with the year zero. In 1999, 46.2 per cent. of long-term disabled people were in employment; by 2007, that percentage had increased to 50.5 per cent. That is a welcome improvement, but, as other hon. Members have said, it is not as big an improvement as one would hope.

The hon. Member for Kingswood is absolutely right that the best route out of poverty for disabled people who can work is to get into work. He made some interesting comments that flow nicely into some points that I want to make about the welfare reform proposals that my party has published, on which we are consulting. He made an important point about using the savings that are gained from not paying incapacity benefit and other out-of-work benefits to disabled people whom we get back into work. Those savings, and the tax and national insurance contributions that they pay, can be used to fund the help and support that are required to get disabled people back into work. He drew attention to the current Treasury rules, which make it difficult, if not impossible, to invest those savings in getting such people back into work.

I am pleased to put it on the record that my hon. Friends in the shadow Treasury team agree with the hon. Gentleman, and that we propose to use private and voluntary providers that will get paid only on results, when they get people into work for sustained periods. We would use those savings to fund programmes. Only in that way can we address the issue of all the people on out-of-work benefits, including those who have been on such benefits for some considerable time. If we do not make that change, we must limit our ambitions to the people who newly enter such benefit programmes. I am pleased that we have been able to do that, and I would like nothing more than if the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his Budget statement tomorrow—

Mr. Rooney: I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman was more assiduous. There is already an agreement between the Department for Work and Pensions and the Treasury for just such an arrangement: a proportion of the savings made on incapacity benefit through the new Pathways To Work programmes will return to the DWP to finance further programmes. That has already been done.

Mr. Harper: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I know that that is done in a limited way, but it does not enable the Government to focus their employment and support allowances on all of those who are on out-of-work benefits. I think that the hon. Gentleman gave the statistic that if one is on incapacity benefit for more than two years, one is more likely to die or retire than to come off it. A significant number of people are on incapacity benefit. More people are on incapacity benefit now and have been on it or its predecessor benefits for more than five years than in 1997. A significant number of people under 35 are on incapacity benefit. It cannot be right to allow them to spend their entire lives on out-of-work benefits without trying to extend programmes to everyone on out-of-work benefits and to get them all back into work if they are able to work. As has been said, that is the best route out of poverty.

The right hon. Member for Oxford, East made another wise point, which was followed up by other hon. Members, about the extra costs that disabled people have to bear, and whether they are properly reflected in the disability living allowance. I hope that the Minister will respond to that point. On what basis are those figures calculated? Some transparency would be helpful, because at least then we could engage in a proper debate. In its excellent report, which has been mentioned by several hon. Members, Leonard Cheshire has had a good stab at doing that work and has come up with an estimate. Other organisations have done similar work, and it would be good if the Government were to undertake an official version of such work, which could be built into the calculation of such benefits and allowances, to give those disabled people a level playing field on which to compete with everyone else in the workplace.

The hon. Member for Kingswood talked about the access to work programme. I know that the Minister agrees that it is one of the Government's best-kept secrets, because I have heard her say so before. I know what she means, and I agree that it is an excellent programme, but I have found from both empirical and anecdotal research that a significant number of employers, particularly smaller employers, have never heard of it. In debates such as this, we should all take the opportunity to reiterate that the programme exists and how good it is. That is why I am talking about it even though other hon. Members have already done so. More employers should be aware of the programme and should take it up where necessary to enable more disabled people to get back into work. It is easier than employers might envisage.

I shall make only a few more points, because I want the Minister to have time to answer the many points that the hon. Member for Kingswood made. First, the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) again made the point about Scotland that I have heard him make several times. If he wants a UK-wide approach to disability poverty, he should remember that his party devolved such matters to the Scottish Parliament and the Scottish Government, which is controlled by the Scottish National party. The place to have these arguments is, therefore, in that Parliament and not in this place.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for referring to my comments, because I had a feeling that he was not going to say a word on them. I think that the charming Annabel Goldie will be hanging on his every word. She and I would like to know whether he believes that, given devolution, which we accept as a reality, transparency and accountability should apply to resources that are made available specifically for disabled children and their families.

Mr. Harper: Absolutely; I am a great believer in transparency, and I have no problem with the right hon. Gentleman pressing for the SNP Government to be open about where they spend such money. Unfortunately, however, even if he disagrees with the priorities of that Administration, we in this place can no longer influence them, because those matters have been devolved. I am sure that he will continue raising this issue. His campaigning work and his arguments about disabled children are well made and are often supported by the Conservatives.

In closing, I thank the hon. Member for Kingswood again for securing this debate, which has given us an excellent opportunity to make several points on the record. Finally, as the hon. Member for Bradford, North mentioned the Minister's fine qualities, it is worth mentioning, by way of balance, my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), who was an excellent Minister for disabled people. Indeed, he put the first Disability Discrimination Act on the statute book in 1995. On that note, I look forward to hearing the Minister's comments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Let me say at the outset that I am not going to compete with the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). I have congratulated him on the Floor of the House on challenging a significant majority of his own party on the Disability Discrimination Act. I pay tribute to my colleagues, including those present—my hon. Friends the Members for Kingswood (Roger Berry) and for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), and my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke)—for campaigning to encourage the then Conservative Government to put that Act on the statute book.

I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Chope, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood on securing the debate. He has shown significant commitment to this issue over many years. I also thank other hon. Members for their contributions. I am particularly pleased to note that my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), the former Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, was present at the debate earlier. It is significant that, although he is no longer the Secretary of State, he continues to take a great interest in the subject and attends debates such as this one.

I shall try to answer as many of the questions that have been raised as possible, but let me get one thing out of the way and then I will be able to settle down a bit. The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) mentioned this Government's child poverty targets. I just want to say, colleagues, that I welcome his interest in child poverty, but we have a target for which we are being held to account, and we welcome the fact that we are held to account for it. His party does not have a target. It once had an ambition to eradicate child poverty, but demoted it to an aspiration, and now we are not even sure whether it has that.

Mr. Harper: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. McGuire: No, I will not. I am not quite sure whether the hon. Gentleman's party has even an aspiration. He said that he had heard me say certain things. I have certainly heard his colleagues challenged on that issue on the Floor of the House.[1]

The other issue is, of course, long-term incapacity benefit. There were fewer people on the benefit in 1997 than there are now because it was introduced in 1992, and even the most basic mathematics indicates that it would be nigh on impossible only four and a bit years after a benefit is introduced to have a significant number of people on it long term. We should start to be a little more mature when we bandy figures about.

1. [Official Report, 19 March 2008, Vol. 473, c. 8MC.]

I am delighted that this debate is being held today, because yesterday the Secretary of State and I met with John Knight, the head of policy for Leonard Cheshire Disability, to consider some of the issues in the organisation's report. I know that my hon. Friends and, I would hope, hon. Members across the House, accept that we have made considerable progress in tackling poverty. Indeed, hon. Members alluded to that this morning.

However, we also recognise that there is difficulty in reaching a consensus on how some of the issues are assessed, and on how we calculate the level of disability poverty. We cannot reach consensus, although we continue to do work to try to get to the bottom of how we assess the real level of poverty.

Regardless of the methodology used, we accept that there is significant poverty among disabled people. According to our material deprivation measures, before housing costs, some 22 per cent. of individuals living in households affected by disability are at risk of income poverty, compared with 16 per cent. if no one in the household is disabled. We should not worry about the figures, but we should recognise that major issues must be addressed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood and one or two other colleagues raised some specific issues. In the short time that is available to me, I shall try to pick up on those issues rather than give a set response to their contributions. My hon. Friend asked about disability living allowance take-up, particularly among disabled children. Again, I hope that colleagues recognise that it is difficult to assess the level of take-up, because DLA is an individually assessed benefit. Both DLA and attendance allowance are always difficult to calculate. However, we are working with the Policy Studies Institute on a feasibility study to explore the suitability of options for estimating take-up so that we can get to a position where we can understand what the take-up issues are.

Our disability and carers service is working with "Every Disabled Child Matters" to promote take-up of DLA among children and, more generally, to determine how the service can be more responsive to their needs. It is tackling some of the issues that my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill raised in the Select Committee. We are looking at how to pick up on some of those issues.

I am not sure that I ever did say that the access to work programme was a secret. If I did say that, I would suggest that it was because I am sometimes disappointed that, as my right hon. Friend highlighted, we do not get publicity on access to work and how it promotes employment for disabled people. My right hon. Friend is dead right, as we say north of the border, on this one: the programme is successful and popular, and it generates net flow-backs to the Exchequer. There is no dispute about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North, who is the Chairman of the Work and Pensions Committee, was right in saying that there were some issues with access to work. I hope that he agrees that there have been some significant changes in how we operate—the turnaround times are certainly better now than they have ever been. I listened to his radical approaches, not just on access to work but on other aspects of the benefit system, and I shall consider them over the next period or so.

On the extra costs of disability, again, it is difficult to get to a concept or methodology that is generally accepted. However, I put it on the record this morning that we welcome the Leonard Cheshire Disability report as a major contribution to the debate.

I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North highlighted the importance of child care in encouraging disabled adults and parents in a family to move into employment. He may be aware that the Department for Children, Schools and Families is seeking to improve the lives of disabled children with its "Aiming High for Disabled Children" implementation strategy. A key part of the additional investment will be improved access to child care for disabled children. His comments were spot on: we cannot tell parents of disabled children that we want them to move into work if they have major difficulties in accessing child care, and that is why we have welcomed the report.

I am not sure which hon. Member raised the matter of disabled children getting fair access to education. I believe we all agree that poverty comes in many guises. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill said that there was sometimes a poverty of ambition. We all recognise that sometimes the seeds of poverty of ambition are sown when children are young, and that we need to ensure that our education system lifts their ambitions and aspirations. Indeed, since September 2002, schools and local authorities have been under a duty not to treat disabled pupils or students less favourably than those who are not disabled.

In the brief time that is left to me, I want to ensure that the message of this debate is not lost. One of the important ways out of poverty for disabled people is through work, and I welcomed the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood on ensuring that the operation of our benefit system and our support for people who want to move into employment is adjusted—as a matter of fact, one could say "revolutionised". We now have Jobcentre Plus and Pathways To Work, and partnerships are in place that are far more sensitive to the needs of the individual and of disabled people.

I am sorry that the past eight minutes or so have involved such a quick tour of some of the things that have been raised in the debate, but I shall write to hon. Members if I have missed anything important. I want to put it on the record that, yes, we have a lot more to do, and there are all sorts of things that we could do differently and better, but this Government certainly do not suffer from a poverty of ambition to improve the lives of disabled people over the next years. That is why "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People" and the independent living strategy have been published. That is why we will, in fact, achieve what we set out to achieve. It is only by working with organisations such as Leonard Cheshire Disability and my colleagues in this Chamber that we will achieve that.

Transport Infrastructure (Yorkshire and Humberside)

11 am

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): It is a great pleasure to speak in this debate, Mr. Chope, with you in the Chair. However, there is a common error in the title of the debate, because it should be about Yorkshire and Humber. Humberside ceased to exist some 12 years ago and it is little lamented, not least in east Yorkshire.

I am delighted to have secured this debate and to have the opportunity to speak about an issue of great importance to my constituents and to the wider community of people across the Yorkshire and Humber region. It is a pleasure to stand opposite the Minister, with whom I debated in Westminster Hall when there was a rather unpalatable situation with community hospitals. However—thanks, doubtless, to the Minister and her colleagues—there were subtle changes in the Government position. I hope that today's debate can similarly engender subtle changes in their position to the betterment of transport in Yorkshire.

In June 2006, I introduced a debate on the A1079 corridor between Hull and York. I argued that that road is dangerous, congested and cannot support a powerful, dynamic growth area. I could have expanded my arguments to include other roads, bus routes and train journeys affecting the whole region that are no longer fit for purpose and risk holding the county of Yorkshire back from the future growth, prosperity and success.

I shall discuss first the contribution that Yorkshire and Humber have made to the country's economic development, especially over the past 10 to 15 years, then focus on the economic and social transformation that will be at risk unless improvements are made to the region's transport infrastructure. I will then focus on what the region's Members of Parliament, together with groups such as Yorkshire Forward and the Yorkshire and Humber regional assembly want to see from the Government in funding and support. I will also consider two specific issues: the A1079 road and the proposed reopening of the Beverley to York railway line. I am happy to give way to hon. Members from other parts of the region.

The basic position is that Yorkshire and Humber has, over the past five years or more, been at the bottom of the table of funding on transport. The Minister will tell us about the increases in transport spending overall and I do not deny that there have been increases. However, I am here to ask the Minister what the rationale is for Yorkshire receiving less per head than any other region in the country. I shall lay out the various areas where our transport infrastructure has been found wanting. Almost every part of the community recognises that that is so, and they have data to back it up. That brings into question any argument that says that giving the least spending to Yorkshire makes any sense.

Yorkshire and Humber is performing strongly. With a population of 5 million, the county ranks alongside Ireland, Greece, Norway and Singapore in population. Some 279,000 businesses contribute to an economy worth in excess of £80 billion. Growth in Yorkshire's gross domestic product has been above the United Kingdom average for the past six years, and above the European Union average for the past four. Manufacturing is predicted to grow by more than 12 per cent. over the next 10 years, and five of the world's top 10 companies have a base in the region.

In the East Riding of Yorkshire, where my constituency is located, business investment has grown significantly, and more people are moving to the area than ever before. The city of Hull has a successful port that caters for more than 1 million passengers a year and can handle up to 80 million tonnes of freight annually. Some £72 million has been spent on Hull's infrastructure since 1990, and it supports a work force of many thousands.

The region as a whole is ideally located in the centre of the country. It supports two of the country's three busiest motorways—the M1 and the M62—and the east coast main line, now under the National Express franchise, runs up to 800 trains a day, including 200,000 tonnes of freight. Hull Trains, which runs up to seven services a day between Hull and London, is a regional success story. It was established in 2000 with just three services a day.

Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab/Co-op): In Halifax we are campaigning for a direct line from Halifax to London. Perhaps in highlighting the benefits of the direct line from Hull to London, the hon. Gentleman might say how important such lines are for the social and economic benefit of towns such as Hull and Halifax.

Mr. Stuart: I agree with the hon. Lady. The direct line has had a positive impact on Hull, and I am sure that similar services could do so for Halifax. The Hull Trains service has received many accolades, including the prestigious Guardian/Observer/Guardian Unlimited travel award for the best train company. I hope that one day a Halifax train company will vie with Hull Trains for that award.

Yorkshire's strong economic performance has been achieved in spite of, rather than because of, regional transport infrastructure. Let me read the concluding remarks from a recent report by new Labour's pet think-tank, the Institute for Public Policy Research, which looked into the state of transport links in the north of England in general:

> "The North lags behind in some key dimensions: the northern regions receive less public funding for transport per head than other regions and their roads are in worse overall condition than anywhere else in England...high levels of traffic congestion and declining bus use mean that substantial investment in transport infrastructure and reform to transport governance will be required to deliver world-class transport services in the North of the future."

I do not always agree with IPPR reports, but this time it hit the nail on the head. Hon. Members will be aware of the problems facing their local areas. Overall, road traffic usage in the region has increased by 20 per cent. in the past 10 years and, according to the regional assembly, journey times are expected to increase by 30 per cent. by 2012. According to the RAC Foundation, the A1/M1 between south Yorkshire and Leeds, and the M62 in west Yorkshire are both likely to be gridlocked by 2041.

On the railways, the region has seen a 50 per cent. increase in rail passenger numbers since 1996. Again, according to the IPPR, the main rail links in the north of England, particularly those between Manchester and Hull, and Leeds and Sheffield, are no longer "fit for purpose". The east coast main line, although it is performing strongly, is now at capacity, and there are no specific funding commitments for that line for the period between 2009 and 2014. The situation is so bad that, when surveyed by Yorkshire and Humber chambers of commerce in November 2007, 60 per cent. of businesses said that they were losing income because of the region's transport infrastructure—up 21 per cent. in just one year—and only 14 per cent. felt that the transport system in the region met their needs, compared with 17 per cent. nationally. The Hull and Humber chamber of commerce said in a recent briefing that "businesses believe that poor transport infrastructure is holding the region back and making it harder for them to compete with other UK regions and internationally."

In east Yorkshire, the cities of Hull and York—two of the big five urban areas in the region—are let down by appallingly bad transport links. There is no direct rail link for passengers, who must go instead via Brough and Selby—an absurd route, which probably adds 45 minutes to each individual journey.

The A1079 is used by an estimated 15,000 vehicles a day. However, just 4.5 km of that road is dual carriageway, with the remaining 39.5 km being single carriageway. It is one of the most congested roads in the region: the journey times even from Beverley to Hull are creeping towards 45 minutes during peak times. It is one of the most dangerous roads, not just in Yorkshire but in the country as a whole. Since 2002, 25 people have been killed in traffic accidents, and 1,037 have been injured, which averages out at more than 200 year. This problem affects the whole region. According to figures released by the Department of Transport, 21,009 road accidents were recorded in Yorkshire and Humber between March 2006 and March 2007. A vast number of people have been hurt. Overall, only the Metropolitan police recorded a higher number of road casualties during a 12-month period, at 21,781.

These grim accident statistics are hardly surprising when we consider that almost one third of Britain's most dangerous roads are in Yorkshire and Humber. According to a recent assessment report by the European Road Assessment Programme—EuroRAP—of the 17 sections of road that present a persistent medium to high risk to users, six are situated in the Yorkshire region. The most dangerous road in Britain is the 15-mile stretch of the A682 between junction 13 of the M65 and Long Preston. Also on the list is the A62 between Diggle and Huddersfield, the A644 between Dewsbury and junction 25 of the M62, and the A1079—specifically the stretch between Hull and Market Weighton.

I hope that the Minister will not suggest that there is some special situation in Yorkshire, or that there is a benign state that means it does not need the investment required in other areas; there is no case to be made along those lines. The East Riding of Yorkshire council deserves to be congratulated on taking steps to reduce the number of accidents on the A1079. Two years ago, it installed up to half a dozen speed cameras, which appear to have had an impact. Some 154 people sustained injuries on the road in 2006, which is down from 255 in 2003, but accidents continue to happen. Earlier this month, two men were treated in hospital for serious multiple injuries following a car crash at Wilberfoss near Pocklington. The men had to be freed by firefighters using hydraulic rescue equipment before being taken by RAF helicopter to York hospital. A few weeks before, a man died following a collision with another car near the village of Shiptonthorpe.

Put simply, the A1079 is in urgent need of improvement. The East Riding of Yorkshire council has clearly stated that fact. In 2006, it claimed that the road was operating "near to its theoretical capacity for a single carriageway of its width and characteristics."

The main problem for the road is the number of heavy goods vehicles that use it every day—up to 10 per cent. of the total number of vehicles on the road. That is not ideal, particularly because most of the road is single carriageway.

After much local campaigning, the council agreed to undertake a feasibility study for a bid to improve the A1079, which was considered by the council at a cabinet meeting in December. However, the decision on whether to conduct a study was pushed back until the summer, because there is limited money available, and the A1079 is behind two other major development projects in priority. Such projects are worth while. For example, improvements to the A164, which runs between Beverley and the Humber bridge, will make access to that strategic hub much easier, and the Beverley and Bridlington integrated transport plans will make traffic and congestion more bearable for local residents.

If Yorkshire did not receive such a poor share of the transport budget compared with other Government regions, many more improvements could be undertaken, including to the A1079. The same could also be said for the Beverley to York rail link, which was closed in 1965 as part of the Beeching cuts and has never been reopened. Public pressure for the line to be restored led to the appointment of a consultancy group to conduct a feasibility study by the East Riding of Yorkshire council. The group concluded that up to 622,000 journeys a year could be made on the line, provided that two trains an hour were operated, with journeys extended to and from Leeds. As ever, the sticking point was the estimated cost, which was projected to be up to £239 million, with a cost-benefit ratio of between 1.26 and 2.04 over 60 years. Although there is a positive cost-benefit ratio, the chances of the line seeing the light of day in the next 10 to 15 years are slim.

As I have said, the crux of the issue and the main reason for initiating this debate, is to ask why Yorkshire receives less money than any other region. As hon. Members will know, when Department for Transport funding is distributed, our region sits at the bottom of the pile, although this year, it has crawled up slightly from the very bottom. In 2001-02, Yorkshire and Humber received just £140 per head in transport funding, which compares with £323 for London and £171 on average in England. As a percentage of the English total, our figure was 81.9 per cent. of the average. In 2006-07, funding for Yorkshire and Humber increased to £215 per head. However, in London the figure was £614, and in England overall it was £305. For some reason, over the past six or seven years, our figure has dropped to 70.5 per cent. of the English total. Again, the people of Yorkshire and Humber want to know the rationale behind that cut in relative spending.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate. It is important to acknowledge the work that the Minister and the Department have done to reimburse local authorities for the damage caused by the flooding last summer. Sheffield has just received more than £9 million—£10 million in total—to repair the damage done to local roads by the floods. We should at least acknowledge what has been done while making the case for what has not been done.

Mr. Stuart: The hon Lady is correct, where things have been done right, that should be acknowledged. On the floods, the Audit Commission considered the financing of local government in relation to floods and emergencies, and described the situation as incoherent, overlapping and very poor—that is not an exact quote, but I think it was the conclusion that was reached. To put those figures in context, the insurance companies have spent in excess of £3 billion, on which they are forced to pay VAT. The Exchequer has therefore received hundreds of millions of pounds as a direct result of the flooding. The sums it has put back do not adequately compensate councils, such the East Riding of Yorkshire, for the damage that has been sustained, not least to the highways. The sum will emerge over the next couple of years, but we should put it in context. I completely agree with the hon. Lady; justice should be done and recognition should be given where it is deserved.

Nobody is saying that the region should have parity with London, which is a major international city and finance centre with specific needs, but what is the justification for Yorkshire doing so badly compared with other regions? A number of recent reports have set out in detail the economic rewards that the region would gain if more money were invested in transport infrastructure. A report from the think-tank Centre for Cities suggests that if the necessary investment was made in its public transport infrastructure and a park-and-ride scheme, the local economy in and around Leeds would benefit to the tune of £68 million a year. The report concluded that improvements to the trans-Pennine rail link and to the M1 and M62 would benefit the cities of Manchester and Leeds to the tune of £225 million a year. The Northern Way report, "North-South Connections", published in August 2007, states that investment in north-south and east-west rail links would benefit the economy by up to £10 billion. The Institute for Public Policy Research states in its report that

> "two of the northern regions—the North East and Yorkshire and the Humber—appear to lose out significantly from the current distribution of public investment in transport: the Department for Transport should review its future funding allocations to make sure that these regions get a fair share of funding"— whatever that funding is. That goes to the heart of what hon. Members from all parties and I want to say to the Government today: we accept that increased investment has been made, but we would like an explanation of the rationale involved and a fair share of the investment made nationally, according to a criteria that we, as Members of Parliament, can understand.

I would also like to raise the issue of the Humber bridge and its tolls. The Minister will know that the original quote for building the Humber bridge—we all know why it was built at the time of a by-election in 1966—was £28 million. As a result of Government procurement and management—or mismanagement—that figure trebled while the bridge was being built. Over the years, in the hands of Governments of all parties, the debt has been left to sit on Government books, although I pay credit to the Government for writing down some of that debt in the Treasury's books. The debt in public accounts is now £300 million more than the original quote of £28 million to build the bridge, as it is £333 million. It is my constituents and the constituents of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) who are paying for that, as they pay the highest toll in the country to cross the bridge. The tolls also have an economic impact on the region. I would like to inform the Minister, if she does not already know, that the local authorities will produce a report later this year that will consider the economic impact of the Humber bridge tolls. I hope that I have readied her for receipt of the report later in the year. Removing the tolls could have a positive economic impact.

I have come to the end of my remarks within the 20 minute margin. The Minister has influenced community hospital policy to the betterment of my constituents, so I hope that she can influence Government and that, particularly as the Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber, she can concentrate on representing Yorkshire in government rather than the other way round. I trust that, with her talents and arts of persuasion, she will be able to do precisely that.

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) not only on securing this important debate, but on the excellent panoramic view that he has given of transport issues in the region. I shall try not to reiterate the bevy of statistics that we have all come to the debate suitably armed with. It is not my intention to be too parochial or to play beggar-my-neighbour in the debate, but all of us will put our constituencies forward as perfect examples of the transport challenges that the hon. Gentleman described. Key roads in my constituency are often choked with traffic. Rail is affected by overcrowding, and buses have been hit by the effects of deregulation, higher car ownership and usage, and congestion.

Normally, my eyes glaze over when I see a document that contains the word "strategy". I like to wait for the action plan that follows it if there is one, but an exception is the 25-year Leeds city region transport vision and investment plan—that is a mouthful—because it is a cogent and coherent document. I can extrapolate from that strategy, contrary to other strategies, what the benefits advocated by it would be for my constituency and constituents, as well as for the rest of the Leeds city region. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister is aware of the document, because we exchanged views on it in a fairly recent Adjournment debate that I secured on transport issues affecting my constituency. It is an excellent analysis of the needs and, I submit, a modest document in terms of the finances that would be required to realise the proposals.

Rail plays a crucial role in my constituency. We have taken some years to recover from the effects of privatisation. I am thinking of the time when the first franchisee—MTL—got rid of 80 drivers, with all the concomitant unreliability and cancellations of services. In addition, a huge proportion of the extra investment that the Government have allocated to rail has gone into maintenance and safety issues in the wake of the Hatfield disaster, which has deflected that investment away from the more visible and tangible aspects of rail provision—that is, extra rolling stock.

Northern Rail data show significant overcrowding problems affecting most services into Leeds during peak times. The main examples are the three lines that run through my constituency: the Airedale and Wharfedale line, the Harrogate line and the Caldervale line. At peak times, each of those exceeds 135 per cent. of seating capacity, which is generally regarded as the maximum practical load. That lack of capacity and the poor quality and reliability of services, particularly into Leeds, are already discouraging trips at peak times. It is no surprise that the 25-year strategy regards improvements to those lines as key measures.

I recognise that, under the present Government, there have been improvements to all three stations in my constituency: Horsforth, Guiseley and New Pudsey. We have seen new 333 class rolling stock on the Airedale and Wharfedale line. We have seen the £150 million upgrade of Leeds City station, which has increased its efficiency and reduced the waiting times that used to typify services going into the city. Last year, a partnership of Metro—the West Yorkshire passenger transport executive—Yorkshire Forward and Northern Rail increased capacity on lines such as the Caldervale line, but unfortunately unreliability has led to a continuation of major complaints from passengers about overcrowding at peak times. The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) may have comments to make about the fact that, often, trains that go through Burley station in his constituency have been filled at the previous station by my constituents, if they are fortunate enough to get on the train.

The proposal in the White Paper, "Delivering a Sustainable Railway", to deploy 1,300 extra carriages and the recognition that a fair proportion of those should come into the Leeds area are welcome, but we need the carriages very soon and we need as large a proportion as possible. It certainly needs to be at the higher limits of what has been envisaged by the Department for Transport. The 25-year Leeds city region plan proposes extending the electrification measures that have been so successful on the Airedale and Wharfedale line. That example demonstrates the value of extending them across the area.

Bus deregulation has been a disaster for many communities throughout the country, not least communities in my area. Since deregulation in 1986, fares in Pudsey and west Yorkshire have gone up by more than 50 per cent. in real terms. Passenger numbers have declined by almost 40 per cent., which equates to 100 million passenger journeys. As in many areas, services are chopped and changed, missing, late or unreliable, and passengers, if they have an alternative, simply vote with their feet, or rather with their cars, with all the attendant problems that that creates: congestion, pollution and rat running and speeding through residential communities.

When we appeal to First Bus when it takes a service off the timetable because it is not profitable, we get what I call the two-fingered response, if you will excuse the gesture, Mr. Chope. The first part of the response is that the service is not profitable, and the second is, "Go away to Metro and get a subsidy." Part of the problem with that is that, although all the figures show that the Government have been making more and more finance available to PTEs to subsidise services, we have not been getting a commensurate increase in the services provided.

All hon. Members could cite a litany of service cuts down the years in their areas. I am thinking of services such as the 97, 647 and 651 in the Guiseley and Yeadon areas. We are currently having battles over services such as the 966 in Yeadon and over cuts to the 81 and 82 services serving Pudsey and Horsforth. Some communities, such as Farfield and Hough Side in my constituency, have simply been cut off; they have ceased to exist as part of a bus route. People cannot get to key facilities such as the newly rebuilt Wharfedale hospital, which, although it is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West, serves a large number of my constituents, too.

Ms Angela C. Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend's comments and hope that the Local Transport Bill will offer us the regulation that we need to sort out the problem. Yesterday in The Guardian, there was a report that bus operators may try to challenge the national concessionary bus pass scheme for the over-60s, because they say that they will lose out with that. Will he join me in being critical of that move, given that the bus operators have done very well out of deregulation over the past few years and that that bus scheme is one of the best things that has been done in the past few months by the Government?

Mr. Truswell: I absolutely agree. It would be a shame if bus operators seek to challenge the scheme, because there is a suspicion—I put it no more strongly than that—that they have been jacking up their standard fares to maximise their income once the nationwide concessionary fares system comes into operation. It is absolutely right to say that the deregulated system has given them a licence to print money and they make profits even when they are not providing a decent service.

We know all the environmental benefits of rail and buses. The Tyndall centre for climate change research has given us many insights into that, although I will not go into the details. The plan for the city region envisages more quality and accessibility improvements, including the holy grail of integration—integrated ticketing—better passenger information, the extension of existing guided busways, which have been so successful in certain parts of Leeds, and high-frequency bus rapid transit corridors to complement rail corridors.

I welcome the Local Transport Bill and the easing of requirements on quality contracts, but as the Minister knows, I, together with others, still have reservations about the process. I do not intend to go into those in detail now; I will share them when the Bill comes before this House.

As the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness rightly indicated, most of the strategic routes in Yorkshire, certainly those in the city region, are congested at peak times, including the motorways. The A65 and the ring road in my constituency is a good example of a route on which people experience increasingly lengthy peak-time delays and congestion. The worsening congestion has led to a deterioration in the reliability of journey times.

[Mr. Truswell]

As a result, peak periods are simply growing like Topsy. Some drivers re-time their journeys to avoid the worst congestion, thereby further extending the peak period.

I do not intend to reiterate the hon. Gentleman's points. At the end of the day, the question, as always, is how we pay for the improvements that are envisaged in the plan. As my right hon. Friend the Minister will know, the estimated cost is slightly more than £4 billion in 2006 prices, although that will increase by £500 million when the so-called optimism bias is factored in—I shall not bore hon. Members with a description of that because most of us will have come across it at some point. The good news is that the sum includes funding that is already committed for transport in the city region. Around £1.75 billion, which is 40 per cent. of the necessary funding, has already been committed, and a significant part of the remainder does not require new funding sources. Unidentified funding currently totals about £1.8 billion. The plan is explicit on the wide range of possible funding sources that could be used to make up the shortfall, which includes the transport innovation fund, train operator investment, section 106 contributions from developers, additional funding from local authorities, and the Northern Way growth fund and its successor.

There has been significant real-term increases in funding for transport in the region, which was welcome—I am pleased that the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness acknowledged that in his balanced contribution. However, at the end of the day, we are asking for a much fairer share of the larger cake—I can put it no more starkly than that. I was going to go through some of the statistics that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but I shall not waste time doing so because other hon. Members wish to speak. I share his analysis. The case is indisputable and the cost is modest compared with the benefits and certainly the consequences of not meeting the challenge. As I said, we need not only a fair wind from the Minister, but fair funding.

11.32 am

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing this debate—there can be no better time to discuss the matter. As he made clear, and as I am sure we all agree, transport infrastructure is vital to growth and development in any area or region. It supports economic renewal, contributes to environmental sustainability, and tackles social exclusion by linking deprived areas at risk from marginalisation to key services and the new opportunities that are created by the kind of regeneration and growth that we all want. However, investment levels in Yorkshire and the Humber on transport infrastructure are a concern—I shall speak particularly about Leeds.

My Leeds colleagues will agree that the city is in many ways a huge success story, but equally that a lack of investment in transport infrastructure is, simply put, holding back further growth and, indeed, costing us further inward investment. Yet again, in 2006-07, for the third year in a row, Yorkshire and the Humber came bottom of the Government expenditure league table—a position that we are not prepared to accept, and nor should we. More worryingly, the gap is widening dramatically compared with transport spending in London and the south-east in particular. To demonstrate that, in the five years from 2000-01, our region went from receiving just less than half the per person spend in London and the south-east to less than a third in 2005-06. That could not be more starkly shown than by a graph of the increasing gap. The Minister should address that gap by increasing the per person spend in Yorkshire and the Humber in a meaningful way. Unfortunately, the pattern at the moment shows little sign of change. In 2006-07, the spend was £215 a head in Yorkshire, compared with the £614 per head enjoyed by those in London—nearly three times as much.

As the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness mentioned, the chief economist at the Institute for Public Policy Research, Howard Reed, highlighted the matter. He said:

> "Major investment in the rail network, bus services and upgrades to the North's road network are crucial ... It is imperative that the resources that are available for transport investment are allocated to where they can be most effective".

That sentiment is strongly echoed by the Leeds chamber of commerce on behalf of the Leeds area. Ian Williams, the chamber's executive director of policy, said:

> "Funding is everything and unless we increase the level of overall transport funding, we will always be on the back foot, we will always be at a disadvantage compared to other regions".

The chamber points out that, despite the fact that Leeds is a key driver for the economy in the region, and thus supposedly a key focus of Government policy, it actually receives only 24 per cent. of the regional transport budget. It argues, quite sensibly, that transport investment is needed in the areas where it will deliver the greatest return and that, therefore, there is surely an argument that cannot be ignored to invest further in the Leeds city region.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Of course Leeds needs more investment, but it is not the only economic centre in Yorkshire—York's science base is also extremely important. We should not get into the business of robbing Peter to pay Paul. Rather, do we not need to fight for the region as a whole?

Greg Mulholland: The hon. Gentleman is right to stick up for the wonderful city of York—I spent a very happy five years there. Of course, York is a vital hub for the region, as is Leeds. I am not talking about competing for a limited pot; indeed, the hon. Member for Pudsey said that we are trying to get a bigger slice of the cake. My point, with which the hon. Member for City of York will probably agree, is that because cities such as Leeds, Hull, York and Sheffield make such a contribution to the region's economy, it surely makes sense to invest in them rather than pouring so much money and such a proportion of the cake into the south-east, which is already over-developed. Doing so would provide a win-win solution. However, the Department for Transport is increasingly fixated with the south-east, and it continues to ignore such a solution.

We have already heard about capacity on the railways. To add to that, there was an extraordinary revelation from the body responsible for promoting public transport—Metro is the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority—a few weeks ago. It said that it was unable to promote the benefits of peak-time train travel in the region because the trains were bursting at the seams and it simply could not accept any further capacity.

We all know that the issue goes back to the short-sighted decision to award train franchises on a no-growth basis, which still detrimentally affects us. We also know about the 60 to 90 extra carriages proposed by the Department for Transport. However, that will not be enough—Metro estimates that we will need 135 extra carriages simply to meet current demand, not including the capacity necessary for park-and-ride facilities and the like, which we will need if we are to get more people out of their cars.

To echo the hon. Member for Pudsey, around 15,500 passengers arrive at Leeds on local services in the morning, about 15 per cent. of whom do not have a seat. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the figure of 135 per cent. of capacity. The Leeds-to-Harrogate line, which runs through my constituency, is one of the worst, with 133 per cent of capacity. Actually, the busiest train on that line operates at 213 per cent. of capacity, which is exceeded only by the extraordinary 274 per cent. of capacity on trains coming into Leeds from Castleford and Knottingley.

Incidentally, I should point out that the hon. Member for Pudsey and I share Horsforth station—we have a platform each—and I can only claim half of Burley park station because the other half is in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Leeds, West (John Battle), who is also behind the campaign to get a better funding deal for the region. The Harrogate-to-York line, which is linked to my area, goes through the magnificent Bramhope tunnel, which was finished in 1849, an era in which we in this country invested in public transport. Yet today, the Government do not provide enough carriages to allow people to travel in comfort through the tunnel. How far back have we gone regarding investment in public transport? Yes, there has been investment, but the Government have spent 11 years tinkering around the edges in Yorkshire and the Humber and the situation has got worse.

I turn to the subject of congestion. Several sections of the motorways around Leeds—the M1, the M62 and the M621—are operating close to capacity. Between junctions 5 and 6 on the M621, average speeds during the peak hour are as low as 20 mph. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) may smile, but I suggest that he visits us to see the reality of the situation.

We have two of the most badly congested roads in the country—the A660, which runs like a spine through my constituency; and the A65, a section of which I share with the hon. Member for Pudsey, though he has the bulk of it. The situation is not getting any better. The Government say that they cannot find £500 million for the Leeds supertram scheme, yet they can find £16 billion for the Crossrail scheme in a city that already has an integrated and extensive public transport system.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the difficulties with Government plans is their failure to honour and deliver on previous promises? Promises made in the transport 10-year plan in 2000 were not met. In the 2002 spending review, the then Chancellor, now the Prime Minister, promised that

"55 strategic road schemes are now being progressed through the Targeted Programme of Improvements, and around 100 more will be added as the programme of multimodal studies moves towards completion over the next two years".

That was a tremendous soundbite, but the Department for Transport's annual report in 2006 stated that only 36 strategic road schemes had been completed since 2001, which is a failure.

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. That was a very long intervention. I hope that two more hon. Members will be able to speak before I call the wind-ups at midday.

Greg Mulholland: The supertram experience has left a bitter taste. The Manchester and Nottingham extensions and the Edinburgh scheme have been given the go-ahead, despite similar costs and a significantly worse cost-benefit ratio, so it is clear when it comes to decisions on transport that it is one rule for some regions and another for Yorkshire.

We are united across the political spectrum; indeed council leaders from all parties and all the city's MPs have made the same case, but all we hear from the Minister is that small is beautiful. I am disappointed. Unlike Ministers for Health, whose job is clearly to promote health, it seems that the Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber is not meant to promote Yorkshire—she represents the Government to Yorkshire, not Yorkshire to the Government. That is extremely regrettable.

I have three questions for the Minister. First, when are we going to get a fair deal on transport in Yorkshire? Secondly, when will the Government take seriously the transport issues that are hampering regional development? Thirdly, when will we stop being bottom of the league for transport spending? We are not prepared to put up with that, and we will keep saying so until we get the fair deal that the people of Yorkshire and the Humber deserve.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I challenge two myths. The first is the myth in parts of the road transport lobby that building roads is the only answer to congestion and the second is the myth from parts of the environment lobby that investment in roads is bound to be bad for the environment. I congratulate the universities of York and Loughborough, Imperial college London and a number of transport companies for winning £4 million of Government investment to research solutions to road congestion. Among other things, the research will use military situation awareness technology; QinetiQ, the defence research company, is one of the partners to the consortium. It will seek to be able to tell drivers not only where there is a traffic jam but how to avoid it; and it will tell transport managers what the causes of congestion are and what needs to be done about them.

It is important to realise that technology has as much to contribute to reducing congestion as tarmac. Reducing congestion is important, because it leads to better safety on the roads. It also leads to less pollution. Vehicles queuing up with their engines running are going nowhere, but they have a severe environmental impact. Transport is the one sector of the economy in which carbon emissions continue to rise, and we need policies to reduce those emissions.

The view that all road transport investment is bound to increase pollution is wrong. A good example of its wrongness is the investment in York park-and-ride schemes over the years, which has hugely reduced the number of car journeys in and out of the city centre. City of York council is bidding for funding for improvements to York's northern ring road junctions, and for additional park-and-ride facilities.

Last year, we faced a large number of manufacturing job losses; Nestlé, the chocolate manufacturer, and British Sugar both announced redundancies, following the previous year's announcement that Terry's of York was moving out. One reason given by the companies for cutting manufacturing in York was road congestion; they blamed it for the length of time that it took to get the raw materials into the factory and the goods out. If, as a result of manufacturing closures due to road congestion, manufacturing moves abroad—perhaps to eastern Europe, as was the case with Terry's—the road miles used in the making of the food and the chocolate bars would be enormous. A modest investment in roads in the United Kingdom could lead to huge environmental benefits.

I seek Government support for three schemes about which City of York council and I spoke to the Minister on 4 February. The first is the council's bid for funding for three new park-and-ride sites. The first such site to be constructed was at Askham Bar, the Leeds gateway to York, just off the A64. That is now used by 600,000 passengers a year. The site has room for 550 cars; it is normally full by 10 am, and drivers are rerouted to other sites, thereby lengthening their journey. The idea is to replace that site with one nearby with space for 1,250 cars. The second change would be to construct a new park-and-ride site where the A59 crosses the northern ring road close to Poppleton, and to change the junction to improve traffic flows on the ring road. That would provide space for 750 cars. Thirdly, there would be a 750-space park-and-ride site on Wigginton road, with additional bus priority measures from there into York.

Secondly, I would like the Government to support the Highways Agency's bid to the regional transport board to upgrade the A64 Hopgrove roundabout, where the A64 branches off the ring road towards Scarborough. Finally, I notify the Minister that, later in the year, City of York council will be making a bid to the regional transport board for additional improvements to the outer ring road, in order to improve traffic flow. There has been much debate in York about dualling the ring road, but the bid is not for dualling but to make the existing road work better. I shall leave my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) a little time to contribute to the debate.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Chope, for calling me to speak in this debate. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing this important debate and I am glad that he put on the record that Humberside no longer exists as an administrative area.

Other hon. Members have already mentioned this, but I would also like to say that I welcomed the Minister's announcement yesterday of money to repair roads damaged by floods. North Lincolnshire council will receive £1.5 million from the Government to assist it in road repairs, so I thank her for that.

I want to set the scene a wee bit. Everyone today has been talking about Yorkshire and we have this little bit added on to the name of the region, called the Humber, which is actually the name of a river. The area that I represent is, in fact, in Lincolnshire, so I want to set the scene about that part of the region.

The port of Immingham is the transport hub of the area. About 64 million tonnes of cargo go through Immingham every year. Twenty per cent. of the UK's freight begins or ends its journey on the south Humber bank. The south Humber bank is also an industrial area with many major British industries involved there. It also contains most of Britain's oil refining capacity. We also have Grimsby docks adding to the trade that is going in and out of the area, particularly with cars being imported and exported.

That description should give hon. Members a bit of an idea of the pressure on transport infrastructure in the area. The main east-west route, linking the docks to the A1 and M1, is the M180/A180. That road has a concrete surface. As the Minister will know, roads with a concrete surface are very noisy and, with the increase in volume of heavy goods traffic on that particular road, the noise is getting worse. The Government have resurfaced part of it. However, because that resurfacing has been so successful, local people are lobbying to have the rest of the road resurfaced. I recently met the Minister and the Secretary of State for Transport to discuss the issue, so I would appreciate an update on the timetable for the rest of the resurfacing.

Leading from the A180 to the port of Immingham is the A160 road, linking to all the oil refineries in the area. However, that small section of road is single carriageway and it needs to be dual carriageway. I was told by one truck driver that it is possible to drive from Sicily all the way to north Lincolnshire on motorway or dual carriageway until the point where vehicles come off the A180 on to the A160 and then it is a single carriageway road.

Along with my right hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and my hon. Friends the Members for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), I led a delegation from North Lincolnshire council to meet the Minister's officials and we were told that her officials were looking favourably on getting the A160 dualled. Obviously, as the whole Humber estuary is a global gateway, particularly Immingham, I would certainly appreciate an update from her about the funding for that work.

If that work can be completed, it will have a knock-on effect on the town of Immingham itself, because heavy goods vehicles regularly go through the centre of the town at the moment. If we can sort out the transport infrastructure in the area, particularly the roads, that will take such heavy traffic out of the town and that can only be good for Immingham.

I would like to talk about the Humber bridge, a subject that was raised earlier by the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness. If he cares to go to my website and read the section called "The River Humber - the curse of the crossing", I think that he will find out some more facts about the subject. The high cost of getting across the Humber has led to complaints as far back as I could go. In 1316, people were complaining about the halfpenny charge for pedestrians and the one penny charge for equestrians on the Barton to Hull ferry. Daniel Defoe was not terribly fond of crossing the Humber either and referred to it as "an old fashioned dangerous passage".

He went on to describe

"a ferry over the Humber to Hull in an open boat, in which we had about fifteen horse, and ten or twelve cows mingled with about seventeen or eighteen passengers, we were about four hours tossed about in the Humber before we could get into Hull."

So there have been problems getting across the Humber for quite some time.

The story that I really like is that of a bit of a fight about the ferry between Jimmy Acland, who was from Hull, and the Hull Corporation in 1831. Again, that conflict related to the cost of crossing the Humber. The Hull Corporation kept bunging up the charges on the ferry to cross the Humber and Jimmy Acland, who was the editor of the Hull-based Portfolio newspaper, started a campaign against the high ferry charges, to such an extent that he purchased a boat. He called his boat "The Public Opinion" and it was up against the Hull Corporation's boat, which was called "The Royal Charter".

Both boats competed with each other. Jimmy Acland went back in time, as it were, and charged one penny, which was the 1316 charge, for anyone who wanted to cross the Humber. That led to fights between the two boats.

Mr. Truswell: It was a ferry war.

Shona McIsaac: It certainly was a ferry war. People would try and cut the moorings of the rival boat and local thugs would try and block people from getting on to the ferries. All that, and many other wonderful tales about crossing the Humber, can be found in that section of my website.

To bring matters more up to date, to be fair to the Government they have made some progress. Going back to shortly after the 1997 election, following representations from all MPs in the area—those representing the south bank of the Humber and the north bank—the Government wrote off about £64 million of the debt that had been built up by the Humber Bridge Board. Another £16 million has been written off recently, and there have been commensurate reductions in the interest rates. I welcome those moves.

I met my right hon. Friend the Minister recently to discuss the issue of tolls, because I believe that tolls are a thorn in the side of economic development in the area. Tolls act as a barrier, rather than linking both sides of the Humber. We have these bustling, busy ports and industrial development on both sides of the river, but the high tolls to cross the river act as a barrier. Recently, North Lincolnshire council commissioned a report to examine the effect of the tolls on economic development, and that report is welcome. I hope that the Minister will look at what it says.

Continuing with the tolls issue, what really upset local people is that the reorganisation of cancer services in the area meant that some of my constituents and other people on the south bank of the Humber had to travel north for cancer treatment. If someone is having cancer treatment every day, or every other day, and they are paying the toll, the parking fees and other transport costs if they are driving, because there is only one bus linking Grimsby and Cleethorpes to Hull, it becomes very costly. Consequently, many of us in the area have been campaigning for some sort of concession.

I must say that we have found the Humber Bridge Board to be not very receptive to that idea of a concession, to such an extent that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole tried to introduce a private Member's Bill on the subject. When he became aware that he could not follow that through, I introduced a private Member's Bill and I know that the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness was a co-sponsor. All parties backed the Bill as a way of trying to find a solution to the problem. I hope that, in her roles as a regional Minister and a transport Minister and also with her background at the Department of Health, the Minister will understand that particular problem and do all that she can to try to bring all the disparate groups together to find a solution to it.

Very quickly, I would like to talk about an issue that is related to access to hospital treatment, which is bus passes for pensioners. I raised the issue at Prime Minister's Question Time last week, saying that I have one local authority that imposes no restrictions on travel for pensioners; pensioners would be able to use their passes all day, including before 9.30 am. The neighbouring authority is imposing restrictions and it will not allow people to travel before 9.30 am. As I have said before, there is only one direct bus link from Grimsby to Hull. So, for people going to hospital, that is a very serious issue. Pensioners from Immingham who have to get on the bus before 9.30 to access hospital treatment have to pay full fare, but pensioners who live a mile down the road, across the border between the two authorities, in villages such as Killingholme, get to travel free.

We must resolve that issue, because it is almost creating apartheid in terms of access to travel in our area. I hope that the Minister will be able to do something about that, because I have looked at the figures, and North East Lincolnshire has had sufficient funding to allow pensioners to travel free before 9.30 am. I would therefore appreciate it if she could have a word with the council.

[JOHN BERCOW in the Chair]

12 noon

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to contribute to a debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing it.

For reasons of time, I shall restrict my remarks largely to public transport matters. Let me say at the start, however, that investment in transport infrastructure is self-evidently vital to the economic growth of any region, but particularly those regions that are some distance from the capital. The further away they are from London, the more important good transport links with the capital and the rest of the country become. We rely on good transport links not only to move goods around, but to create trade links with the rest of the UK and the wider world, allow workers to get to their jobs, bring together rural and urban areas, access shops and culture and allow children to get to school. The list is endless, but the point that I seek to make is simple: good transport links are essential to our everyday lives.

[Mark Hunter]

Transport is the backbone of our economy, and it is a generally accepted fact that the state of any area's transport network relates directly to its economic and social success. Many hon. Members have referred to IPPR North's recent paper on the subject, which argued convincingly that the lack of investment and improvement in transport—particularly public transport—in northern England is one of the biggest checks on the region's economic growth. Like many others, including Yorkshire Forward and just about every hon. Member who has contributed to the debate, IPPR North remains concerned about the level of investment in the region's transport.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) referred to the figures supplied to us by PTEG, which show that Yorkshire and Humber received only a third of the public expenditure that London received in 2006-07. My region, the north-west, was not much better off, receiving £276 a head, which is less than the average for England, at £305 a head, and considerably less than London's £614 a head. Of course, the difference in investment between London and the north will not come as a surprise to any of us, and we will all have argued in relation to our own constituencies that funding seems all too often to be skewed in favour of the south. Obviously, we understand that London is the capital and therefore a special case, and all that I am arguing is that the north also deserves a transport system that can support its economic growth and its citizens' social needs. Is the Minister therefore considering reviewing the funding allocations for transport to ensure that all regions get their fair share?

The lack of investment in the region's public transport is particularly worrying. I have listened to contributions from hon. Members both sides of the Chamber, and it seems to be universally accepted that significant investment must be made in the region's train services. The IPPR North report stated:

> "It is widely recognised that the main rail links between the North and South of England are not likely to be adequate to support sustainable growth over the coming decades" and that rail links in the north are not "fit for purpose". As I mentioned in questions to the Secretary of State for Transport just last week, it is a fact that, on too many train journeys, people are left without a seat, certainly in the Yorkshire and Humber region. As in the north-west, overcrowding is a significant problem on trains. According to PTEG, and as we have heard, a quarter of all local train arrivals at Leeds in the morning peak period have passenger loadings in excess of 135 per cent. of seated capacity.

If we want to encourage more people on to public transport, it is pretty obvious that we desperately need extra capacity, because no one will want to travel by train if they know in advance that the likelihood of getting a seat is remote. Therefore, there needs to be an urgent assessment of rail services in the north and of the introduction of high-speed rail services to London. That should be looked at as soon as possible, and I ask the Minister to address that question specifically in her response and to tell us if and when a proper cost-benefit analysis of such schemes will take place.

More specifically, I understand that First Group, which runs the trans-Pennine service, is in negotiations with the Government to add a fourth carriage to its trains to increase capacity by 20 per cent. and that that would be in exchange for an extension to its franchise. I also understand that it is looking to buy new rolling stock, but that it needs the go-ahead from the Government before it does so, so that the stock will continue to be used if the franchise changes hands. Will the Minister update us on what stage the negotiations with First Group have reached and give us an assurance that the Government are committed to working with First Group to ensure that capacity is increased on the trans-Pennine service?

One problem with transport is that it is nearly always more efficient in cost-benefit terms to create services in city regions than in rural ones. In particular, bus services for countryside communities often suffer first when funding is tight, because they do not make as much money as urban transport services tend to. There are not many rural areas that will say that their bus services have not been reduced in recent years. That is certainly no less true of the Yorkshire and Humber region, and we must ensure that rural bus services in the region are protected to reduce social exclusion.

One possible way of increasing bus passenger numbers—I say this in reference to the point made by the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac)—would be to introduce a system that allowed passengers to travel more easily between different areas. We could have a cross-regional smartcard system similar to the Oyster card in London to encourage more people to use buses and, I hope, ensure that more of the region's bus services remained sustainable. Perhaps the Minister could also touch on that.

Obviously, we need to keep in mind at all times the need to ensure that all forms of transport are sustainable and to help move England towards a carbon-neutral future. As we know, transport contributes highly to greenhouse gas emissions, and we must ensure that improvements and extensions are not accomplished at the expense of the environment.

The transport system in the Yorkshire and Humber region obviously needs significantly increased investment to support economic growth, reduce social exclusion and improve environmental sustainability. With a population of 5 million, the region is a vibrant, successful and hugely important part of the UK, but it deserves better. I very much hope that the Minister is listening to the concerns of the region's residents, as they have been expressed today, and I look forward to her response.

12.8 pm

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing this debate on transport spending in Yorkshire and north Lincolnshire.

Shona McIsaac: The hon. Gentleman mentioned north Lincolnshire, but both north Lincolnshire and north-east Lincolnshire are on the south bank of the Humber, and it would be unfair to leave out north-east Lincolnshire.

Mr. Goodwill: I stand corrected.

The picture that my hon. Friend painted has certainly been reflected in contributions from all parts of the region. The picture of under-investment over a long period, with our region being bottom of the list, seems to have hit home. My hon. Friend specifically mentioned the A1079, which I drove down last Friday, and the road is a story of congestion and carnage.

I was very pleased when the right hon. Lady was appointed Minister for the region. I am not sure what influence she will have over other Ministers in the areas of health and education, but when it comes to transport, she will be able to lobby herself. I hope that she will quickly respond to many of the concerns that have been expressed. In particular, I hope that she responds to the "Road to Ruin" campaign run by the Yorkshire Post, which has highlighted some of the points very clearly.

The figures speak for themselves. In 2006-07, per capita spending in our region was £215. In London, the figure was £614, and for the UK as a whole, £319. As the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) said, we should have a fairer share of the cake. How can the Minister justify the continuation of this sorry state of affairs? She cannot pass the buck because she has a dual ministerial responsibility.

Mention has been made of the IPPR report. On 28 February, Howard Reed, its chief economist, wrote that such effects could be transient given the existence of large projects in the pipeline to widen the M1 and the M62. However, last week, along with the announcement that the hard-shoulder running pilot on the M42 was to be extended, came the announcement that the widening of the M6, M62 and M1 was to be scrapped, which many people did not notice. Will the Minister assure us that such schemes will still go ahead? At the Dispatch Box last week, the Secretary of State was less than clear about those other motorways.

As shadow spokesman for Leeds, I do not get such a big bit of the region to represent. I am particularly concerned about the transport problems in Leeds. Leeds is the largest city in Europe without a light rail or metro system. For example, Frankfurt has a population of 650,000, compared with 725,000 for Leeds. Yet Frankfurt has 63 km of tramway and 56 km of underground. Even without additional unplanned intervention and investment, the Leeds city region economy is forecast to create 65,300 net additional jobs, and for gross value added to increase to £53.3 billion by 2015. The promise of a super tram in Leeds was axed by this Government. Some £39 million, which had been spent planning for that scheme, has been wasted. That is money down the drain. Leeds is now considering a trolley bus scheme—a second best scheme—which will share the same infrastructure as the cars and buses.

Hugh Bayley: The hon. Gentleman speaks on behalf of his party. If his party were to form a Government, would it increase investment in Yorkshire over and above the Government's plans?

Mr. Goodwill: When I was invited by the leader of my party to take responsibility for both Leeds and transport, he made it clear that he wanted to see the north get a fairer share of the cake. I suspect that the overall transport spend will depend on the mess that we are left with when we once again form a Government. No doubt we will learn more about spending during the Budget speech tomorrow. I am also concerned that many of the projects that the Government have encouraged local authorities to take up through the transport innovation fund often have strings attached. I am concerned that in order to access funding, congestion charging schemes may be forced on councils and communities against their wishes.

Last Friday, I was in the city of Hull, in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). I had been invited there by businesses and local councillors to see Castle street, which is at the end of the A63. I was told that Hull had a booming economy, with its new marina development, The Deep, which is a fantastic tourist development, a new freight terminal coming on stream that will increase the capacity of the port by 1.2 million tonnes, and the Princes Quay shopping centre. We have 9,000 jobs in that area involved in making caravans and mobile homes. Some 1.2 million passengers pass through the port of Hull on to P&O ferries. I was told that if one wishes to make a journey with an HGV from Liverpool to Leningrad, there are only five roundabouts on the route, and they are all in the middle of Hull. May I invite the Minister to visit Hull—

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Ms Rosie Winterton): I have been there already.

Mr. Goodwill: She has been already. Perhaps she can look at that particular problem because it is a regional priority. I was very impressed to see that Hull was catching up with cities such as Leeds and Newcastle. For far too long, Hull has been the poor relation. I am pleased to see that it is catching up, but it needs infrastructure investment.

I could not speak on this subject without mentioning my own constituency and the A64. A number of employers constantly lobby me about the lack of investment on that road. Recently, we had some very bad news. The printing company, Polestar Greaves, which had recently secured European funding for a new plant in Sheffield at the heart of the motorway network, closed its plants in Scarborough. One of the reasons it cited was the problem getting heavy print in and out of Scarborough.

As for rail, we have an overall problem with overcrowding. Overcrowding levels, to which the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) alluded, are worse in Yorkshire than the south-east. The rate of passengers above capacity in London and the south-east in the morning peak is 5 per cent. In West Yorkshire, it is 9 per cent. in the morning peak and 5.3 per cent. in the evening. So we need to look at our rail infrastructure. All too often, Ministers talk about investment when they mean investment and spending. It is important to make a clear distinction between subsidies paid to railway companies and investment in new infrastructure and improvements. I met the boss of Northern Rail, who told me that on her entire network, which covers much of our region, for every pound that she gets in the fare box, she gets another 80p in subsidy. It is important that we see what we are getting in addition to those subsidies that will contribute to an improvement in our rail system.

I pay tribute to Hull Trains which, as an open-access operator, is providing an excellent service from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart). Also, dare I mention Grand Central, the new open-access operator that runs from Sunderland, through York to King's Cross, which offers a non-stop service four times a day from York. It offers passengers a 50 per cent. refund on the price of their ticket if they cannot get a seat on the train. I have been on that train a number of times; there is not much chance of not getting a seat at the moment. As word spreads on those good deals, however, that may change. It is a very good initiative and it would be interesting to see whether other rail operators follow suit.

Last April, the leader of my party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), was on the record saying that there must be a shift in focus on transport spending from the south to the north and plans to extend rail. My hon. Friends the Members for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond) and for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) are undertaking a feasibility study with industry professionals of the possibility of building a high-speed rail network in the UK. Liverpool, Manchester and Leeds are the cities in line to be connected into that network, as well as other north-south options.

This Labour Government have seen many lost opportunities. When they came to power, they followed the spending commitment in total, but they axed the road programme for three years and diverted that money to other objectives. Wherever we are now, we are three years behind where we could have been. They squandered the economic legacy of the last Conservative Government. As we will hear tomorrow in the Budget, the party is over and the future is not so "Rosie" in regard to additional money being available. We will be seeing additional cuts all over the place. The problem with transport is that it is easy to cut because one only has to nudge that spending into the next year's budget. Labour has dominated much of this region over the past 10 years, so why have we lost out so much? The "Road to Ruin" campaign by the Yorkshire Post has highlighted that. Could it be that the lack of regional vision and commitment will put the Government on the road to electoral ruin in 2009 or 2010?

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Ms Rosie Winterton): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow. I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing this debate and on the way in which he conducted his opening remarks. I can assure him and other hon. Members who have contributed, especially the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill), that I am aware of the level of interest in transport in Yorkshire and the Humber, not least because of my role as a regional Minister. Transport and skills are two of our highest priorities for ensuring the economic competitiveness of our region.

I want to emphasise what the Government have done to increase investment in transport in our region—a subject on which the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) asked me to touch. In fact, spending on road and rail has nearly doubled from about £330 million in 2001 to almost £600 million in 2007-08. At the end of last year, we announced £469 million-worth of funding over the next three years for local authorities across the Yorkshire and Humber region to invest in highway maintenance and small schemes, such as public transport projects and town centre improvements. That represents a total allocation for 2010-11 that is 12 per cent. higher than current levels. In July 2006, we announced plans to fund 31 major road and public transport schemes in Yorkshire and the Humber from the £927 million allocated over the next 10 years in response to regional advice about priorities in the region.

I must challenge very clearly some of the points made today about Yorkshire and the Humber being at the bottom of the list of spending priorities. Total funding per head in Yorkshire and the Humber, when we combine the local transport plans and the regional funding and road safety allocations, is the third highest of all the regions. The hon. Members for Beverley and Holderness and for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) referred to the A1079 and the Leeds supertram respectively, funding for both of which would have to come out of those allocations. Opposition Members are wrong about Yorkshire and the Humber being at the bottom of the scale for allocations for those schemes. Spending per head and the allocations in our region, from which funding for those schemes would come, are the third highest of all the regions.

It is important to remember that the region has a very clear way of deciding its priorities. We devolved to the regional assembly an allocation of £927 million of regional funding, so that it could decide its own priorities which, after much hard work, it did. However, owing to ballooning costs of the supertram, it became very difficult to sustain that project through the regional funding allocation. Funding for the A1079 also comes from that regional pot. The priorities are being looked at to ensure that they are right. Furthermore, headroom for additional spending is being considered.

It was worrying that the Leader of the Opposition went to Yorkshire and said that before the next election he would produce a list of bypasses and road schemes for Yorkshire that might well completely overturn all the decisions on priorities made through our regional assembly and transport board. Where will that leave many of the proposed schemes, on which much work has been done? Opposition Members ought to think about that. In his rather mean-minded speech, the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West asked me three questions, but I ask three of him: does he say that the Leeds supertram will go ahead? What cost is he prepared to pay for it, and what other schemes would he sacrifice in the region to pay for it?

Mr. Graham Stuart: I am not quite clear, but I think that the Minister suggested that we are all mistaken in thinking that Yorkshire and the Humber has received the lowest transport spending over the past five years. Will she confirm whether cumulatively we have had less spent per head than any other region over the past five years? If that is not the case, I must have looked at the wrong tables, and the whole premise of this debate is unfounded. Given that I have taken my numbers from Department for Transport figures, I would like her to clarify the position.

Ms Winterton: I know where the hon. Gentleman got his figures from, but that expenditure includes projects such as the channel tunnel rail link, the King's Cross refurbishment and Crossrail. If we include major national schemes, it is true that there has been greater spending in London and the south-east. However, we must consider the benefits that they bring to the national economy and the fact that our constituents will travel down to London and make use of things such as the channel tunnel rail link and refurbishments of stations such as King's Cross and St. Pancras. That is where the distortion occurs. As I have said, all the schemes to which he has pointed, particularly for the A1079, come out of the regional funding allocations. When those are combined, Yorkshire and the Humber is third in the list, not at the bottom.

I want to address the very positive speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell), who encapsulated what we need to do in the region, which is to consider strategic plans and to ask what changes we need to make in the Leeds city region—for example, those changes that will make a real difference to the economy. His is absolutely the right approach. My hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) and for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) discussed concessionary fare schemes, the importance of ensuring that they work and that councils do not use them as an excuse to cut services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes and the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness talked about the Humber bridge. Both quite rightly said that we have made attempts to restructure the debt. My hon. Friend made a particular point about health, which I hope to work on with the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), who happens to be here, which is very handy. I hope that we can look at some of the challenges facing cancer services in the area that she mentioned. I shall come back to her on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) talked about the positive approach that he and partners in York are taking to look at the challenges facing development in the centre. It was good to see the meeting that he organised to look at that positive way forward. Again, that needs to go to the regional transport board, which will consider whether it is a priority in the area for making the economic improvements that are necessary. He referred to the changes that we discussed yesterday and the funding that we have allocated, from which I am glad that York will benefit. He was absolutely right to ask what technology could be used to enhance our transport systems.

We are all aware of the importance of assessing demand more easily, considering alternative traffic routes—that is the important point about the route in Leeds—and managing congestion more effectively. That takes me back to points made by the hon. Members for Cheadle and for Scarborough and Whitby: the important question of whether widening roads or hard shoulder running would be most effective in the region. I can assure hon. Members that I am very committed to ensuring that Yorkshire and the Humber has a good transport system. We are investing more money. We need to recognise that and take the region forward.

Nursing & Midwifery Council

12.29 pm

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): It is a pleasure to secure my first Adjournment debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow. Your reputation for fairness, modesty and humility precedes you, and I know that you will exhibit the same during the debate.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): It is matched only by you.

Mr. Devine: Matched only by myself.

The Nursing & Midwifery Council is a public body that is also registered as a charity. It regulates almost 700,000 nurses and midwives. In line with its principle of self-regulation, it is funded by those whom it regulates. Nurses and midwives currently pay a mandatory annual fee of £76. That has increased by 77 per cent. since 2007. I will return to that point.

Members of the NMC's council are responsible for its governance and are charity trustees. They have a general duty of care to ensure that the organisation is properly run, that what it does accords with its purpose and that action is not taken beyond its constitution. There is a particular duty to ensure that its moneys are used only for legitimate purposes. As trustees of a charity, they must ensure that there is no misuse of funds, for example, through supporting activities that are outside the body's defined activities or by incurring excessive costs that are not commensurate with the scale and needs of the fulfilment of its objectives.

As a self-governing regulator, whose purposes are public protection and the public interest, the NMC should be run with integrity, competence and transparency. Unfortunately, that appears not to be the case. It appears to be a fundamentally dysfunctional organisation where the priority of those in control is to maintain the status quo at the expense of proper transparency and good governance. Its funds are being misspent and staff time is being misused. Poor financial management has resulted in nurses and midwives, who are already under financial pressure, being faced with nearly a doubling of their annual fees, which they must pay each year to be licensed to practise. Trustees are systematically prevented from doing what they are supposed to do. There appears to be an ingrained culture of bullying and racism as a means of preventing good governance in general, and in particular, any proper examination of what is going on. I will deal with those very serious allegations in detail.

Sadly, since this matter has come into the public domain, there has been an attempt by the NMC to portray me as a man running a personal vendetta. That is not the case. I trained as a nurse and represented nurses as a lay and full-time officer for more years than I care to remember. I believe that I can recognise a serious issue when it is brought to my attention. The lack of governance at the NMC is a very serious issue that we, as parliamentarians, cannot ignore.

I have six statements from former members of the council and its staff and one from a trade union representative who represented a staff member at the NMC. Those individuals live throughout the United Kingdom and I understand that other hon. Members have been approached by constituents with similar issues.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I, too, have been approached with very serious allegations about probity and conduct. Whistleblowers are in an awfully difficult position. The person who approached me asked who regulates the regulator, because they have nobody to complain to.

Mr. Devine: The hon. Gentleman raises a very interesting point, which I will hopefully return to at the end of my contribution.

Allow me to quote the statement from the trade union representative who represented a member of staff at the NMC:

"My enquiry suggests that the organisation is dysfunctional and out of control. It is not just the staff but council members are also being harassed and bullied, contrary to the Nolan principles."

John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on taking up this issue. Does he agree that it is completely and utterly unacceptable that any member of a regulatory council is afraid to speak out and be identified, let alone a representative who is one of the most experienced and respected members of the profession in this country?

Mr. Devine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention and I will deal with his point at the end of my contribution.

The trade union representative went on to say:

"My member has also, as I have seen, experienced a lack of due process and investigations and equally annoying a failure of natural justice. This has been compounded by a perverse use of individuals under a grievance investigation to carry out investigations into staff who are the grievance source."

That is absolutely unprecedented.

A former member wrote to me, saying:

"We are hoping to make a contribution to a body run with integrity and competence while we would have confidence in its leadership. Sadly this is not the case. The NMC is a fundamentally dysfunctional organisation where the priority is on maintaining the status quo at the expense of proper transparency and integrity, where funds are being misspent and where trustees are being systematically prevented from doing what they are supposed to do."

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): Like other hon. Members who have contributed, I have a constituent who is a council board member, and they have expressed similar concerns about the organisation. Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that there is no agreed procedure for handling complaints at the NMC is a very serious matter that should be rectified immediately?

Mr. Devine: My hon. Friend is exactly right. It is an issue that I hope to touch on in my contribution.

Another council member wrote:

"I am aware that there are other past council members as well as current ones who feel as I do about the organisation. They would be prepared to share these concerns with you but the current members especially are extremely concerned that their names are not divulged to the NMC because of a fear of incrimination, bullying and harassment. It is essential therefore that you provide a guarantee of confidentiality at the outset."

Another former member contacted me and stated:

"I also have lingering concerns from the old council about the way a particular member of staff had been eased out of the NMC. I have signed a confidentiality agreement about that matter and so am not at liberty to say any more than this. That was the context to my own resignation."

Another former council member wrote:

"My concerns about the NMC are a culture of institutional bullying dominated by a few individuals; a failure to respect all views even if they are in the minority; over use of outside legal advice, some of it conflicting, and; inappropriate use of registration fees."

A former staff member wrote:

"I was very happy when I joined the organisation, loved the job and the working environment. Things changed when" the new chief executive

"arrived and I was very soon out of favour. I was very happy with the idea of change but the changes made to the culture of the organisation resulted in a very unpleasant, punitive and negative working environment lacking transparency. Sarah held what she termed 'soft chair conversations' with staff who were not in favour. This involved me being given at one point what she termed a bollocking."

The national committee of the Community Practitioners and Health Visitors Association passed a vote of no confidence in the ability of the NMC to protect the public. All those people cannot be wrong, and hon. Members throughout the United Kingdom have expressed similar concerns from their constituents. Those individuals are strong people and leaders in their chosen career field, yet every one of them, whether a past or present member, is frightened to have their name mentioned, even in this privileged place. I can think of no better proof that a culture of bullying prevails in the NMC.

The culture at the NMC is reflected by the fact that some 20 complaints and counter-complaints have been filed in the past year against eight current and two previous members of the council, and I understand that there are more complaints in the pipeline. Given that there are only 23 council members, that is completely disproportionate. The NMC's expenditure on outside legal advice is also excessive. Legal fees are paid not to address the organisation's proper purposes, but to deal with, and often to create and pursue, such spurious complaints. In 2007, legal expenditure on governance issues and the costs of investigating complaints in relation to council members seeking transparency and satisfactory explanations were well over £120,000.

The expenditure continues, and it is now significantly higher. The money is nurses' and midwives' money, paid in the name of public protection, and its misuse raises serious issues for public protection. Costs as high as £250,000 to £300,000 equate to the annual registration fees of 3,200 to nearly 4,000 nurses. The NMC's reaction the first time that I raised the matter in the House was to seek legal advice. It is a bizarre organisation.

The concern is not only that money is being spent on complaints, bullying and so on but that staff and council members' time is dominated by those matters rather than by the organisation's proper purposes. Staff whose faces do not fit are subject to disciplinary action, paid off and required to sign confidentiality agreements. I have been told of two recent such payments of £100,000. The absence of transparency, responsiveness and integrity in the organisation means that it is not possible to hold the chief executive to account and that the governing body is not given the information that it needs for effective decision making.

I understand that the NMC's approach to governance is also very worrying. It is not unusual for the decisions of the council and its committees to be ignored or circumvented, and standing orders are routinely put to one side to suit the position of the chief executive and prevent the council's consideration of legitimate business. In a formal note, the chair of the council's audit committee suggested that certain council members should be barred from participating in a council debate on the basis of their past voting patterns. I find that unbelievable. When two respected lay members of the council resigned last year, the Appointments Commission was told about it and invited to intervene, but did absolutely nothing. It went ahead with replacing the two people who had resigned, despite their suggestion that it should not do so until the reasons for their resignation had been properly investigated.

We have moved on, rightly, from a situation in which professions are allowed to regulate in their own self-interest. If self-regulation is to be sustainable, it must involve accountability and the highest possible standards of ethical behaviour and competence. An important point has been made by hon. Members about the position of non-executive trustees in bodies such as the NMC. Trustees are protected against discrimination only. Because they are not employees, no other legislative protection or redress is available to them, and they can be very exposed. Unlike employees, trustees and public office holders who blow the whistle have no legal protection.

The NMC was set up to protect patients, raise standards in the profession and act in the public interest. Unfortunately, it is acting only for a small group of staff. Our first priority must be to rebuild the NMC on a sound footing, but it is equally important to look to the future. The House, the nursing and midwifery professions, other professions and the public need assurances that lessons will be learned from the NMC debacle. I say in a comradely way to the Minister that, after parliamentarians from throughout the United Kingdom have expressed concern about the workings of an organisation that regulates 700,000 nurses, it is not good enough to say that the matter has nothing to do with Parliament, and I hope that he will not go down that road.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine) on raising this important and worrying issue for discussion. I know that he has much personal experience in such matters from his early years as a psychiatric nurse and his later trade union career with the Confederation of Health Service Employees and then Unison. I take this opportunity to reassure him and the other hon. Members present that the Government take the matters that he has brought before us extremely seriously. The governance of the Nursing & Midwifery Council is of great importance, as is the governance of all health professional regulators.

The majority of concerns raised by my hon. Friend relate to the internal proceedings and management of the NMC, which has been charged with operating in an atmosphere of bullying, harassment and institutionalised racism. The NMC is, as he acknowledges, an independent professional regulatory body, and the Government therefore have no power to intervene directly in its internal operations. However, the situation has been causing serious concern for some time, and I know that he does not make such charges lightly. Although I am sure that he will accept that it would not be right, even if it were possible, for me to judge or pre-judge goings-on at the NMC, as well as that some would challenge the allegations that he has made today, the Government will do what we can to help the organisation to get out of the problems that it faces and rebuild its members' confidence.

My hon. Friend will be aware that the NMC itself has instigated an inquiry into the criticisms that he outlined. As I understand it, that will include asking an independent, external party to investigate the charge of institutional racism. I understand that the NMC has invited him to meet its members, visit the organisation and discuss his concerns. However, given the seriousness of the breakdown of relationships within the NMC and the level of concern expressed by hon. Members, an internal inquiry is not likely to satisfy the NMC's critics. That is why I will write today to the Council for Healthcare Regulatory Excellence and the Charity Commission to encourage them to play a role in resolving the long-standing problems at the NMC.

The Council for Healthcare Regulatory Excellence is the independent umbrella body that oversees the operation of the various health professions' regulatory bodies. It is already undertaking its annual performance reviews of all the regulators, the results of which are due to be published in the summer, but because of the seriousness of the situation at the NMC, I will ask the CHRE if it is possible to expedite its review of that organisation, including addressing the crucial question whether the organisation is fulfilling its statutory functions. I understand that a number of people involved in the NMC's internal rows have asked the Charity Commission to intervene. I welcome that move, and have written today to the Charity Commission to say so.

It important to me as well as to thousands of nurses and midwives that the workings of the NMC and all regulators should be open and transparent. That is crucial to maintaining patient and public confidence. If neither the NMC's internal processes nor the measures that I have just outlined are sufficient to resolve the problems at the council, the Government would not rule out formally asking the Privy Council to investigate. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend appreciates that that would be a nuclear option.

In the longer term, the Government are taking a number of other measures. My hon. Friend will be aware of the passage through Parliament of the Health and Social Care Bill; indeed, it was on Report that he raised with me his concerns about the NMC. The Bill is part of a programme of legislation on matters relating to professional regulation that the Government introduced after the publication of our White Paper "Trust, Assurance and Safety" in February last year.

The Bill introduces a number of reforms regarding the governance of regulatory bodies and the Council for Healthcare Regulatory Excellence. As part of the new governance arrangements that we will shortly put before Parliament in a section 60 order, under the Health Act 1999, greater transparency will be introduced to the process of disciplining members. Each council will have a constitution order, made by the Privy Council, that will set out the grounds for removing council members from office. Under the proposals, which the Department of Health is in the process of sharing informally with the regulators, council members and employees will be given a statutory right to notify the Privy Council if they consider that a council member should be removed from office. Responsibility for considering the matter will then be delegated by the Privy Council to the independent Appointments Commission.

[Mr. Ben Bradshaw]

Together, the Bill and the section 60 order will meet the commitment that we made in the White Paper to reform completely the governance of regulatory bodies by introducing smaller, more board-like councils which are fully appointed by the independent appointments commissioner, and which operate in a more strategic manner. Those changes will allow councils to set the strategic direction of the regulator and to hold the executive properly to account for the day-to-day running of the organisation. That should help to avoid some of the long-standing problems on the board of the NMC.

The Bill amends the governance of the Council for Healthcare Regulatory Excellence, giving it a new primary objective and enhancing its powers to look at regulators' functions and processes. The Government are also taking new powers to direct the CHRE to investigate particular concerns or issues that arise. Those powers would have been useful in preventing the breakdown of the NMC's functionality. The changes will ensure that the CHRE acts as a strong, independent voice for patients and the public. Its board members will no longer consist of the presidents of the regulatory bodies, but of independent people approved by the Appointments Commission.

As a result of the concerns raised today, I shall ask the CHRE to advise on what further steps could be taken, under secondary legislation relating to the regulators, to enhance confidence in this area. I thank my hon. Friend again for raising his concerns, and I hope he accepts that within the limits of our powers of intervention, the Government are doing what we can to help the NMC to address serious, long-standing problems. The changes that we are making through the Bill should help to ensure that such problems cannot arise in future.

John Bercow (in the Chair): I am grateful to the Minister of State for his contribution.

As both the right hon. Member whose debate it is and the Minister who is to respond are present, we can proceed to the next debate.

East Midlands Trains

12.52 pm

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I am grateful to you for that, Mr. Bercow, and to the Minister for his early attendance. I shall start by giving some details about East Midlands Trains and train services in my constituency. On Saturday, I had the great privilege of attending the reopening of Idridgehay station. It has been reopened by the Ecclesbourne Valley Railway company, which plans to reopen the railway line down the Ecclesbourne valley to Duffield. The new train service will give people an important link from Wirksworth to Duffield, and will enable them to take advantage of East Midlands Trains services into Derby, from where they can connect to London.

I was pleased that the station reopened on Saturday. The opening was the culmination of a huge amount of work by a private company to restore the railway line, and was the first time that a passenger train had run on that line since 1947, although I do not blame any Governments for that. I compliment people at the company, and volunteers, for their dedication and for providing a good service. When the line is fully open in 2010, it will be very useful to the people who live in the area.

There have been some remarkable achievements with trains and train services in the midlands. Ten years ago, St. Pancras station was the worst station in London to come into. It was dark and desolate, and had few services. Today, it is without doubt the best station in London. It reopened recently and is now the hub for trains going to the continent, as it is the home base for Eurostar. That is a tremendous achievement, and anyone who has not visited it should go to see its tremendous refurbishment and the reawakening of the railway age at St. Pancras. Those are some of the positive aspects of what is happening with the rail industry.

When the Government took the franchise away from Midland Mainline and awarded it to East Midlands Trains, I was encouraged by what East Midlands Trains said it was going to do. It set out its programme and options in a booklet for passengers, which included:

> "Faster journeys to Sheffield and Leicester from London as part of a new timetable being introduced in December 2008; Additional early morning train from Derby to cater for morning peak demand; A new daily direct service between London and Lincoln;"

and an hourly service between Nottingham and Matlock. I hope that the hourly service will coincide with connections, because the service from Matlock, which is a bit of distant cousin, currently arrives in Derby at times that are inconvenient for connections to London. That would make a huge difference to my constituency and to my constituents.

I want to talk specifically about an issue that I have raised in the House before: the poor deal that passengers get with Sunday services. Those services seem to have been almost forgotten, not necessarily by the train companies, but by Network Rail, which operates and makes decisions about repairs. I am concerned about its accountability, as it is not accountable to anyone but the Government, who therefore have total responsibility for its management and ownership. A few weeks ago, we had the ridiculous situation in which Network Rail was fined for over-running works around Rugby, only to find that the fine would go back to the Treasury and would then have to be lent or given back to Network Rail.

There are constantly poorer services for Sunday travellers. This morning, I asked the managing director of East Midlands Trains whether he had the occupancy rates for Sunday services. He replied that it has only been running the service for four months, so it does not have those rates; the records that Midland Mainline held were not passed on. Anyone who travels on a Sunday will see that there is huge usage by the travelling public at weekends. That is one pattern of rail travel that might be changing. Perhaps, 20 years ago, trains were not used so often on Sundays, but that has changed. I am sorry that the records on customers and predicted customer bases, which were obviously there when Midland Mainline was operating services, have not been passed on to the new operator. Will the Minister address that point?

East Midlands Trains took over services just four months ago. When it was announced as the preferred operator, I thought that some of its plans were encouraging and exciting, and I was looking forward to seeing it operate. I accept that it has to operate according to Network Rail's decisions on track maintenance and negotiations, over a considerable period, about repairs. There is a planned investment programme, over the period of East Midlands Trains' franchise, of £90 million, which should lead to better services. At the moment, however, for more than three months, Sunday trains are to be diverted around Manton, after they leave Leicester, which will add an hour to the journey.

On Saturdays and Sundays, trains are operated with fewer members of staff on board, so that when something goes wrong, extra pressure is put on them. As far as they are concerned, that affects their communication with the travelling public. I want to be absolutely clear that I have nothing but praise for how the members of staff behaved and responded to passengers' concerns on the Sunday—I have to declare an interest—when I was on a train for almost six hours.

Leaflets have been published which say that I can go from Derby to Paris in six hours. Therefore, when on 2 March it took almost six hours to go from Derby to London, I was, shall we say, a little less than impressed with the service that I received. Of course, I am a Member of Parliament and can raise the matter here. I investigated the situation further and found that on that day there were 100 alterations to service, 13 train cancellations and 11 partial train cancellations. Many members of the travelling public were involved in the huge delays. It is how the problem came about that I now wish to discuss briefly.

As I said, due to essential track and ballast renewal work, there is at present a diversion between Market Harborough and Kettering. Trains are diverted around Manton. Delays were worsened because, apparently, there was a theft of some 60 m of cable on the line. I find this rather odd: this bit of line is not used very much in the week, but, on the day when all the trains were being diverted, there was a theft of cable.

Some cable was stolen, and that basically brought that part of the network to a standstill for quite some time, during which communications to the passengers as to what was happening were totally unsatisfactory. It may well have been that the people controlling were not in a position to know fully what was going on. The first time the train came to a standstill, we were told that there was a freight train in front of us. After 30 minutes, we were told that that there was a passenger train and a freight train in front of us. Then, after an hour, we were told that there were two passenger trains and a freight train in front of us. After about two hours, we started to move again after being literally completely stationary on a very crowded train on a Sunday afternoon.

There was a problem for the members of staff on that train, because they were not being informed as to what was happening. They could tell the travelling public only what they were being told. As I said earlier, I have nothing but praise for the way in which they tried to tell us what was going on, but the information was appalling.

When we finally arrived in London, I was told that the theft of the cable had occurred some time during the late morning. Surely, if that was the case, the delays were known about before people boarded the trains. I do not know whether there has been a full investigation into what exactly happened on that day, or whether a report is available about the incident, but there certainly should be.

It is in the Government's and everybody's interest that more use be made of trains. Passenger miles have been going up over a very long period. I could almost say that they have dramatically increased since privatisation. I see that the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform—I still regard the Department as Trade and Industry, but I realise that its name has changed—will be making an interesting speech today about the benefits of many more millionaires and entrepreneurs, and I welcome that sort of change, but I also say that the travelling public require a service that is satisfactory. The service that was given on that day by East Midlands Trains primarily, because it is the rail operator, but also by Network Rail, which stands back from this a little, was woefully inadequate.

I was asked by some of the passengers whether they would be entitled to a refund. The last time I was delayed on a train for more than an hour, I was able to get a refund. I was therefore surprised when I inquired whether passengers using the service would be entitled to a refund to be told that, because the delay was due to vandalism, it was outside what is laid out in the "National Rail Conditions of Carriage". I have obtained a copy of the rules and regulations. You will not be surprised to learn, Mr. Bercow, that they run to 27 pages. There are more get-out clauses in those 27 pages than could be written by anybody I have yet to come across in the legal profession. The number of get-out clauses is quite amazing, but one of them is vandalism, along with the weather, acts of God, fire, police, terrorism—in fact, I am starting to wonder what actually does come into the area where compensation can be given.

I was therefore encouraged to receive a letter from the managing director of EMT, Tim Shoveller, in which he stated:

"Although our current Passenger's Charter does not allow refunds for those delays which are beyond the control of the rail industry, for example trespass and vandalism, from 1 April 2009, we will be introducing a new scheme called 'Delay Repay'. The 'Delay Repay' scheme, which is part of our franchised commitments, will ensure refunds for passengers who are delayed, irrespective of the cause of the delay."

I very much welcome that, but I do not quite understand why the scheme cannot be operated until 1

[Mr. Patrick McLoughlin]

April 2009. Can the Minister reassure me that it could be introduced far sooner than that? Such a scheme would have served me and some of the complainants on the day that I described. If Network Rail and EMT thought that they would actually lose money, there would be more pressure on them to get repairs done more quickly. More pressure would be put on Network Rail to respond more quickly to such cases. I accept that they are beyond their control, and I understand that the theft of cable is a growing problem as far as the rail network is concerned. It is disturbing to all of us who use the train service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) has sought the Minister's and my permission to make a short contribution, so I shall try to sum up. Positive changes have been made to the rail network. Days such as the one that I described are rare, but they still cause huge inconvenience to the travelling public. I would like to be reassured that lessons will be learned from the incident, which I understand was quite large as far as the overall operation of the network is concerned, so that if anything like that happens again, passengers will be notified as soon as possible, perhaps before boarding.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on securing a debate that is important to those of us who live along the main line. In his concluding remarks, would he welcome the moves that EMT is making to bring about joint control of the track with Network Rail? Perhaps when that has been achieved, the sort of communications difficulties that obviously occurred on that particular day might be avoided.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who I know is a regular user of the service, as are many others who have constituencies along the line. I hope that that will make an improvement, but I was not encouraged by what I saw on that day and have since learned about the incident. I know that there is a move towards a joint control room. It seems odd that that has taken so long, because the diversion around Manton has been used on many occasions in the past, and, much to my horror, I hear that it may be used in future years. It makes for a difficult, time-consuming service, irrespective of the fact that on the days when trains are diverted along that route, there is no reduction whatsoever in the price—passengers pay the same price for that service as they pay for a faster one.

I understand what the hon. Gentleman said. I accept that improvements had been made: anybody who comes into St. Pancras station can only marvel at what has been achieved there. However, we still need to, and must, learn lessons from incidents such as the one I have described so that people who rely on the trains for connections—I have heard many stories about people who have missed connections once they have arrived in London—are not put at a disadvantage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough asked if he could make a contribution, so I hope that he gets the chance to do so now.

1.13 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Bercow. It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship for the first time.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing from Mr. Speaker an extraordinarily important debate for people who have to use the railway line through the east midlands. I also welcome the Minister. I always find it difficult to criticise such an excellent, competent Minister, whom the Government always seem to put up to defend the indefensible. As always, I hope that Jim will fix it. I am grateful that we have a little more time than was originally expected, which enables me to make these few comments.

Midland Mainline, the previous franchise holder, was popular in my area. It was a good train operator that often won the train operator of the year award, the staff were friendly and I had no complaints from my constituents about the service. Lo and behold, it lost the franchise and along came East Midlands Trains. The managing director of that company, Mr. Tim Shoveller, kindly met me at the House of Commons. I am pleased to report that, despite what my constituents think, he does not carry a little fork and does not have two horns sticking out of his head. However, that is the feeling in the constituency.

We have had a downgraded service since East Midlands Trains took over the train service; there is no question about that. The frequency of the trains has been reduced and seat reservations for season ticket holders—the most important customers of the railway, who pay thousands of pounds out of their income each year to travel from Wellingborough to London—have been withdrawn. People are paying thousands of pounds a year, but they cannot get a seat and they cannot be guaranteed a seat from Wellingborough to London. That has caused the most enormous uproar. Of course, the trains were already overcrowded.

So the trains are overcrowded, the number of trains has been cut and people cannot get their seat reservation. My constituents, and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), are extremely annoyed about what has happened. I should like to blame East Midlands Trains and say that it had nothing to do with the Government, but unfortunately that is not so. The Government say that they will solve overcapacity and undercapacity by having lots more carriages—perhaps 1,300 or 1,500—but how many will East Midlands Trains get? It will get three more. So that will not solve the problem.

I talked to the managing director of East Midlands Trains and asked, "Why are you doing all these things? When you cut the service, why did you increase the cost of the fares by more than twice the rate of inflation? Did you do it to save money?" I then said, "What about the tea and coffee?" The nice thing about Midland Mainline was that it gave people a free cup of tea or coffee. East Midlands Trains took that away, saying, "Ah, that costs £1 million a year, Mr. Bone." I said, "So what? You charge enough for your fares: you've just bumped them up enormously." I was told, "It is all down to a problem that we have. It's the Government." I asked, "How can it be the Government? You run the service. The Government tell me that it is nothing to do with them and that you run it." "Ah", the managing director said, "it is because we have to pay the Government a premium for the service."

I was told that my constituents who travel by rail are subsidising other people travelling by rail around the country. I thought that that was nonsense and could not possibly be true, so I asked the Secretary of State for Transport a parliamentary question. The reply I received says:

"Stagecoach Midland Rail Limited"—

that is, East Midlands Trains—

"will pay a premium of £133 million (net present value)", which will be a great deal more in actual cash terms,

"over the life of the franchise."—[Official Report, 4 March 2008; Vol. 472, c. 2262W.]

The cuts are deliberately the Government's fault. I hope that the Minister will be able to sort that out and improve the service from Wellingborough to London.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Jim Fitzpatrick): It is a pleasure to see you presiding today, Mr. Bercow. I congratulate the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing this debate. I am reliably informed that the Government Chief Whip, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon), suffered a similar experience on the train journey mentioned by the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire, but later on the day in question. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman therefore accepts that this is not personal and that there is no attempt by the Government to make his life more difficult than it is at the moment. There may well be occasions when we would want to do that, but this was not one of them.

The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) have raised some serious issues that I will try to address and, if I am unable to deal with all of those, I will ensure that we write to both of them.

The Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris)—the rail Minister—apologises for not being able to respond to this debate personally, but he will be informed of the discussion. He will be pleased to hear some of the compliments made by the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire at the beginning of his speech and he will be dismayed to hear the accounts of the difficulties articulated by both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Wellingborough.

The unfortunate, regrettable and lengthy delay experienced on the East Midlands Trains midland main line service on Sunday 2 March 2008 had two causes. The first was scheduled major engineering works on the midland main line and the second was an incidence of cable theft on the diversionary route that had to be used as a consequence of the closure of a section of the main line.

The closure of the midland main line was due to planned Network Rail major engineering works and essential heavy maintenance on Saturday nights and Sundays between 3 February and 23 March 2008. That resulted in train services being diverted off the midland main line, south of Barrow upon Soar, to the diversionary route line via Manton and Corby—part of which, from Corby to Kettering, is currently a freight-only route—rejoining the midland main line north of Kettering. Consequently, journey times were longer than normal due to services running over a slower route than on the main line. The diversionary route south of Corby towards Kettering is also single line, which severely restricts capacity and increases journey times. The section of track that was closed is two-track and there is no possibility of carrying out the necessary works without the diversion. The cycle of engineering works means that this route will have to be closed at weekends each year at this time. I understand that this will be frustrating for weekend passengers. Disruption is an unfortunate and unavoidable consequence of maintenance work that is essential for the continuing drive to deliver a safer, faster and more reliable rail network.

Increasing demand for travel has brought a growth in passenger services on the network and the introduction of newer, faster trains—Class 222s on the midland main line—has resulted in increased maintenance work across the network. Maintenance and renewal work is specifically programmed to avoid impacting on peak commuter travel periods when many more people use the trains. The alternative to major engineering work would be temporary speed restrictions, which would affect many more passengers commuting and travelling every working day. Using temporary speed restrictions would not stop, but would only serve to slow the degradation of the track and would eventually result in more extensive engineering work to provide continued use of the line.

As maintenance and renewal work is frequently carried out at weekends, leisure fares are available all day on Saturdays and Sundays and higher business fares do not apply. National Rail Enquiries has details of engineering works and extended journey times, which are published on train operating companies' websites and at stations.

The first that East Midlands Trains knew about the disruption was the failure of signals in the Corby area. The true nature of the disruption was known only later in the evening, which resulted in some confusing communication from staff to passengers, as the right hon. Gentleman explained. As he said, staff endeavour to provide as much information to customers as they possibly can—they did so at the time—but clearly they are reliant on accurate information being supplied to them.

A joint Network Rail and East Midlands Trains control centre is being created in Derby, which will enable the sharing of information and allow people to work together to manage any incidents, including providing timely and accurate communications to staff and passengers. That will be completed by May this year and therefore ought to overcome the difficulties raised by the right hon. Gentleman.

Over the past two years, a cross-industry possessions review led by the independent Office of Rail Regulation has been examining how to address best the growing mismatch between the increasing demand for travel and the service availability of the rail network. That has produced a new cross-industry consensus and a determination to develop ways to enable major reductions in the disruption that arises from engineering works. Critically, how to do so without compromising the safety of passengers and staff will also be considered. Network Rail, which is responsible for programming all engineering, renewal and maintenance work, is leading the development of a strategy to deliver on that so that, within seven years, rail users should enjoy a seven-day railway service. The strategy includes initiatives to reduce the typical duration of renewals works to track and bridges from 54 hours over a weekend to eight hours or less overnight.

The second cause of the delay was the theft of 200m of signal cable near Corby on Sunday, which I am advised happened at around 5pm—I know that the right hon. Gentleman said that he was advised that it happened earlier. That put signals out of action and delayed all consequent services. Trains could not be diverted back on to the main line because Network Rail engineers had started their activities and work was in progress. The diversionary route south of Corby is single line, and the emergency procedures in such cases entail trains being allowed through the single line section only if an authorised staff member is travelling on the train—known as a human token. That ensures total safety in the absence of signals and prevents more than one train being present on the single line section at any one time. There is an initial delay while procedures are put in place and staff located to operate them, and a further delay as the authorised person switches from one train to the next. Without signal cable, individual points have to be manually operated.

The British Transport Police are well aware of the widespread problem of cable theft and are trying to tackle it. They encourage better housekeeping and security to discourage theft in the first place and use helicopter patrols and covert and overt police action. They have also targeted scrapyards and metal dealers. Because of the risk to lives and the disruption that it can cause to train services, the BTP chief constable has described line side cable theft as "one of the biggest challenges after terrorism".

To assist in the fight against cable theft, Network Rail and East Midlands Trains have jointly offered a £10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of cable thieves who stole cable in January at Pye Bridge between Derby and Chesterfield. That demonstrates a serious commitment to supporting the police in efforts to fight this type of crime. On Monday 28 January 2008, the BTP conducted a day of action and undertook a number of operations to target metal thieves and clamp down on copper cable theft from the railway. Notable success was achieved and four men were convicted in Leeds in February 2007. In addition, three men were jailed for a total of 17 years in London and in Cleveland an operation involving 30 officers resulted in 10 arrests.

If passengers experience delays on top of the extended journey times set out in the national rail timetable, normal delay provisions in the operating company's passenger's charter prevail. There are currently two types of compensation payable to passengers of East Midlands Trains. One form of compensation is vouchers or cash given to holders of tickets for problems with one-off journeys. In practice, that is valid for all types of single, return or seven-day tickets. The second form of compensation applies to holders of season tickets valid for one month or longer. The season ticket compensation scheme is not valid on Sundays, but compensation for other tickets is available. For season tickets, a discount is given on season ticket renewal at the time of purchase. Delays and cancellations caused by incidents beyond the control of the rail industry are excluded from both compensation schemes, as the right hon. Gentleman has said. Such incidents include security alerts, vandalism and trespass.

As the right hon. Gentleman outlined, from 2009 the two sets of arrangements will become one and the new "delay repay" regime will apply to all ticket holders, which will compensate all passengers for delays regardless of cause. That is a new departure for the rail industry and has changed years of custom and practice. The scheme is being phased in to allow for systems to be altered, staff to be trained and passengers to be informed. That is one of the many tasks that the new franchise has committed to in the first years of operation and was negotiated as part of the bidding process.

Mr. McLoughlin: Is the Minister saying that that will be available across the whole rail network or will it just be applicable to that particular franchise? I realise that he may wish to obtain further information on that point, but it would be interesting to know the answer.

Jim Fitzpatrick: As I understand it, I am advised that it is for the franchise operations. However, on that question and the questions about whether it is possible to advance the introduction of the arrangements, I will ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport who is responsible for rail, to write to the right hon. Gentleman. As I say, because it was part of the negotiations for the franchise, I suspect that that part of the contract will have to be honoured. However, I am happy to consider that matter on his behalf and respond in writing in due course.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough raised the issue of services at Wellingborough. There are currently two trains an hour to London, Leicester and further north. A new timetable will be introduced in December 2008 that will provide a service of two trains an hour from Wellingborough to London and one an hour from Wellingborough to Leicester, supplemented by extra trains at peak times. The reduction in services from Wellingborough northbound is due to the introduction of a new Corby to London service. Capacity constraints on the main line mean that the Corby service cannot be introduced without the reduction in services at Wellingborough.

The reduction of northbound services from Wellingborough reflects existing travel patterns. Industry records show that there are relatively few journeys from Wellingborough to points north. The December 2008 timetable will allow faster journey times to Sheffield and Derby because fast trains will no longer have to stop at some of the intermediate stations that will be served by the revised Wellingborough to London trains, which will start from Kettering. There is a franchise obligation in the new east midlands franchise to spend £2.6 million by 31 March 2014 on enhancements or refurbishment at 11 premier stations, one of which is Wellingborough.

The right hon. Member for West Derbyshire asked about the figures being passed from franchisee to franchisee. The matter that he raised was part of the considerations on deficiencies in the previous franchise arrangements, so it is now incumbent on new franchisees to pass on those passenger numbers and data when they pass on their franchises to subsequent operators. That will ensure that the deficiency that has been spotted is dealt with in future. Historically, that is the reason why it was not dealt with in the past.

In conclusion, since 1996, rail passenger kilometres have increased by 45 per cent. People are now travelling further by rail than in any other year.

Sir Peter Soulsby: The hon. Member for Wellingborough mentioned the small number of additional carriages that are destined for the east midlands main line. Does the Minister agree that if the service to Corby that has been mentioned is to be provided and the increased need for capacity on the main line is to be met, the Department ought to encourage the industry to revisit those projections and ensure that that main line gets the additional carriages that it needs to deal with existing capacity problems, never mind deal with predicted growth?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am happy to ensure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport is informed of the points on capacity made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby) and the hon. Member for Wellingborough, and that he is told of the request for the matter to be revisited.

In 2003-04, for the first time since 1961, more than a billion rail journeys were made and the number of rail journeys increased further in each of the next three years. We have committed £15 billion in Government support for the railway up to 2014, so that the industry can plan against a secure funding commitment. Among other things, the money will procure the 1,300 new carriages, as mentioned in previous debates.

I thank the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire for initiating this debate. I hope that I have covered at least some of the concerns that he and other hon. Members have expressed and that I have offered them the prospect that matters are in hand.

Woodhead Rail Route

1.29 pm

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): I think that this is my first opportunity to speak under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow, and it is not unwelcome. The debate is about the future of the very important Woodhead rail route, which crosses the Pennines from Sheffield to Manchester. The campaign to have the rail route reopened has attracted much interest. The case for reopening it, which is well encapsulated by the slogan "Crossrail for the north", is supported not only by campaign groups such as the Campaign for Better Transport and Friends of the Peak Park but by the Northern Way group, the city councils of Sheffield, Manchester and Leeds, and IPPR North. That body said:

> "The main rail links within the north—particularly on the trans-Pennine corridor and between Liverpool and Manchester and Leeds and Sheffield—are not fit for purpose. Failure to invest in these links is likely to lead to increased congestion on rail and road links...and additional domestic air travel".

Apart from the environmental case that I have outlined, what is the case for reopening the rail route? Rail passenger numbers are growing faster in the north than in the rest of the country, and there is increasing demand for rail freight. With a population of 14.5 million, the north is equivalent to a medium-sized European country, such as Sweden. It has a large internal market and its economy is worth in excess of £200 billion. The north has undergone a revival in the past nine years—I would say, of course, that that is thanks to the Labour Government. Its economy is stronger now than at any time in the past 40 years, and employment is at a post-war high.

Research recently published by the Northern Way shows that potential demand to move containers to and from the north's ports and across the Pennines is in excess of what the railway network can currently accommodate. In an earlier debate today, it was mentioned that Immingham alone carries 20 per cent. of the in-and-out freight traffic of the United Kingdom; 64 million tonnes of freight go through that port alone. If we add Grimsby and Hull to that, we see just how important the Humber estuary is to the north's economy.

Based on the work that the Northern Way has carried out to date, it is likely that a new higher-speed rail route across the Pennines will need to be built in the next 15 to 20 years or so. Successful delivery of the Northern Way's goal of closing the £30 billion productivity gap in relation to the north's economy will result in faster rates of passenger growth than the Government assumed in the recent White Paper, "Delivering a Sustainable Railway".

The view of the groups that I named earlier, as well as of the many MPs who have signed early-day motion 459, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer), is that the Woodhead rail route offers the most cost-efficient option for building trans-Pennine capacity in the long term. It also offers the most environmentally sustainable option. Indeed, the view is that only the 1953 Woodhead tunnel route offers the prospect of a broadly non-contentious means of enhancing cross-Pennine capacity sustainably. The alternative would be a brand new route, which would entail large-scale tunnelling, the cost and environmental consequences of which could militate against its adoption as the preferred policy. That is why there is such opposition to any use of the 1953 tunnel by National Grid for recabling work, unless there is a commitment from National Grid to maintain all three tunnels and to return the cabling to the Victorian tunnels as and when the rail route is required to be brought back into use.

There is an economic case and an environmental case for a Crossrail for the north. The economic case is strong. The existing Hope Valley line is exactly that—much of the time, those who use it do so more in the hope than the expectation of getting to their destination—and there never was a more inappropriately named rail service than the Manchester airport "express" from Cleethorpes to Manchester. I shall give some examples. The journey from Sheffield to Manchester airport on that line, a distance of 30 miles, takes a minimum of one hour and 20 minutes. Sheffield to Newcastle, a distance of 134 miles, takes two hours and 20 minutes—two hours minimum, actually. Doncaster to London—a route well known to my right hon. Friend the Minister—takes a minimum of one and three quarter hours; that is for a distance of 140 miles. The case is clear.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): My hon. Friend represents one end of the Woodhead tunnel and I represent the other. She is absolutely right when she talks of the Hope Valley line, which is not even capable of running fast—I use the word euphemistically—and slow trains at the same time, let alone taking significant amounts of freight. Does she agree that over the years there has also been considerable support from the private sector for the Woodhead freight route, which would take pressure off Hope and the other existing trans-Pennine routes?

Ms Smith: My hon. Friend is right. Indeed, I was contacted only yesterday by one of those companies about this issue. The Woodhead line used to take Sheffielders to Manchester and vice versa in half an hour. That is the improvement offered and that is why there is a much better option for freight on the Woodhead line. We clearly need new capacity, and the Woodhead route offers the potential to link effectively to the east coast and west coast main line networks.

Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this very important debate. Does she agree that investment in transport needs channelling in the right direction? The fact that it takes just over two hours to go from Wakefield to London by train and that it takes 40 minutes to go from Halifax to Wakefield, which is 10 miles away, speaks volumes. Does she agree that the investment needs to be in the regional links that link to the main line stations, such as Leeds and Wakefield, to improve travelling times and connections?

Ms Smith: My hon. Friend is right. The whole point of reopening the Woodhead line would be to enable passengers, as well as freight, to travel more quickly. In relation to travel to work, the economic benefits of easier access to workplaces are obvious. The Northern Way has demonstrated the wider economic benefits of a national high-speed rail network linking London with the north-west and with Scotland and the north-east; and of a trans-Pennine link. Crucially, that integrated network would offer a means of addressing the locational disadvantage of the north in terms of access to markets, to the world financial centre that is tantalisingly close—of course, I am speaking about London—and to the key international gateways, which are our ports and airports.

The benefits could be as much as £10 billion nationally, £3.5 billion of which would be in the north. Apparently, £3.5 billion of the benefit would also be to London itself, which does not tap into the economic potential of the north as well as it might. Inclusion of a trans-Pennine link adds a remarkable 40 per cent. to the economic benefit to the north from such an investment.

The proposal for a Crossrail for the north would not only add significant value to the north's economy but could change the perception that investors, business and graduates have of the north's potential as a career and investment destination.

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): My hon. Friend is making an unanswerable case for reserving the Woodhead tunnel for future use and, indeed, reopening it. She is also pointing out the fact that the timetables and schedules for trains in the north of England would have embarrassed Gladstone. Is it not time not simply to consider demand on the trains but to invest in new faster routes to support the economy of the north of England?

Ms Smith: Absolutely. My hon. Friend makes a very important point. There is a great deal of sense in establishing high-speed networks on the east and west coast main lines, but to maximise the impact of that we need to make the trans-Pennine link. That is critical to the case that I am making.

Agglomeration benefits could also accrue if we went ahead with the scheme. Agglomeration benefits arise through firms becoming more productive as a result of being closer or more accessible to other firms, workers and markets. Labour markets and business catchments overlap in the north—we have eight city regions—and offer an opportunity to create a critical mass as a counterweight to the London and south-east economy, but only if there is the reality of a coherent transport system that enables businesses to flourish beyond their city boundaries.

The environmental benefits of a Crossrail for the north are significant.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): As my hon. Friend is aware, the west side of the tunnel is in my constituency. One of the groups that supports the re-opening of the route is Barnsley council, which fully supports it. Her economic argument is tremendously strong—the area between Manchester, Sheffield and Leeds requires the freight route. Does she agree that there is also potential for a grander scheme using the freight route, by which I mean linking the east and west Pennines to the Scottish economies and, through the midlands, to the channel tunnel? That would link the economic vitality of the area that she is talking about to the European market.

Ms Smith: My hon. Friend makes the key point again that the issue is not only the trans-Pennine link but the link between the north, via an east-west link, to the east and west Scottisn economies, London, and the channel tunnel and Europe. That is a critical part of the case and I am glad that it has been emphasised. Of course, Barnsley, which is part of the Sheffield city region, would benefit substantially from such a scheme. My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the benefits that would accrue to Barnsley—the town's economic potential, as well as its football team, is often underestimated.

The environmental benefits of a Crossrail for the north would be significant. Rightly, there is cross-party consensus in the House on the Climate Change Bill. We need to set targets for the medium and long term to reduce carbon emissions, but in focusing our attention on that legislation, we must not lose sight of the practical measures necessary to deliver a significant reduction in carbon emissions. Investment in high-speed rail links and rail-freight capacity is one of the key measures to success in our mission.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): The hon. Lady is making a powerful case, which I support. Obviously, there is an environmental benefit from laying electrical cables under ground rather than on pylons. Is the hon. Lady aware—she is more familiar with the case than me—whether National Grid has given any consideration to enlarging the tunnel, thereby taking the cable through it without closing it for future rail use? Does she agree that such a possibility is worth exploring?

Ms Smith: National Grid's considered view, which has been tested by a number of hon. Members, is that even if the cables go through one or two of the three tunnels, it will not be possible to run rail capacity through them. The key issue is whether National Grid is prepared to maintain the two Victorian tunnels so that we can return cabling to them in future. That is accepted as the way forward by all concerned, including the Department for Transport and National Grid. Most hon. Members recognise that the outage constraints of simply chopping off the supply to Manchester to recable the Victorian tunnels would be enormous. We have Ofgem to thank for that.

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): The hon. Lady is making a strong case—it would appear that there is a trans-Pennine alliance of hon. Members from all parties in support of her comments. Further to what the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) said, does she agree that the key thing to establish is that we are not opposed to the principle of National Grid using the tunnel if—it is perhaps a big "if"—there were some way for it to route cables through the tunnel that allowed train services to commence at some future date? I do not know how realistic the hon. Gentleman's proposition is, but we ought to establish firmly the principle that if there is a way around the problem so that National Grid was able to run its cables and retain the potential for future use, we are not against it in principle. We should ensure that the route remains a viable proposition for the future.

Ms Smith: If that were a realistic option, it would be the most acceptable one for all sides. We are talking about 440,000 V cables, so it would be a major technological challenge. It would be wise for hon. Members to test the case further with National Grid. However, so far, National Grid has been absolutely firm that it cannot put the cables through the tunnel and run rail capacity through them at the same time.

On environmental benefits, our children and grandchildren will never forgive us for losing important opportunities to invest in a lower-carbon future. The Woodhead rail route is one means by which to secure such a future. Any projection of the case for a new trans-Pennine link must take into account the need for extra capacity economically and to proactively engage in the process of incentivising greater use of rail networks by passengers and freight alike. We are talking not only about the possible extra demand but about the modal shift from road to rail, which is important to that lower-carbon future. We can do it by developing the high-speed integrated network that we are discussing.

I must make a plea to the Minister to display foresight on the issue and apply the precautionary principle. National Grid's use of the 1953 tunnel must not in any way be allowed for the economic and environmental reasons that I have outlined because it would close down the option of reopening the line in future. However, the omens are not good. Despite the Secretary of State for Transport's intervention in the matter, a rail magazine at the weekend reported:

"Network Rail has dismissed the idea it will pay for the decaying original Woodhead tunnels to be mothballed pending their re-use as electricity cable-carriers."

In the same article, National Grid says:

"If Network Rail or the Department for Transport wish to maintain the Victorian tunnels, we are willing to discuss this option with them".

We cannot risk stalemate—we cannot risk losing the potential use of the Woodhead route for rail and compromising the national interest because National Grid and Network Rail cannot agree who should maintain the tunnels. Will the Minister commit the Government to sorting out the impasse for the sake of the long-term vision that I have outlined? Will she also commit to looking seriously at the case for a Crossrail for the north? A project that would draw on a wide range of support, including from all three northern regional development agencies, must be worth investigating.

The Minister is a good listener and likes to respond—I know that from the work that she has done on flooding in Sheffield. Will she today give us the hope that we can realise our ambition to compete effectively with the London and south-east economy, and that our transport infrastructure will be appropriately modernised in the medium to long term? Will she give us a Crossrail for the north?

1.48 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Ms Rosie Winterton): It is nice to be back in Westminster Hall under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow, after only a short interval. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) on securing the debate. She has demonstrated passionately how strongly she feels about the issue. Obviously, my hon. Friends the Members for High Peak (Tom Levitt), for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), for Manchester, Blackley (Graham Stringer), and for Halifax (Mrs. Riordan) have demonstrated that passion, as did the hon. Members for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) and for Cheadle (Mark Hunter). Not least because of my role as Minister for Yorkshire and the Humber, I know that maintaining adequate rail capacity on trans-Pennine routes now and in future is vital to the economy of northern England.

[Ms Rosie Winterton]

I should like to reassure hon. Members that National Grid's plans will not jeopardise the possibility that the Woodhead tunnel route will reopen to rail traffic at some future date. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough outlined, National Grid owns the two Victorian tunnels and the more modern tunnel that was purchased from the British Rail Property Board in the early 1990s following the closure of the route in 1981. The company holds permitted development rights for placing cables in the newer tunnel. The cost to National Grid of replacing cables in the Victorian tunnels and of not using the more modern tunnels would be substantially higher than putting cables in the more modern tunnels and moving them back into the Victorian tunnels in future, as my hon. Friend mentioned. Replacing cables in the Victorian tunnels would require the transmission of electricity between the efficient power stations to the east of the Pennines and Manchester and the north-west to be suspended while the work was carried out. Less efficient power stations elsewhere would have to provide electricity, and that would be considerably more expensive—tens of millions of pounds according to National Grid.

Those outage charges would not be incurred if new cables were laid while the older ones were still transmitting; consequently, the charges would not be incurred if the process was reversed and new cables were put back into the Victorian tunnels while the cables in the more modern tunnels were still transmitting electricity. Reversing the process remains a possibility if growth in demand requires a fourth rail route across the Pennines.

My hon. Friend made a powerful speech, but I am sure that she realises that no Government or rail industry strategy or planning document has identified a need for additional rail capacity across the Pennines that would require the reopening of the Woodhead route. The Government's strategy for the railways is set out in the White Paper, "Delivering a Sustainable Railway", which identified the need for additional passenger capacity, and proposed that it should be met by longer trains to accompany reduced journey time on the Manchester-Leeds route via Huddersfield. On the south trans-Pennine route between Sheffield and Manchester, the East Midlands Trains franchise will deliver longer trains on the route between Liverpool and Nottingham via Sheffield.

Tom Levitt: My right hon. Friend has moved on from the tunnel itself, but I remind her that the question is whose responsibility it is to maintain the Victorian tunnels so that there is a tunnel to move back into.

Ms Winterton: I am coming to that point.

Neither the White Paper nor the Yorkshire and Humber regional planning assessment identified a long-term need for substantial increases in freight capacity across the Pennines. Consequently, it has not been suggested that the Woodhead route was needed for the purpose.

Network Rail published its freight route utilisation strategy in 2007. The only trans-Pennine issue that it identified was a possible need for additional capacity on the south trans-Pennine route through the Hope valley between Sheffield and Manchester. Again, that strategy did not identify a need for a new trans-Pennine route for freight. Network Rail's Yorkshire and Humber route utilisation strategy is work in progress. Network Rail is also considering capacity needs on the three rail routes across the Pennines—the Hope valley line, the Manchester-Leeds route via Huddersfield, and the Calder valley line via Halifax.

I am aware of the Northern Way study, "The Market Demand for Gauge Enhancements", but it does not refer specifically to the need for a new route across the Pennines or the reopening of the Woodhead route as the best way of achieving it. However, I am aware, as are other hon. Members, of previous expressions of interest from the private sector in using the Woodhead route. The Government set out their approach for developing a longer-term strategy in the document entitled "Towards a Sustainable Transport System". At its heart is a process of engagement with stakeholders—that has already begun—on the goals and challenges for transport. Should robust evidence be produced that one of the key challenges is meeting significant growth for movements across the Pennines, the next stage will be to consider options across all transport modes that could meet the challenges identified.

As far as rail options are concerned, capacity enhancements on the three existing routes would be considered first. However, if an analysis of capacity on those routes concludes that the option of an additional route ought to be investigated, the Woodhead route for rail use can still be considered. The time to consider whether or not the Victorian tunnels need to be protected from long-term deterioration, so that they could be used again for rail or cable, is when the long-term capacity analysis has been completed but before National Grid finally seals the tunnels after the removal of the life-expired cables. That is expected to be in 2010 or 2011. At that time, a decision can be made on whether the Victorian tunnels should be sealed in a way that allows the process of inspection and maintenance to continue, should it prove necessary. Meanwhile, National Grid will continue to carry out regular inspections of the tunnels.

Following the meeting between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and many of the Members in Westminster Hall today—led by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough—and following the letter that the Secretary of State subsequently wrote to my hon. Friend, I propose to meet National Grid in the next few weeks to confirm that the Government wish to explore further the option of continuing the inspection and maintenance regime for the Victorian tunnels once National Grid has vacated them.

We will need to confirm the date by which a decision has to be made. As I said, that is expected to be in 2010 or 2011. By that point, much of the evidence gathered under the "Towards a Sustainable Transport System" process will be available, which will enable us to make the right decision. Following that meeting, I would like to meet key stakeholders. I want to discover the transport industry's view and the northern economic perspectives on the challenges that face freight transport across the Pennines, and how that will tie in with the development of a longer-term strategy—in particular, the process of engagement with stakeholders on the goals and challenges for transport, which has already begun.

I want to build on that. I will encourage stakeholders to produce robust evidence on the expected growth in demand for passenger and freight movements across the Pennines. Should a significant challenge be identified, the next stage is to consider options for meeting those challenges through all transport modes. As far as the rail options are concerned, as I mentioned earlier, it will doubtless include capacity enhancements on the three existing routes as well as the reopening of the Woodhead route. The outcome of that work will provide us with the evidence needed to take a view on the long-term strategy for trans-Pennine transport links.

In conclusion, I reinforce the view that nothing should be done to jeopardise the economic future of the north of England, and I emphasise that National Grid's proposals will not do so. During the period 2009-14, the Government plan to spend £15 billion on the rail network, supporting a network of services in the north of England and elsewhere, improving performance and reliability, increasing capacity by providing 1,300 new carriages, and making better use of the existing network. I hope that my response to the points raised during the debate reassures hon. Members that the steps that I propose will keep open the option of using the Woodhead route in the long term.

Question put and agreed to.

HMRC (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): It is a privilege, Mr. Bercow, to serve again under your chairmanship.

The House and the wider public will know that Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs is undertaking a regional review, and we know the results of the initial stages of that programme. The next stage is the core of the matter that I wish to debate today. It is aimed at rationalising offices in smaller towns and cities throughout the United Kingdom. In Northern Ireland, that could affect locations such as Coleraine in my constituency, Ballymena, Enniskillen and Londonderry, with almost 500 jobs being put at risk.

Coleraine is the only town with two tax offices, both of which could be closed. Those two offices have 80 employees in post. Most people appreciate that HMRC staff throughout the UK engage in a task that is not only worth while but vital. They try to ensure that the appropriate revenue accrues to the Treasury, particularly in Northern Ireland where, in some sections of the community, evasion is more rife than in other parts of the UK.

The Northern Ireland Assembly has for several years supported the principle of decentralising public sector jobs, but it seems that the regional review is contemplating moving in the opposite direction. On the face of it, it would appear that most jobs will be centralised in the Belfast area. If they do move along that route, it will have significant adverse financial and social consequences.

Virtually all those employed in the Coleraine offices will be offered posts in the Belfast area, which is between 90 minutes and two hours travelling time away during peak hours. That will necessitate an assisted travel allowance being paid for three years. That will amount to about £1.5 million. I do not include the redundancy payments, but if that were to be contemplated, it would cost more than three times that amount.

In addition, there is the thorny question at the core of my contention, which is about the requirements of section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. At the moment, they do not apply to the rest of the UK, but we in Northern Ireland are only too well aware of them. Under section 75, HMRC has to establish whether specific sections of the community would suffer as a result of the rationalisation programme. I shall give a few examples.

Approximately 58 per cent. of HMRC staff in the UK are female. The female complement in my constituency is 64 per cent. I suspect that the other offices at risk have a similar proportion. The point is that females will be specifically disadvantaged by relocation, as many of them are carers and some are mothers with young children. The prospect of an additional three and a half to four hours travelling time a day on top of their normal work load would undoubtedly cause hardship and create unnecessary family stress, which is completely at odds with the requirements of section 75.

I turn to the age structure of HMRC's staff. The proportion of staff in my constituency over the age of 35 is 81 per cent. The national average is 74 per cent. Again, the additional travelling time caused by rationalisation would make the elderly staff complement more prone to illness and stress. Again, that is in contravention of section 75.

Over the past five years, HMRC's staffing in Northern Ireland has been shown to be under-representative of the Protestant community. Indeed, that is the case in much of the public sector in Northern Ireland. According to the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland, the staff is 55 per cent. Roman Catholic and 45 per cent. Protestant. The closure of offices in a town such as Coleraine that has a predominantly Protestant population would make the task of trying to create a more balanced work force even more difficult. Again, section 75 requirements would not be met.

Much of Northern Ireland outside the Belfast travel-to-work area is rural. It has a higher than average ratio of people registered as disabled, in both rural and urban areas. Fern house in Coleraine is fully compliant under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995; that would be a prerequisite for the disabled population of Coleraine. However, for disabled people as consumers to have to travel the journey that I have outlined would be completely unacceptable.

I understand that the two buildings currently occupied by staff in Coleraine are leased. I hope that the Minister will address directly the question that I am about to put, as well as dealing with the general concept. I understand that several freedom of information requests have been made to the Department, seeking to establish the terms of the leases of those two buildings. To date, that information has not been released.

It is a simple question. What is the current rent? Once that has been established, we will be in a position to say whether it will take 15 years or even 20 years in savings of the rental merely to cancel out the assisted travel allowance, let alone the other factors that I have mentioned. Amalgamating those two offices would be a better option—or a least worst option—than closing both.

The north coast and the north-west of Northern Ireland have been particularly hard hit with redundancies over the past two years, in both the public and the private sectors. We need stability, as the Northern Ireland Assembly seeks to generate inward investment.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP) indicated assent.

Mr. Campbell: I note the approval, from a sedentary position, of the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in the Northern Ireland Assembly. I accept that in the spirit in which it was given.

During the past year, decisions have been taken about Northern Ireland's Driver and Vehicle Agency; much of its work is being transferred to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in Swansea, south Wales. That is resulting in job losses in Northern Ireland. Even then, some job saving was managed by non-location-specific work being transferred from Swansea to Coleraine. I ask the Minister to say whether it will be possible to do likewise in respect of HMRC.

[Mr. Gregory Campbell]

Finally, I understand that a recent Treasury Select Committee report expressed concern that the current tax gap, with underpayments of VAT, direct tax and national insurance contributions and a deterioration in the performance of self-assessment, may be linked to the overall reduction in the head count that has already taken place under the HMRC review. For those reasons, I hope that the Government, even at this stage in considering the progress of the review, will be able to come to a more satisfactory conclusion. The problem is affecting hard-hit communities in a way that could make unemployment much more likely and re-employment even more difficult in an area that is already experiencing hardship.

9.40 am

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): It is a pleasure to sit under your chairmanship this morning, Mr. Bercow.

I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell), or East Derry—he can take his choice—on securing this debate. Like him, I recognise the potential impact of the pending changes to the Revenue and Customs estate in Northern Ireland. For many of us, part of the issue is: are those changes effectively estate-driven, and blind to the performance issues facing Revenue and Customs, almost blind to the job implications for people currently working for Revenue and Customs and indeed blind to the implications for the areas in which the affected offices are located?

It has already been said that there are standing commitments in Northern Ireland to decentralisation. If I am honest, I would have to say that everyone seems to be for decentralisation but few are for doing anything about it. It is the usual story: everybody wants to go to heaven, but nobody wants to die. When I was Minister of Finance and Personnel in Northern Ireland, I sent missives around, commissioned a review on office accommodation strategy and asked all my fellow Ministers to offer up candidates for decentralisation. I received three indications of possible candidates for decentralisation, which were effectively non-starters in terms of their impact.

Therefore, I am not trying to be dishonest, saying to the Minister, "We have a perfectly wonderful active policy of decentralisation and we want you to do the same". That is not the fact, and the Minister has her own experience of being in office in Northern Ireland, so she knows the resistance and talented inertia that can exist within the civil service system regarding such matters.

However, a number of localities, not least in my constituency, have seen job losses, some in the private sector and some in the public sector. Those jobs were previously decentralised back in the 1990s, and they have been lost in the past few years. They were decentralised within the Northern Ireland civil service—under direct rule, I hasten to add, before the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), who is the current Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in Northern Ireland, thinks that I am being pointed in my presentation.

Some of the remaining civil service jobs in my constituency, namely in Foyle house in Revenue and Customs, are now under threat because of this so-called rationalisation. That rationalisation seems to have the effect of sucking jobs in Revenue and Customs away from the west of Northern Ireland and on to the eastern sea board. That is a pattern that we need to avoid. People see that as centralisation in a particular direction, and as geographic concentration. That affects not just the reasonably equal job opportunities that people throughout Northern Ireland have every right to expect, but, materially, the performance and effectiveness of Revenue and Customs.

When we lose the existing network of local offices, Revenue and Customs will lose the effective rate of contact and access that it has with local taxpayers, local businesses, local tax advisers and local accountants. That will make a real difference to the performance and effectiveness of Revenue and Customs. It is a good thing when some people appreciate being able to access and contact a tax office—[Interruption.] I notice that the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) dissociates himself from those remarks; perhaps he is in a constituency position that gives him some comfort to do so. I certainly know, however, that it is not just people working in Foyle house in Derry who are concerned about the changes, but people whose work leads them to rely on the contact with, availability of and access that they have to Foyle house and some other tax offices in the region. That level of availability is not something that should simply be tossed aside. It seems that this process is effectively driven by estate policies and estate agendas, rather than by service effectiveness and performance.

The changes in relation to Revenue and Customs, and the impact on the capacity of Revenue and Customs in Northern Ireland, are not just happening in isolation; I refer to the wider issues of public sector job distribution in Northern Ireland. In that context, we should not ignore the changes in relation to, say, the Assets Recovery Agency. That agency was particularly successful in its work in Northern Ireland. It has been able to address the local Mr. Bigs and the ostentatious affluence from questionable sources that people have been able to demonstrate in Northern Ireland, in ways that would not interest the Serious Organised Crime Agency. Many public representatives in Northern Ireland are concerned that the impact that we have seen on illicit moneys and on money laundering—some pretty mature money laundering fronts have developed in Northern Ireland—will not continue. The ARA was having an effect on that, and was able to draw on the expertise, assistance and intelligence of other agencies, including Revenue and Customs. Given that we will potentially lose out in the shake-up of ARA, I would have thought that a case could be made that the experience in Northern Ireland and the insights in Revenue and Customs in Northern Ireland could be used to good effect to continue the pursuit of those moneys and potential revenues through Revenue and Customs and other means.

Under the new regime in SOCA and in policing, in terms of how the models work, police will essentially deal with level 1 crime, SOCA will be interested in level 3 crime, and nobody will really pursue the illicit means and moneys involved in level 2 crime. It is almost as if a tax band system has been created for the criminals in Northern Ireland, many of whom are essentially just the privatised paramilitaries. They will know that if they effectively stick within band 2, they will get away with things because nobody in particular will pursue them. That would be a dreadful signal for us to send at a time when we are trying to ensure that everything about Northern Ireland is more legitimate and more stable.

We have capacity, intelligence, means and hard-working personnel available. If we are simply going to toss those resources aside, that would be wrong. Will the Minister therefore ensure that whatever other adjustments are made to the Revenue and Customs estate strategy across the UK more widely, particular attention is paid to the specific circumstances and issues in Northern Ireland, to determine how best those are to be tackled across the range of Government interests? It cannot be in the interests of Revenue and Customs to do otherwise.

In Northern Ireland, Revenue and Customs has been part of the Organised Crime Task Force, which has had road shows. A direct rule Minister and people from Revenue and Customs have been going round telling businesses what they have to do and what they can do in relation to money laundering and other aspects of organised crime. In the aftermath of all that publicity, all those road shows and all the motivating effort to help business, the signal coming from the Government is essentially that they will do less about such activity, and the means and the tools that they have will be left, or made, redundant in some of the reforms.

Mr. Dodds: May I say to the hon. Gentleman that I agree with him entirely in what he says about the ARA, the work that it has done and the problems and concerns that have now arisen, given SOCA's new role and so on, and the gap in chasing organised crime that he refers to? Does he not agree that that pursuit of organised crime is even more important in the context of the great outcry and the spotlight on the enormous amounts of money lost through fuel laundering, smuggling and all the rest of it? Also, does he not agree that there is great concern within Northern Ireland about this transfer from the ARA to SOCA along the lines that he has mentioned?

Mark Durkan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that point. He raises another dimension: revenue issues in Northern Ireland in respect of fuel smuggling and other criminal activities. Of course, there is the issue of Northern Ireland having a land border, with legitimate businesses conducting their affairs on a cross-border basis, as well as some illegitimate businesses conducting their affairs on that basis too. Again, that points to the need to ensure that Revenue and Customs has services and offices in Northern Ireland that are attuned to all the factors and circumstances in play so that they can understand what is going on.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry mentioned the Treasury Committee report, which cannot be ignored. We all know that questions have been raised about self-assessment and the terrible problems with tax credits. Indeed, Northern Ireland no longer has its own tax credit office, and we all have to ring Frank in Preston if we want anything done; if we do not get Frank in Preston, it is hard lines, and the problems remain. We have to wonder why the answer to all these problems is supposedly to rationalise the estate in ways that will only strain the performance capacity and the flexible intelligence of the Revenue and Customs system.

I have mentioned issues particular to the Northern Ireland economy and revenue base, but the skills, experience and insights offered by the work force in the existing offices in Northern Ireland can also serve Revenue and Customs more widely. Just as many of us in Northern Ireland have our tax affairs dealt with by an office in Wales, offices in Northern Ireland can serve other regions in the UK. That is true not least in respect of money laundering, and I return to the implications of the concentration on SOCA. Under the proposals, level 2 crime and illicit financial activity will essentially be given a bye ball. The issue of Revenue and Customs needs to be addressed if the Government are serious about levying legitimate tax and pursing illegitimate activity where they can.

I hope that the Minister and her colleagues will reflect more widely on the implications of the proposals. We are not simply making an appeal for jobs in our constituencies, although it would not be honest to deny that that is a dimension of what is happening here, because it is a real and legitimate concern. We are talking about people who have given good service in difficult circumstances and sometimes not in the best premises. If the estate in Northern Ireland is to be rationalised, that must be based on safeguarding performance and effectiveness at Revenue and Customs more generally and ensuring that there are proper working conditions.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): When the hon. Gentleman refers to jobs, does he agree that the loss of jobs flies in the face of Government policy? The Government encouraged females to return to part-time work, but the current proposals fly in the face of that. We are talking about the economically inactive taking up different jobs in the Province, but the Government are kicking the feet from under these ladies, who have made the effort to return to part-time work, but who will lose their jobs.

Mark Durkan: I fully take the hon. Gentleman's point.

The workers we are talking about have been told that there might be retraining opportunities for them, but when they have asked questions about those, they have been given bizarre, evasive and confusing answers. As the hon. Member for Upper Bann said, these people have made their way back into the work force, taking advantage of retraining opportunities that were previously available and fitting their jobs in with their other responsibilities. We cannot turn around and tell them that they will be released altogether, albeit with limited opportunities for retraining, or that they can travel two or more hours each way every day to and from their job. Essentially, that is a let-them-eat-cake response.

The workers on whose behalf we are speaking face various challenges and difficulties and they have been told that offers of retraining are available to them, but those offers cannot be available to all of them. It is great to offer people retraining, but there is a reduced number of jobs, so the idea that everybody is being offered relocation is somewhat dishonest. That is not a satisfactory answer, and these employees and their families deserve more than a let-them-eat-cake response from their employers.

9.55 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow. I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on introducing this timely debate and enlightening us about the special problems of Northern Ireland. We all know and accept that tax offices across the land are affected in similar ways to those in Northern Ireland, and that includes those in my constituency. I should add that it is difficult for Members of Parliament to take up the cudgels on behalf of tax officers, as opposed to groups such as nurses, because they are not always the most popular people in the land.

Tax offices are currently the object of the Gershon savings, which were announced without a clear plan in 2003. At the time, my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable)—a man gifted, as we all know, with exceptional foresight—said that it was all very well announcing big global savings, but that it was not so easy to know how they would be implemented in practice, particularly when they affected individuals' jobs and individual communities.

The general assumption behind the Gershon savings is that they are about efficiency and having cashable, bankable savings, not about cuts and reductions. With that in mind, we must ask the Minister certain key questions, and one pivotal question obviously relates to redundancies. I am still not clear about the nature of the allegedly benign agreement between the unions and the Government, and I have spoken to the Minister about it at the Dispatch Box. I get different stories from the Public and Commercial Services Union and the Government, and I should like a clear answer on whether we anticipate any compulsory redundancies and whether the Government are budgeting for them. Are the offers to staff so impractical as to amount almost to constructive dismissal, as has been suggested? Do the savings that the Government anticipate include an allowed attrition rate that will arise as a result of people simply throwing in the towel, because they cannot move to the jobs that they are offered?

There are also questions about savings. Obviously, big savings are possible, particularly in relation to the buildings. Given the number of buildings that are going, the savings could be considerable. In my constituency, it is said that savings of £230,000 will follow from the change in use of the building and the emptying out of most of it, although we are told—there is a certain vagueness about this—that more detailed information on savings will be available only when the closure timetable is announced.

That leads me to speculate, as the hon. Member for East Londonderry did, that there is a certain amount of uncertainty about the savings on property. What will be the capital dividend from the release of the property? Will the revenue savings that are engineered depend on the sale of the asset or on finding a new tenant? Some buildings in town centres are obviously highly valued, but not all are. There are also the costs of removal and de-installation.

Furthermore, a lot of the property that we are talking about is not freehold and is covered by the private finance initiative, on which there is an annual charge. Do we need to keep paying that charge or to find someone to take it over? How does that charge affect the disposal value? In other words, we need a clear account of the Government's intention towards the estate and of how much everything will cost.

Another issue is the reduction in service. The Government claim that there will be no reduction; but unquestionably, the service will be less local, with fewer inquiry points, and there will be incalculable damage to public confidence in the tax service, because it will not be as accessible. That is especially true in Northern Ireland and in a town such as mine, which has lots of small businesses, as well as elderly people and migrant labourers who have complex tax affairs. All their cases need resolution. There seems to be no overwhelming case for centralisation, particularly in an age of IT, when networks between different buildings can often be very sophisticated.

That brings me to my final point, which other hon. Members have touched on: what about the localism agenda and the work-life balance that is so desired, for female employees in particular? What about helping disabled people back into work? Is there any upside to the centralised processing that is being suggested, such as the lean system, from which the Government hope to get most of their savings? That has not been properly assessed. A passage from the National Audit Office report on accuracy in the processing of income tax, which was produced in July 2007, comments on the centralised system:

> "The Department's initial experience of Lean working suggests that significant improvements in the accuracy and efficiency of processing Income Tax are possible. Early results suggest some improvement in the quality and productivity of work, but lead times in completing work have increased. No firm conclusions could be drawn on how Lean working had affected accuracy rates at this stage. Close scrutiny of emerging trends will be important in identifying any unforeseen effects and in assessing action needed to sustain improvements".

That is not exactly a clean bill of health for the centralisation system.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): We are talking about improvements to the service, but how can we have an improved service if employees, including those who are disabled, travel for two hours before arriving at work, stressed out? I see the Minister shaking her head, but she knows that people travelling from certain parts of the Province will travel for that long. If they must sit for an hour, as the rest of us must, trying to get into the city of Belfast, that will add to their stress. How will that assist the progress of the centralisation?

Dr. Pugh: I was coming to precisely that point. Clearly, how staff are treated affects the way that the workplace functions, including its efficiency. Deskilling, which is what we are really talking about in this case, will not necessarily lead to a gain in efficiency; it can mean that problems that do not involve standard tax cases take longer to sort out. Plenty of documentary evidence suggests that HMRC does not have brilliant success with its current forms and procedures. There are anecdotal stories to the effect that such an approach can lead to the stockpiling of post, when post is simply left in cupboards and treated as not having been received, which significantly reduces processing times. It can lead to the "computer says no" syndrome, with which I am familiar: when someone asks why their letter about tax credits was not received, they are told, "It wasn't received on our computer." Unquestionably—this is the point that the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) just touched on—staff will become demoralised. All research tends to show that, in such highly centralised institutions, absence rates are higher and there are recruitment problems. That is perfectly well documented.

In the office that is being closed in Southport, the office staff, as in Northern Ireland, are mostly female and many have caring responsibilities, but most of them have good knowledge of the area. When the office was previously scheduled for closure, they all won their appeals. I question what will happen to those people with caring responsibilities and to those who are disabled when they have to move. I fear what will happen; I assume that many of those people will simply throw in the towel and look for work elsewhere. That will be a loss not only to them but to the Revenue. Those employees make the point that their local knowledge helps to clear up problems that would be difficult to solve otherwise. It makes it easier for them to track down evasion in the area.

I suppose that a cynic might not be surprised to see the Government abandon some of their own agenda of localism, work-life balance and keeping disabled people in employment. It is more of a surprise to see them spurn efficiency. My conclusion, about which I am quite sincere, is that HMRC is acting in somewhat of a panic, to a higher, unreasoned political imperative. It simply must do something to get the savings that Gershon has said can be made. I used the word "political" in connection with the imperative, and it has been noted with some bitterness in my area that certain constituencies, notably Blackburn, are unaffected by closures of tax offices. If we act in such a rush, we end up with ersatz savings, pseudo-efficiency and, in consequence, a lot of unnecessary human anxiety.

10.5 am

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship again, Mr. Bercow, and to speak in the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing it. It might not attract the greatest attention among all the Treasury events that are occurring today, but it is nevertheless important to the hon. Gentleman's constituents and others. He set out his case with great skill on behalf of those of his constituents who are employed in Coleraine and other offices in his part of the world.

The hon. Gentleman raised several important questions about the practicality of the Government's proposals for the reorganisation of HMRC offices in Northern Ireland. He also raised some of the specific issues that relate to Northern Ireland, such as section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) on raising issues that relate to organised crime in Northern Ireland and the impact that some of the proposals might have in that respect.

The Minister has great knowledge of and, it would be fair to say, fondness for Northern Ireland from her time as a Minister there. We all look forward to her response to points specific to Northern Ireland, as well as to her comments on the other issues that have been raised. She has debated them before; she and I took part in a debate on reforms of HMRC offices in the midlands on 18 July last year. Indeed, many of the points that have been raised today were raised in that debate.

In preparation for today's debate, I looked back at what I said on that occasion, and I want to reiterate a couple of those points. First, I do not think that anyone will disagree that efficiency is no bad thing. It is right for the Government to seek to make efficiencies and to deal with inefficiency. On occasion, that will require a reduction in the head count, and I do not want to shy away from that aspect. However, several hon. Members have today raised an important concern about supposed efficiencies that result in a reduction in the quality of the service being provided.

We should examine whether the changes that the Government propose will cause a decline in customer service. To repeat a point that I made in the previous debate, I feel that the word "customer" is not always the appropriate term for taxpayers. In last year's debate, I drew attention to the concern raised by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the Chartered Institute of Taxation that some head count reductions and supposed efficiency savings were causing a decline in customer services.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the reduction in the quality of service is an important matter, but is not the reduction in the quality of life of staff in HMRC offices equally important? If the proposals go ahead, staff in my constituency who work at Moira house in Lisburn will have to travel on the M1—a very congested motorway—into Belfast and find parking. Some of those people are young mothers with children. Should not we take into account the impact on the quality of life of staff in places such as Moira house before we take such decisions?

Mr. Gauke: The right hon. Gentleman sets out his case very well, and I do not want to dispute what he says. Indeed, I shall return specifically to the point about the impact on staff and morale. He other hon. Members have made that point very well.

A number of targets are set out in the HMRC's 2004 public service agreement. Some relate to customer service and experience, which were assessed as suffering slippage in the 2007 departmental annual report and the 2007 autumn performance report. In particular, the departmental report highlighted the indicator of an 80 per cent. response rate of businesses and individuals who said that they achieved success at the first point of contact but that that was not sustained. That will be of concern to customers within Northern Ireland and elsewhere in the UK. Furthermore, last month's Treasury Committee report, referred to by the hon. Members for East Londonderry and for Foyle, stated:

> "We remain concerned that HMRC's headcount reductions, office closures and consequent move towards contact centres have proved a source of frustration to customers."

I would be grateful for the Minister's comments on that.

Staff morale is, of course, relevant to this debate, given the difficulties that the efficiency reforms will create for them, which feeds into customer service, because staff with low morale are unlikely to provide as good a service as those with high morale. There is concern about morale in Northern Ireland and generally. I suspect that proposals, such as those being discussed today, play a part in that. We have heard about issues with missing data discs and performance on VAT registrations. However, the combination of a variety of Government initiatives, such as the Lyons and Gershon reviews, and tight budgets appears to have an impact on morale. The Financial Times reported, a few days ago, on a staff survey that referred to very low morale in HMRC and, in particular, highlighted a lack of confidence in the leadership of HMRC. Certainly, the HMRC capability review identified leadership as a weakness. What is the Minister's assessment of morale in HMRC, in Northern Ireland and more generally?

Evidence for strains within HMRC emerged in a report in The Mail on Sunday on 24 February that claimed that HMRC was not pursuing debts of up to £20,000. I do not know whether that report is correct, but it went on to argue that tax collectors were being drafted from Belfast and elsewhere to London to address that backlog. Is that the case?

Another issue directly related to Northern Ireland concerns the status of HMRC's VAT registration centre in Newry. Some months ago, it was intended that various registration offices, including Newry, would close and that there would be one centre in Wolverhampton. Owing to difficulties in the area, the Newry office was not closed and was maintained to address a backlog of VAT registrations. What is the up-to-date position on the future of the Newry office? Is the intention that it will remain open for much longer? The VAT registration backlog has been addressed to a large extent and HMRC is meeting its target of dealing with 70 per cent. of VAT registration applications within 14 days. In the light of that, is the Newry office safe, or is it more likely to close? There are further concerns about VAT registrations; it still takes about 75 days to deal with high-risk applications. Will the Minister comment on that?

Furthermore, about 23 per cent. of VAT registration applications are judged to be incomplete, which suggests a problem with the process. The Treasury Committee addressed that matter in its recent report:

> "We have repeatedly been assured that the headcount reductions and efficiency programme as a whole would not cause a decline in the quality of HMRC's services. We ask the Government to explain why there has been a deterioration of service in relation to VAT registrations and what measures it will take to bring HMRC back on course."

That issue applies as much to Northern Ireland as to the rest of the United Kingdom.

In closing, once again, I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry on initiating this debate and setting out his case very well on behalf of his constituents, staff and the wider community using HMRC offices. In July last year, I made the point that we increasingly want some personal contact and that distant contact centres do not always provide the type of service that we want. I would be grateful for the Minister's comments.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Jane Kennedy): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Bercow. I have enjoyed your chairmanship. In all honesty, in preparing for this debate, my opening phrase was to be, "I am pleased to have an opportunity to respond to the concerns expressed by hon. Members." I was thinking about that in the context of what is happening elsewhere today and wondered whether I could say it with sincerity. However, just a few moments into the debate, listening to Members whom I regard in very friendly terms—many of them are friends whom I have got to know over some very difficult years—I can honestly say that it has been a pleasure to listen to this debate and to have the opportunity to respond. I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on arranging the debate.

Members' interest in the reorganisation of HMRC in Northern Ireland has already been brought to my attention through questions to the House and the consultation process that HMRC has developed, for which I am grateful. As others have said, the taxman has never been a popular figure, particularly in Northern Ireland. On many occasions, he has led a dangerous life. However, as the hon. Member for East Londonderry is aware, HMRC has designed a systematic review process—not a panic response. In some sense, it was a response to pressures brought to bear on it by Ministers to ensure that its processes and procedures are as efficient as possible. As a result of those pressures and the Gershon and other reforms, HMRC has developed a very good and thorough process for dealing with the matter, which involves review, consultation and announcements on decisions that are then very carefully taken forward. That process is being implemented across the UK.

The review process for the Belfast urban centre is virtually complete and I expect an announcement to be made to staff and trade unions in the next couple of months. Hon. Members with a constituency interest in the area will be notified at the same time. To meet its requirements under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, the importance of which the hon. Member for East Londonderry rightly emphasised, HMRC has undertaken a full equality impact assessment of its proposals for the Belfast urban centre taking into account the particular issues affecting the region. It has worked with the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland to ensure that it does not unlawfully discriminate against particular groups.

Mark Durkan: The Minister said that the equality impact assessment relates to the Belfast urban review. Did the Equality Commission not advise the Department that the equality impact assessment should cover the whole of Northern Ireland?

Jane Kennedy: I shall come to that in a moment, if my hon. Friend will give me time. I anticipate that the review of clusters, which will include Coleraine and individual offices in Northern Ireland will begin within the next couple of months, supported by a full equality impact assessment for those locations. The issue will not be decided quickly; it will be a process in which the staff, service users, Members of this House and—I am sure the Chamber will want to be reassured—Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly will be involved.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry made a couple of points to which I shall respond. He asked about the rental of HMRC offices in Coleraine and the freedom of information request. HMRC cannot release information about the accommodation costs that it pays to Mapeley, the third-party landlord for much of HMRC's estate. The information is protected as commercially in confidence. However, HMRC is able to release figures for financial savings on buildings having been vacated once decisions have been made. Those figures are germane to the process, but it is a process that I, as a Minister, require HMRC to carry forward professionally. It is HMRC's responsibility to negotiate the best savings out of all the changes that it proposes.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: rose—

Jane Kennedy: I appreciate that that will disappoint the hon. Gentleman, and I happily give way to him.

Mr. Campbell: The Minister will understand the incredulity that many people will express, because we will be able to establish the cost-effectiveness of any decision only after it has taken place and people either have been made redundant or have to undertake the huge journey that many hon. Members have outlined today.

Jane Kennedy: For people outside the process, there is some truth in that point. However, learning from the way in which the process has been carried forward in other regions, I am confident that HMRC operates the process absolutely properly. In fact, it is gaining savings—I shall turn to them in a minute—by changing the way in which staff work, and they are all important modernisations that HMRC is required to take forward. As the process goes forward, I think that the House will be satisfied that the right decisions are being made.

Hon. Members should visit those offices where changes have been implemented and the process has been completed—in the south-east of England, for example, where similar representations were made at the beginning of that process. Having gone through it all, none the less, staff have been able to move and be accommodated within reasonable travelling times. I shall come on to that issue, which several Members have raised. I know Northern Ireland well, and I am very conscious of the pressures that people are under when they travel there. I therefore encourage hon. Members to have confidence, because HMRC has a real and proper agreement with the trade unions about the way in which it carries the process forward, and it works. I have seen it work and I have confidence in it.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) made a number of points, and I was very interested to hear his concerns about the impact of changes on the way in which the law enforcement agencies might work. He said that he feared that the review was in danger of sucking jobs to the eastern seaboard, and I can see that that concern is very real for him and for his constituents. However, all I can say to him, as I said earlier about the second review of the smaller offices, which will begin shortly, is that everybody will have an opportunity to contribute to the process and everybody's views will be listened to before decisions are made. It is not a process whereby decisions have been made in advance, and then we will have a review in which people cannot have confidence. There have been many occasions when proposals have been met with counter-proposals and they have been taken on board.

Mark Durkan: Frankly, I am not reassured by what the Minister has said, because in effect, the Belfast review will be presented as having resulted in certain givens that will affect, inform and influence the review of offices outside Belfast. She has told us that, in effect, there are two separate equality impact assessments: one for Belfast, which will reach a conclusion, and a separate one for the other offices. The Equality Commission for Northern Ireland has clearly said that the right thing to do is to have one overall equality impact assessment of the current regional review. Why is that not happening?

Jane Kennedy: The Equality Commission said that it would prefer all areas of Northern Ireland to be reviewed together, but it was mindful of the model that HMRC has used to review urban centres in the rest of the United Kingdom, and the earlier timetabling commitments that HMRC had given to staff. The commission had no objection to HMRC continuing with the model involving two processes, examining first, the urban centres, and secondly, the smaller offices, when taking forward the Belfast urban centre review.

I shall turn to the changes that HMRC is making to the way in which it carries out its business, so that it can respond to customer demands and the requirement—

Dr. Pugh: rose—

Jane Kennedy: I shall come to several points that the hon. Gentleman made, if he will allow me, and then I shall be happy to give way.

For some years, there has taken place in HMRC buildings very little work that is directly connected to the local community; some contributions have alluded to that this morning. Further, many customers now choose to telephone HMRC offices or to use the internet to file returns or make claims. Throughout the UK, HMRC estimates that it has up to 40 per cent. too much accommodation, but it is right for HMRC to keep its network of inquiry centres, as is happening. I hope that hon. Members accept that we value the face-to-face contact that we know the public appreciate, and HMRC is maintaining it. However, it is also right for HMRC senior management to examine their back-office operations to ensure that they are run as efficiently and effectively as possible. In some work areas, that is best done by concentrating work in large units, but in others, a more mobile work force is seen as the best solution to customer needs.

There must be an emphasis on improving compliance by focusing resources on the risks that HMRC deals with regarding different taxes and customer groups.

Mr. Donaldson: The Minister knows from her previous role, in Northern Ireland, that for members of the security forces we have very special arrangements to protect their identity. She knows that those special arrangements for HMRC are located at one of its facilities in Northern Ireland. I do not expect her to expand in detail on the way in which she intends to handle that very special part of HMRC's work in Northern Ireland in the context of the review. However, can she assure me that those special arrangements for police officers, soldiers, prison staff and others whose security must be protected will continue, that the arrangements will be dealt with not in the context of the wider review and then reconfigured, but in a ring-fenced way, and that they will be properly protected and, I hope, maintained?

Jane Kennedy: The right hon. Gentleman makes a valid point that I shall personally look into as a result of his drawing it to my attention today. If he will allow me, having looked into it, I shall write to him to give him the reassurance that he seeks.

I am happy to confirm that, whatever the outcome of the review for the offices in Northern Ireland, the proposals for the remainder of Northern Ireland, including Newry, which was mentioned earlier, will be subject to a full—that is to say, a public—equality impact assessment. Inquiry centre services will be maintained in their current locations or nearby, and staff will not be required to commute to an office beyond reasonable daily travel. There is an established process for managers and staff to discuss options for their future employment dependent on the outcome of the review. The process is open, transparent and accessible to the trade unions.

David Simpson: When you say that they will not be expected to travel a distance that is unreasonable, could you elaborate—

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman, but he has on two occasions used "you". He will know that I play no part in these proceedings at all.

David Simpson: I appreciate that. Thank you for pointing it out, Mr. Bercow. I apologise.

The whole moving of jobs issue that the Government are trying to force on Northern Ireland surely flies in the face of Government policy. I raised it earlier with the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) in relation to trying to encourage people back to work. Surely it flies in the face of what the Government have been trying to do for a number of months.

Jane Kennedy: I know that the hon. Gentleman is making a serious point, but I do not believe that that is the case. Having been an employment Minister in Northern Ireland, I am familiar with the issues, and I do not believe that the changes proposed for the Belfast urban centre and the review respecting the other HMRC offices will have an impact on employment, although I am aware of his genuine concerns for work in Northern Ireland, as well as those mentioned by other hon. Members.

The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) asked about the processing of VAT registration. I have responded several times to written questions and other questions on that issue, and he will know that the process has improved, so I shall not take up time discussing it now. This debate is not strictly about that subject, although we are talking about HMRC performance in a broader sense.

Several hon. Members are interested in the matter of pressures on individual staff members. Proposals to rationalise work and office space across Belfast, Antrim and Lisburn were put forward for consultation in September last year. Staff, trade unions, Members of Parliament and local authorities have contributed to that consultation, providing information on travel routes, economic interests in the local areas, the position of other employers and Departments and individual circumstances that should be taken into account. A report summarising those responses was published in January this year and is available. HMRC is considering all the information provided during the consultation in arriving at its recommendations.

Dr. McCrea: Minister, could you tell us how the process in which you are involved—certainly in relation to the offices outside Belfast—sits comfortably with the Assembly's anti-poverty strategy and the decentralisation of work?

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. Before the Minister replies, and so that I am not open to the charge of discrimination between one Member and another, I must say to the hon. Gentleman that he too should not use the word "you". I hope that both hon. Members will take my rebuke in the constructive spirit in which it was intended. I call the Minister.

Jane Kennedy: I say to the House in all sincerity that the changes being made and the improvements that will follow to HMRC's processes for responding to customers will help in dealing with poverty, particularly now that HMRC plays such an important role in the administration of tax credits. The administration of tax credits has been much criticised in recent years, and the work being done to improve it will bring dividends. If there are concerns about how the plans will sit with the Northern Ireland Assembly, I am happy to visit to see what can be done to ensure that the administration in Northern Ireland follows as closely as possible Government policy elsewhere in Britain. I am happy to take that discussion there to consider what impact the changes might have on Northern Ireland.

I shall briefly outline some of the facts being considered for the Belfast centre. HMRC has nine offices in the Belfast urban centre: seven in the city, one in Antrim and one in Lisburn, accommodating some 1,700 staff in total. HMRC expects to need roughly the same number of staff across the entire urban centre, including those offices, in 2011. Analysis of staff travel times suggests that our Belfast city centre offices are all within walking distance of each other. Any rationalisation of buildings therefore should not pose serious problems in terms of commuting times. In moving to an efficient structure, HMRC is confident that the majority of staff can be relocated nearby with their own or similar work.

Before the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) jumps to his feet—I am immediately conscious of his comments—I say to him that I recall the M1 well, having travelled it many times. Even in a police car, with all the advantages that that brings, it can take inordinately long. I understand the concerns of people working outside the city centre about any extra travel time they may face, particularly those who depend on public transport. Even though the analysis undertaken by HMRC to support its recommendations will be extensive, individual staff members will have the opportunity to discuss their circumstances with managers before any decision is taken on their suitability to relocate. Throughout the programme, senior management in HMRC are committed to being open with staff.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: The Minister has mentioned the test of reasonableness several times in relation to staff relocations. Does she think that it is reasonable for female staff living on the north coast, many of whom have caring responsibilities, to have to leave home before 7 am and arrive back after 7 pm in order to work at HMRC offices in Belfast?

Jane Kennedy: Travelling from Londonderry to Belfast is a long journey, but there are many people in south-east England who commute. [Interruption.] The comparison is germane. I am reluctant to say that such a commute is unreasonable, full stop. Some may make that choice for career purposes, and I would not want to suggest that they are making an unreasonable decision. All the issues will be considered, and individual staff members' personal circumstances will be taken into account by their managers as the review proceeds, but we are in the earliest stages. We have not even begun the review of the offices about which the hon. Gentleman is particularly concerned, but I know that he will continue to make such representations.

Managers are being open with staff, explaining the options available to individuals and exploring how their expectations can be matched with the need to make the operations more efficient and effective. The decisions are not easy, and they can be made only after all the specific facts are known. Once decisions have been announced in the Belfast urban centre, as elsewhere, HMRC will begin relocating staff and releasing surplus accommodation. As I said, I expect the review of clusters and individual locations—the remainder of HMRC locations in Northern Ireland—to begin within the next couple of months. The hon. Gentleman has expressed concerns about the review of individual locations, several of which have been mentioned. I reassure him and other Members that the full equality impact assessment of all the proposals will be undertaken to identify—I have always found this a comprehensive list—any impacts on people's racial group, age, marital status, number of dependants, sexual orientation, religious beliefs or, in Northern Ireland, political opinion. It is always worth reminding the House of that.

The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) raised a couple of points to which I should like to respond, because I do not often get the opportunity and I have a minute or two now. He criticised the lean process. I assure him that I am confident that in Northern Ireland, as elsewhere, the lean process will bring benefits. It works. I have met staff who have gone through the process, and I can see the benefits to management in terms of the ability to bring about improved customer experience by speeding up how HMRC responds to its work load. I am confident that the process will bring new opportunities for staff.

The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire was right to draw attention to the assessment of morale in HMRC. It is a cause of concern to me. I suggest that sometimes delay in such processes undermines morale even further. It is important to staff to have some certainty about where they will be and what they will be doing, and that is what I hope HMRC's review will bring.

The hon. Member for East Londonderry asked about redundancies. HMRC cannot guarantee that there will be no compulsory redundancies or compulsory moves of home, but its intention is to avoid both if reasonably possible. HMRC is working with staff and unions to minimise the risk of compulsory redundancy, but it cannot guarantee that that will not happen, nor do I think the House would wish to impose such a limitation on it.

Mark Durkan: The Minister was speaking about the morale implications of delay, and I accept her point. Does she accept that in the context of what she is now billing as two reviews in Northern Ireland, there is a morale hit and frustration about what people see as cynical staging? Doing the Belfast urban review first and guaranteeing that the aggregate number of jobs in the Belfast area will remain roughly the same means that the entire efficiency hit on job numbers—about 500—will affect the rest of Northern Ireland. That sort of delay, or pretend delay, which is effectively cynical staging, hits morale big time.

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman has his point of view. He may call it cynical staging, but HMRC has taken a pragmatic approach that has worked and has paid dividends elsewhere in the UK as it has carried this programme forward. If hon. Members are concerned about the impact, I encourage them to visit regions that have gone through the process.

Dr. Pugh: There is one point that the Minister has not picked up. I recognise that the exercise should be transparent, as she said, and thorough. The document that I received about my tax office shows how thorough it has been on the personnel side, but it is slightly light on the financial side. When making counter-proposals, one needs to know the financial cost of any moves that are being made. One therefore needs to know the accommodation costs that might be imposed not only for the offices that are being closed, or are scheduled for closure, but for those that are being kept open to draw comparisons. If the unions are to make counter-proposals, they need that sort of data—otherwise, the exercise is not open and transparent.

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman will know that when decisions are announced, financial assessments are also released. It is worth the House remembering that HMRC has saved the not inconsiderable sum of £27 million as a result of the process. It should be congratulated on that and encouraged to make further progress. This long-term programme will deliver a more responsive and efficient service for taxpayers and HMRC customers. I hope that hon. Members will look back on it and say, "Yes, we can see the benefits of what has happened."

Dry Macular Degeneration

11 am

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): It is delightful to serve under your careful stewardship this morning, Mr. Bercow.

This debate is about dry macular degeneration. Macular degeneration is the leading cause of vision loss in people over 65 in the UK. Research published in the British Journal of Ophthalmology in 2002 suggested that more than 200,000 people had a condition severe enough to be registered but many more had a less severe form of the disease. In an article in The Times in 2007, Dr. Thomas Stuttaford, an industry expert, said that macular degeneration affected more than 500,000 people in the UK. That is a significant number, and, with an ageing population, it is probably increasing.

Tom Bembridge, the chief executive of the Macular Disease Society, said during a discussion that I had with him recently that one of the most pressing issues is the referral time for those diagnosed with low-vision problems. When someone leaves a clinic, it takes some time for the services that they need to kick in, and there is a particular lack of a joined-up approach between social services and the national health service in respect of this disease. I shall expand on that later.

Tom Bembridge queries what the Government are doing to ensure that there is no postcode lottery for provisional support following a low-vision assessment. There are flagship projects in Camden and Islington, and there has been a project pilot in Gateshead to attempt a joined-up approach by the NHS and social services. The Macular Disease Society would like them to be replicated throughout the country. Part of the problem with equipment is that its supply is down to social services. It has been identified that this major problem falls into the gap between health and social provision, and there is a great belief that there should be a more joined-up approach by the NHS and the Department of Health.

Dry macular degeneration is the most common form of the disease. It occurs when a build-up of waste material and a lack of proper nutrition cause a gradual deterioration of the macula, usually over many years. Dry macular degeneration accounts for 80 per cent. of cases. Wet macular degeneration is less common and occurs when tiny new abnormal blood vessels begin to grow behind the retina towards the macula. They usually leak blood and fluid, damaging the macula and causing a more rapid loss of central vision. That form of the disease has received much high-profile coverage in the national and local press because sufferers face a postcode lottery for funding for the latest drug treatments to ease their symptoms.

I do not wish to dwell on that form of the condition because many people have championed the cause, although I would like to relate that my surgery—I am sure that it is not the only one—has several sad cases of people with wet macular degeneration in one eye and dry macular degeneration in the other eye who have been told that they need to go blind before they can access treatment for the wet condition. Of course, there is the awful time bomb of the wet eye going first and those people being left with only the untreatable dry eye. It is unacceptable to withhold treatment for this preventable form of blindness.

However, I want to focus on those with dry macular degeneration. They form the majority of sufferers but do not seem to be able to grab headlines in the way that wet macular suffers have recently. They face a world of increasing sightlessness. They form the majority of victims but get the least help.

Yesterday, I addressed the annual general meeting of the Macular Disease Society club in St. Albans. It is a very active group. It produces its own leaflets and literature and meets regularly. This large and active club was formed out of desperation; it was not a mutual coming together of like-minded souls. Ken Nutty MBE, the founder of the group, was himself diagnosed with dry macular degeneration, and his woeful experience was a common one: he received little advice on what to expect, doctors were not particularly well informed about his disease, and, after a considerable wait, social services gave him a few basic aids. He graphically describes to the group—he shares his experience with many other people—his depression and frustration at his situation. Unlike many people, he decided to put his anger into action and form a mutual support group.

The St. Albans macular degeneration group was formed in 2002 out of frustration at the lack of information and support. It is a catalyst to try to change the priorities for the treatment of MD sufferers. The group receives inquiries from fellow sufferers across the UK who are anxious to get information and advice. I brought letters with me from people in Andover and other areas of the country who do not have a support society such as the one that Ken has managed to offer in St. Albans. Those sufferers are anxious to get information but do not know where to turn.

In 2004, Mr. Nutty, the leader of the group, started lobbying the Government for a reduction in the cost of closed circuit television readers, and improved accessibility to them. They are not considered a luxury by the many people who suffer from dry macular degeneration. They are considered an aid that makes their life bearable and, indeed, enjoyable and pleasurable again. The rationale is that the readers restore the quality of life for macular degeneration patients, but they cost the individual more than £2,000 if they have to buy them.

Mr. Nutty is a delightful, feisty, articulate 90-year-old. I am sorry to say that yesterday was his last meeting. His sight has become so poor and his health so frail that he is now emigrating to Canada to live with his son for support. His legacy is the fact that he has galvanised many people into taking action to lobby on behalf of fellow sufferers. He is annoyed at what he believes is the complacency of this Government over their plight, and I agree with him.

I made notes of a conversation that I had with Mr. Nutty. His biggest gripe is that macular degeneration sufferers are provided with only a piece of hand-held magnifying glass-style equipment. I urge Ministers, if they have not used one, to try doing so. The device gives a very small field of vision that makes reading less of a pleasure, if not an impossibility, for many people. Ken feels that if sufferers were treated in the same way as those who have hearing problems or who need hip replacements, they would have better access to the best services.

Wet and dry sufferers receive little assistance until they are almost blind. They are then provided with simple hand-held magnifiers, and sometimes a piece of equipment akin to a pair of field glasses. Those things often break and are often useless. Ken and other sufferers think that CCTV-style cameras are needed. They help them to live more independent lives. Indeed, if Ken lived in France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Canada or one of many other countries, two thirds of the cost of such a unit—a black-and-white unit—would be paid for by the Government.

Ken has managed to campaign successfully for CCTV units to be put into libraries in Hertfordshire. Thanks to him, there are now 24 units across the constituencies of Hertfordshire MPs, including mine and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning), who has attended this debate. Ken believes that he and other sufferers require such units. He feels that macular degeneration sufferers are being discriminated against, because some of the units are no more expensive than some digital hearing aids. In fact, if there were a bulk purchase or commitment to the devices, the cost would drop.

Ken's other campaign has been to lobby the Government on the waiting times between being diagnosed and receiving assessment and support from social services. The situation was confirmed by the Macular Disease Society. In fact, a worrying case was outlined to me in the meeting yesterday. A chap who was diagnosed with macular degeneration received very little advice but was savvy enough to look up his condition on the internet. He realised that he had a brief opportunity to get laser treatment. Unfortunately, he had to sell his car to access the treatment, only to be offered a treatment slot some several months later, by which time the golden window of opportunity for treatment for wet would be missed.

The lag between diagnosis and assessment for both sorts of macular degeneration is woeful. A few years ago, some patients were waiting up to nine months to be seen by social services. Some of the waiting times have decreased, but outcomes are still patchy.

Macular degeneration should concern all of us. Hon. Members may note that I am wearing glasses today—age-related sight problems. Many of us will be grabbing them on and off as we grow older. None of us seem to think about the fact that we will be stuck with ineffective readers. As the population ages, there will be even more people suffering from macular degeneration. Ken started his club in 2002 with just 17 local members. There are now 97 on his books, and he regularly has 60-plus at his meetings, as he did yesterday.

Macular degeneration is not only a personal tragedy, but has cost implications for the health service if it is not properly managed. The Audit Commission noted that 190,000 blind and partially sighted people were admitted to hospital in 1999 as a result of falls. The cost to the NHS was estimated at £270 million. Given that huge cost, one would think that it would be vital to ensure that as much as possible is done to assist with sight, but an investigation into equipment for disabled people in England and Wales carried out by the Audit Commission in 2000 found a huge variety in provision.

The Audit Commission ordered a full review and reorganisation of community equipment services, but despite that and other calls for improvements from, among others, the Association of Directors of Social Services, evidence shows that there are still major problems with the current system. Those with sight loss face increasing difficulties gaining access to essential items of equipment, including unavailability of items due to funding restrictions, long waiting periods before items are even delivered and a lack of information and training about how to make the best use of equipment when it is eventually provided.

To establish the progress made by implementing the Audit Commission's recommendations, the Royal National Institute of Blind People carried out research in 2005 into the experiences of 500 blind and partially sighted people. The evidence from the RNIB's research shows that blind and partially sighted people are being failed by local authorities at every stage of the process, from the initial referral for assessment to the delivery of essential equipment. The research also shows that access to even the most basic items is often denied and items such as CCTV monitors or scanners, which are vital for communication, are rarely provided by local authorities. I urge the Minister to dwell on that failure and specifically to address in his reply the fact that delivering such services through social services, which are given the job of providing such equipment, may not be the best approach.

I should like the Minister to consider a working partnership with social services, as has been demonstrated in other areas, to ensure proper delivery of such services to sufferers of dry macular degeneration, rather than just hoping that local areas are doing their best. As has patently been shown, they are not doing their best. Quite often, local authorities are doing what is cheapest.

I remind the Minister of the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Witney in 2004. David Cameron asked the Secretary of State for Health:

"what representations he has received on making magnifying equipment more easily available"—[Official Report, 14 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1495W.]

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I gently say to the hon. Lady that although she is right to refer to her then hon. Friend—now right hon. Friend—the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), she should not refer to him by name.

Anne Main: I take your guidance; I am sorry, Mr. Bercow.

The brief answer to the question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney stated that there had been several representations from hon. Members and the RNIB about "the provision of closed circuit television (CCTV) readers to help visually impaired people with certain tasks", but

"The provision of CCTVs and other non-optical aids is a decision that lies with social services departments as they are considered to be aids to daily living. Being registered as visually impaired is not a pre-requisite to receiving services. Social services departments are responsible for assessing an individual's needs and for arranging services to meet those needs; this could include the provision of CCTV. However, hand-held, stand and spectacle-mounted magnifiers are easier to use, more widely available, more accessible and more cost effective."

I assert, and Mr. Nutty and his group assert, that what is really driving the lack of adequate provision of CCTV monitors, which make life so much easier for people, is the cost element, which is leading to patchy provision. The then Minister of State, Department of Health, on behalf of the Secretary of State, went on to say:

[Anne Main]

"Encouragement is being given to hospital and social service departments to work more closely together, and perhaps operate a joint budget to allow more flexibility in funding equipment, and provide a wider range of services and equipment than has hitherto been available. The overall level of funding for aids to vision will, however, rest with primary care trusts and local councils."—[Official Report, 14 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1495W-1496W.]

I should like the Minister to examine that statement, to see whether any encouragement was given and, perhaps, to give us an update on the impact of that encouragement, because I believe, as do macular degeneration sufferers, that little has changed since that answer was given.

In 2006, NHS South West managers spent nearly £400,000 on sculpture for mental health units and a further £100,000 on research into whether anybody liked it. That is an interesting use of public money. Mr. Nutty would say that better services could be provided for those who are struggling to see. Similarly, in 2003, NHS trusts all over the country introduced schemes to teach senior citizens the right way to wear slippers and now Hull is offering replacement of worn-out slippers with new, professionally fitted slippers. Hon. Members might ask how that is relevant to macular degeneration. As I said earlier, loss of sight means that many people fall and end up in hospital. Surely, giving people vision aids would be more useful than slippers. Of course, some would beg to differ. However, there is money in the system for some rather more dubious schemes that, perhaps, affect fewer people than are affected by going blind. In one of the more controversial examples, those who are troubled about losing their virginity can access a hymen-replacement repair: more than 24 of those were done in 2005-06. Those whose sex life is flagging due to age can access vacuum pump devices for erectile dysfunction—again, on the NHS.

I mentioned some of those schemes to Mr. Nutty and his group yesterday and they found them quite amusing, but they might say that although those things are not essential, they improve the quality of life. Mr. Nutty would argue that CCTV readers would improve the quality of the lives of dry macular degeneration sufferers, yet they are being denied them. Why can certain parts of the NHS give away funding to services that do not necessarily treat symptoms, although they aid or help people in their lives and relationships, while those with dry macular degeneration are given the cheapest and most accessible option?

I remind the Minister that, in 2006, the then Health Minister promised free trampolining and tango lessons for the unfit as part of the Government's attempt to tackle obesity, which costs the NHS £7 billion a year. Perhaps the Minister will say today that a small amount of that money could go to the 500,000 sufferers of dry macular degeneration. If all the other causes that I have mentioned can attract funding and high-profile support, why are my constituents and those of other hon. Members left scrabbling around with equipment that is undoubtedly inferior?

The RNIB says that blind and partially sighted people are being poorly served by the community equipment system. There are pockets of good practice—only pockets but in most areas people are being given a very limited range of items that are almost always low cost. The need for essential equipment supporting independent living, communication and mobility is not being met. The RNIB believes, as I do, that that should be addressed as a matter of urgency. The provision of the right equipment at the right time, with the right training, would contribute towards the independence and quality of life of blind and partially sighted people. Surely, that is what the other examples that I have mentioned do.

The RNIB also believes that better provision would help prevent accidents and early entry into residential care, providing cost savings. It estimates that only 8 per cent. of visually impaired people have access to a CCTV unit—it is no wonder that such units do not come down significantly in price—and a quarter of those have had to pay for the item themselves.

In his response to Mr. Nutty's campaign, the then Health Minister said:

"I have recently received many representations from people with macular degeneration...at present there is no allowance specifically for non-optical low vision aids within the money granted to NHS hospital trusts".

Yet as I said earlier, there are supposed to be talks about having some sort of joint budgeting service. Again, I press the Minister to tell me what has happened to that aim. Mr. Nutty, accompanied by the Bishop of St. Albans, met the then Health Minister in 2005 and felt that, at that meeting, they had both received assurances that things would improve. However, things have not improved.

A survey by the RNIB in 2004-05 showed that of the 2 million people with sight loss, approximately 380,000 are registered blind or partially sighted. Many of those people are living in poverty. Some 73 per cent. of older people with sight loss surveyed by the RNIB lived in poverty—in line with the Government's definition of poverty—compared with 27 per cent. of all pensioners. Sight loss has many implications.

Economic deprivation is, equally, a major factor for those of employment age due to the high levels of unemployment among people with sight loss. Three out of four blind and partially sighted people of working age are not in paid employment. Isolation and lack of mobility is a major problem, with 76 per cent. of people with sight loss saying that they get out of the house never, rarely or less than before they lost their sight. If people do not visit those people and they cannot get out, then how much more miserable is it for them to try to occupy their time by reading a novel or a newspaper through a 3 in by 2 in spyglass?

Hospitals and social services struggle most. Twenty per cent. of hospitals and social services reported that patients waited between two and six months to be assessed for optical devices. Those results show that one person in 10 waits between two and six months before being assessed, and the picture is similar for assessments regarding home adaptations and daily living aids. We are failing people with dry macular degeneration.

Ken said yesterday, as he has said on many occasions, that his main passion is that "these people"—

people who could be us—

"should not be left on their own to cope with just this hand-held magnifier."

He said that some of those people are ladies aged 80-plus who lost their loved ones in the war. Many of them have paid into the system and feel that they get very little back. He wants to know,

"who is caring about them?", and wants me to convey the anger and frustration felt by his group. He wants me to ask the Minister today to say whether there will be improvements in future.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): It is always a privilege to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow. I will not make the mistake of naming the leader of any political party—if the hon. Member for St. Albans (Anne Main) had simply said "the great leader", she would have avoided the need for Mr. Bercow to intervene.

I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing the debate. I am sure that there is tremendous consensus from all parties on the points that she has made about the impact of dry macular degeneration on the quality of people's lives. There is no doubt that we owe those who suffer from macular degeneration the best and that, too often, the system in some parts of the country does not respond to the challenges faced.

I will try to address the issues raised by the hon. Lady. My only gentle disagreement with her is that, although the Conservative party consistently talks about the importance of decentralisation and the local devolution of accountability and responsibility—both in terms of the management of public services and clinicians on the front line—Conservative Members come to the House and demand ministerial intervention from offices in Westminster and Whitehall. I gently say to her that to have that vision and view of how public services should operate nationally and then to give a slightly different impression to constituents is perhaps usual during parliamentary and constituency duties, but it is not entirely acceptable.

I accept that people such as Mr. Nutty deserve better and that they do a tremendous job in bringing together people who have similar difficulties. As well as medical intervention and the health service fulfilling its responsibilities, I believe in people who have similar challenges and conditions coming together to support one another and press public services. That is a very powerful way to achieve improvements and changes to public services. For example, you, Mr. Bercow, have been heavily involved in raising in the House the profile of the needs of disabled children and their families. As a consequence of the pressure from parents and families who are supported by parliamentarians, we have a much more progressive and advanced approach to meeting the needs of those families. The concept of mutual support and of people who use public services applying pressure to improve standards and quality is incredibly important.

The hon. Lady asked about community equipment services. Last year, we recognised that community equipment services in most parts of the country are not working well—they are not efficient and they do not give people speedy access to the equipment that they need. We believe that, if the systems that underpin the provision of community equipment are reorganised, available resources will be used more effectively and people will have speedier access to equipment. That is why we have started reforming the provision of community equipment and, in certain areas, have trialled a new model, called the retail model, which essentially attempts to simplify the whole process—from assessment to receiving community equipment. In the next few months, we hope to roll out that model throughout the country. The difficulty is that to impose a one-size-fits-all system on every local authority is simply not within our gift, so we have trialled best practice in simplifying the process—from assessment to delivering the equipment that people need. We believe that we have identified a model that does that. I would have hoped that the hon. Lady had asked the local authority—the local NHS—in her locality whether it intends to apply the principles of the retail community equipment model, so that people such as Mr. Nutty and those in a similar position with dry macular degeneration have access to the equipment that they need.

There is also a resource issue, and the hon. Lady asked all sorts of questions about the way in which NHS resources are deployed. The vast bulk of NHS resources have been deployed to create a situation in which waiting times and lists are at a record low. Some 90 per cent. of people who actually use the NHS, rather than simply reading about it, say that they have a high level of satisfaction with the service that they have received. There are more doctors and nurses than ever before. Advances have been made in the NHS, and the hon. Lady should therefore have been a little more balanced in her presentation. On her point about the use of resources, it is important to reform and reorganise the system to deal with the issue of community equipment and to make the best use of resources.

Anne Main: I accept that there must be prioritisation in the use of resources; as the Minister says, decisions have to be made. May I ask for his view on whether CCTVs should be made available?

Mr. Lewis: We cannot have the following approach to the NHS: make the money available, allow local primary care trusts to make the right commissioning decisions based on their population needs and on non-negotiable national priorities, as well as allowing them to make the decisions about the needs of their local populations, and then stand up in the House and issue diktats on certain types of equipment. Having studied the new approach to community equipment, I really believe that, if local authorities and primary care trusts in every part of the country adopted the new model, it would free up considerable resources. I assume that those resources could then be used to purchase the equipment that people require for their individual needs. I am not a clinician, and although it would make me incredibly popular to make sweeping statements that every individual should have access to a particular type of equipment, I am not sure that it is appropriate for a Minister to make those kind of commitments.

If the quality of life of someone with dry macular degeneration would be clearly and considerably enhanced and improved as a consequence of having access to a certain piece of equipment, the local NHS should do everything possible to make that equipment available. However, I do not run every local primary care trust or local authority. We have to accept that we ask people in those organisations—leaders, managers and commissioners—to make difficult decisions.

Anne Main: I would just like a little clarity. The Minister says that, if the equipment would make people's lives better, the local NHS trusts should make it available, but how does the funding work in relation to social services and providing the equipment?

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I inform the Minister that less than two and a half minutes remain.

Mr. Lewis: The issue is about assessing each individual's needs and considering what would make the most difference to enhancing that person's quality of life—in this case, a person's ability to live independently and have as full a life as possible. Obviously, if the determination is that a particular piece of equipment is required, the people making the decision have to consider the available resources and make the right decision.

Part of getting the best use of resources is having a far more joined-up approach between the local NHS and the local authority. I urge the hon. Lady to ask the local authority and the primary care trusts in her local community some hard questions not only about their processes, practices and policies as independent organisations, but about how they propose to have an integrated approach to meeting the needs of a whole range of groups—in this context, people with dry macular degeneration. She should challenge local commissioners in the local authority and primary care trust. Instead of asking Ministers in Westminster and Whitehall to issue central diktats, she should use her influence and her passion on this issue to ask fundamental questions of her local authority and primary care trust.

The hon. Lady obviously genuinely cares about the matter and has spent a lot of time with people who have articulated the difference that could be made to their quality of life. To support that, the Government have instituted a radical reform of the way in which community equipment is provided, and I hope that that will lead to change not just in a few local authorities and primary care trusts, but throughout the country. I believe that people with dry macular degeneration deserve the best possible support and the best quality of life. It is clear what we expect of local PCTs and authorities in the commissioning and provision of equipment.

Window Blinds

4 pm

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): It is good to have you in the Chair, Mr. Bercow. To save your blushes, I shall not go to the lengths that two of my colleagues went to yesterday in welcoming you to the Chair.

Today there has been an important piece of business in the House. This debate might lack the grandeur of the Budget, but in some people's eyes it is much more important. Budgets are important, but they are not a matter of life and death. This issue is a matter of life and death to some people following the debate, although others might think it trivial and see looped blind cords as just another household object that they might not even notice.

It is commonly accepted that the household is one of the most dangerous places, and is where the vast majority of accidents occur. When one thinks of household accidents, one thinks of people falling down stairs, being scalded with water or slipping in the bath, but looped blind cords are also a danger. For those who do not know what they are, and perhaps imagine them to be more grandiose than the words suggest, let me explain. They are the cords used to raise, lower or tilt window blinds, and they are usually looped. Some blinds have separate cord designs, but many people are reluctant to use them as they can lead to confusion when operating blinds. Also, separate cords can be tied into a loop, thereby causing the same danger as looped blind cords.

The real issue is not ease of use, but the threat that looped blind cords can pose to young and vulnerable people. A chilling statistic is the estimate that 20 children in the United Kingdom have lost their lives in the past 10 years because of looped blind cords. I confess that I had never considered the dangers of looped blind cords before, and I am sure that that is true of many. When I discussed the issue with my wife, she told me that when my children, who are now adults, were tiny, she tied up the blind cords because she was aware of the inherent danger that they posed. Perhaps that shows how strong a mother's instincts can be.

The issue has been forcefully highlighted in my constituency by the tragic death of two-year-old toddler Muireann McLaughlin, who died on 5 February this year when she became tangled in a window blind cord in her bedroom. The statistics show that that incident was by no means isolated. In 2004, another toddler lost his life when he became tangled in a window blind cord in Dalgety bay, in Fife, which is only 25 miles from where Muireann lost her life. Last year, a 10-year-old from Uddingston, Lanarkshire, died in the same manner. Families and communities have been rocked by those tragedies.

I pay tribute to the Alloa Advertiser newspaper, in my constituency, which is running a local campaign and has launched a petition to ban looped blind cords. The petition has more than 2,000 signatures and is growing by the hour. The other day, I read some of the comments on this issue, and saw that there is support in all parts of the UK for a ban, and even international support in the United States, Canada, Australia, France, Germany, Norway and New Zealand. Scottish councils are also signing up and supporting the campaign.

Many of us will be able to cast our minds back to when our children were young and we looked around our homes for dangers. The stairs, cooker, kettle and cleaning materials are obvious dangers to keep away from young children, but it can be only luck that incidents have been avoided by millions of families. Tragically, families such as those in my constituency have had their children taken from them far too soon. I have spoken to Muireann's grandfather, and I do not imagine that anyone can understand the hurt and devastation that the family is feeling. It must be difficult for them to come forward at this time, but they have issued a call to the industry and the Government to tackle this issue. It is sad that tragedies such as Muireann's case in Menstrie have to occur before we take up such issues and call for a ban. I hope that the Minister and the Government will listen to those calls and will give a commitment here, today, that they will begin the process of banning looped blind cords.

I am not an MP who likes to ban things just for the sake and the fun of it, and I have heard from some quarters that such a ban would be another example of the nanny state, but I cannot accept that argument, as it is surely the first duty of a Government to protect their citizens. Are we living up to that responsibility if, on average, two children a year in the UK lose their lives because of a design factor? That is an unacceptable figure, and we must do more—or, more accurately, we must do something.

We in the UK have fallen behind: both the US and Australia have banned looped blind cords, the former more than 10 years ago. A ban in this country is long overdue, and I have been pursuing Baroness Morgan, who has responsibility for the British Standards Institution, for a meeting. Unfortunately, I have yet to receive a reply from her, but I am glad that my colleague the Minister is here to respond to the debate. I firmly believe that the best way to address the issue is to create a new British standard for the blind industry that removes looped cords. However, I will stand corrected if my hon. Friend feels that there is a better way of effecting change.

I have mentioned the US, and it might be useful to give some background to what happened there in the hope that it will be replicated here. A study by the USA's Consumer Product Safety Commission estimated that the total number of window cord strangulations in the US between 1981 and 1995 was 359—nearly one child a fortnight. In 2002, the campaign group, Parents for Window Blind Safety, was set up, and it still monitors the blind market for possible dangers. It aims to educate the public, support affected families and assist in correcting manufacturing defects. A ban on looped blind cords would not be a silver bullet that would solve all the problems: we need regular monitoring of the industry to ensure that it is as safe as it can be.

No one can eliminate accidents, but we can limit the chance of them occurring. We need to remain vigilant and to strive always for safer products in all walks of life. I looked at the Parents for Window Blind Safety web page when I was writing my speech, and I was very moved by the pictures of the young children, mostly toddlers, who have lost their lives. I thought to myself, "What an absolute waste of life. What might those children have grown into if they had been given the opportunity?" Each child had their own unique story and background, but, sadly, the outcome was the same for all of them. If a ban can prevent just one such tragic incident from occurring, it will be worth while.

It is disappointing that the industry has not moved to solve the issue voluntarily, as I have no doubt that it will be aware of what its counterparts are doing in America and Australia. I hope that public awareness of the campaign will encourage the industry to consider the issue, but there will always be manufacturers who try to increase their turnover by using cheaper designs. That is why I believe that a universal UK standard is necessary for the safety of toddlers and to ensure a level playing field in the industry. Surely, there must be a safer way of raising a blind than using a looped cord, and it cannot be beyond the wit of UK design to invent a safer, but effective, method. I hope that we can demonstrate some leadership here today. Families are looking to the Minister to show the will and desire to tackle the issue. I know that Muireann's family are watching the debate right now, and I hope that what they hear meets their expectations.

On Monday morning, I met the manufacturer of the blinds that were fitted in the McLaughlins' home. I met a man who was distraught and who blamed himself in the days after the tragedy. He had questions running through his mind for weeks about whether he could have done anything to avoid the tragedy. He did not come up with any answers. This was a man who was following the acceptable standards in the UK. He cannot and should not be blamed. It is the industry as a whole and the British Standards Institution that need to address the issue. When a tragedy occurs, such as the one in Menstrie, there are always people left behind who are gripped by worry and angst. We should spare a thought for them, too.

Change would be a minimal imposition on the industry. Removing looped blind cords will make no difference to the function of the blind. The industry could easily make the transition to protect the young and vulnerable in our society. The solution must be a UK-wide ban on such cords at the point of manufacture and import into the United Kingdom. However, that will still leave millions of such cords in our homes. In a sense, they are a ticking time bomb, and, sadly, there is every chance that they could cause another death, even if we banished them here today. We need to ensure that the dangers are communicated to all corners of the UK in the hope that parents, and those caring for vulnerable people, will at least cut the blind cords now, or replace them with tension snap mechanisms. What guarantee do we have that they will do that? There is none. That is why action is required at a national level to ensure that blind manufacturers are forced to change the design.

Blind manufacturers and installers provide some guidance to point out the risks to new buyers, but is that always the case? Who can answer that question? Do parents always take notice of such guidance? Who can answer that question? Do parents always have the time or the inclination to attach hooks to keep the cords out of reach of tiny hands? We cannot rely on such flimsy guidance and hope that it will be adhered to. We need to act from the top. I have heard some people say that banning these cords will mean little as there are so many other dangers in the household. Although I agree that there are many such dangers, we need to do all that we can to limit them. Looped blind cords serve no specific purpose that cannot be designed out and changed easily into another type of mechanism, most importantly into one that is less dangerous. We need to eliminate needless dangers and to remain vigilant.

I said previously that the best way to address the issue is to create a new British standard. The BSI is renowned worldwide, and its kitemark symbol is one that carries a great deal of trust, integrity and respect in society. Its information supply and training is second to none. I have experience of working to British standards in my previous business life before I came to the House. I have no doubt that if the BSI were requested to look into blind cords, it would be thorough and professional in implementing those instructions. The BSI has thousands of certification marks that have saved lives throughout the UK. It is my hope that it will make the blind industry, which seems to have been overlooked in some instances, much safer in future.

The BSI's motto is, "Raising standards worldwide." It appears to me that standards worldwide have been raised, but that we need to match them in the UK for all our sakes and to protect families from tragedies, such as the one that occurred in Menstrie in February. I am eager to hear what the Minister has to say on the issue. I want him to be aware that there is an air of expectancy in the country about the words that he will deliver. I hope that we will not be left disappointed. I trust that he will be happy to meet me to discuss the issue at some point in the not-too-distant future.

I also want to thank Muireann's parents for their actions following their daughter's tragic death. They donated two of their daughter's heart valves for transplant, thereby ensuring that other lives will be spared even if their daughter's could not be. I am heavily involved in a campaign to increase the number of organ donors and to move towards an opt-out system. However, the McLaughlins' courage should be recognised here today.

Before I sit down, may I urge my colleagues to show their support for this cause by adding their names to my early-day motion 1115, which calls for the designing-out of looped blind cords? It currently has the support of 25 colleagues. It will be a lot easier to sign the early-day motion and support the campaign than to stand here at some point in the future, arguing for further change after yet more tragic deaths. I thank you for your patience, Mr. Bercow, and await, with anticipation, the Minister's remarks.

4.15 pm

The Minister for Science and Innovation (Ian Pearson): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow. I thank and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks) on securing this Adjournment debate on looped blind cords and on the fair and reasonable way in which he introduced his remarks. I am, of course, aware of the recent tragedy in his constituency that prompted this debate, and I am sure that all hon. Members join me in extending their deepest sympathies to the McLaughlin family, who face such a tragic loss as a result of looped blind cords. The safety of any product is paramount, especially when the consequences of inadequate safety requirements could be tragic.

My hon. Friend suggested that, in the past 10 years, up to 20 children are reported to have lost their lives in the UK as a result of incidents involving looped blind cords. The Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills does not keep records of child deaths attributable to blind cords, so I cannot confirm whether his figure is correct. However, even one death arising from such an incident must be a cause for considerable public concern.

As my hon. Friend will appreciate, I am relatively new to this subject, but before I address the regulatory position in the UK, I shall say a few words about international comparisons. He talked a great deal about the situation in the United States and Australia. As I understand it, despite heavy campaigning in the US and Australia for the banning of such products, a complete ban did not result in either country. Instead, other means of addressing the problems were found. In the US, a meeting on the subject was held between the Consumer Product Safety Commission, to which he referred, which conducted a study on window cord strangulations, and the Window Covering Safety Council, the membership of which is made up of major US manufacturers, importers and retailers of window coverings.

Following that meeting, the WCSC agreed to eliminate loops from the production of all window cords. As I understand it, the industry reacted to the campaign and moved away from using the looped cord mechanism. The US Government did not need to place a legal prohibition on such products; the CPSC has worked with US businesses to develop a voluntary standard that sets out performance requirements and includes alternative devices and test methods to address strangulation hazards associated with all types of cords on window coverings.

In Australia, the Government issued a product safety order banning the sale of hazardous looped cords to manufacturers, installers, suppliers and retailers in Western Australia and New South Wales. However, as I understand it, looped cords continue to be allowed provided that they are 1.6 m above the base of the blind when lowered or that an alternative safety mechanism is used, such as a tension device. The order also encourages suppliers and manufacturers to provide alternatives to systems that require looped cords. In that case, a hazardous cord appears to be defined as being longer than 1.6 m, and therefore potentially within the reach of children, or without a safety mechanism, if required, such as a tension device.

Both the US and Australian policies have focused on alternative mechanisms that can be used on blinds, rather than on the imposition of a complete ban on looped cord products. They have succeeded in eliminating hazardous looped blind cords using the legal structures in those countries and by working with industry.

My hon. Friend wants to know how that compares with the UK's position. The UK has responded to safety concerns associated with blind cords. As soon as it came to light, in 2004, that the safety and performance requirements of blind cords could be improved, the UK standards committee initiated work to improve them. Through the committee, we have led Europe by putting forward amendments to European standard EN 13120 that are equivalent to the safety requirements in the US standard and in the Australian product safety order. The UK has led the way on this in Europe, and other EU member states have accepted our proposed amendments to the current standard. It is expected that the revised standard will be ratified in July.

I should like to provide some details about the process, and I would be happy to meet my hon. Friend and officials to discuss the matter further. In the UK, looped blind cords are covered under the general product safety regulation, which sets out general safety principles. European standard EN 13120 is the standard that sets out the detailed safety requirements to support the GPSR. The Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform is responsible for the GPSR and has been heavily involved in the development of the standard. The Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills is responsible for sponsorship of the British Standards Institution and for standardisation policy. BSI, as the UK's national standards body, represents the UK's views in Europe.

The CEN, which is the relevant European standards organisation of which BSI is a member, developed the standard that currently sets out the performance and safety requirements for internal window blinds. The performance and safety requirements will have been set by representatives from industry, consumer groups and others with an interest at the European level. In the UK, BSI set up a committee of technical experts, industry and consumer groups and Government officials to provide the UK's input. BSI's role is to facilitate the process and feed the UK position into the European forum. BERR and its officials have been heavily involved in the process and have steered its content.

As I indicated, in 2004, as soon as it was apparent to the Government that the safety requirements of the standard could be improved, the UK committee recommended a revision to EN 13120, and the subsequent amendments to the standard have introduced stronger warning requirements concerning the risk of strangulation to children. They also set requirements for design features or accessories that allow cords to be kept out of reach of children.

Gordon Banks: I fully understand that there are facilities and mechanisms in use today that will keep cords out of the way of tiny hands, but the difficulty is that they are in some way temporary. They are not integral to the blind but fixed to a wall. Something that is screwed to the wall might be taken off when someone is decorating but not put back on when they have finished decorating, therefore raising the possibility of a looped blind cord hanging down. That would result in the blind not being installed correctly to the standard. There are inherent problems with the safety mechanisms that we have today.

Ian Pearson: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend is making. When the UK's proposed amendments were considered in Europe, they were compared with the US standard and the Australian product safety order to ensure that the European standard was as comprehensive as possible. I invite him to look at the proposed standard. It is being consulted on at present, and perhaps we can meet to discuss whether it is appropriate and proportionate.

My hon. Friend should note that the amendments to the European standard focus on the design of the product and on improving labelling on products. His contribution to the debate is important, because communicating the potential hazards of looped blind cords that are already in people's homes is important, and we have various organisations such as the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents that do just that.

We need to ensure that manufacturers are developing and introducing features that will improve the safety of the product. Additionally, amendments to the standard ensure that manufacturers label their products so that installers are aware of risks and how they may be managed. For example, as my hon. Friend said, blinds that have loop cords should not be near beds, cots or furniture, from where children may easily reach them. To the best of my understanding, the amendments are equivalent to the safety requirements in the US standard and the Australian product safety order.

As I indicated, the amended standard is expected to be ratified in July and will then be adopted in the UK towards the end of the year. The key feature of the process is that it is driven by consensus, which is important, in that it takes account of the views of all the relevant groups, including consumer safety groups.

The then Department of Trade and Industry, now BERR, as the guardian of the GPSR, considered the option of making regulations under section 11 of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 in order to improve the safety of blinds. The aim of the Act is to help to safeguard the consumer from products that do not reach a reasonable level of safety. The Act is important to all those with an interest in the safety of products that are put on to the market. It provides any Secretary of State with the power to introduce safety regulations if that is deemed necessary to protect the health and safety of consumers.

As BERR is the guardian of the GPSR and the policy on product safety, this is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform. BERR would need to consider the full impact of any proposal to put in place a national regulation, but the normal way in which such things are done is through the GPSR.

Additionally, any proposal to introduce new regulation would be subject to the provisions in directive 98/34/EC, which has put in place a process that European member states must follow so that national technical regulations do not create a barrier to trade. I am sorry to go into so much detail, but it may help to give sufficient information to those who are passionately interested in the issue, as I know people are.

Any proposed new regulation would also need to be considered in the context of whether there is a need to go further than what is provided for in the amended standard. The updated European standard is imminent, and it will support enforcement action taken under the GPSR, so there is no immediately obvious case for introducing specific regulation.

Let me reiterate that the proposed amended standard not only tightens the warning requirements but sets out requirements for safety accessories or design features so that the cords are kept out of reach of children. Therefore, if the design of the blind requires a looped operating mechanism, the revised standard requires manufacturers to introduce means of limiting risks by incorporating them into the design of the product.

[Ian Pearson]

Improved public information is, of course, extremely important. The British Blind and Shutter Association, whose members have been part of the process to revise the standard, have been actively promoting the safety of blinds within the UK and will continue to do so. Information has been featured in direct communications to members and in articles in trade journals and general journals such as Household, Home Parent and Parent and Child, but I am sure that there is more that we can do by working with the industry.

In conclusion, I thank my hon. Friend for raising this important issue. It is right that we communicate the potential dangers of looped blind cord mechanisms. I am happy to meet him in conjunction with officials. I hope that he is reassured that the regulations that will be introduced imminently will be a significant improvement, but of course he and I will want to review them to be absolutely satisfied of that fact.

Trunk Roads (Norfolk)

4.30 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow.

The county of Norfolk has seen substantial economic success over the past decade or so. It has also seen significant population growth and growth in the amount of vehicles driving on its roads. I will return to that in a moment, because it is particularly relevant in respect of the A47, which is Norfolk's key east-west trunk road.

Only 25 per cent. of the A47 is dualled and much of its dualling dates back to the 1970s. For example, the King's Lynn southern bypass, the Swaffham bypass and the Dereham bypass were all built in the 1970s. We are talking about roads that were built nearly 30 years ago. Since then, we have seen the opening of the Norwich ring road, which links with an important part of the A47. Under the last Conservative Administration, the important Tilney-Wisbech stretch of the A47, which is dual carriageway, was opened. More recently, the Thorney bypass was opened. However, roughly 75 per cent. of the A47 is still single carriageway.

I should like to mention the sheer folly of building new bypasses of single carriageway standard, as happened at Narborough and Wisbech. More recently, under this Administration, we saw the absurdity of building the new Hardwick flyover to single carriageway standard.

The impact of busy single carriageway traffic rumbling through villages is significant. Let us consider some of the villages in my constituency on the route of the A47. For example, the communities of Middleton, East Winch and West Bilney are totally cut in half. Children going to school have to cross that road every day, and people going to shops and pubs face exactly the same challenge.

There is no question but that single carriageway roads are substantially more dangerous than dual carriageway roads. On Monday, a lorry turned over on the Acle straight. On Friday last week, there was a fatality on the A47 at Narborough, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Christopher Fraser) and that road was closed for a substantial period. Of course, when busy single carriageway roads are closed, there have to be diversions. Such diversions are time-consuming and put a huge amount of strain and pressure on local villages. Often, the diversion routes are totally unsuitable. We are talking about some 23,000 vehicles a day being pushed off a busy trunk road on to minor roads.

Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): The accident in my constituency, which my hon. Friend described, illustrated a wider point that we need to deal with in Norfolk. Our trunk roads are unfit and unsafe for the traffic that they carry in the 21st century. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is about time that the Government woke up to the fact that, if Norfolk is going to realise its true economic potential, they must recognise that those roads are of national, not just regional, importance and that proper upgrading and proper funding for them should come from central Government?

Mr. Bellingham: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I will deal with that point in a moment. The Government are forcing ever-larger growth figures for housing on Norfolk, yet they are not supplying the infrastructure that is vital for those growth figures.

I should like to quote Adrian Gunson, the Norfolk county council cabinet member for planning and transportation, who commented last week on the problems and challenges arising due to single carriageway stretches of the A47 carrying large amounts of traffic, and on the cost to the local economy of accidents that happen on those stretches of road:

"Quite apart from the loss of life and limb in accidents, any sort of incident in these single carriageway stretches of the A47 has a serious effect on travellers, businesses and surrounding communities. This is happening month after month, year after year. The cost is probably incalculable, yet many of these accidents would not have happened if the road had been dualled."

That sums it up.

I should like to deal with the growth figures for Norfolk, in respect of which one should not miss out Cambridgeshire, because the A47 goes through a substantial part of Cambridgeshire as well. Looking at the greater Norwich area, which includes Norwich city council, Broadland district council and South Norfolk district council, the figure for housing increases between 2006 and 2026 is 40,000 dwellings, and some 35,000 more jobs are anticipated. That is a huge number of extra people along an important part of a vital trunk road.

Recently, the go-ahead was given for the construction of Yarmouth's east port and outer harbour. That will lead to a substantial amount of extra freight traffic coming on to the A47. In fact, there will be a significant number of extra lorry movements, as freight traffic is concentrated on the new east port at Yarmouth, away from some of the other east coast ports in East Anglia.

The housing requirement for Fenland district council in Cambridgeshire between 2001 and 2024 is another 12,250 homes, with the market town of Wisbech expanding by more than 4,000. In Breckland, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson), although a lot of the growth will be concentrated along the A11 corridor, there will be substantial growth in Dereham, Swaffham and Narborough. Again, a lot of extra pressure will be put on the A47.

In my constituency, the housing requirement increase for the borough council of King's Lynn and West Norfolk between 2001 and 2021 is 12,000 new homes, increasing to 14,400 by 2026. King's Lynn will be named as a regional transport node. King's Lynn is, as the Minister will know, a key centre for development and change. Furthermore, the council has submitted a bid for King's Lynn to become a new growth point. As the Minister will also be aware, we have a major brownfield site scheme, encompassing quite a lot of the old industrial area of South Lynn, which is known as the Nar Ouse millennium community housing project. The Minister will know that a development cap of 450 units has been imposed on that project by the Highways Agency, even though its total potential is 874 housing units. The agency needs to be satisfied that there will be traffic improvements before lifting the cap. Of course, the A47 is vital to that project, because the community is just on the edge of the A47 South Lynn bypass.

We are seeing already a huge amount of overload on single carriageway stretches of the A47. I have done some research into figures on vehicle movements on some of those stretches. Along the Guyhirn to Wisbech B198 stretch of the A47 in Cambridgeshire, there are more than 24,000 daily vehicle movements. I understand that the normal threshold figure for the Government to decide that a dual carriageway should be built is 11,000 vehicles, although I am sure that the Minister will correct me if I am wrong. More than 20,000 vehicles a day travel along many stretches of the A47. We need serious action on that stretch of road, the whole way from the A1, west of Peterborough, to Great Yarmouth.

I want to touch on the discussion, which has been somewhat vexed of late, about the trans-European network. The A47 from Yarmouth through to the A1 at Peterborough is part of a strategic trans-European network—the TEN—that links various European cities. However, within the TEN designation, there are also priorities axes that are more likely to receive European TEN-T funding. The A47 is not currently regarded as a priority axis.

I wrote to the Minister a while back to ask why the A47 was not a priority axis and, in particular, why it had not been made a priority axis in the light of the go-ahead for the Yarmouth outer harbour and the figures for extra housing and development that the Government have imposed on Norfolk. The Minister wrote back on 7 February, saying:

"I can confirm that the A47 between Great Yarmouth and the A1 near Peterborough remains part of the Trans-European Network (TEN-T) and this status has not been amended".

However, he did not explain why it is not a priority axis. Unless it is a priority axis, it will not attract extra funding from Europe or, possibly, even from the Government. Will he therefore answer that question today? All MPs with Norfolk constituencies regard it as an incredibly important matter.

We need from the Minister and the Government a firm commitment to dual the entire length of the road. We already have some good bypasses that are dual carriageways. If anyone goes along those stretches of dual carriageway, they will see for themselves how much safer they are, but then they will hit a bottleneck of single carriageway. We therefore need a firm commitment from the Minister.

Without making a key list of priorities, I shall note the really bad parts of the road. The Acle straight is very bad. The Blofield to North Burlingham stretch is very bad. The Middleton, East Winch and West Bilney stretch in my constituency is very bad. The North Tuddenham and eastern stretch to the west of Norwich is particularly bad. The Narborough bypass, where the accident that I mentioned took place last Friday, was absurdly and foolishly built as a single carriageway. It is a fast, new and wide stretch of road, but it is a single carriageway, so given the volume of traffic, it is a very dangerous stretch of road. The Great Yarmouth third river crossing was a priority for improvement to dual carriageway standard, as was the A47 going west of Peterborough through to the A1. The A47 is Norfolk's key east-west axis, and we really want action on it—not promises or fine words, but a commitment to action.

I shall very briefly touch on the other roads that concern my constituents. Although they are perhaps not as important, they are nevertheless vital to the economic well-being of west Norfolk and Norfolk as a whole. First, the A11 is the key link from the south and from the motorway network to Norwich. Over the years, all Members with Norfolk constituencies have campaigned hard to secure improvements to the A11, and we have, I am pleased to say, more or less succeeded. However, one stretch remains a problem—from Barton Mills to Thetford. Will the Minister tell us today when that stretch of that vital trunk road will be dualled?

Secondly, the A10 is the important link from King's Lynn and West Norfolk, going south to Cambridge and the M11. The road was de-trunked about five or six years ago and there are no dual carriageway sections on it whatsoever. Again, we have seen the folly of various bypasses being built on the A10—for example, around Downham Market and around Ely—as single carriageway roads. Goodness, how much easier and more economic it would have been to put in another carriageway at the time, rather than later.

The A10, because it is de-trunked, is the county council's responsibility, and on a part of the road in my constituency, going through West Winch and Setchey, two villages have been completely cut in half. It is now a priority for the county council's road building programme, but because the road does not have regional priority, there is little chance of it being built in the near future. Will the Minister tell us today why that regional priority has a low designation? Can he do anything about it? Can he speak to the relevant people in those regional bodies to ensure that the A10—in particular, that bypass—is given more priority?

Thirdly, the A17, which is the vital link road from King's Lynn and West Norfolk going north, was similarly de-trunked about five or six years ago.

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I counsel the hon. Gentleman not to refer to, still less to dilate upon, roads that have been de-trunked, for which the Government do not have any responsibility. I also very gently point out to him that I feel sure that he is nearing the conclusion of his speech, because he awaits with eager anticipation that of his hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson).

Mr. Bellingham: Thank you, Mr. Bercow, for that gentle reminder. I am bringing my remarks to a conclusion.

It is important to mention that we are trying to get the de-trunked roads re-trunked, and I should like the Minister to tell us the chances of him using his good offices to ensure that we have extra dual carriageways on the two roads that are so important to my constituency and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Norfolk and for South-West Norfolk.

In conclusion, Norfolk is a county with a very important future. It has a great economic future, but it needs the infrastructure to service that extra growth and to guarantee and secure those jobs. On the one hand, a Minister says that Norfolk must grow and meet those housing targets, but on the other, other Departments say, "All your pleas for better infrastructure will not actually be met or fulfilled." I therefore look to the Minister this afternoon to give us some guarantees and to confirm that there really will be progress.

4.45 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): It is a great pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Bercow. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) on obtaining the debate. I thank him for allowing me a brief opportunity to speak, and the Minister, too, for his generosity.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, a sizeable part of the A47 runs through my constituency, and only part of it is dualled. I have been campaigning on the issue since 1997. I am a member of the A47 alliance, which brings together many interested groups, and I help to represent all the MPs on it. The A47 is a crucial link road between the east midlands and Great Yarmouth, but there are frequent serious accidents, and when they occur, they not only completely block the A47, but there are diversions around the whole of Norfolk. It is almost like going back to mediaeval times.

The Government were mistaken when they decided to downgrade the status of the A47, alongside that of many other roads, from a strategic route of national importance. It was done several years ago, and the French, the Germans and the Dutch would never have made such a mistake on such an important road. As a consequence of that decision, as my hon. Friend touched upon, effectively, the European Union also downgraded the road's status as a trans-European network. Our friend, Mr. Robert Sturdy, an MEP for the eastern region, obtained that information from the EU.

The Government say that it is no good lobbying Ministers about the future of the A47, because decisions and priorities are at a regional transport board level. However, the conclusion of everybody belonging to the A47 alliance is that, sadly, at that regional level, every area is set against another area, and they all compete for a limited amount of money. That is not satisfactory.

The A47 alliance recently commissioned studies from three district councils—Broadland, Fenland and Breckland district councils—and King's Lynn and West Norfolk borough council, in my hon. Friend's constituency. The study was entitled, "The Potential Implications of Proposed Growth on the A47". Based on the Government's figures, the report shows that the Government's and the eastern region's housing targets for those councils and Norwich will make the present problems on the A47 much worse, "and indeed in some instances the housing targets will not be achieved unless the A47 is improved."

When the outer harbour at Great Yarmouth is completed, as my hon. Friend said, there will be even more traffic congestion.

Finally, the responsibility rests at ministerial level. That is not just my view, but the view of local businesses and local authorities. I urge the Minister to consider reinstating the A47 as a strategic route of national importance, because without that measure, we will continue to have a rather poor debate.

4.49 pm

Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Bercow, I shall make one very quick point.

The Minister is fully aware that Norfolk is the only county in England that does not have a dual carriageway network linking it to the national trunk road network. As such, its road networkis not fit for purpose or for the current traffic on it. I hope that the Minister will address my earlier point about Norfolk's potential economic growth being stifled by the fact that it does not have the roads infrastructure that it should. Previous Ministers doing his job have considered the issue and come out with platitudes but not a great deal of action, so I hope that he will not use his response to suggest that the issue is of regional importance. As my hon. Friends the Members for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) and for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) said, the roads infrastructure in Norfolk is clearly of national importance and needs national Government support, rather than—dare I say it to the Minister, who is a decent man?—fobbing off to some regional prioritisation for which nobody will take responsibility.

4.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tom Harris): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) on securing the debate and commend the comments made by his colleagues. I understand the importance of the subject, as it is a common concern among Members on both sides of the House when the pot for carrying out works to strategic roads in an area is necessarily limited and tensions obviously emerge between the various stakeholders in each region. I want to say a little more on that later.

I will address some of the specific comments made by the hon. Gentleman. He asked when the last part of the A11 was due to be dualled. It has been scheduled for dualling in the period between 2009-10 and 2015-16, which is a long period and I understand his impatience in that regard. He also raised a point that has been raised with me before by Robert Sturdy MEP on why the A47 is part of the trans-European network but not designated as a road of national importance. Four criteria must be met before a road can be designated as a national route, one of which is that it must be part of the trans-European network. The three additional criteria are that flows should be greater than 60,000 vehicles a day, that heavy goods vehicles should comprise more than 15 per cent. of the total and that any such routes should link two of 20 major cities in England. The A47 does not meet those four criteria.

I understand the argument that the hon. Gentleman made. He will not be surprised to note that, from a number of discussions with colleagues on both sides of the House, the obvious solution seems to be to change the designation of a particular route from a road of regional importance to one of national importance, thereby, it is assumed, generating an unspecified and presumably limitless amount of cash from a source that has previously been unidentified. Were that course to be pursued, the money that would have to be used for any changes to those roads would not simply be additional to what has already been given in the regional funding allocation, but would have to be top-sliced from the regional funding allocation, so we would be back to exactly where we began. The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) referred to the regional transport boards as comprising stakeholders who basically fight for funds for their own areas. We would end up in exactly the same situation, but with a smaller pot of money to argue over. The solution in this case is not as simple and straightforward as the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk suggests.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about vehicle flows on the A47 with regard to the criteria for dualling. He suggested that a single carriageway carrying 11,000 vehicles would automatically qualify to be upgraded to a dual carriageway. My understanding is that 11,000 is the figure at which the Highways Agency will begin to look at a road to see whether dualling would represent value for money, rather than a definite criterion. He raised a number of issues, so if I cannot answer them all in the short time left, I will of course write to him to clarify those matters.

The economic performance of the east of England depends, as has been said, on good connections at national and international levels. We work closely with regional partners to deliver the transport infrastructure that the region deserves and requires. Norfolk, by virtue of its location, is sometimes perceived as on the sidelines, especially by those living there. However, in recent years there have been some additions to the strategic transport infrastructure, which have improved accessibility to the rest of the country.

Norfolk is served by six major roads from the west and south—the A47, A11 and A12, and the A10, A17 and A140, which are the responsibility of Norfolk county council. In recent years, there have been several improvements to those roads, such as the dualling of the Attleborough bypass, which removed a major congestion point on the A11 and significantly reduced delays along the route, and the Hardwick flyover on the A47 in the hon Gentleman's constituency.

A number of local transport schemes in Norfolk have also contributed to improved access to the wider strategic network and, therefore, to connections with the rest of the country. However, it is not only within Norfolk that we need to look for improvements. Improvements outside the county can benefit accessibility to it. We have completed the Thorney bypass in Peterborough on the A47, which had been promised by successive Governments for more than 60 years.

Future provision of additional transport infrastructure will be met through our goals of delivering sustainable growth and economic prosperity throughout the country. The agenda for that growth in the east of England is being set by the emerging regional spatial strategy, or east of England plan. Underpinning that is the regional transport strategy, which has an overall vision to deliver the spatial strategy. That provides a regional framework for delivery of transport investment and policy priorities focused on two levels: first, encouraging sustainable transport solutions for the key growth centres of the region; and secondly, emphasising the need to improve the strategic and regional road networks by providing journey reliability through tackling congestion and improving safety and efficiency.

In the east of England plan, the Norwich area has been identified as a transport investment priority. As it is a key centre for development and change, I welcome the approach by the three local planning authorities in joining forces to form the Greater Norwich development partnership, with the aim of delivering a joint core strategy for their local development framework. From a transport perspective, that will help to provide an integrated approach to identifying transport solutions to the delivery of that growth.

I will move on as quickly as I can to the infrastructure that links the urban areas. The regional transport strategy has identified key elements of infrastructure requirement, and I am pleased that the region has prioritised the funding of those schemes through the regional funding allocations. I am talking, of course, about the dualling of the A47 between Blofield and North Burlingham and of the A11 between Mildenhall and Thetford. Both are subject to statutory procedures but could be delivered between 2009-10 and 2015-16. I am delighted that after many years of Government investment, the longer-term strategy of completing the dualling of the A11, linking the north of the region with the motorway system and the midlands via the A14, is finally in sight.

The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues have campaigned long and hard for further dualling of the A47, and I pay tribute to the efforts that they have made on behalf of their constituents. Although that is commendable, I hope that they will consider their aspiration in the context of the related housing and economic development programmes identified in the east of England plan. Transport should be seen not in isolation, but as part of the regional strategic decision-making process. That is why there is a regional transport strategy and why, apart from the A47 Blofield to North Burlingham scheme, the strategy has not identified the A47 outside the Norwich area as a priority for further study. That position is in line with the recommendations made through the Norwich to Peterborough multi-modal study a few years ago.

The regional funding allocations provide the means for delivering the transport priorities of the east of England plan, and there will be an opportunity to reconsider regional priorities again this summer as part of a review of the regional funding allocations that the Department for Transport will be conducting. I welcome the recent announcement by the East of England Development Agency to commission a study to consider how transport can unlock the economic growth potential of the region.

As I am running out of time, I suggest that the refreshing of the regional funding allocation might be the opportunity for hon. Members to lobby the regional transport board in their area to try to persuade their colleagues there that priorities should be re-ordered to give the A47 the attention that it has not had hitherto.

Question put and agreed to.

Older People's Rights (Health Care)

[Relevant documents: Eighteenth Report from the Joint Committee on Human Rights Session 2006-07 HC 378 and the Government's Response Session 2007-08 HC 72]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Siobhain McDonagh.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): As Chair of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, I am grateful to have the opportunity to introduce the debate on our report on older people in health care.

It is sometimes argued—by politicians who should know better, and by the tabloid press—that human rights exist only to protect unpopular minority groups in society such as criminals, suspected terrorists and asylum seekers. Human rights, they proclaim, are nothing to do with ordinary people, but that argument is a travesty of the truth.

Human rights apply to us all. They are not just for those people on the fringes of society for whom public sympathy is low or non-existent. Vulnerable people in the mainstream are in real need of the protection of human rights law. For example, older people in hospitals and residential care homes, the subject of our report, need such protection.

There is a growing recognition among pensioners that human rights are vital to their well-being. That explains the enormous outcry over the consequences of the YL case, to which I shall refer later, as its outcome has deprived older people of protection in private and voluntary-sector care homes. My Committee's work rightly embraces the universality of human rights by examining and reporting on popular and unpopular causes alike. To illustrate that universality of human rights, we could not have chosen a better example than the one that we are debating this afternoon.

The numbers of older people—inevitably the main users of the NHS—are growing. Some 80 per cent. of NHS resources and 80 per cent. of staff time are devoted to the over-65s. Two thirds of general and acute hospital beds are occupied by people aged 65 and over but, as the British Institute of Human Rights has made clear, the human rights of older people are particularly invisible in society. So we decided to bring the human rights of older people in health care into the political spotlight and, by illuminating the respect—or lack of it—for those rights, to make their cause visible to all. Victimisation or neglect of older people in health care raises any number of serious human rights issues.

We heard about, and saw, a lot of good practice, and our visit to Edgware hospital in my constituency is an example of that. In care homes, we met staff with low status and poor pay who were really committed to looking after the people in their charge. However, although 79 per cent. of care homes meet the minimum standards, that means that 21 per cent. do not.

Depressingly, but not surprisingly, we received an overwhelming volume of evidence about the problems that exist from staff working for the various inspectorates, service providers and non-governmental organisations. We were told about malnutrition and dehydration; abuse and rough treatment; lack of privacy in mixed sex wards; lack of dignity and respect for confidentiality; neglect, carelessness and poor hygiene; inappropriate medication and use of physical restraint; inadequate assessment of a person's needs; too hasty a discharge from hospital; bullying, patronising and infantilising attitudes towards older people; age discrimination; communication difficulties; fear of making complaints, and eviction from care homes. All those things are human rights issues that can infringe the European convention on human rights and the Human Rights Act 1998.

Abuse of the elderly can be psychological, physical, financial or sexual. According to Age Concern, half a million people in the UK suffer abuse. Some 23 per cent. of reports to Action on Elder Abuse's helpline relate to abuse in care homes, and 5 per cent. to abuse in hospitals. In our view, elder abuse is a serious and severe human rights issue. It is perpetrated on vulnerable older people who often depend for their care on the very people who abuse them.

Elder abuse is not just a betrayal of trust—it can also amount to a criminal offence. We heard of an 80-year-old lady who was sexually assaulted, yet no action was taken. Criminality is downgraded by being classed as abuse. We also identified that as a problem in our recent report on the human rights of adults with learning disabilities. If a person is the victim of a serious crime, that crime should be treated as such and not trivialised because of the vulnerability of the victim.

I turn now to neglect and carelessness. The Committee heard examples of death arising from poor hygiene, and about problems with personal care, such as people being left in their own waste. We heard of one patient who asked for a urine bottle for one and a half hours, only for his relatives to be told, "It doesn't matter if he wets the bed, we'll change the sheets." Where is the dignity there?

Patients were moved for non-clinical reasons, sometimes at night. Older people's spectacles, false teeth or hearing aids were thoughtlessly left out of their reach by staff. Patients were left for hours in reception without food or drink as they waited to be taken home or to another hospital. At Edgware hospital, we met an old lady and her daughter-in-law. The old lady had been discharged there from Barnet hospital, in whose discharge lounge she had been left for most of the day—in her night clothes, with her belongings in her lap in a clear plastic bag but without refreshment.

Medical problems are not addressed until they become critical. We were told of an 89-year-old who was admitted to hospital from her care home with pressure sores and dehydration, because the care home said that it was "not our job" to deal with such matters.

A number of witnesses raised concerns about malnutrition and dehydration. In 2006, the Healthcare Commission found that 20 per cent. of adult in-patients needed help with their meals, but that nearly 40 per cent. of those never, or only sometimes, received help. That led to uneaten meals being taken away from patients who needed help to eat them. In one case, that happened because it was not clear whether it was the job of the nurse or the care assistant to help.

However, we heard examples of good practice too, such as the use of red trays for patients who need assistance. I recently heard about a volunteer scheme at the Royal Free hospital, where volunteers help with what can be a time intensive and difficult job.

The Committee was told about the inappropriate use of medication, especially in care homes. Neuroleptic sedatives were used to keep difficult patients with dementia quiet, even though those drugs are not licensed for that purpose. We heard about a general practitioner who, without first examining her, prescribed sleeping pills to a care home resident with mild dementia to prevent her from disturbing staff at night.

The lack of privacy, dignity and confidentiality is a serious problem that has a significant detrimental impact on older people in health care. A number of witnesses spoke about mixed-sex wards. Not all of them opposed the continued use of such wards, but everyone raised serious concerns about privacy. Witnesses complained about sensitive medical advice being given to a patient on the ward within earshot of other patients, and about staff having conversations among themselves while attending to patients' intimate care needs—in other words, just talking over the people in their charge.

The delayed discharge regulations were mentioned by a number of witnesses. In principle, it is important to ensure that patients do not stay longer in hospital than necessary. However, 16 per cent. of over-75s are readmitted within 28 days, compared with only 10 per cent. of those aged 16 to 75, which prompts the question about whether decisions to discharge are made prematurely. In one case, the wife of a patient died: his son wanted to attend his mother's funeral, but the hospital decided to discharge his father on the same day.

Moving into care can be a life-changing event for many old people. They may have lived in their own home, with or without social services support, up to their hospital admission. Changing from an independent environment to one of dependency can be unsettling and traumatic. We were told that, in practice, older people have little or no choice on discharge. They are put into placements that do not meet their needs, or where adequate care is not in place. They are sometimes discharged to care homes instead of their own home, where they would be able to live with appropriate support. Other elderly people are discharged into care, miles from friends or family.

We were told that the Department of Health guidance that says that no one should be discharged direct from an acute hospital bed to a care home was routinely ignored. We recommended that the delayed discharge regulations should be amended to allow for more flexibility in applying the time period within which patients must be discharged. We also called for guidance to be given to hospitals and local authorities to help them respect the rights of patients under article 8 of the European convention on human rights.

The Government set out their view of how the regulations could and should work to safeguard respect for patients' rights. The Minister expressed surprise at the evidence that we received showing that the regulations were not working well in practice. The Government need to do more to show that the delayed discharge regulations work as well in practice as the Department thinks that they work in theory. We have reported that, in practice, the regulations can compromise the human rights of older people in the ways that I have described.

The Government's response so far has been complacent. I hope that the Minister will reassure us today by saying that he will look at how the regulations are working in practice and will reconsider issuing guidance to ensure that patients' rights are respected when they are discharged.

So why do these problems happen? There is a real power imbalance: on one hand, we have frail, sick, elderly, vulnerable people and, on the other, a big and unresponsive bureaucracy. Both patients and providers have an extremely low awareness of a patient's rights. It is not just a matter of providing a proper, professional service for the patient; it is also the patient's enforceable human right to receive such a service.

Older people can be very stoical, and they are often reluctant to make a fuss and complain. They may say, "I am old, what can I expect? I am grateful for what they are doing." Such expressions exemplify their approach to life. Low expectations are, in effect, internalised ageism. They are compounded by the fact that some of the most elderly people remember the time before the NHS was founded, when there was no affordable medical care.

Human rights are seen as a matter only for a health trust's legal department. They are a regulatory burden: they require boxes to be ticked yet have nothing to do with the reform of service delivery. The failure to protect and respect the human rights of older people in health care is a deep-rooted cultural problem in the system.

We also received evidence of both direct and indirect discrimination on the grounds of age. Direct discrimination is less common than in the past, but it has not vanished. Age Concern gave us some examples, among them the fact that invitations to breast screening stop for women over 70. In addition, doctors are less likely to refer angina sufferers to see a specialist or to have tests if they are over 65.

The Committee heard about one GP being called too late to see a care home resident whose health had deteriorated suddenly. Earlier access to a GP would not have been denied to a younger, non-dependent person, as that person would be able to arrange an appointment at an earlier and personally convenient time.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I endorse the concerns that the hon. Gentleman has expressed about the second two cases. I think that he will remember that we made a recommendation about breast screening age. When one is dealing with a screening procedure for a defined population, it can be legitimate to identify those people for whom routine calls for screening will not be cost effective. The people I am talking about are the ones who are still able to opt into the screening for themselves, in a cost-effective way. I know that the hon. Gentleman understands that there is an important distinction to be made between the first of the examples that he gave and the other two, which are not acceptable.

Mr. Dismore: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, and I think that that came out in the evidence.

Returning to the point, more subtle forms of discrimination are still endemic. The NHS's national director for older people's services told us that there are still "deep-rooted, negative attitudes and behaviour towards older people" in the NHS. Examples include making decisions, on whether to refer or to treat people on the basis of those "deep-seated underlying attitudes and beliefs about older people."

For example, elderly people are less likely to be offered "talking therapy" for mental health problems. Financial arrangements can also discriminate against older people. We were told that local authorities frequently have lower budgets for their teams dealing with older people than for those dealing with younger people.

We are not convinced that the existing legislation does enough to protect and promote the rights of older people in health care. In addition to our recommendations relating to the Human Rights Act 1998, which I will come on to shortly, we made two recommendations to address that problem. We called for a positive duty to be placed on the providers of health and residential care to promote equality for older people. We also recommended that the current prohibition on age discrimination in the workplace should be extended to the provision of goods, facilities and services so that it would include health care, among other things. The Government told us that they would consider the suggestion in the context of the review of discrimination law. Perhaps the Minister can tell us what his view is, and also say what progress is being made.

What do human rights offer beyond what should be good practice, common sense, and good old fashioned manners? That was considered by one of the Lords on our Committee when we started looking at the issue. The NHS is good at curing, but what about caring in the wider sense of the word? Human rights are based on dignity, respect, equality and fairness. We can all agree that those concepts are particularly relevant to vulnerable groups, such as older people in health care. The Human Rights Act is best seen as a tool that can and should be used in law, policy and practice to ensure that those social justice goals are achieved. It is a lever to help drive up improvements in service. It is not merely that there a duty on the NHS and its staff to provide services properly; the patient has an enforceable right to receive such services, too. The Human Rights Act can help put patients, and not finance systems or staff, at the heart of the NHS.

The organisation Action on Elder Abuse told us:

"Debates in both the health and social care sector have ignored the Human Rights Act and have instead been focused upon costs, rather than quality of care provision. We are addressing a 'mass production' approach toward older people, rather than a 'quality approach'".

By giving legal force to concepts such as dignity, respect, equality and fairness, the Human Rights Act empowers patients and carers to demand better quality treatment. Patients in vulnerable circumstances can be powerless in the face of unresponsive systems. The Act also empowers individual members of staff and their teams to improve the ways in which they work. The Royal College of Nursing told us that human rights

"legitimise speaking out when things are not right."

The human rights legislation gives nurses and care workers ammunition to pressurise management to change bad practice or improve resources because the rights of their patients are being infringed. Of course, good quality patient-focused treatment is to be found in parts of the NHS, but best practice is not universal throughout the service. The Human Rights Act provides a framework to encourage best practice in health care and, because it has the force of law, it also acts as a backstop to ensure that a positive approach to respecting the human rights of patients becomes the norm.

We have all seen the signs that say, "Our staff are entitled to be treated with dignity and respect," or "We will prosecute those who assault or abuse our staff." Where are the ones that say, "You, the patient and the relatives, are entitled to dignity and respect. We will take action against those who assault or abuse you"? I have yet to see them myself.

In practice, it is important to look at how the Human Rights Act can work. The British Institute of Human Rights, with the Department of Health and five NHS trusts, has completed a pilot programme to demonstrate how a human rights approach can be mainstreamed in the NHS. For example, upholding human rights is one of the strategic objectives of the Mersey Care NHS Trust, which is participating in the pilot, and there is board-level leadership on the issue. We were told:

"People have traditionally had things done to them rather than being actively involved. Now that service users and carers are involved...they say it makes a difference for them, they feel valued, they have interesting things to do."

Users and carers also say that involvement makes a difference to staff attitudes, clinical practice and the kinds of services that are provided.

The pilot programme provides welcome evidence of the kind of institutional respect for human rights for which we have long been calling. It integrates not just the elderly, but other vulnerable people, such as adults with learning disabilities and those at risk of discrimination on the grounds of race and gender. However, such practice is the exception rather than the rule. In 2003, the Audit Commission found that 60 per cent. of health bodies had not yet adopted a strategy for human rights from the Human Rights Act. We have seen no evidence that the position has improved. Will my hon. Friend the Minister bring us up to date on the BIHR pilot? When does he expect to evaluate its impact? We would certainly like to see the human rights approach piloted by that project implemented across the health care sector. We hope that the Minister supports that, and will explain how it is going to be developed.

The Human Rights Act provides a legal underpinning for dignity, respect, equality and fairness in health care and elsewhere. Respecting human rights is not a question of take-it-or-leave-it best practice; it is a legal duty on public bodies. Public bodies have a positive duty to take active steps to protect and respect the human rights of the people with whom they deal. In our view, an understanding of that legal obligation in the public sector is very limited. As a result, there is infrequent compliance. We call for the positive duty that is implicit in the Human Rights Act to be spelled out explicitly in primary legislation. That could kick-start the institutional changes that are needed in public authorities to put the human rights of their users at the centre of their work. The Government's response to that recommendation missed the point entirely. It merely referred to the terms of the Human Rights Act and the role of the Equality and Human Rights Commission in encouraging public bodies to comply. Our argument is that the existence of that positive duty is not contained in the Act, so understanding of it and compliance are poor. Will my hon. Friend the Minister explain to the House why the positive duty should not be spelled out explicitly in primary legislation? If not, how does he intend to ensure that the NHS bodies act on that duty?

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the Government had a chance to do just that recently when we looked at the matter in detail in the Health and Social Care Bill?

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman is right, and I proposed amendments to that effect, which I might mention in a few moments.

The health and social care inspectorate—currently the Healthcare Commission— and the Commission for Social Care Inspection are important in ensuring that health care providers respect and promote human rights. We were critical of the Healthcare Commission for regarding the Human Rights Act as just one of a large number of regulations to which it is subject. The Human Rights Act is fundamental to the work of the commission, and should be used explicitly in its regulatory work. The Government response pointed to a recent report by the commission, "Caring for dignity", which included the commitment to ensure that dignity and human rights are the underlying principles that inform the work undertaken by the commission.

Things have moved on since our report, and the Bill to merge the inspectorates into the new Care Quality Commission has passed through the House and is in the other place. We published two reports on the Health and Social Care Bill. The first set out amendments to the Bill to take account of some of the recommendations in our report, which we debated on Report a few weeks ago. Our main concern is to ensure that the Care Quality Commission adopts a human-rights based approach to its work and that human rights are reflected in the care standards that will be issued by the Department. The Minister was not persuaded that human rights should be one of the factors of which the CQC should take account in its work, and he said that the commission will be subject to the Human Rights Act.

In our view, the Government are again missing the point. There is ample evidence to show that health care bodies are not taking their commitments under the Human Rights Act sufficiently seriously. It has taken several years to persuade the Healthcare Commission that human rights should be a central element of its work, rather than simply being one of the many legal requirements that it must meet. The CQC will be in the same position unless the Government act now to accept our recommendation to insert a reference to human rights into the factors that the CQC must take into account.

We are not convinced that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is doing enough to take human rights into account in its decision making. That is particularly important in relation to difficult decisions about the availability of treatments for older people. We call for NICE to demonstrate in all its work that it takes into account convention rights as required by the Human Rights Act.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that we have made a recommendation, and we hope the Government will see fit to copy it. NICE's remit should be widened through legislation to include cost and clinical effectiveness and to bear in mind societal effects. That encompasses a reference to human rights, particularly in relation to carers and the cared for, and that is the provenance of our policy making.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman probably goes a little further than I would regarding the wider impact on society, and he may have gone beyond the human rights principles that we are advocating. If human rights principles were part of NICE's basic approach, that would in itself be a significant advance and might address many of the matters about which he is concerned.

I shall now consider the position of NHS staff, who are on the front line in protecting and promoting the human rights of older people in health care. They are the people with whom older patients and residents interact every day and on whom they rely. We are not talking simply about doctors and nurses: the attitudes, actions and omissions of reception staff or those involved with patient transport have a major impact on older people. They, too, should know what is needed to respect, protect and promote the human rights of the people with whom they deal. Given the many competing demands on health care staff, if cultural change is to be achieved, it is vital that all staff understand what human rights principles mean and how they should be applied. By respecting human rights, staff will also be able to recognise and support the positive benefit they bring to their own working lives, and the lives of patients and residents.

Since the Human Rights Act came into force in 2000, human rights training should have been provided throughout hospitals, care homes and other public sector organisations. In 2003, the Audit Commission made a similar recommendation, but the training has not materialised. When training is provided, it is on a one-off basis and is somewhat unfocused. We recommend that all staff working in health care, both clinical and non-clinical, receive targeted and regular training in human rights principles and duties, and how they apply to their work. The training should be integrated into general training, so it should not be costly.

We also ask the Government, the regulators, and the Equality and Human Rights Commission to monitor the extent to which training is provided. The Government responded positively to our concerns and mentioned a number of initiatives that deal with training and guidance on human rights. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what is being planned in more detail and the time scale for those initiatives.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: We should focus not just on abstract training, which can often be quite legalistic, but on the practicalities. Health and safety legislation has resulted in many nurses and carers in care homes being discouraged from undertaking the lifting that was commonplace in the past. Training has always been required to enable somebody to lift well, without causing bruising to vulnerable people who are susceptible to bruising. Training at that level is also a human right in relation to professional skills, and we should, for example, train people to lift, rather than simply inform them about the legal issues.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman has made an interesting point. There was a Human Rights Act case that trumped the ban on lifting and stated that patients should be lifted when appropriate. Obviously, with appropriate training, it is possible to lift people safely. I know from my old job as a personal injury lawyer that nurses can often be injured when lifting patients improperly, because they have not had the training or been given the additional staff required to lift patients safely. That is linked to the points I made earlier about how the position of staff should be strengthened when they argue against doing things that they consider to be in breach of the rights of their patients.

We recommend that qualifications, accreditation and relicensing for health professionals should include a basic understanding of human rights principles, such as dignity, fairness, respect and equality. I tabled amendments to the Health and Social Care Bill to address a number of those issues and although the Minister again argued that the bodies responsible for those matters are subject to the Human Rights Act, our view is that that is not enough to ensure that human rights are taken seriously. Staff who come across incidences of neglect or carelessness should be required to report them without fear of reprisals. Doctors and nurses are under a professional duty to report poor treatment, but other staff, particularly those in care homes, are not under such a duty. On our study visit to Denmark and Sweden, we were informed of Lex Maria and Lex Sarah—laws which require all employees in residential care or hospitals to report suspected abuse. We recommend that similar provisions should be introduced in this country by using the new care standards to be introduced under the Health and Social Care Bill. Will the Minister confirm whether or not the new care standards will extend the duty to report poor treatment to all NHS staff and care home workers?

It is key to ensure that older people are empowered. They are often unaware that they have human rights or that such rights are legally enforceable. At Barnet hospital, new patients are given a leaflet about what to expect from their stay, how to complain, and the discharge procedures, but not what their rights are. We call on the Department of Health, the inspectorates, and service providers to make information available in an accessible form to service users about their rights. The Government have agreed with that recommendation, so perhaps the Minister will tell us what is being done to implement it. The Government have referred to two publications—"Human Rights in Healthcare" and "Promoting Dignity within the Law"—which are apparently available to service users. Will the Minister tell hon. Members how many copies have been distributed to the public, and how the impact of those documents has been measured? Is he satisfied that his Department is doing enough to disseminate information about human rights to patients and carers?

Older people often benefit from independent advocacy to ensure that their voices are heard. We welcome the Minister's support for independent advocates, but we are concerned about whether there are sufficient advocates to meet the needs of older people. We are also concerned about whether advocates are adequately trained in human rights principles. Effective complaints mechanisms are essential, but they function only if people know how to complain, are not afraid to do so, and are not victimised when they do. Ultimately, a system in which complaints can be made to a third party is needed. We are concerned about the proposal in the Health and Social Care Bill that states that the Care Quality Commission will not be able to investigate individual complaints in the way that the Healthcare Commission can. More emphasis will be placed on resolving complaints at a local level. Will the Minister explain how local arrangements will be sufficiently independent of the organisations that are the subject of the complaint to enable the process to be credible in the eyes of the complainants, especially those who fear victimisation from those about whom they are complaining?

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: I deal with the issue of complaints in my remarks. We had an extensive discussion on that matter in the Committee that considered the Health and Social Care Bill, despite the difficulty in getting the amendments in order and selected. Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that since the axing of community health councils and their immediate successors—local involvement networks are about to replace forums—there has been concern about the lack of independence for patient advocacy bodies, particularly in relation to NHS care? Those who are vulnerable and need help require an assurance about independence so they can trust the process, rather than thinking it will be an in-house fix. Such independence is still absent from the Government's plans.

Mr. Dismore: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. There are two types of complaints: those that can be resolved locally and quickly without too many problems and others that are more serious and require further detailed investigation. Handling the latter category requires a degree of independence, which is why we have made our recommendations. I tabled amendments on Report, but unfortunately Mr. Speaker did not select them, otherwise we would have been able to debate the matter fully then. One of the advantages of a Joint Committee is that we have representatives from both Houses. I shall be surprised if my colleagues from the other place do not table amendments on the matter when the Bill starts its passage through the Lords.

One of our concerns related to the risk of eviction. We were alarmed by how little protection care home residents have against eviction, compared with tenants in rented accommodation. That is particularly relevant in the context of complaints: care home residents and their families and carers are less likely to complain about the care that is provided if they are worried that the response will be eviction. We heard of a care home resident who used the emergency buzzer at night. The care assistant took half an hour to come, by which time the resident had wet the bed. The resident was left in the wet bed, the buzzer was thrown across the room and, after making a complaint, they were given 28 days' notice to leave. In another case, a low-level complaint was made to the care assistant about the resident's bed not being made. Twenty-eight days' notice was given to look elsewhere. The YL case arose out of similar circumstances, with the proposed eviction of Mrs. YL from her home in Birmingham.

[Mr. Dismore]

In Denmark and Sweden, residents have the same security as other tenants. As their needs increase, the level of care steps up from sheltered accommodation to highly dependent, all in the same home. Will the Minister consider making it harder for care homes to evict residents? I am sure that hon. Members are familiar with the YL case, given the intense interest throughout the country in its outcome. In essence, users of services provided by the private and voluntary sectors but commissioned by public bodies are excluded from the protection of the Human Rights Act, as a consequence of the House of Lords judgment. That raises issues that go far beyond our debate today, but the consequences have been brought into sharp focus by the impact on care home residents: 77.9 per cent. of care homes are private and 13 per cent. are in the voluntary sector, which means that residents in 91 per cent. of homes have no direct protection under the Human Rights Act.

This year, for the second time, I have introduced a private Member's Bill to attempt to resolve the general issues; and for care home residents in the interim, I moved on Report a new clause to the Health and Social Care Bill to restore the law to what everyone believed to be the case before YL and the earlier authority established by the Leonard Cheshire case. I am pleased that the Minister responded positively, with an undertaking to report to the other place with the Government's own proposals. I hoped that that would result in a Government amendment, so I withdrew my amendment. Will the Minister bring us up to date on Government discussions and tell us what amendments he anticipates will be tabled in the other place?

I come now to the question of leadership. Until recently, the Department of Health manifestly failed to ensure that human rights were at the heart of health care policy and practice. It was left to voluntary organisations to provide leadership and fill that vacuum. We need nothing less than an entire change of culture throughout the health service and care home sector. Recently—perhaps because of our inquiry as well as the work of non-governmental organisations—Ministers and senior officials have come to understand better the importance of human rights in health care, and I very much welcome that change. The references to human rights in the policy documents that we have seen are good. I certainly cannot fault the Minister's personal understanding of the issue and commitment to progress. However, we are concerned about how that translates into policy making and implementation in practice.

At the end of our inquiry, we remained without confidence that the Human Rights Act was "an integral part of policy-making"

in the Department. Initiatives such as the British Institute of Human Rights pilots are welcome but piecemeal, and there is no clear strategy on making human rights integral to the work of the Department as a whole. There has to be much clearer guidance, and we need a much stronger cultural steer. The reluctance to use the language of human rights must be overcome. It is not an embarrassment, but a guarantee of good practice.

The Government told us that they were focused on improving their performance, drawing on support from the Equality and Human Rights Commission. Will the Minister tell us whether there will be a departmental human rights strategy, so that human rights considerations can be at the heart of the Department's work? How will the Department demonstrate leadership throughout the NHS on human rights? The Department said that it would review its policy-making processes to ensure that they reflected human rights considerations. Has that been done? If so, what was the outcome?

This year, the NHS is celebrating its 60th anniversary. It has been a remarkable success story overall. In our inquiry, we pointed to ways in which it can be more successful still by putting human rights at the heart of its work, which will make the rights and needs of users central to the work of the NHS, helping to ensure that financial or staff pressures, or the sheer weight of the bureaucracy, do not drive policy and practice. As one consultant told us, "Looking after older people well is a lot cheaper than looking after them badly." That can be done without spending enormous sums of money, but it requires a cultural shift from the top of Richmond house down to the staff on the hospital reception desk or in the call centre. The welcome political commitment recently shown by the Minister and his colleagues must be both intensified and sustained, so we will continue to keep the Department of Health under scrutiny until the human rights of older people in health care receive the respect to which they are entitled.

3.4 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on the way in which he summarised the findings of the report and the reaction to the Government response to it. I also thank him for his chairmanship of the inquiry. As a member of the Committee, I can certainly testify to the fact that it was a thorough and serious inquiry, examining what could have been a very wide field. Efforts were made to narrow down the issues that we considered in order to produce a focused report that was able to make specific recommendations in the relevant time scale. Our Committee is a busy one. It scrutinises the human rights compatibility of all Government Bills and some private Members' Bills, and considers the UK's compliance with treaty obligations and judgments in our domestic courts and at the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg on human rights cases. It also conducts thematic inquiries; the one that we are discussing was a significant piece of work last year.

I endorse everything that the hon. Gentleman said. I just want to make a number of additional comments. First, I apologise to the Minister, to you, Lady Winterton, and to other hon. Members present because I will not be able to stay to hear the concluding remarks. Therefore, I shall not ask any specific questions of the Minister; I shall just add some commentary to what the hon. Member for Hendon said.

I was struck by a process issue, which I shall place on the record in the hope that clarification can be given. Our report contained 54 conclusions and recommendations, but the Government response considered 36. I found that confusing. It turned out that those 36 included the expansion of one of our recommendations to two in a number of cases, so the Government probably responded specifically to only about 30 of the 54 conclusions and recommendations.

What the Government have done—I am not criticising this; I am just commenting because it is not something that I have noticed before—is respond only to those conclusions and recommendations that were recommendations. Perhaps that is appropriate, but I think that when we put certain parts of our report in bold type and considered them conclusions, we were expecting the Government to react to the assertions that we were making, even when they did not start with the words "We recommend". Perhaps there is an issue of process for those of us on the Committee to consider. Perhaps we should specifically say at the end of every assertion, "We recommend that the Government respond to this assertion," because if that does not happen, it is hard to engage in the give-and-take of a report and response as fully as we would want.

In fairness, I accept that the Government did engage on the points to which they responded. I suspect that the Government are not able as effectively to clarify which of our assertions they disagree with. A couple of those are exemplified in the recommendations that we made on delayed discharges, which was the subject of one of the first sections of our report. The hon. Member for Hendon spent some time explaining why we were concerned. Our conclusions and recommendations included a number of points that were not formal recommendations. For example, we said:

"We are...concerned that the premature or inappropriate discharge of older people could lead to their readmission shortly afterwards."

I would be interested to know from the Government whether they think that delayed discharges could have the unintended and possibly unavoidable consequence—this may just be something that has to be accepted—of an increase in readmissions, which is not necessarily in the clinical interest of any patient, but particularly not in that of older patients.

The Government point out, and I accept, that when someone is clinically ready for discharge, the last place or one of the last places that they want to be is in an acute hospital. Hospital is then inappropriate, with the risk of infection and so on. There must, however, be a balance between that and over-hasty discharge, with or without the risk of readmission, but certainly where there is the risk of readmission.

As I say, the Government gave a lengthy response to the conclusions and recommendations that they said they would respond to, and we should put on record our gratitude for that, but we did not get a full response on this issue, as the hon. Member for Hendon said. In theory, delayed discharge arrangements should not, as the Government intend that they should not, cause premature discharge where that is not in the patient's best interests—they may not be ready, or the circumstances may be inappropriate, as, for example, in the case of direct discharge to a care home where there is no interim arrangement. However, the evidence that we took, which was backed by data, rather than by mere assertion, suggested quite strongly that that was happening in practice, and it is what happens in practice, not in theory, that is the problem in human rights terms. Similarly, if everyone was healthy in theory, but a lot of people were not healthy in practice, we would still have the problem of people suffering ill health.

In their response, the Government did not engage with the question whether it is right that the intention is that no one should be discharged directly from hospital to a care home. There is a great deal more to be said in this debate and beyond about to which evidence in our report the Government take objection. They are entitled to say, "We don't think this evidence is correct. We think you heard only one side. This conclusion is not valid." However, given that they restricted themselves to responding to two specific recommendations—they call them 1 and 2 in their response, but both were part of conclusion and recommendation 3 in our report—we did not get the full picture. The Committee may well consider following the issue up in a further evidence session with the Minister so that we have the dialogue that the work of the Committee, the work in the report and the needs of older people merit.

The second issue that I want to touch on is the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence. Again, the excellence and completeness of the speech by our Chairman mean that some of these issues have already been raised, but I want to raise a couple of extra ones. Paragraph 192 of our report states:

"In their evidence, NICE note that they have taken advice from their lawyers, and that their procedures are human rights compliant".

NICE went on to say that human rights were not often cited in appeals. However, that is not what should be required of the human rights culture in public authorities such as NICE. It is a matter not simply of compliance but of recognising that there is a positive duty to consider human rights and to seek to enhance their attainment by the group in question, which, in this case, is particularly vulnerable. That is why, in paragraph 193, the Committee says:

"In particular, we are not convinced that NICE are fully taking human rights into account in their decision-making."

That sentence appeared in bold, but because we did not use the words "we recommend", there was no Government response. As a result, we do not know whether the Government agree that the evidence to which we drew attention is a fair reflection of what NICE is doing.

Speaking of the place of human rights in NICE's social value judgment guidelines, which would seem to be an important place to consider human rights, Age Concern told the Committee:

"it was completely absent from that work."

To be fair, the Government response to one of our recommendations on the issue confirmed that NICE was revising that guidance and that the issue would now be included. The Government said:

"The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence...are currently updating their document Social Value Judgements, which helps those developing NICE-guidance in making their decisions. NICE will take this recommendation into account when updating the document, and will be consulting publicly later this year."

That is useful to know, but that short paragraph is all that we have in response to quite a significant section of our report, which goes from paragraph 191 right to the end of paragraph 199.

My other point about NICE relates to age discrimination, and this may be an indirect consequence of the way in which NICE works. In our report, we said—I am pleased that we did so and I may have argued that we should do so—that we did not take enough evidence on the nature of quality-adjusted life years, which are a significant part of the measure of cost-effectiveness. We did not take enough evidence to judge whether they were appropriate, particularly given the issue of indirect age discrimination. We received conflicting evidence on the issue. NICE told us that a measure of quality-adjusted life years could often be advantageous to older people. Indeed, one of the strange things about the reluctance of some health care providers to give surgical coronary care, for example, is that there is good evidence that the older people are—within reason and on average—the greater the clinical benefit of intervention. That might seem counterintuitive, but older people often find it difficult to compensate for a physiological problem, and once it is corrected, the improvement in their quality of life is more marked than it would be in that of a younger, fitter person.

A younger person may already have compensated for the problem and will not, therefore, see such a vast improvement in their health as it affects their daily activities, even though the surgical correction is the same in each case. That is why NICE claims that quality-adjusted life years can be advantageous, but if there is a choice to be made about to which patient a rationed treatment such as a kidney transplant should be given, there is an understandable trend to give it—all other things being equal, although they often are not—to the younger person because they have more life years to gain.

I think that that approach is reasonable, but such things should not be done surreptitiously or on the nod. There should be a public debate about the issue, and a decision should be made about whether the good innings argument is a legitimate basis on which to make difficult decisions when a scarce health care resource could help more than one person. That should be made explicit, and there should be a role for Parliament in deciding such things, not simply for a group of people brought together by NICE in a focus group. When it comes to age discrimination, there is a huge amount of sensitivity about such things, which clearly engage with human rights issues.

Parliament has failed to make clear how it wishes such resources to be allocated. I was pleased that the Secretary of State for Health acknowledged that rationing did exist in the health service. He is the first Secretary of State for Health in this Government whom I have known to do that. I think that rationing exists, but the issue is whether it is fair and explicit, not whether we should have a false debate about whether it takes place or not. Older people may well be the victims of unfair rationing and they may, indeed, be unknowing victims, if they do not know that rationing is taking place.

The hon. Member for Hendon also raised the point that some in the medical profession tend to use age as a factor, independent of clinical factors, in deciding what treatments to give. It is not acceptable to say that specialist cardiac care will be given to under-65s, while over-65s will get cardiac care as part of a care-of-the-elderly service. If there is an advantage to having specialist cardiac care, it should be available to everyone who can benefit from that care; it should not be made available simply on the basis of an arbitrary, if understandable, age cut-off. Far too often in the health service, we still see convenient cut-offs based on age, and that may, on one level, be because of sensitivity to the fact that older people need the series of skills provided by a care-of-the-elderly team. If the main problem of an otherwise healthy person who happens to be over 65 is cardiac, and they do not need the specialist input that a care-of-the-elderly teams can give, they should be seen by the specialist cardiac team, who can seek input from their colleagues in care of the elderly—not the other way round.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument, and I see that he is using a clinical evidence base with respect to what is appropriate or inappropriate treatment and attention. Is there behind what he is saying a concern about the funding base for NHS and means-tested social care, and about whether arbitrary age cut-offs could mean that NHS care would not necessarily be provided; or is the hon. Gentleman purely basing his argument on clinical issues?

Dr. Harris: I do not think that that is an argument solely about care of the elderly. Whatever someone's age, if they need residential care it is likely to be means-tested. We know that there is pressure on the people running the budgets of any publicly funded service for which 100 per cent. of the funding is provided by the state to move people into means-tested care. I know that the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) has an interest in that dilemma. The situation is inevitable, when in many contexts there is a boundary between NHS and means-tested social care; it occurs more often in the context of care of the elderly, but I was not making exactly that point.

Finally, I want to mention population screening. The Committee heard from Age Concern, which has been pretty consistent about the matter. Its view was that an upper age limit for screening programmes was discrimination on the grounds of age. I argued against that necessarily being so: when consideration is given to the question of which populations should be brought in for population screening, it is possible to analyse cost-effectiveness. That captures a great many aspects of the matter, such as the sensitivity and specificity of the test, its acceptability, and the effectiveness of treatment for those who are found to be true positives. A calculation can be done of the overall cost-effectiveness by population, according to age—or, indeed, according to other factors, although age is commonly used.

There are some age groups in which it is simply not cost-effective to screen. It would be wrong to take resources from effective and cost-effective treatments, to provide a screening programme that might sound good and be popular, but would not be cost-effective. I think we must accept that, which is why I disagreed with Age Concern's view that an age cut-off for calling in people to be screened is always inappropriate, and why I intervened on that point in the speech of the hon. Member for Hendon. That is not to say that if someone wants breast screening, for example, but is over the age at which people are called in for it, they should not have access to it on request. That is permitted in the NHS and I make no criticism—nor, I think, does the report—of Government screening programmes, at least on those grounds. It is not gender discrimination to provide breast screening only for women; it is a question of effectiveness, and cost-effectiveness, in the end.

In conclusion, I want to comment on the meaning of the term "public authority". The hon. Member for Hendon hid his light under a bushel, to some extent, in his speech. The Joint Committee on Human Rights has an interest of long standing in the question of the failure—in practice and on the part of the courts—to understand the meaning of "public authority" as including those private companies and organisations that provide a public function, particularly with respect to health care. The hon. Member for Hendon has a long history of effective campaigning, as a Back-Bench MP and as Chairman of the Committee, to push the Government to move more quickly than they have towards a resolution of the problem—even after the Leonard Cheshire case, and before the YL case.

I think there is a huge expectation in society, within NGOs and in the House, that there will be effective provision—even if it is not the whole story, for reasons that we understand—by the Government in the House of Lords. I know that the Minister will want to reassure us that that is so, because I know that he and his colleagues, including the Minister of State, Ministry of Justice, the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), have been lobbied about the matter. They have heard the arguments and have had a series of meetings with hon. Members and outside groups, so they are not blind to the issues. We hope that progress will be made now, with the Bill that is currently going through Parliament, even if a wider solution is needed in later legislation.

I add my thanks to those offered by the hon. Member for Hendon to the people who supported the Committee in its work, those who gave evidence, those who helped us with the report and our specialist advisers. It is an excellent report, and I join the hon. Gentleman in commending it.

3.25 pm

Greg Mulholland (Leeds, North-West) (LD): I want to say how pleased I am to be contributing to the debate. I commend the Joint Committee's excellent report, and the work of the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and his Committee. The report could not have come at a better time to move the debate forward. We would probably all agree that things have not been moving as quickly as we should have liked. To quote Help the Aged, which also welcomed the report:

> "Sadly, we have seen little progress in this area since we published Rights at Risk in 2005 and think that it is now long overdue."

As the Joint Committee's report made clear, there is much excellent health and social care provision for older people throughout the country. It is very heartening when we see at first hand the best of our health and social care professionals giving such care, and ensuring the dignity and human rights of older people—something to which we are all committed. Unfortunately, as we have already heard powerfully expressed by the hon. Member for Hendon, examples of neglect and abuse of older people are simply too widespread. We probably all accept that we are talking about a societal problem, and not simply a political one. Some people's attitude to older people is a manifestation of a view of them as second-class citizens who somehow do not have the same human rights that other people do. All the cases that we have heard about from the hon. Gentleman suggest that such attitudes are found far too frequently.

I was very happy, as I think the hon. Gentleman knows, to put my name to amendments to the Health and Social Care Bill that tackled the current loophole in the Human Rights Act 1998, affecting private and voluntary care home residents who are not state funded. I shall talk about that more later, but will mention now that there are 300,000 vulnerable older people who are not protected by the Human Rights Act. There have been discussions with the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), and I welcome the fact that they are continuing.

We still, however, hear of cases of malnutrition and dehydration, rough handling of patients, bullying, neglect and people being left in their own urine and excrement. The British Institute of Human Rights provided a list of examples, including continent older people being forced to wear incontinence pads; the bathing of older people one after the other in the same bath; routine over-medication to keep people docile; night staff forcing older people to wake at 4 o'clock in the morning to be cleaned and dressed, simply because that suits the shift pattern; and an older woman being placed on a commode, fed Weetabix and washed by a carer, all at the same time. The issue that was so well highlighted by the Joint Committee's report is that, at the moment, there is no real recourse to a legal remedy under the Human Rights Act. Until that changes, older people and, of course, younger disabled people are unable to challenge clear violations of their human rights by independent providers of health and social care.

The report was neatly summarised by the hon. Member for Hendon. He mentioned some of the key issues, the first being hospital discharge. Again, inhumane discharge procedures often happen simply because of a lack of consultation with families or a lack of information to the individual and their family. There is very little information about options—frankly, a lot of the time, there is no choice at all. Often, such things happen in the context of bed-blocking, which is a difficult situation, and the need to move patients into appropriate care facilities from hospitals. However, despite the inevitable pressures, we must ensure that older people have rights. That needs to be addressed, and patients' rights need to be clearly spelled out, which I hope we will hear from the Minister.

I am sure that we agree that confidentiality causes problems. It is vital that the Department of Health issues clear guidance and perhaps a code of practice to make clear the limitations to the duty of confidentiality so that, when appropriate, family members or carers receive information and are involved in decisions, as they clearly need to be in some cases.

On the right to complain, there are huge barriers in the system as it currently operates. The hon. Member for Hendon gave a powerful, specific example of someone who was evicted for complaining. So many people in our care homes fear that. People within the NHS often have limited awareness of the organisation's complaints system, or they have difficulties navigating it. That strongly makes the case for an independent advisory service for people, their families and carers to enable them to navigate their way through the system and to show them where to go when they have a grievance and wish to make a complaint. There should be an independent complaints system in social care settings to ensure that people have the right to speak up.

Returning to the human rights loophole, we had lengthy discussions on the matter in debates on the Health and Social Care Bill. Because 90 per cent. of care homes are in the private or voluntary sector, the issue can no longer be ignored if we are serious about tackling the problems that we have heard about today. I was pleased to take forward amendments on the back of the Joint Committee's report, and to work with the hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), who led on those matters in the Health and Social Care Bill Committee.

I welcome the way in which the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Exeter, listened and engaged with organisations and MPs across the political spectrum to take the matter forward, but the fundamental issue remains. Until we close the human rights loophole—some of us strongly believe that that must be done in the Health and Social Care Bill—we will continue to experience situations in which two residents in the same care home have different rights or, indeed, one will have rights under the Human Rights Act but the other will not, simply because one has assets of more than £21,500 and the other does not. That cannot be right.

I was happy to discuss the matter at the Department of Health, and to acknowledge the challenges of the way in which the Human Rights Act is currently framed. However, it cannot be right that one person is covered and another is not, even though they receive the same care in the same institution. We all accept that principle but the challenge is to legislate for it. The Government said consistently in Committee that they did not believe that the Health and Social Care Bill was the right measure to tackle the issue, and they talked about doing so later on in a Bill of Rights.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Greg Mulholland: How could I possibly say no?

Mr. Lewis: May I seek clarification on the hon. Gentleman's comment on differential rights in the same establishment? As I understand it, the problem that we are all keen to sort out is that publicly funded individuals in a private establishment ought to be covered by the Human Rights Act, but are not. On Parliament's and the Government's intentions, self-funders were never going to be covered by the Human Rights Act, which leads us to a debate on how to protect them. However, as I understand it, the problem is not that there is one group of people in a home who are protected while others are not; it is about public commissioning in private homes. Parliament and Government intended that those who were publicly funded should be covered by the Act even if they live in a private home, so we do not have an apartheid system in any single establishment. It is simply that a group of people who we thought ought to be covered are not covered at the moment.

Ann Winterton (in the Chair): Before Mr. Mulholland gets to his feet again, it would be helpful if hon. Members—I have been lenient—made shorter interventions.

Greg Mulholland: Thank you, Lady Winterton. I heard what the Minister said, but it is my understanding—I might be wrong—that we are talking about people who are self-funding, who might well be in the same environment as people who are publicly funded. The simple principle remains: I and many organisations believe that every individual, regardless of whether the home is public, private or voluntary, and regardless of whether they are publicly funded, part-publicly funded or privately funded, should be covered by the Human Rights Act. In the end, that is what I and older people's organisations want.

I therefore welcome the helpful U-turn by the Government, who, following discussions with the Minister of State, are planning to bring forward an amendment on Second Reading in another place. First, will the Minister say whether the amendment will cover all four nations in the United Kingdom? We are aiming for universality, so any other measure will not do. Secondly, to return to our earlier discussion, will the amendment cover all care provision, including both self-funders and those who are publicly funded? Otherwise, we will continue to have a split. Perhaps the Minister will clarify those things when he makes his winding-up speech.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: I have been listening very carefully. I would be very surprised if such an amendment came forward because, if the Government held talks, they did not involve any Member of the official Opposition. As the other place prepares to consider the Bill, we have not been informed that the Government have any such amendment in mind. As far as we know, there is purely the prospect of a discussion on a Bill of Rights that might incorporate such ideas.

Greg Mulholland: All I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that MPs who were invited to the discussion with other organisations added their name to amendments in Committee. That might be something that he wants to take up, but it shows that we need clarity. I believe that the Government will table an amendment that represents a U-turn from the position taken by the Minister of State in Committee. The concern of older people's organisations and human rights organisations is that it should not be a half-way house but should cover everybody in care homes.

We heard today—I am sure that we all agree—that the human rights of older people are not sufficiently enshrined in law, and that we do not have the kind of duties at the heart of the health and social care that are needed. Until the Government are prepared to take action, closing that loophole and introducing the necessary duties, the human rights of older people will not be central to our health and social care systems. I am sure we would all agree that we need to move towards that position.

3.40 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): It is a pleasure, Lady Winterton, to serve under your chairmanship for this timely and important debate.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) on introducing the debate in such a comprehensive and reasoned manner. I also congratulate him on his chairing of the Joint Committee. I hope that he has the chance to secure further discussion of the subject in the main Chamber. I am sure that it merits such a debate. At the very least, it is highly likely that the report will be referred to in connection with many other matters that are to go through both Houses, and in other contexts.

I pay tribute to all nurses, carers and others in the care sector—and, indeed the care home owners and businesses. They provide excellent care, day in and day out, to the most vulnerable people in our society. We should not allow aberrations, however horrible, to cloud our judgment of those who discharge their duty with skill, compassion and professionalism. They work towards quality of life, dignity, respect and well-being with the unremitting best care and attention that we know exist.

I hope that the Minister will enlighten us as to why no mention was made of social care in yesterday's Budget, and why no mention was made of the NHS—our No. 1 priority and, until yesterday, what the Prime Minister said was also his priority.

The Joint Committee identified the areas on which this debate should focus. They were that human rights should be integral to policy making by the Department of Health as well as to the planning and implementation of services in hospitals and care homes; that human rights should underpin the work of the proposed health and social care inspectorate; that front-line staff in health care should receive appropriate education and training in human rights; and that there should be no discrimination on the ground of age in the provision of health care to older people. The Committee also highlighted the fact that the debate would be an opportunity to scrutinise the Government's response to the judgment of the House of Lords in the YL case, in which it was found that private sector care homes were not public authorities for the purposes of the Human Rights Act 1998.

The Joint Committee's report charted failings under articles 2, 3 and 8 of the European convention on human rights because of malnutrition and dehydration, and the inadequate assessment of a person's needs; articles 3 and 8, because of abuse, rough treatment, neglect, carelessness and poor hygiene, and bullying, patronising, and infantilising attitudes towards older people; and article 8 because of the lack of privacy in mixed sex wards—another broken commitment by the Labour party—and a lack of dignity, especially for personal care needs.

The report also noted failings under article 8 because of insufficient attention being paid to confidentiality, inappropriate medication and the use of physical restraint, too hasty discharge from hospital, fear among older people of making complaints, and eviction from care homes; article 14 because of the discriminatory treatment of patients and care home residents on grounds of age, disability and race; and articles 8 and 14 because of communication difficulties, particularly for people with dementia or people who cannot speak English. Those are the issues that underpin our debate.

The Department's responses on the question of human rights being integral to policy making and the planning and implementation of services were disappointing. In its response to recommendation 8, it failed to commit itself to a statutory constitution for the NHS. The wider concern is not just that human rights are left out. In December 2006, a consultation on the core principles of the NHS—we have committed ourselves to enshrining those principles in legislation—was undertaken by the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he was Minister of State at the Department of Health. In it, the Government omitted the principle that "Public funds for healthcare will be devoted solely to NHS patients."

Are the Government still planning to get rid of that central pillar of our NHS?

I would be grateful if the Minister provided me with a copy of "Better Policy-Making", a document that the Government pray in aid in their response. However, the response does not make clear whether the document highlights human rights in any way. I genuinely trust that the Government will not seek to divert the Joint Committee with such an action.

The Joint Committee also proposed that human rights should underpin the work of the proposed health and social care inspectorate. Like others, I had the privilege of serving on the Committee that considered the Health and Social Care Bill. I am glad that we have the opportunity today to hear from the Minister about the Care Quality Commission. One of our concerns is that, in the merger, social care will be squeezed out as a priority.

It was unfortunate that the Minister, who is responsible for social care, was not chosen to take that Bill through Committee. A number of Committee members would have liked to see him take charge of that Bill; we believed that we might have made more progress if he had had responsibility for the Bill rather than his colleague, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw). Indeed, I know that that concern was shared by some of the Minister's colleagues.

The Commission for Social Care Inspection has said that it

"believes, in line with general Government policy, that the new regulator should take a strong rights based approach towards the people who use social care and health services...and their carers", and there is a desire to "properly reflect" that "in the legislation". The official Opposition sought a number of changes to the framing legislation for the Care Quality Commission. One of the most important was to create a reference board consisting of commissioners, and a management board consisting of executives, at the head of the commission. That would have resulted in stronger governance, and the promulgation of human rights.

The Minister of State rejected that proposal on the grounds that he did not want to tie the hands of the new commission in its structure—a somewhat spurious argument, as the legislation as framed prevents it from having that structure should it so desire. One has to look at it the other way around. He may genuinely have wanted the freedom of that option, but the legislation was deliberately set out to ensure that that option was closed.

The Bill Committee also sought to establish a human rights committee within the CQC. The Minister of State refused that request on the ground that the advisory committee set out in schedule 1 to the Bill would fulfil that requirement. However, he also said that the advisory committee would be used for patient and public involvement. I wonder whether the Minister will take this opportunity to clarify those mixed messages.

It was also disingenuous of the Department, in its response to recommendations 20, 21 and 22, to say that it would take no action on human rights because it "will not be specifying the precise work programme of the new regulator".

[Mr. Stephen O'Brien]

On health care-associated infections—the new phrase for what we used to know as health care-acquired infections—the Government have mandated action from the CQC in the Bill. Why are HCAIs more important than human rights? Why, for that matter, are such infections more important than malnutrition, which affects more people and also breaches article 2, 3 and 8 of the European convention on human rights? The Government repeatedly refused to include that in the Bill, and I hope that the Minister will shed some light on the illogical nature of the Government's contention. Does he believe that HCAIs are more important than human rights, and can he say why the Government were not prepared to include malnutrition in the Bill? As we argued in Committee, many people say that it is closer to a human rights issue.

It was encouraging to see the Joint Committee's focus on training in human rights for staff, a matter that the hon. Member for Hendon rightly focused upon. Training was discussed at length by the Bill Committee, and I hope that those discussions will be noted by the CQC. The other side of the coin is that staff should have the time to put into practice the things that they have learned.

In fact, the majority of those in the caring professions would deliver care compatible with human rights if only they did not have to contend with so many bureaucratic procedures and Whitehall top-down targets breathing down their necks. That argument is more generally pursued on the Floor of the House, so I shall not take time on the matter now, but I hope that hon. Members recognise that there is a consequence to managing the health service with such top-down targets.

I hope that the Minister will take on board our proposals for getting rid of distorting targets in our NHS. I would be interested to know when he intends to raise the recommendations with the strategic health authorities and training bodies, as he commits to doing in the Government response, and what measurable outcomes he is expecting.

Rightly, the Joint Committee also called for no discrimination on the ground of age. One specific issue that was picked up on in the Government response, which was raised by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), was discharge planning. The Government response to recommendations 1 and 2 showed some prevarication. We have an opportunity today to see if that prevarication can be addressed, as there were no measures in the Government response to strengthen discharge planning, which would ensure that older people's care was not compromised.

In their policy review for the official Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who is a former Secretary of State for Health, and Baroness Perry of Southwark examined the experience of Sweden and Denmark, where hospitals can charge social services for extra bed days. In Sweden, notification of patients is made immediately on admission, social workers visit wards daily and discharges are planned in four stages during the patient's stay.

Lady Winterton, that is a system that we could usefully use in our shared county of Cheshire—we are neighbouring MPs—in which there have been plans to close nursing and care homes; plans that have left some very vulnerable people with some dramatic and at times life-threatening situations to contend with suddenly. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will be able to give some clarity and indeed commitment to taking action on the issue of discharge planning today.

The most disturbing issue regarding the empowerment of older people is the changes to, and failings of, the complaints framework. The CQC, unlike the Healthcare Commission which it subsumes, will no longer be a second-tier complaints handling body. Instead the Government intend to strengthen local complaints handling functions and pass unresolved cases directly to the parliamentary ombudsman, which initially will lead to an elevenfold increase in her work load. She is seeking extra funding from the Treasury to support her work and we can only hope that she is more successful than almost every other part of Government.

The Government have not yet told the House how much that change will cost the ombudsman. Given that the Opposition have been asking repeatedly for that information, I must say that that is something of a disgrace. How can hon. Members make the correct judgment if the Government withhold such facts from us?

Regarding the failings of the complaints system itself, the Government acknowledge those failings in their response to the Joint Committee, saying, in response to recommendation 32:

"We are sympathetic to the situation of those people who self-fund, in care homes for example, and recognise the problem. We are currently considering this issue."

I think that the Minister sought to make that point himself, to some degree, in his intervention on the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats on the issue.

The Health and Social Care Bill Committee and Report stages showed the failings of the complaints system to be a matter of cross-party concern. The hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins) criticised Government policy in that area. The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) said:

"A number of my hon. Friends, not necessarily members of the Committee, are concerned about changes in patient representation and procedures for patients making complaints in recent years."—[Official Report, Health and Social Care Public Bill Committee, 17 January 2008; c. 346.]

The Liberal Democrats supported those comments, as did the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon, who has just had to leave his seat, and the hon. Member for Hendon on Report, as he rightly mentioned earlier in this debate.

Therefore, I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify his own comments on the issue. Speaking in a Westminster Hall debate, he said:

"it is unacceptable that self-funders should not have the protection that other residents have".—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 11 December 2007; Vol. 469, c. 52WH.]

More cryptically, in September 2007—I do not have the exact date, but I am told that his comments have been verified—he told the "File on 4" programme—this shows that we listen to him at every opportunity—that he would be solving that problem through the integrated complaints procedure for health and social care in 2009, which is again cited in the Government response. However, the Minister of State, who led on the Health and Social Care Bill, and the Department, in its response to this report, did not embrace the idea of a universal complaints system, nor did they suggest that that system would be achieved through the 2009 framework. Is the Minister reneging on that undertaking or, as I fear, is he just as disappointed as all the rest of us are with his own colleagues?

Will the Minister tell us exactly how the CQC will monitor trends in complaints? There was no suggestion in the Health and Social Care Bill that the CQC would do that; indeed, the Government rejected the amendments tabled by Opposition Members that tried to achieve that very effect. With the CQC losing its complaint function, how can we be sure that the early warning signals will be picked up by the regulator?

If I may, I would like to pick up a little on a point that I made earlier. The community health councils were axed. It may be frustrating for any Government but independent trusted bodies should have entitlements to visit hospital or care settings and bring forward generically all their collective wisdom, without necessarily having to individualise it. The councils were able to see trends and put out schemes such as bed watch and deal with all the other issues, which were always a major additional source of information about what was truly going on. There seems to be a lack of ability to collate and collect that information, and to ensure that it is generally made available in reports. That was one of the concerns of the bodies that will be succeeded by the CQC; they are concerned that that information will be lost. I fear that it will be a serious loss, both to the individuals who could be affected and for policy-making purposes for all of us, unless the Minister, who I believe would sincerely like to see those matters improved, is able to take that issue up with his colleagues.

I would like to address the issue of private care homes, which was raised by the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West. Although the human rights issue is naturally all-encompassing, political and public interest has recently been most exercised by the human rights loophole under which private care homes are not bound by the Human Rights Act 1998, and can therefore evict residents without breaching article 8 of the European convention on human rights, whereas their public sector counterparts cannot do so.

It would be nice to see the Government not dragging their feet over that issue. During the debate on the hon. Member for Hendon's private Member's Bill to clarify the Human Rights Act, which took place on 15 June 2007, the Solicitor-General, the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who was then the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs and who is herself a human rights lawyer, talked the Bill out rather than bringing it before the detailed scrutiny and consideration of Committee stage, which is what the Opposition wanted and urged should happen at that time. Indeed, it is still our position that that matter warrants the detailed consideration of a Committee stage because of the difficulties—difficulties that we all acknowledge—of intertwining it into all other forms of law.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the remarks of the Solicitor-General. In fact, I recall her saying at that time that she hoped that the matter would be resolved by the end of that calendar year,

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman advocates his position even better than I can, and I am most grateful that he was able to intervene. Therefore, we all doubly share in the disappointment, because we are already now in March of the following year, and that seems to indicate that there is a serious dragging of feet.

In the Westminster Hall debate on 11 December 2007, to which I referred earlier, the Minister who is present today called the current state of affairs an "anomaly", saying that "neither Government nor Parliament intended that publicly funded residents living in private sector establishments would not be covered by the Human Rights Act 1998. That is an unintended consequence, and we need to put it right."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 11 December 2007; Vol. 469, c. 52WH.]

During the Committee stage of the Health and Social Care Bill, the Minister of State said:

"the Government are committed to ensuring that independent sector care homes are covered by the Human Rights Act."—[Official Report, Health and Social Care Public Bill Committee, 10 January 2008; c. 135.]

Why will the Government not deal with that matter now? If they are truly committed to dealing with it, what is the reason for the delay?

I hope that I have put questions to the Minister in a fair manner, and I am sure that he will take the opportunity to give us specific answers to the issues raised both by myself and the hon. Member for Hendon, whom I again congratulate on securing this debate. I also congratulate him and his colleagues in the Joint Committee on producing this report. I am sure that we will see some movement on the part of the Government, but there will still be too much prevarication and, as I see it, another attempt to find sufficient long grass to kick this issue into. I look forward to the Minister dispelling such a notion, which has obviously formed in my mind, and giving specific answers to the specific questions that I have posed. If, for any reason, he is not able to answer them today, I hope that he will be prepared to let us have some answers in writing.

Let us not forget that at the heart of this debate is the care of some of the most vulnerable people in our society. That is something that all of us, and I include the Government in saying that, take seriously, as we ought to.

3.59 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) for his leadership of the Joint Committee on Human Rights and for his personal advocacy on behalf of some of the most vulnerable groups in our society. I have appeared before his Joint Committee to talk about the way in which the health and social care system treats older people and, recently, about the often unsatisfactory way in which it treats people with learning disabilities. Both of those inquiries have led to a sharper focus on the issues and, ultimately, will lead to significant cultural, regulatory and other changes to the way in which the health and social care system relates to older people and those with learning disabilities. He deserves tremendous personal credit, therefore, for championing unfashionable causes.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) made a very constructive and fair contribution to the debate and raised an interesting point about the difference between recommendations and conclusions

[Mr. Ivan Lewis]

Of course, if any elements of the Joint Committee's report have not been responded to adequately, I am more than happy to have a fresh look at them.

I am delighted to say that the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) made a fair and balanced contribution, which is a new approach from him to these issues. I welcome that very much. I do not want to contradict him, because his contribution was extremely constructive, but he made one inaccurate comment, and it is important to the debate about the YL judgment that we get this clear: neither publicly funded nor self-funded residents in private homes are currently covered by human rights legislation. His case was that in the future both groups should be covered. He would like us to go further than simply dealing with the anomaly and unintended consequences of the YL judgment. I accept that perfectly legitimate position, but his description of the situation—that one group of residents is covered, but the other is not—was incorrect.

Greg Mulholland: I appreciate the Minister's constructive comments. I was probably not clear. I was trying to say that we must not move to a situation in which publicly-funded people in private care homes are covered, because that would move us from one loophole to another. That was my point—it was not a description of the current situation—but I accept that I probably did not make that clear.

Mr. Lewis: I accept that clarification and shall come on to that issue later. We have a problem with the definition of "public authority", which makes this quite a complex problem to resolve. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman made a fair point; I just wanted to clarify the current situation.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) made a consensual contribution and recognised that both sides of the House feel very passionately and strongly that the rights of older people should be a priority for Government, Parliament and society. Those outside the House might demonstrate wry amusement at the fact that he is a passionate advocate for the Human Rights Act and for further regulation and legislation on this subject, in view of his proud track record as a deregulator and a severe critic of the notion of human rights legislation. I am delighted, therefore, to hear him speak so positively about the importance of such legislation and its capacity to protect older people. It seems that when human rights apply to vulnerable people, there is a common view that we as a society have a duty to look after them properly, but when they apply to other groups in society, about which there is not the same level of enthusiasm and support, people deride the whole notion of human rights. I think that we need some consistency in the debate.

The hon. Gentleman said that the Chancellor failed to mention the NHS during his Budget speech, but he referred on several occasions to the record levels of investment that the Government have made in the NHS. I understand why he did not want to hear that bit of the Chancellor's statement, so I am happy to repeat it. I am also happy to repeat the fact that by the end of 2008 we will have achieved a historic landmark in the NHS—a maximum wait of 18 weeks from seeing one's GP to hitting the operating theatre. Not only has there been record investment, but a major improvement has been made in people's experiences of NHS care and treatment.

On 1 April, the most radical transformation programme in the history of social care will begin in every local authority area, with a focus on information, advice and advocacy for all and, of course, personal budgets putting maximum power and control in the hands of those who use social care services and their families. As the hon. Gentleman is fully aware, we are committed to a Green Paper on the long-term fundamental nature of our care and support system. There is no doubt that the investment and reform of the NHS and social care system is one of the Government's top priorities. More important than priorities, the Government's track record over the past 10 years on the NHS and social care is impressive. Older people have benefited disproportionately from that record investment, which is frequently forgotten. There has been improvements in acute care, hip replacements, cataract operations—people used to have to wait years for such treatment. Older people have benefited more than any other group in our society from those tremendous advances.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a piece of work conducted for him by the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell)—a very distinguished former Secretary of State for Health—detailing a radical transformational vision for the future of social care services in this country. It stated that we needed better and more integrated commissioning between health and social care, but that was the end of the comments on the Conservative party's position for the future of social care, although I am sure that more will be said in the future. Nevertheless, I genuinely welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Eddisbury cares passionately about the issues before us and seeks, wherever possible, to find consensus on them.

I endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about those on the front line of delivering services. The difficulty with debates such as this is that they are usually based on a deficit model of care. We highlight all of the appalling and dreadful failings and abuses taking place. Of course, too often elderly people and their families describe those circumstances to us and we have a duty to act. Equally, however, every day of the week, in every community, people on the front line of NHS and care services do an extraordinary job, frequently in very difficult circumstances. We should make that clear when we talk about our overwhelming responsibility to improve the system and to ensure that cases of neglect, abuse and poor care continue to be minimised.

Politicians accept the notion that the great national and international challenges facing us are climate change, the effects of globalisation and fundamentalist terrorism, but very few people acknowledge that demography should be up there as one of the top four or five public policy challenges facing our society and those in many similar countries. People are now living longer, which means that more people have complex conditions such as dementia. Furthermore, people have very different expectations. These days, the vast majority of people, given an authentic choice, want to remain in their own home rather than enter institutionalised care, whereas, perhaps 20 years ago, our parents or grandparents were resigned to the fact that they would live to their 60s, if they were lucky, and spend the latter part of their life in institutionalised care.

Members of the baby boom generation are increasingly concerned about those issues, not only because of self-interest and worries about their own future, but because they are coming into contact with the health and social care system through the experiences of their ageing parents. Frequently, those sons and daughters find the system frustrating, particularly the division between health and social care. They also find that their elderly parents are not treated with the respect that we would like. I have set a test; people should ask, "If the care is not good enough for our mothers and fathers, why should it be good for somebody else's?" That simple test should be applied to every NHS ward, nursing and residential home and domiciliary and day care service.

The NHS and social care systems do not function in isolation from the rest of society. We have a deeply negative culture and attitude towards older people in society generally, and it is frequently reflected in the NHS and social care systems. I am a great believer in the human rights legislation being the starting point for, and the heart of, health and social care thinking, systems and policies, but even if we had a utopian application of the Human Rights Act 1998 in its strictest sense, we would still need to address some major cultural and attitudinal issues. Older people are not just passive recipients of our sympathy; thankfully, they make a tremendously positive contribution to their communities and our society, and we should highlight it far more.

Several issues were raised in today's debate and in the report. First, I shall describe what the Department of Health is trying to do internally to ensure that human rights have a far more significant role in the development of policy. The hon. Member for Eddisbury referred to better policy-making guidance for officials in the Department. The guidance includes clear references to a human rights perspective and the consequences of human rights legislation. The impact assessment process is relevant to all policies, and equality is an important part of that. Part of equality is human rights and the human rights legislation. The Department is also working on a human rights e-learning tool, which will be available in the autumn. The tool is designed to make people far more aware of the position of human rights at the heart of development and training.

I shall deal with the Department's ability to influence change on the ground. First, on the YL judgment, there is absolutely no doubt that Parliament and the Government intended publicly funded residents of private homes to be covered by the human rights legislation. As a consequence of a court judgment, they are not, but the Government are absolutely determined to ensure that the original intentions of Parliament and the Government are restored. The question is how do we best do that in terms of the legislative process? Discussions are active and ongoing between myself and ministerial colleagues in the Department of Health and the Ministry of Justice, and we will be able to make clear to hon. Members in the near future how we intend to correct that anomaly.

The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West expressed some concern about self-funders. Correcting the YL judgment would deal simply with people who were publicly funded, but because social care is a means-tested system, an increasing number of people are self-funders. Owing to the implications of the original focus of the Human Rights Act, it is much more difficult and complex to extend the correction of that anomaly to self-funders, because we would then get into a situation involving the definition of "public authority". On the sentiment, however, we have a responsibility through whatever means to ensure that in a means-tested system, self-funders have far greater protection—even though it may be difficult to do so through human rights legislation.

A major part of the social care reform programme that will begin in every local authority area over the next three years will be an end to the "no help here" culture, in which people who fund themselves, or their families, are essentially left to navigate the care system alone. The transformation programme seeks to commit local authorities no longer to have a "no help here" culture. Depending on its implementation and delivery, I think most people will welcome it.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury rightly raised the right of people to complain beyond the organisation or provider about whom they are complaining. The difficulty is that if people are publicly funded recipients of care, they can go to the local authority, use its complaints procedures and ultimately go to the ombudsman, but if a self-funder wants to make a complaint, they can go only to the provider against whom they are making the complaint; there is no independent vehicle or organisation to which they can turn. We must do something to address that anomaly, and officials are considering the issue. I am not able to tell the Chamber the solution that we have come up with, but we must create a level of independence for self-funders when there is nowhere for them to go other than to the organisation against which they are making the complaint.

The Government remain committed to minimising mixed-sex accommodation in the health service. This year in the NHS operating framework, we have set stretching targets for every strategic health authority and primary care trust to minimise mixed-sex accommodation. We have made much progress over the past 10 years, but not as much as we had hoped, and the only difference of emphasis is the definition of mixed-sex wards versus mixed-sex accommodation. My colleague Lord Darzi made it clear that he thought the term "mixed-sex wards" was an error and we should not have made a commitment to abolish them because it is unachievable. However, we remain committed to the minimisation of mixed-sex accommodation in the health service, and we have made it clear to the NHS locally that we expect it to be a priority where there has not been as much progress as we expected.

Premature discharge is a very difficult issue, because if older people are in hospital for a prolonged period unnecessarily, all the evidence suggests that their mental and physical health deteriorates. The challenge is to ensure that we have in every community an appropriate range of provision—intermediate care, step-down care, proper domiciliary and day care services—and the appropriate relationship between the local NHS and local government, so that, from the point of view of patients and carers, that Berlin wall does not get in the way.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Heridon said, it is important that we get the issue right for individual patients and in individual circumstances. It is irresponsible to discharge people when they have not fully recovered or into a care setting that is not appropriate to meet their needs. Overall, however, it would be a mistake to take the pressure off the policy of getting people out of hospital as quickly as possible, because from my experience of my relatives and other older people, the longer they remain in hospital, the less likely they are to make a full recovery. But that depends on our having appropriate alternative provision available.

Mr. Dismore: I certainly think that that approach to discharge is the right one; I do not dissent from it. Our concern was that without a degree of flexibility, either in the rules or elsewhere, that ideal will not be reached. We recommended guidance from the Department that would effectively put in black and white what my hon. Friend just said. Will he consider whether it would be appropriate to produce such guidance?

Mr. Lewis: What is appropriate is that people implement best practice in care. If we need to clarify that, I am certainly willing to do so, but I would not want to give any impression that we were returning to the days when older people were left to languish on acute NHS wards, entirely inappropriately, for long periods, which led to a deterioration in their mental and physical health. We can certainly consider how to make it clear what best practice is.

I shall run quickly through some other relevant changes that we are making. In terms of messages to the NHS, we have issued "Human Rights in Healthcare", a framework for local action. In guidance on how NHS trusts should implement equality schemes, we have included age, even though there is no legal requirement to do so. As for the regulators, the Healthcare Commission and the Commission for Social Care Inspection have approached their regulatory responsibilities with a strong human rights focus, particularly CSCI when making judgments about the quality of social care provision. In respect of the new Care Quality Commission, there will be new provider registration requirements from 2010. We will consult on those and make it clear that the convention on human rights should be a significant guide for the new requirements under the commission.

On the training of front-line staff, we are bringing together regulators and providers of education and training at an event in April at the Equality and Human Rights Commission, specifically to consider those who have the most influence over the training of leaders, managers and front-line staff. We want to talk to them about how the content of training can more appropriately reflect human rights legislation and a human rights culture. We will hold a similar event in May, but it will be aimed at front-line staff, leaders and managers in the health service and social care system.

I should like go into more detail about the other levers that will make a difference to achieving the aims of the Human Rights Act. I shall just reel those off before bringing my remarks to a conclusion so that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon can speak. I believe that world-class commissioning should make a major difference in securing human rights. I believe that our national campaign to put respect for dignity at the heart of health and social care is making a difference, and I shall announce the extension of that campaign soon. I believe that the development of CSCI standards towards star ratings will make a difference, as will the development of a national dementia strategy this year.

The roll-out of psychological therapies means that older people in every part of the country will have much greater access to such therapies. The new deal for carers, which will be announced by the Prime Minister later in the spring, will hopefully lead to major changes in the experience of family members, who are often not treated as we would like them to be treated by the health and social care system. Equally, caring itself has an impact on the health of carers, and we need to consider that as part of the new deal.

I have referred to the transformation agenda in social care. Putting more power and control into the hands of the people who use the system through personal budgets and greater information, advice and advocacy is far more likely to lead to packages of support consistent with the Human Rights Act 1998 than the historical or traditional way of providing services. We are reviewing the entire system of adult protection in this country, and that review will cover the way in which vulnerable adults are protected by the health, social care and criminal justice systems.

I have mentioned the Green Paper on the future of the care and support system, and my colleague Lord Darzi is in charge of a review that will ask, "Having fixed the foundations of the national health service, how do we move towards creating a world-class health service?" Creating a world-class health service involves more than just celebrating the fact that most people in this country are very satisfied with the quality of clinical care that they receive from the NHS. People are nowhere near as satisfied with the personal care that they often get on NHS wards, for example, and that is particularly relevant to older people, and to customer care. As well as improving clinical care in the NHS and the relationship between the NHS and social care over the long term, it is incredibly important that we improve the personal care, not just the medical care, that people receive, in the NHS.

We are also considering a new constitution for the NHS, with a focus on rights and responsibilities for both staff and patients as well as on greater accountability to local communities when making decisions about the NHS than may have been the case in the past. Culturally, there has not been the same openness in the NHS as in local government and other public services, so we need to consider what mechanism we can introduce to make the system more accountable and give patients and communities more power and control over the decisions that are made and the services that are developed.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend has touched on most of the issues that I raised, but I should like to ask him about two in particular. One is the British Institute for Human Rights pilot. When will the evaluation be completed, and when will the subsequent roll-out happen? The other is the whistleblower duty. Will that be included in the care standards regime?

Mr. Lewis: On the new regulators' duties and whistleblowers, I cannot give my hon. Friend a definitive answer, as we are considering the issue at the moment. However, the new standards will be put out for consultation. It is certainly one of the issues that I am considering.

Ipsos MORI has been commissioned to conduct an independent evaluation of the pilots. Once we have received it, we will decide how to mainstream them through the national health service. We want to look at best practice and the trusts that have operated a human rights approach, then consider the implications of mainstreaming that approach throughout the health and social care system.

This debate has demonstrated that the Select Committee's report has led to significant change. The human rights debate in health and social care has been given much more serious attention than before, but I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon and other hon. Members that we still have a considerable way to go. Part of it will involve legislation and regulation, but some of it involves cultural and attitudinal change.

Mr. Dismore: I shall not say a great deal, because we have had a good debate. I appreciate my hon. Friend the Minister's approach. He will receive a letter to remind him of those of our findings that were not recommendations.

I think that the question of the YL case has been troubling for everybody. The problem is that the Human Rights Act applies only to public authorities; a lot of people do not know that. That is where the difficulty has arisen. The Committee argues that, at least in the short term, we should return to where we were, or where we thought we were, before the YL case, so that publicly funded people in private or voluntary sector care homes have the protection of the Human Rights Act, which should be directly enforceable by residents, if necessary, against providers. The present post-YL system makes enforcement extremely indirect and difficult. We want direct enforcement.

The wider issue of whether privately funded people should be included is more complex, partly because that was not what was originally intended by the Human Rights Act. It also raises wider issues about what is known in the human rights trade as horizontality—the right of private citizens to enforce rights against other private citizens or private bodies. That is why it raises significantly wider issues in relation to the human rights debate and, ultimately, the debate about the Bill of Rights. That is not to say that private funders should not have additional protections, but it is another question altogether whether that can be done through the YL reform mechanism. There is an argument that because there is significant state regulation of private sector care homes, they are therefore brought within the public authority definition. However, that is a complex and convoluted legal argument, and I shall not go into it in detail.

When the Committee was considering what amendment to the Health and Social Care Bill to propose on Report, we thought it better to go back to where we were before YL and let the arguments about private funders be resolved differently. As my hon. Friend the Minister has said, we should try to find better ways of protecting them without getting bogged down in the Human Rights Act. The problem has to be dealt with differently, because private provision goes far beyond people in care homes: it concerns adults with learning disabilities and people who receive publicly funded education in private schools. A whole range of additional services could be affected, so the issue is much wider. My Bill would refine the definition of a public authority to include such service providers. If we are to go beyond that into private enforcement by private individuals against private companies or people, it would involve a much bigger human rights argument, which has to take place in the wider context of the Bill of Rights debate. We want private funders to be protected, but not in that way.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman and I are both trained lawyers, so there is grave danger of our getting into a luxurious debate as lawyers. He has put his finger on what is relevant: we must consider the restricted area of amendment, because to go down the private-to-private route would invade privity of contract. That could create a difficult legal position, leading one into the equivalent of tort and duties of care. I must correct the Minister on one issue: the invocation of the Human Rights Act presents problems, which is why both parties are talking about a Bill of Rights, under which one could have rights, responsibilities and duties, and which would make duties in the private sector enforceable. Under the Human Rights Act, that is difficult both as a legal concept and in terms of society.

Mr. Dismore: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman. The Committee will produce a report on the Bill of Rights debate in which we will discuss social and economic rights, although I do not know what conclusions we will reach. We will also discuss horizontality, or private enforcement against private bodies. That issue concerns much wider arguments and debates than apply here. The important thing today is that we hold the Government to their commitment to turn the clock back, and put the law back to what everyone thought it was before YL, when the House of Lords got things wrong.

Greg Mulholland: I accept that there is a legal debate, but I am not a lawyer, so I cannot contribute to that debate. I acknowledged in my speech that there are challenges in trying to adapt the Human Rights Act in this case, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the general public will find certain situations hard to accept? For example, if two people are in the same care home and one of them has been means-tested and is publicly funded, whereas the other does not qualify and has to pay, that may mean that one of them is covered by the Act and one is not. Never mind legal reality, common sense says that that simply is not fair.

Mr. Dismore: I am afraid that people in more or less equivalent positions often have vastly different rights. There are many examples of such situations. I should like everyone to be protected by the Human Rights Act in every circumstance, but that cannot be done through the mechanism that the hon. Gentleman advocates. I do not want to get into a completely different debate, especially as it would get very technical, but the Act is there to protect people who receive services from public authorities. As a result of the YL case, a private care home is not a public authority. We can correct the problem for publicly funded recipients of care services, because they were originally intended to be covered by the definition of a public authority. Indeed, there are several mechanisms by which we can make that change, and the Government will have to choose which mechanism to use. The difficulty arises when we try to bring into the equation self-funders, who have no direct relationship with the state, because that means trying to make the Act do something that it was never intended to do—protect self-funders in relation to private providers.

There is a convoluted argument that if there is significant state regulation, that is sufficient to make something a public authority, which it would not otherwise be. I am not entirely convinced by that argument, although I see where those who make it are coming from. In the interim, we have to find another way of protecting self-funders, which is what the Government are trying to do. In the long term, we must reform the definition of public authorities so that everyone who receives public services is covered, not just those in care homes. I gave examples earlier of others who might be covered. That is reform No. 1.

Reform No. 2 concerns the wider issue of horizontality, or the extent to which human rights should be directly enforceable more generally, outwith the issue of care homes, between private individuals or between private individuals and companies. That is a wider argument, and it falls within the much bigger debate on the Bill of Rights. There are therefore three different stages: sorting out the YL case in relation to care homes, sorting it out in relation to the wider recipients of public services, and sorting out the general issue of those who receive privately funded services from private organisations.

Each of the three stages has a different solution. In the meantime, we must try to find a way of protecting private funders in care homes through other mechanisms, giving protection that is equivalent to human rights protection. In the report, we discussed whether it would be possible to provide better protection against eviction, not necessarily within the context of the Human Rights Act, but under landlord and tenant law. The issue is one where non-lawyers might fear to tread—

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: And lawyers.

Mr. Dismore: Indeed. The more one gets into it, the more complicated it becomes. That is why the Committee decided to propose a relatively narrow amendment to the Health and Social Care Bill to return the position with care homes to how it was before YL. That is the cleanest way of dealing with the matter in the interim. There are wider issues to be addressed, but not by using the Bill. Other things can be done to provide those protections, without necessarily involving the Human Rights Act. The issue is very complicated.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Minister that demography is one of the great challenges facing society. When he spoke about policy-making guidance and the impact assessment, he said that human rights are part of the equality duty, but it is the other way around. Human rights provide all-embracing, universal protection, of which equality is one element. He might like to reconsider that point. The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), who is an active member of my Committee, talked about the need for NICE to have a positive duty to promote human rights, and I do not disagree with that point. He also spoke about quality-adjusted life years, which we should discuss in more detail in future. Once we started to tackle that subject, we realised that it is incredibly complicated. The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Greg Mulholland) talked about the duty of confidentiality. That issue is important, and it is raised in our report.

The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) raised several important issues. He also echoed my tribute to all those who do good work. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, it is important that we do not forget that many people do a lot of good work in difficult circumstances. When we focus on aberrations, that should not take away from their work. We need a rights-based approach from the new commission, as the hon. Member for Eddisbury said, and I am sure that we will keep returning to that point. The YL case is a thorn in the side of everyone who is involved in this business, and I hope that the Government will propose their amendments when the Bill starts its progress through the other place.

Question put and agreed to.

Water Strategy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Siobhain McDonagh.]

9.30 am

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): I am very pleased to have the opportunity to initiate this debate, although I would probably be more pleased if I had not initiated rather a lot of similar debates over the past 20-odd years. In a sense, this feels like a return to old ground, but as I speak I think that it will become clear that I am not looking simply to repeat what has been said before. There are some immediate issues to address, particularly given that Ofwat is in the middle of a consultation on its review of water charges and pricing—PR09—and that the Government have just released their strategy, "Future Water". Over the next year, we will set the agenda for the future of the water industry, and that will not be just for the five years that Ofwat has traditionally considered in its reviews—we could be talking about a 20-year horizon. The debate is therefore extremely timely, and I hope that things will move on in a way that they have not always done in the past.

I am not sure whether I should declare an interest, but my wife has been very involved in the issue. She formerly ran Surfers Against Sewage and wrote a response for it on these matters, and she has done some work for South West Water. If that is an interest, then I have it—my wife is certainly interested in this debate, if I can put it like that.

I have returned to the subject more often than any other during my career in the House of Commons. I warned the Conservative Government that their privatisation of the water industry would cut off the potential to secure the public and European moneys necessary to clean up our beaches and that people in the south-west, who are on some of the lowest incomes in the country, would be left to foot the bill. They proceeded regardless, and left only £1.5 billion for a clean-up programme that actually cost £6 billion—four times the amount that they had assumed. That is why South West Water customers continue to pick up the tab to this day.

Much of what I have to say will be relevant in the national context, but I must first focus on the situation in the south-west. Households with water meters account for two thirds of users—there is a very high penetration of water meters in the south-west because of the high bills—and can expect to pay an average of £397 in 2008-09, which is up 5.6 per cent. on last year. Many of the remaining, unmetered users are unable to switch to meters because their properties do not allow it. They do not necessarily use large amounts of water or choose to avoid installing a meter in the hope of saving money. Many of them are poor, and the problem has been of concern to the Minister, who has spoken about it publicly in the past few days. Such users face an even bigger rise of 8.7 per cent. and will pay £686 on average. That figure will go up all the time because the more people switch to meters, the higher the charge for those who are still unmetered.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): The recently announced rises have meant that some people in my constituency—and, I suspect, in my hon. Friend's constituency and in others in Cornwall—now use almost 10 per cent. of their disposable income to meet their water bills. Given that those are combined with energy, council tax, food and other bills, it is becoming a massive problem for a lot of households on unmetered supplies.

Matthew Taylor: My hon. Friend is spot on. To give an example, the average bill of a south-west pensioner on a meter suggests that they will spend almost 10 per cent. of their pension on water bills. For those who are unmetered, the average bill implies that they will spend 15 per cent. People in my area have the lowest incomes in the country, so the impact is felt much more broadly. In London, where wages are much higher, bills are much lower—the average bill is £304.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): Of course, none of this should come as news to the Government. In 2004, their cross-governmental review of water affordability found that a single pensioner living on the minimum pension credit and paying an average South West Water water and sewerage bill would be required to use 7 per cent. of their disposable income. The question is why the Government have done nothing before now.

Matthew Taylor: There is a real concern that there has been precious little progress on this subject over 10 years of Labour government. As I say, there is an opportunity for substantial change, and that is what I am looking for. There has been some effort at mitigation, as my hon. Friend knows, and I shall talk about that in a moment. Nevertheless, more fundamental change is needed.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): It is interesting that the penetration of water meters in the south-west is the mirror image of that in the rest of the country, where 70 per cent. of water is unmetered. The privatisation of water, as the hon. Gentleman prophetically indicated all those years ago, has been something of a disaster in many senses. Since that era, UK-wide household demand for water has gone up by about 55 per cent. Does he have any statistics showing whether that figure is lower in the south-west because of the higher penetration of water meters?

Matthew Taylor: I do not have the figure, but I suspect that it is lower, and there is evidence that people with meters use somewhat less water, for obvious reasons. Irrespective of the introduction of water meters, however, there has been a universal increase in water usage because of the move to dishwashers, washing machines and all those other things that make quite intensive use of water. In the long term, part of the solution to the problem of keeping bills down is to make more sensible use of water, and I shall come to some of the big issues that that raises.

Having debated this issue in the House in April 2007, I and other hon. Members from across the parties had a meeting with the Minister before Christmas. It was a positive meeting, and he made some very positive comments, but we now need to move forward and to take action.

The results of Ofwat's consultation on its approach to the current price review—PR09—are due out next week. New price limits for 2010-15 will be calculated over the coming months and will be published next year. Ofwat is also consulting on its future strategy for customer charges for water and sewerage services. As I said, the Government have also published their strategy, "Future Water". Over the coming year, therefore, many of the issues will be fundamentally settled for the short term. As I said, Ofwat is looking much longer term and it is asking companies to do the same, which is welcome. We are talking not just about the next five years, so this is a decisive moment.

I want to address two core issues. One is fairer ways of dividing the costs, and the other is better ways of dealing with the costs—particularly diffuse pollution and climate change—in the first place so that we can bring down water bills in the long run, rather than simply redividing them. In that sense, I want to talk about solutions, not the history of the problem.

The best way to shift the burden from customers in the south-west—I have always argued this and I will say it again because I could not possibly take part in such a debate without saying it—would be to redistribute the costs more fairly across the country. The principle on which the Conservatives undertook privatisation, which landed 3 per cent. of the population with a third of the beach clean-up costs, was wrong. In the 1970s, the Labour party introduced legislation to allow costs to be shared across the country, but it was never used; indeed, it was also the Labour party that ultimately removed that legislation. The millions of people across the country who visit the south-west and who regard the country's beaches as a national asset are paying nothing or very little towards the clean-up costs. The burden falls on a relatively small number of people; hence the very large bills.

I should like a mechanism for redistributing more evenly across the country the environmental costs of maintaining a landscape that is part of the national heritage. It could be done through the benefits system—I know that South West Water has advocated that—or through national funds. I know that as the Conservative Government started to lose seats across the south-west they began to consider whether more funds could be put in, but that the suggestion was turned down at Cabinet level, despite a recommendation from the Secretary of State. The issue destroyed the Conservative party in the west country and it could still cause great difficulties for Labour Members there.

The principle in question is already accepted: Northern Ireland water bills are capped with UK taxpayer funds. It is accepted in relation to Scotland's electricity bills, with prices capped by UK funds. I do not understand why Ministers always argue that there is a problem in principle. Indeed, in the last debate, the then Minister suggested that a national fund to meet the extra costs in the south-west could weaken the link between South West Water and its customers. To be honest, that is a link that South West Water customers would be only too happy to have weakened. It could be argued that it would create a new link between them and the Government, which they might feel was more appropriate.

The argument that all areas at one time or another must pay more for necessary costs will not wash either. It is true that different areas must pay for different investment at different times, but the south-west always pays the most, for the most investment. The suggestion that the situation is a case of swings and roundabouts rings particularly hollow. We are always on the swing and everyone else is always on the roundabout, which is substantially cheaper.

I do not want to suggest that I have given up, but I know that the position I have set out is not accepted by the Government or the previous Conservative Government, so I have some suggestions for things that could be done even if the Minister does not follow the route I have outlined.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I ask the hon. Gentleman to imagine waking up tomorrow as Environment Minister in a Liberal Democrat Government. What would his party do? Would he do what he invites the Minister to do, and ask those of us in landlocked constituencies to pay for the clean-up in other parts of the country? Is that what he says a Liberal Democrat Government would do? With local elections coming up, it would be interesting to know the implications of a Liberal Democrat Government for water bills throughout the country.

Matthew Taylor: If the cost were spread across the country the implication for water bills would be extremely small and the benefit for people in the south-west would be extremely large. When the Conservatives privatised water they promised that what I have been talking about would not happen. They said that they had put enough money in the pot from privatisation receipts to pay for the clean-up. That was a national receipt, which, it was implied, was a contribution from around the country. The Conservatives got it wrong: they calculated the money wrongly. They landed South West Water customers with higher charges and lost most of their seats in the south-west as a result. I think that the hon. Lady should apologise for the Conservatives' record, rather than complaining that someone is trying to get something done about it. Had they done something, they would have more seats now.

There are various routes by which what I suggest could be done. One would be to make the benefits system responsive to the cost of water bills, as it is to other charges, such as council tax in particular, which people pay differentially in different parts of the country, so that people in high council tax areas get more benefit. No one complains about that principle and I do not think that the hon. Lady wants to change it. I see no reason why the same principle should not apply in the case that I am talking about. However, I also want to talk about ways of mitigating the cost, which would reduce the impact on everyone.

Miss McIntosh: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Matthew Taylor: The hon. Lady can explain what the Conservative party has to offer in her speech later.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the difficulties is that there is no help in the benefits system for anyone who experiences the problem that he describes? Does he also agree that many of the constituents of the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) have no doubt visited Cornwall and enjoyed the wonderful beaches there and in Devon?

Matthew Taylor: Indeed. It is possible that the hon. Member for Vale of York has done the same.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): With a seaside constituency myself, I have great sympathy with the hon. Gentleman, and I greatly admire his consistent fight on the issue; he is right. However, the real failure is not privatisation, and it is not to do with looking back—although the detail could have been better. Nor is it the fact that the water companies and Ofwat, the regulator, allowed prices to increase. Prices had to increase to pay for pipes to be mended, for reinvestment, and for conserving and helping the environment. The real failure was not finding a viable alternative for unmetered users. I hope that he will get to grips with the specifics of what can be done, so that we can work together, across the House of Commons, with the Minister, who has this weekend been pushing on the matter, to find a solution.

Matthew Taylor: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment, although I am not sure that I would use the word "detail" to describe the errors made in privatisation. In my part of the world, that detail is regarded as pretty fundamental. Apart from that, I agree with much of what he said.

I do indeed want to turn to the discussion of practical measures, which I think the Minister is open to considering. Indeed, in last year's debate the Government confirmed that they were working with Ofwat, water companies and the Consumer Council for Water, to consider charging options and alternative tariffs, and that a working group including the Treasury, Ofwat, the water companies and Consumer Council for Water representatives had been set up to advise on fairer charging for lower-income groups. The latest water strategy document makes a commitment to commissioning an independent review of metering and charging. The problem is that water customers everywhere will be wondering quite how many Government reviews it takes to change a water bill. It would be nice to move from reviewing to doing, and I shall make some suggestions along those lines.

We have a charging system that needs a complete overhaul. That can be easily demonstrated with the examples that I have given from the south-west. Changes have taken place in the past few years in an attempt at mitigation. The vulnerable groups tariff, for example, means that people can apply to pay on a tariff that reflects average charges, or lower, if they are particularly vulnerable. However, it is too narrow in its reach. It excludes the many low-income households that have fewer than three children, or that live just above the income benefit threshold. Not only that: for those who qualify, bills are capped only to the average for the area, which in the south-west is still above what is affordable, when we consider that the families are by definition in very low-income groups and highly vulnerable. Some steps could be taken in that regard, if the Government were to work with Ofwat and the Consumer Council for Water to change views on cross-subsidy, to allow innovative tariffs to assist with affordability. For example, South West Water has argued that there would be a benefit from a national scheme funded through a levy on all bills, as happens in the energy sector, with the Warm Front scheme. Again, I do not understand why those national levies are regarded as acceptable in one sector but not in the water sector, where bills are similarly high and where the environmental issues and reduction of water use are of similar importance.

Under Ofwat rules, it is very difficult to target specific groups, and the result is that the help that is available can help the multimillionaire in a penthouse as much as the single pensioner in a council house. That is to do with how the water regulation system was worked out, and also with the way Ofwat interprets it. I think that change is needed.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman briefly consider the strengths or weaknesses of the increasing block tariff, which allows for cheap basic water for essential purposes, and rather higher rates beyond that, which may be seasonally adjusted as well? That seems to have considerable attractions, does not it?

Matthew Taylor: As it happens, that was exactly where I was about to turn in my remarks, but I wanted to outline the context to some of the targeted measures, because even for a rising block tariff it would probably be necessary for measures to address the needs of the most vulnerable, whether through the benefits system or specific changes in tariffs to affect individuals. Indeed, we know that that would be true for those with disabilities or large families, who may need to use relatively large amounts of water. We need a system sensitive to that. One option is a system that shares data so that water companies can adjust bills according to data from the benefits system, for example. If the Government believe that that is not possible, the regulator has suggested that such households should be able to apply for help. My concern with applying for help is that, as we know, means-tested and application-based systems such as help with council tax are not taken up by many of the most vulnerable. Frankly, though, anything would be better than the current circumstances.

As the hon. Gentleman suggests, the possibilities of a rising block tariff are strong. There is a strong consensus about that among most south-west MPs and a lot of interest among MPs throughout the country. I know that the Government are considering it. It would mean that metered households paid an affordable amount for their first block of water. People would pay a set charge and get in return enough water for a normal household for the year, and if they used large amounts of water—if they had a swimming pool or left their sprinklers on in the garden all through the summer—they would pay much higher charges. It is those later blocks, which would incur higher charges, that add so much to the cost for the water companies. They require a greater draw on reservoirs, higher system capacity and more purification and treatment and waste water.

The rising block tariff makes sense from an environmental point of view, it makes sense for charging and, most of all, it makes sense for ordinary hard-pressed families in water bill areas, particularly in the highest-priced area, the south-west. Specific affordability tariffs will be needed for certain groups, and we must consider how best to put those in place. On a particularly bright note, from my point of view, it also means that we would get rid of the situation in which tens of thousands of second home owners in the south-west, realising that they are not at home very much to use water, have fitted water meters and pay next to nothing for their water bills, even though the reason why they are there is to use the beaches that have been so expensively cleaned up. Under rising block tariffs, people would have to pay for the year's water, and therefore for the clean-up of beaches, whether or not they resided there enough to use it. Although opinions may differ on that, it would be given a big thumbs up in our part of the world if the Minister did it.

Rising block tariffs would also be extremely good for the environment. The World Wildlife Fund predicts that they could reduce demand by at least 10 per cent. and by up to 30 per cent. in summer. That would cut the cost of treatment, which would lower bills. WWF says:

> "We need to move on the issue of water charging and we need to move quickly. There are plenty of ideas on the table, and we need to start making them work for the customer."

Miss McIntosh: The WWF, the briefing of which the hon. Gentleman is reading, has obviously been busy preparing for the debate. It is keen on rolling out full metering. I should think that everybody present wants a more sustainable water policy and supply that is more in kilter with demand. So far, he has said nothing about the benefits for his constituents of rolling out metering. Is he minded to turn to that?

Matthew Taylor: I am keen on rolling out metering; that is the short answer. In the South West Water area, 60 per cent. of people are on meters, twice as many as in the rest of the country. The reason is that people want to mitigate high bills, so the incentives are that much stronger. To be fair, in the early days when it was discretionary, we had a much more flexible approach to the installation of meters in our part of the world than in other places, where people faced high charges if they got it wrong and had no opportunity to change. That opportunity now exists. The remaining number consists in part of those who cannot fit water meters—there are quite big issues of practicality in some mansion blocks and so on that have shared water supplies—and those who believe that they benefit from not having one. The implication of what I said about the rising block tariff is that those who use large amounts of water should pay for it unless they have a disability or similar situation that justifies such use.

On water resources, everyone rightfully expects a continuous supply of clean, safe water to their homes and businesses, and they expect that water, once used, to be cleaned up before being released on to the beaches or the land. Delivering that supply despite the impacts of climate change and ongoing diffuse pollution is a challenge faced by the water industry. There is no doubt that tackling that challenge requires a new way of thinking and a move away from typical high-energy, end-of-pipe and highly chemical and capital-intensive solutions to an approach that uses soft engineering solutions and works with the natural landscape. A radical new approach, if delivered rightly, would give customers better value and lower bills in the long term as well as an infinitely better environment. With the growing impact of climate change, I do not believe that there is an alternative.

That is why I return to the Government's water strategy, "Future Water". It is an excellent review of the correctly identified core issues of tackling climate change and diffuse pollution. The strategy rightly acknowledges that if we are to protect our valuable and vulnerable water resources, we need to take a new approach to managing them, and that the European legislation, the water framework directive, pushes us to take such a holistic view of our water resources. People often suggest that such legislation comes from Europe, but the Government signed up to it, so it came from the Government in the first place. There is a clear Government approach.

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Phil Woolas): The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting and important speech. I should like to confirm for the record that not only was the water framework directive supported by the UK Government, but many of the measures in it were proposed by us. We welcome it. It is an example of why we need a good, joined-up European Union policy.

Matthew Taylor: I agree. Some years ago, when the Conservatives were in office, I took part in similar debates. Towards the end of those, as South West Water bills rocketed out of control and the Conservatives started losing seats, they moaned about European rules until I pointed out that they had issued a press release when the rules were drawn up claiming that the British Government had led the development of those rules, so there was not much for them to moan about. I am glad that the Minister does not blame others—

Mr. Woolas: On this occasion.

Matthew Taylor: That is the right approach. The policy is supported by Government, but also by non-governmental organisations and, at least in theory, by the industry. The change in approach will mean a move away from expensive, energy-intensive, temporary end-of-pipe treatment measures and towards less intrusive catchment management, in which water companies will develop working relationships with landowners, farmers and other stakeholders to prevent the quality of water from being lowered before it enters the water companies' systems, so that we do not need to tackle issues such as nitrates afterwards.

Adopting catchment management methodology, if it is delivered effectively, enables water companies to lower their expenditure on end-of-pipe treatment without the risk of compromising water quality or safety. Lower capital investment will then benefit the customer by lowering water bills in the long run. Furthermore, ending the need for end-of-pipe treatments will lower companies' carbon footprint and increase their environmental sustainability. It is a long-term solution, whereas capital investment needs constant renewal and expenditure.

Page 51 of "Future Water" says:

"We also encourage water companies to work with farmers to tackle pollution at source, for example where this is more cost effective than treating raw drinking water at the point of abstraction."

I could not agree more. Unfortunately—so far, at least—Ofwat could not agree less. That is a fundamental problem, and it is the reason for the debate. Ofwat said in its PR09 consultation:

"Water companies may see opportunities to address drinking water issues by encouraging changes to land management in the catchments", which is good. However, it went on to say that "we would not wish water consumers to offer a cross-subsidy to address third party pollution issues", and, specifically, that any proposals for expenditure would be considered only if the company owned the land.

Assuming that Ofwat does not want water companies to buy up agricultural land in every catchment and around every river, its fundamental criteria effectively block the very measures that the Government say are necessary, the water framework requires of water companies and many NGOs and water companies themselves accept are necessary. Ofwat is directly contradicting the Government view. That is clearly nonsensical, especially given that such measures are meant to reduce customer bills in the long run. I do not believe that customers in the south-west are saying, "We want a worse environment and higher bills, please," so why is the water regulator, which is charged with protecting customers' interests, standing in the way of such measures? The answer is that it has a very narrow, old-fashioned approach to the issues.

The traditional means of dealing with such problems have been expensive, but the alternatives can be cheaper. The water industry estimates that, since 1990, it has spent £1 billion on pesticide removal alone. Projects under way in the water supply areas of Bristol and Wessex Water show that working with farmers can reduce nitrate and pesticide pollution in ground-water. In northern England, upland moors and bogs are being restored over tens of thousands of acres to purify the water before it enters the system. South West Water is planning a number of such catchment management projects in PR09, with the support of organisations across the south-west, including national parks, the Environment Agency, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and a broad swathe of environmental organisations, but not, it seems, of Ofwat.

Other countries are doing it. New York state experimented on the relative value between water treatment and forestry and found that the latter provided better treatment at a much lower cost. So why is the regulator here standing in the way? Natural England, which carried out work on the subject for the Government, concluded from its study on the options raised by them that agriculture requires regulation changes, advice and incentives. If the water companies are not acting, whose responsibility is it to drive things forward? Who is going to provide the incentive to stakeholders, such as landowners and farmers, to change their practices? If the Government or Ofwat have a better idea, they should tell us.

There is no doubt that if we are successfully to adopt a more catchment-based approach to water resource management, we need to determine the payment mechanism and how to fund it in the long term. Water quality trading is one idea. However, those discussions need to take place now, while the Government and others are setting the agenda for the next five or 20 years. We cannot keep ducking the issue; it is time to make changes. The fundamental premise of any future water charging system should be that water companies can demonstrate to Ofwat that they are proposing the most efficient solution to deliver a specific outcome. It should be irrelevant whether that is a soft engineering solution, such as a wetland to improve water retention and remove pollutants, or a traditional capital intensive project. We should start from a level playing field.

The Government, non-governmental organisations, such as Wildlife and Countryside Link, which covers all the major NGOs, and Natural England all appear, to differing degrees, to agree that such upstream thinking and working with the environment is the way to go. The water framework requires a solution, but so far Ofwat seems to be offering nothing but roadblocks, although it told me at the weekend that it is reviewing its position, which I hope is true. I hope that following this debate and ministerial discussions, Ofwat will change its negative position.

The best reason to favour such schemes is that they are the cheapest way to achieve the required performance, which is entirely consistent with water sector regulatory incentives. To be fair to Ofwat, the PR09 consultation opens that possibility: it produced its 25-year strategic direction statement, to replace the five-year plans, which proved so inadequate; it is encouraging water companies to adopt a longer-term perspective; and it is offering water companies the ability to offer alternative strategies alongside their business plans to show how things could be done differently. The vast majority of water companies have published their SDSs—only a couple are still to come—and they all talk about such holistic approaches. However, it is up to the Government and the regulator to ensure that their words are translated into action.

Most companies, frankly, are paying lip service to the issues and not offering practical solutions, although that is not the case with all of them. I am delighted that for once we can boast about water companies, rather than complain: Wessex Water and Anglian Water are planning catchment solutions. However, they still do not know whether Ofwat will simply block them, and certainly most water companies are not yet committed to such new approaches. We must move beyond platitudes, warm words and ministerial reviews, and actually take action. Publication of the Government's strategy is helpful and the Ofwat review is the time to take action. Let us change things now before water customers suffer further unnecessary rises in bills and the environment continues to deteriorate.

10.5 am

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing this debate—there probably is no subject of greater interest to constituents in the south-west—and particularly on the way he discussed the long-term solutions and opportunities available at this critical point for dealing with an intractable problem. I welcome the line that the Minister has taken since taking up his post and, in particular, the very thorough and good report, "Future Water". I agree with the hon. Gentleman on its quality.

The debate has been given momentum, perhaps not by our problems in the south-west, but by the need to consider metering—perhaps mandatory metering—and specific charging tariffs, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, which can provide fairer bills generally and go a long way to protecting vulnerable customers. The move to metering and smart metering—the latter also needs to be on the agenda—is being given momentum by companies facing drought measures. Compulsory metering is being applied to water companies in the south-east owing to water scarcity, and some water companies will be following a full metering programme.

In water company areas other than the south-west, where water scarcity has been a problem for a very long time, that will create issues of affordability, particularly for householders in low rateable value properties. They pay proportionately less for their water now, but will find that their bills increase under metering, although on nothing like the scale faced in the south-west, where bills are £100 more than the average. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that they can be in the region of £500 or £600, but recently I have seen bills for £700 and £800, which are not uncommon in low-income households. I would therefore welcome any action that can be taken.

I shall discuss the metering and charging review and set out three issues that I would like the Minister to take in, or at least focus on. He has set out five goals—for the sake of time, I shall not repeat them all, because I know that other hon. Members want to speak. The first goal is to assess the effectiveness and fairness of charging methods, which is essential, given current trends in water metering and for the reasons set out by the hon. Gentleman. As set out in the second goal, following trials, we must also consider the effectiveness of different types of social and block tariff, paying particular attention to how they can affect vulnerable households. The remaining goals relate to pace of change, universal metering—we have heard how two thirds of people in the south-west are already on meters—and the cost of metering, including smart metering. Our metering policy must also take into account the social cost of carbon emissions, because climate change is, of course, a big issue, and any policy that takes account of it is a winner. We also need to look closely at the cost of different options. On the introduction of any such policy nationwide, the Minister must recognise that, through South West Water, twice as many customers in our region have meters already; otherwise we will yet again be on the losing side. The review will consider whether legislation is needed for charging or metering.

The current list focuses on tariff types and metering, but it ignores the benefits of improving water efficiency inside the home, which Eaga did so much to explore in the south-west's affordability pilot. The pilot showed that one can reduce the amount of water used in the home by an average of 11 per cent., as the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs report on it sets out. The saving can make a difference to the bills that vulnerable households receive, and to the water company through reduced energy costs and less stress on water resources. Put another way, if the pilot measures were adopted throughout all homes in London, a further 200,000 homes could be built without any more demand on the water and sewerage resources—another win-win situation.

Julia Goldsworthy: The hon. Lady makes a very important point but does she agree that, although the pilot was important in ensuring that people on low incomes access all the benefits to which they are entitled and use their water efficiently, that alone will not resolve the fundamental structural problem?

Linda Gilroy: I certainly agree with the hon. Lady, and in the other two points I will make, I hope to show the way in which my proposals are a package. If that package cannot solve all the problems, it can certainly make a significant difference to the problems that we have faced for many years.

On the second goal of the review, I welcome the intention to "consider the effectiveness of different types of tariff" and

"to see how they can help vulnerable households."

However, the review must go further. It must consider the different water companies' effectiveness in ensuring that vulnerable households access the tariffs that are designed to protect them. Without the review of that issue, the best-designed tariffs in the world will prove ineffective at helping the most vulnerable households. To give a sense of the scale of the issue, the Consumer Council for Water recently estimated that, of the 400,000 households thought to be eligible for vulnerable persons regulations—that is a ball park figure—as few as 16,420 are registered to benefit from the tariff. More must be done to increase drastically the proportion of eligible households that benefit from it.

Matthew Taylor: I completely share the hon. Lady's view on that point, which is why, if we go down the route of the rising block tariff, it is important that information be shared with the water companies so that support can be given as automatically as possible, rather than claimed, as Ofwat says it must be. All the evidence shows that when it must be claimed, the most vulnerable rarely get it.

Linda Gilroy: That is correct, and no doubt adopting a rising block tariff—I shall be brief because the hon. Gentleman has already dealt with it in detail—would reduce the number of households that were eligible for the vulnerable persons regulations. The tariff caps at a certain level people who are on a metered charge. The two measures would work hand-in-hand, but because it will be some years before we see the benefits of any new policy—apart from anything else, it would require the even wider introduction of meters—something should be done now to place upon the companies an obligation to increase drastically the uptake of the vulnerable persons regulations. That should be done by setting targets for uptake. I know that there are hon. Members—some probably in this Chamber—who object to targets, but that would be one very good target to introduce.

As the Minister knows, the all-party group on water is conducting an inquiry at this critical time, for all the reasons that the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell set out. I understand that the Minister will attend the launch of our report on 2 April, and I hope that everybody here today will also attend. During the course of the inquiry, our noble Friend Lord Whitty, who is one of the team, along with the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) and the former Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), asked whether it would be possible "to extend the definition of customer service" as a performance target in the price review to include

"looking after our most vulnerable customers".

That would be one way of ensuring that more was done.

I also make a plea to set the vulnerable persons regulations cap not at the regional average, which still gives people in the south-west a cap that is £100 higher than the average, but at the national average. Although compulsory metering can bring in tariffs, in the meantime we must do something about the vulnerable persons regulations, and in the long term we must also consider the situation of people who will not be helped by compulsory metering but will still have large bills. After all that is done, we must still examine the benefits system. I urge the Minister to consult Ministers in the Department for Work and Pensions on that issue, so that we do not still have a significant group of people whose problems have not been resolved, even when we have secured long-term solutions to this intractable problem. He must ensure that he talks to his colleagues and that they talk to him about the likely residual problem, so that it can be dealt with.

Overall, the water package enables us to see some light at the end of the tunnel. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is doing a great deal, that he has studied carefully the links with the programme for energy conservation in homes, and that he is a strong believer in the need to tackle both matters at the same time. That would be very helpful, because far too many of our constituents still pay not just 10 per cent. of their income for water, but 20 per cent., 25 per cent. and even occasionally more than that, for their utility bills, including fuel and water.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy). She has done a huge amount of work through her membership of the all-party group on water, as her remarks demonstrate, and she clearly has an in-depth understanding of the issue.

I shall not repeat the arguments that we have heard, but I shall make a few brief remarks, because water is an issue that is rising up everyone's agenda. It will certainly rise up my constituents' agenda, because their council tax, energy and water bills will rise above inflation. Water is one factor that is contributing to a squeeze on people's income, and it must be addressed.

Water was the most significant issue that constituents raised with me before I was elected, and it has been since, just as it has been for my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor). It is fantastic that it has risen up the Government's agenda, too: they now have their "Future Water" strategy, which they published just a month ago, and Ofwat is conducting a review. I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate, because the worry is that the Government's primary concern is to deal with water-stressed areas. If one reads "Future Water", one sees lots about improving environmental standards and dealing with water-stressed areas; however, in the south-west, the fundamental problem is not availability of water, but the cost owing to the fundamental structural problems that existed at the point of privatisation.

My hon. Friend has done a great job of ensuring that water affordability is on the agenda. Although it is great that it has made it into the Government's "Future Water" strategy, it is tagged on to a few pages at the back, and there is a danger that now that is in the document, it will be overlooked. I hope that that will not be the case. Following the meeting with the Minister before Christmas, it was fantastic to see water affordability included in the Government' strategy, but as I said the key thing is to make sure that it does not slide off the agenda.

There have been some other concessions in the past few years. The water affordability pilot has helped households across the whole South West Water area. Tribute must be paid to the way that South West Water has pushed that pilot forward: it has really driven forward the agenda by ensuring that as many households as possible are opened up to the scheme. It is continuing to roll the scheme out to make it available to as many people as possible, and the company has made every effort to be as helpful as it possibly can to individuals who come to me for help.

Linda Gilroy: I am not sure whether the hon. Lady was as surprised as I was to discover how much people could gain from the work of the water affordability pilot, which, of course, included a benefits check. A third of the 462 people who received that check were eligible for an extra £33.98 a week. I hope that she will encourage her constituents, as I encourage mine, to establish whether they may be entitled to some of that financial help.

Julia Goldsworthy: I thank the hon. Lady for making that point. I certainly try to emphasise to constituents who come to my advice surgeries expressing concern about the difficulty that they have in paying their bills the benefits that the pilot scheme could bring. It makes me wonder whether the scheme has ended up being a lot more expensive than the Government had planned, because not only is it helping to improve the efficiency of people's water use, but it has highlighted how many people are not claiming the benefits to which they are entitled. That goes back to one of the points made earlier about the need to ensure that data are shared: certainly, a large number of households are not benefiting from entitlements that they should be receiving.

[Julia Goldsworthy]

There has been some progress, but I am afraid that this feels a bit like "Groundhog Day" to me, because that this is probably the third or fourth debate that we have had on this issue since I was elected to Parliament in 2005. In many areas, it feels like one is stuck going round in circles, or perhaps stuck in one of those telephone systems where different menu options keep being presented, but every time an option is selected, one ends up going back to another menu option that directs one back to the start. I would like to give a couple of examples of that type of problem.

In addition to debates in Westminster Hall, we have had the opportunity of meeting with both Ofwat and Ministers. Those meetings have always been conducted on a cross-party basis, because there is a real strength of feeling across the south-west on this issue. On several occasions, Ofwat has directed us to the Minister, saying, "We are just operating the regulatory framework, you will have to speak to the Minister." We then speak to a Minister in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, who says, "Of course I can look at this, but ultimately it is the Treasury that decides." So then we try to meet a Treasury Minister, but we are directed back to DEFRA and back to where we started. That has been a cause of real frustration, and we are yet to secure a meeting with a representative from the Treasury. If the Minister can give us any kind of reassurance that that meeting might happen, many of us would be very happy.

There is also frustration about the fact that water poverty is not recognised as being of equal importance to other poverty issues. Fuel poverty is the obvious example, and there are many clear parallels to be drawn with that in terms of the impact that water bills have on those with the lowest incomes and the benefits to the environment that could be achieved by improving water efficiency. I have concerns about how Warm Front operates as a national scheme and about its ability to identify isolated, vulnerable households.

Fuel poverty is a problem that has been recognised; there is a winter fuel allowance. In 2004 the Government's "Cross-Government Review of Water Affordability Report" identified the fact that by 2010

> "a single pensioner household living on the minimum Pension Credit and paying an average South West water and sewerage bill may be required to pay 7 per cent. of disposable income".

So we knew four years ago that, for those pensioners, water bills will be at least as big an issue, if not a greater one, than their fuel bills, yet there is no comparable scheme to provide assistance to them. I am not entirely sure why water poverty is not being recognised by the Government in their actions.

The Government are also trying to hit their own target on child poverty. Tackling water affordability in the south-west is one of the key measures needed to allow the Government to hit that target, but responses to the parliamentary questions that I have tabled do not make it clear whether water poverty has any input to the working of the child poverty unit. I found it difficult enough to understand how the unit works, given that the Treasury is responsible for targets on child poverty, yet the answering Department for questions on the unit is the Department for Children, Schools and Families, and the Department for Work and Pensions takes a lead in providing resources for the unit. Again, one feels like one is going round in a circle when trying to work out whom to ask to ensure that water poverty is included for consideration by the child poverty unit. When I asked that question explicitly in November 2007, the answer that I received was:

> "The child poverty public service agreement (PSA) sets out the strategic priorities for Government in tackling child poverty including...reducing poverty through raising incomes, and tackling poor living conditions."—[Official Report, 26 November 2007; Vol. 468, c. 56-7W.]

A variety of other measures are given, but water poverty is not explicitly mentioned. Will Minister reassure us today that water poverty is actively being considered by the child poverty unit, and that his Department is making representations to the unit to ensure that water poverty is firmly on its agenda?

I would like to give one other example from very recent experience of talking to people who have been affected by water quality problems and who are feeling real frustration about the way the operation of different Departments has made it very difficult to provide a joined-up approach to or even an understanding of the potential effect of the issue of water quality. On Friday, I spoke to some mussel farmers in my constituency who work on the River Fal. A series of areas that they work in have been downgraded by the Food Standards Agency because of the flesh samples that have been taken from the mussels, which means that the mussels must be moved somewhere else before they can be sold. That creates additional cost for the mussel farmers that threatens their livelihood. The FSA's analysis of the mussels clearly shows that the incidence of a harmful bacterium—E. coli, I think—is rising, which is affecting the water quality. However, the Environment Agency is saying that water quality standards in these areas are improving, so nothing is being done to try to tackle the underlying problem, even though it is manifesting in the quality of mussel flesh. Once again, there is frustration that different Departments and bodies are not working in a joined-up way, and people are finding themselves going round in circles.

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton and my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell have gone into some detail about the type of solutions that we need to deal with water problems. The type of environmental solutions that my hon. Friend mentioned—the use of capital-intensive resources to purify water—would help not only water bill payers, but the mussel farmers on the Fal. Such environmental solutions are long-term measures that need to be actively pursued, and it is great to see them included in the Government's strategy.

Linda Gilroy: I thank the hon. Lady for giving me the opportunity to refer to what the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) said in his opening speech. He gave a very good account of the challenges and the potential costs of meeting those challenges. Do the Liberal Democrats welcome the fact that Labour was the only party to have anything on water in our 2005 manifesto? We aimed to ensure that the costs of diffuse water pollution and dealing with it were laid at the point of the polluter and not at the customer.

Julia Goldsworthy: I am very disappointed that the hon. Lady has not read the environment part of our manifesto, which raised some of these issues. I have been charitable to her in praising work on raising this issue, and I think that it is uncharitable of her to imply that the Liberal Democrat MPs in the south-west have been doing nothing, when my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell has been campaigning on this issue for the past 20 years and has been our environment spokesperson at various times.

Linda Gilroy: I certainly appreciate what the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell has been doing. Both of us have been campaigning on this issue since the water industry was privatised. I did not mean to be at all curmudgeonly about the contribution that the Liberal Democrats make. I would also point out that there is no Conservative Back Bencher here, and Conservative Back Benchers do not attend the cross-party meetings with the Minister, although they are invited to them.

Julia Goldsworthy: The hon. Lady is correct. It is interesting to note that although the Conservatives are well represented in the south-west, both in the area covered by South West Water and in the Government region, not a single one of those Members is here to comment on this issue. That is disappointing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell spoke about long-term solutions. Obviously, the only permanent solution will be some kind of equalisation measure that spreads the burden more fairly. As the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend have said, the take-up of the vulnerable groups tariff is higher in the south-west than in any other part of the country; however, there are still plenty of people who could benefit from it but are not taking it up. As the average cost used to calculate the tariff is an average of South West Water bills, which are the highest, people on the tariff still face high bills. We need a permanent solution to the problem, and we must recognise that more could be done to support vulnerable groups.

The use of a rising block tariff would spread the burden more fairly, but, ultimately, it would not get around the structural problem that has left South West Water bill payers in their current situation. We need to be explicit about the fact that a rising block tariff should recognise different groups, so there would not be a continuation of the current situation in which second home owners benefit from the infrastructure that is provided to their doors, but pay the lowest bills because they are not there to use resources. Any tariff system would have to take that into account.

Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): The mention of second homes has tempted me to intervene on my hon. Friend. Second home owners would no doubt comment, and I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree, that as they are not there all the time, they do not place the same demand on the water system as those who are. However, the problem is at times of peak demand. Despite all the investment by South West Water, the sewage processing system in some parts of the south-west is increasingly under strain at peak times. Even though people do not live in those second homes all the time, the infrastructure has to be able to cope at peak times, and a rising block tariff system would mean that second home owners made a fair contribution.

Julia Goldsworthy: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I have run out of time, so I will conclude. There have been encouraging signs from the Government, but we would like them to take real action, sooner rather than later, to help us to break out of what has been a frustrating cycle. I hope that the Minister will convince us that the cycle has been broken.

10.32 am

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing the debate, which, as he said, is not the first on this issue. His determination and persistence in dealing with this matter, over many years, on behalf of his constituents do him enormous credit.

Some of the issues that are relevant to the debate are specific to the south-west peninsular. Hon. Members from Cornwall enjoy a national asset in their stunning landscapes and coastlines, and as a user of the county's beaches, I, personally, do not begrudge the people of Cornwall a mechanism by which to redistribute more fairly the cost of keeping those beaches clean. I certainly would not object to second home owners paying a fairer share.

Linda Gilroy: Is that a manifesto commitment?

Martin Horwood: I did use the word "personally".

As my hon. Friend said, 2008 is a crunch year in relation to setting policies for the decades ahead. The Government's water strategy is at a critical point. There is shared awareness that our current approach to water is unsustainable and that climate change will make the need for action only more urgent. Several environmental organisations have come together under the umbrella of the "Blueprint for Water" and identified a series of policy opportunities that will be present in 2008 that could put us on a more realistic and sustainable path.

First, the Government's water strategy provides a welcome opportunity to review social and environmental guidance to Ofwat. The issue of surface water drainage will coincide with the final report of the Pitt review and the Government's response to it. As 600 households in my constituency were flooded last summer, I am particularly interested in those documents. The control of the amount of phosphates in domestic laundry products, which sounds like a narrow issue, is a welcome reminder that climate change is not the only environmental issue that we face.

Other policies this year will have an impact on water usage, including the finalisation of regional spatial strategies. In Gloucestershire, the RSS response to the widespread flooding there was to increase its housing allocation to 56,000, thereby increasing urbanisation and, quite possibly, the risk of flooding. That is a strange and unjoined-up piece of Government thinking.

The EU water framework directive requires all member states to restore the ecology of their rivers, lakes and wetlands by 2015, for which member states' draft plans, including that of the UK Government, are needed this year. The mid-term review of the common agricultural policy will provide a Europe-wide opportunity to address pollution and ecology in relation to agriculture, which impacts on water. Above all, the periodic review of water prices—PR09—provides a blueprint for water, that identifies an opportunity to "protect nationally and internationally important wetland sites by amending or revoking damaging abstraction licences and taking action on water quality; take forward large-scale water efficiency programmes; and tackle water quality problems at source through catchment management initiatives that offer many benefits for biodiversity and the environment."

Those comments chime with what my hon. Friend said in his speech, and I commend them all to the Minister.

Currently, there is not a good example of joined-up thinking. Perhaps the combination of PR09 and the water strategy offers something deeper: the opportunity for a complete rethink on the role of Ofwat and its relationship with the water companies, consumers and the environment, which is needed. My hon. Friend spoke about the need for a more imaginative approach to land use from Ofwat, to deliver clean water at lower cost and with a lower environmental impact. I commend that idea to the Minister. Let me give an example from Gloucestershire.

During last summer's floods, Severn Trent reassured the Gloucestershire people that the guaranteed standards scheme would compensate them for the loss of their water supply following the loss of the Mythe water treatment works. However, it later reneged on that assurance, denying compensation that would have cost it about £10 million, simultaneously assuring City investors that their £300 million profits would not be unduly affected by the floods. Astonishingly, Ofwat has so far backed Severn Trent—I say so far because my conversations with Ofwat on this issue continue—on the grounds that the floods were beyond its control. That is true, but all floods are beyond the control of water companies, and they are explicitly included in the guaranteed standards scheme. The submissions to Pitt from the police and others show that Severn Trent's response to the flooding of the Mythe contrasted quite sharply with National Grid's ability to notify emergency services in time to protect the Walham substation and prevent flooding there.

Perhaps the fundamental problem is that Ofwat's remit is from a bygone era of privatisation, when the economic viability of water companies was the top priority, rather than consumers' interests and the protection of the environment. The Government's water strategy statement, "Future Water", looks complacent on that front, because it baldly states that the "current regulatory framework for water works well and has delivered real social and environmental benefits."

However, I have some more examples. Ofwat still pursues the concept of an economic level of leakage, as though the millions of gallons of water that are leaked by the likes of Thames Water would be acceptable if that could be proved to be economic. The energy used to clean and pump water is wasted entirely if a huge percentage is leaked. That is no longer acceptable in the era in which we are supposed to be tackling climate change.

Energy is also wasted if a huge proportion of the water that reaches people's houses and offices is flushed down the toilet. I acknowledge that the Government are beginning to take action on that issue, but that is happening painfully slowly. Why are not rainwater harvesting and grey-water recycling, which are relatively cheap to install in new builds but expensive to fit retrospectively, compulsory in all new buildings?

My hon. Friend pointed out that metering would help. He also explained how it could be combined with increasing block tariffs to safeguard the less well-off in society. The Government accept that fitting meters will, on average, reduce household water consumption by about 10 per cent. Priority areas for water metering should be those where water is scarce and where bills are high, such as in the south-west, but if we factor into the equation energy use, as well as water use, the argument for universal metering becomes unanswerable. But on this issue, again, despite years of discussion there is to be yet another review.

The combination of metering and the laissez-faire regulatory approach will have social impacts. I do not have time to explore the relevant options except to commend many of the recommendations based on combining tariffs or benefits and learning from the affordability pilot in the south-west. Obviously, the answer to many of the questions will probably be yet more consultation, but the Government must be aware, after years of debate on such issues, that consultation is not a substitute for action but a recipe for continued social and environmental harm, while we all wait for them finally to act.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing this debate. I also congratulate him on the expertise that he has built up over the years. Any Yorkshireman would be shocked that Cornwall could even begin to compete with the wealth of resources that we have on our beaches in North Yorkshire, let alone the whole of Yorkshire. I await what the Minister will say but hope that this does not turn into a war of the roses.

Moving rapidly on, one thing that this debate has established is that the demand for household water has risen by 55 per cent. since 1980, and that the trend is set to increase. Water metering should be seen as part of an integrated approach to providing information and helping to adapt consumer behaviour. I do not see any reason why a rising block system could not be introduced without universal smart meters, and I hope that the introduction of smart meters does not require us to be too smart in using them. The concept of meters that are able to talk to each other so that households, whatever their income, will be able to see, particularly in the coldest months of the year, their consumption of all utilities is exciting.

On affordability, I draw attention to the fact that there is currently a vulnerable groups tariff: metered households in receipt of certain state benefits who have three or more dependent children and people with certain medical conditions should pay no more than the average charge for their region. We should all draw attention to that. A vulnerable groups workshop in September 2006 produced recommendations that I find very persuasive: tariff and associated information should be given more positive branding, application forms and guidance should be simplified and standardised, and all relevant parties, including the Department for Work and Pensions, should collaborate in targeted publicity. The recommendations also stated that there is a strong argument for extending qualification to include pensioners. I should like to ask the Minister, having heard this debate, what discussions he has had with his opposite number in the DWP in the context of the 2009 review and the consultations on and reviews of the water strategy. It strikes me, particularly when talking about those on benefits and the plight of pensioners, that the recommendations bear some regard.

The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell focused heavily on beaches, for reasons which are perfectly understandable. Perhaps I ought to declare an interest: I was an MEP for 10 years and probably dealt with the European Union bathing directive, drinking water directive and several other directives. In my time as the representative for the whole of the Essex coast, I handed out a blue flag to one of the beaches on behalf of the district council.

I make a plea to the Minister and to all hon. Members who have taken part in the debate to consider the implications of the price review for sewerage and water supply generally. I have some sympathy with South West Water customers, but I am a Yorkshire Water customer. I have had a series of meetings with the company, and I pay tribute to the work that it did in the clean-up exercise, given the number of houses in one city alone—Hull—that were flooded last year. Our price change involves an increase of 7.5 per cent., which may dwarf even the South West Water price increase.

Will the Minister say something about his adaptation agenda in the context of the price review and the water strategy generally? The Association of British Insurers has come up with its own adaptation agenda. It specifically asks for more investment in flood and coastal defences and in urban drainage and strengthened land-use planning.

The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell and his colleagues spoke about land use. There is some idea that we could move forward with that, in the context of the Ofwat review. Does the Minister accept that water companies could play a role in slowing water down by co-operating with the landowners and farmers who work the land and allowing some water to be retained on that land? Is it possible or feasible for water companies to do that, or is it even appropriate for them to do so?

The concept of storing water on land upstream to prevent flooding downstream is worth exploring. It is not something that we want Yorkshire Water to do, but it is something that we are looking at in my constituency. As the Minister well knows, Thirsk was flooded twice within five years. One business there is now unable to get any insurance cover at all. There is a flood alleviation scheme—I know that this is not about the price review—but we felt a bit aggrieved when, having worked for five or six years to get Cod Beck enmained, we found that the Government changed the point system, so that it did not matter that it was enmained. A different point system applied, so that Cod Beck was still not due to get money. It is worth exploring whether Yorkshire Water and other water companies, as the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell suggested, could work with landowners for the greater good of the local community.

As recently as 14 March, the Minister responded to one of our great concerns, which was reflected in the Pitt review recommendation. At present, water companies are obliged to offer all new developments—I believe that this probably relates to substantial new developments—the right to connect to the public sewerage system under section 104 of the Water Industry Act 1991. As the Minister is aware, one of the interim recommendations of the Pitt review is that there should be an end to the automatic right to connection. The Minister will appreciate that we support that recommendation wholeheartedly. In his answer of 14 March, he stated:

"It has not yet been determined how the money...will be allocated."—[Official Report, 14 March 2008; Vol. 473, c. 709W.]

I believe that the Government have allocated £34.5 million in respect of the Pitt review.

Based on discussions that I have had with water companies, it strikes me that ending the automatic right to connection would be done for no other reason than to ask water companies to perform a similar role to that of the Environment Agency in determining whether there is indeed the capacity for any substantial new development of houses to feed waste water into drains. Missing from the debate was the concept of water companies dealing with surface water run-off, which caused flooding in substantial parts of the country last year, and the end to the automatic right to connection having cost implications for water companies. Has the Minister given some thought to who will pay, and how the water companies will raise the money to enable them to perform that duty?

Finally, just what should be the role of Ofwat, as the economic regulator? Obviously, it is there to protect the interests of consumers, to promote effective competition and to set the framework for new water supply licensing regimes. We note with some concern the increases in water bills, not just for those who are clearly not in a position to pay but for middle earners—those hard-pressed families who have probably been hit by other substantial, above-inflation increases in their energy bills.

Linda Gilroy: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss McIntosh: I want to allow time to hear from the Minister. I hope that the hon. Lady will permit me to wind up.

I note that the increases in water bills in Yorkshire and other places are substantial. I hope that the Minister will talk about sustainability, adaptation and moving towards smart metering, with block meters in the interim. In moving towards the price review, I hope that he will consider the impact of flooding on the whole sewerage and drainage system in parts of the country that were badly damaged, not least Yorkshire.

10.50 am

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Phil Woolas): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship today, Mrs. Humble. I concur that the best beaches are in the north-west of England, particularly in your constituency.

I offer the traditional congratulations to the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) on securing this debate and raising this issue. It is somewhat intimidating when the hon. Member who leads an Adjournment debate clearly knows much more about the subject than the Minister who responds. I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that the former hon. Member, Sir Percy Harris, would have been extremely proud of him. I send him my best wishes.

Let me answer the questions as best I can in the brief time available to me. It is best if I start by responding to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood). Our review of the charges is not about whether there should be change, but about how it should be brought about. Therefore, the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) can be reassured that this is part of a process to change policy and not a review about whether we should be changing policy. The decision and the direction of travel are clear; I put that on the record.

I shall try to get through the policy points and answer the questions. Clearly, policy has to change because of the points that hon. Members have made about water supply in parts of the country, water affordability and the equity of water bills—given the modern circumstances that we are in—and because of the important point, made by a number of hon. Members, about the relationship between water use and energy efficiency in the home and in buildings. The lowest hanging fruit is energy efficiency, and the lowest hanging fruit in that regard is better use of hot water. We need to tie the relevant policies together, and my strategy does exactly that, as the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell suggested.

Climate change is the issue that will force us to change. If we do not get our policies in place, we will suffer the consequences. So that is important as well.

Hon. Members mentioned that 2008 is a critical year for water policy. That is so. The "Future Water" strategy, which a number of hon. Members mentioned, sets out our high-level vision for the water sector in England. The main goals of the policy are to improve the quality of our rivers and lakes and the wildlife that they support; to manage sustainably the risks from all types of flooding and coastal erosion; to ensure a sustainable use of water resources and fair, affordable and cost-reflective water charges; to cut the greenhouse gas emissions associated with water supply and use; and to make adaptation to climate change and other pressures part of the business-as-usual activity in water policy and management. That strategy is not a blueprint, but it sets out the priorities for water management and some of the steps that we need to take.

On the Ofwat price review, I want to say a few words about the latest periodic review of water company price limits, or PR09. The review process is explained in detail on Ofwat's website, as hon. Members know. Last year, I published a statement of obligations for companies and regulators to bring together and describe the environmental drinking water legislation that will apply to the water industry over the PR09 period. Looking to the longer term, alongside "Future Water", we published draft statutory social and environmental guidance to Ofwat. That answers the point made by the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell about what happens upstream. I concur on that point and will answer in more detail if I have time.

Matthew Taylor: I take the Minister's point. It is clear that the Government's position, as suggested in "Future Water", is that Ofwat ought to be taking a positive approach to the water companies engaging with landowners, farmers and others to deliver benefits. Ofwat should not take the narrow view that, because land does not belong to water companies, improving the way in which it is managed is no business of theirs.

Mr. Woolas: I shall reassure the hon. Gentleman by answering in the affirmative: yes, that is our view. To quote from the draft that I referred to:

> "The Government expects companies to play their part in the river basin planning process contributing to the work of the river basin district liaison panels, and working in partnership with a range of public and private organisations. As part of this, the Government expects Ofwat to support companies who wish to adopt innovative approaches to improving water quality, including working with land managers to control diffuse water pollution at source, where this is to the benefit of water customers."

I hope that the hon. Gentleman takes that back to his constituency this weekend and takes some credit for it, because he deserves it.

I can also give some good news to the mussel farmers as well. [Interruption.] I think that I have lost the attention of the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh).

Let me say briefly that the combination of "Future Water" and the social and environmental guidance to Ofwat sets out a strategy dealing with how, through the review, we can move from the current situation to a fairer and more equitable one that takes into account South West Water's customers, who are paying high bills.

Linda Gilroy: Does my hon. Friend the Minister accept that it will be some time before that has an impact on consumers? Will he consider seriously the matter that I raised about the vulnerable persons regulations and consider making that a target in the next periodic review?

Mr. Woolas: Yes, I will do so.

In the brief time that I have left, I should like to make a further point, which hon. Members will be interested in, about bad debt and the non-payment of water bills. The figures on the non-payment of water bills are outlined on page 78 of "Future Water", in paragraph 13. The latest figures show that £575 million of water bills went unpaid out of a total water bill in England of around £7.5 billion. An analysis of those figures shows that a number of people cannot pay because of changes in circumstances; it also shows that a number of them will not pay. The water companies have made that point to me, and I have undertaken to consider it. Of course, there is no liability on the landlord for the water bill and the water company has no right to have access even to the name of the tenant. It is therefore difficult for them to pursue matters. It is unfair that people who pay their bills are subsidising others—not those who cannot pay, but those who will not pay—to the tune of some £11 per head.

Linda Gilroy: I was just going to ask the Minister whether he realised that the figure was £11 per head. That was brought forcefully to our attention in the all-party water group inquiry.

Mr. Woolas: Indeed. If those bills were passed on through rent, some of the points made about the benefits system would come into play.

Given the time available to me, I am not able to answer all the specific questions that were asked. If hon. Members wish to receive answers to outstanding questions, I should be happy to provide them. I look forward to a continuing debate, in which I am trying to build consensus across all parties in the House for a fairer, more equitable and more efficient system of water charging.

Fire and Rescue Services (Humberside)

11 am

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): It is a delight to speak in Westminster Hall under your chairmanship, Mrs. Humble. I would appreciate it if you could convey my thanks to Mr. Speaker for selecting this subject for debate.

On Saturday, firefighters, members of the public, MPs and councillors marched through the centre of Grimsby carrying banners stating, "No Fire Cuts" and "Cuts Cost Lives". People were clapping and cheering as they marched past, and a flower shop had a sign in its window stating "Florists Support The Firemen". It was a good-natured march, but the message was deadly serious. At the front, four firefighters were carrying a coffin because they believe that the proposed changes to Humberside fire and rescue service could endanger lives. We must remember that those are the very people who head towards burning buildings when the rest of us would instinctively want to get away. They constantly put their lives on the line, and I take it seriously when they tell me that the changes will put lives at risk.

To put the matter into context, it was 11 days before Christmas when East Riding of Yorkshire councillor Doreen Engall, who chairs the Humberside fire authority, made the following announcement:

> "Today—Friday 14th December 2007—the Humberside Fire Authority has discussed Operational Resource Disposition across the Humberside Fire and Rescue area and...agreed to start the public consultation process on the following proposed changes:—
> Sledmere Retained Fire Station Closed and taken out of service 2008/09
>
> Waltham Retained Fire Station—Closed & taken out of service 2008/09
>
> Kirton Lindsey Retained Fire Station—Closed & taken out of service 2008/09
> Immingham West Fire Station Reduction by one fire engine 2009/10
>
> Goole Fire Station Convert crewing of one fire engine from wholetime crewing to retained 2009/10
>
> Hull Central Fire Station Closed and taken out of service
> fire engines to be relocated...2010/11
> Hull North Fire Station Increase by one fire engine 2010/11
> Hull West Increase by one fire engine 2010/11".

If those changes go ahead, they will be some of the most severe cuts ever experienced by the Humberside fire and rescue service.

I want to give the Minister and others who do not know that part of the country a picture of the area that it serves. People often imagine that the east riding and Lincolnshire they are bucolically rural, and in parts are. However, they have a population of more than 900,000 and are dominated by a huge concentration of industry. The north and south banks of the Humber are home to most of England's oil refining, chemical and pharmaceuticals industries, and British Aerospace at Brough. The Humber ports of Immingham, Grimsby, Goole and Hull are some of the busiest in the country. It is estimated that 25 per cent. of the UK's freight goes in and out of Immingham. Associated with that, apart from road transport, is a huge rail freight depot. We also have Humberside airport and the Corus steelworks at Scunthorpe. Some 32 industrial sites are subject to the top level of control under the control of major accident hazards regulations, and that is the highest concentration of such sites in the country.

The area is very varied. As well as those industrial sites, Cleethorpes and Bridlington are busy resorts, with a huge influx of visitors in the summer. In Cleethorpes, apart from day visitors, there is a 4,000-strong caravan park. Other risk factors that we must consider include, sadly, the bad road traffic accident rate in parts of Lincolnshire.

News of the changes broke in the local media on 15 December when the Grimsby Telegraph stated:

"The plan, by Humberside Fire Authority, is part of an effort to save an estimated £4 million overspend and follows a round of cutbacks two years ago, which saw Immingham's service reduced from four fire appliances to three."

It is important to focus on the "effort to save an...overspend".

In reality, that means that we will lose between 100 and 110 firefighters on top of similar cuts a couple of years ago. Most of those jobs—12 retained firefighters at Waltham and 53 whole-time firefighters at Immingham—are in my constituency, so Cleethorpes will bear the brunt of the cuts. The nine appliances covering north-east Lincolnshire will be reduced to seven if the cuts go ahead. Those will be the most savage cutbacks ever experienced by Humberside fire and rescue service.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): I agree with everything that the hon. Lady has said so far, but I do not want the debate to run away with one point—risk assessment. I have an interest because in the Howdenshire part of my constituency and in Goole, which is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey), the fire service emergency cover model, FSEC, which assesses risk in various areas—as the hon. Lady said, there are high risks in some parts of the counties—dramatically underestimates the individual risks applying to elderly constituents, who may use oil or container-based gas heating, and who have as much right to a fire service as anyone living in the middle of a town. I am worried that one of the calculations to justify the cuts underestimates the risk in rural areas. Does she agree?

Shona McIsaac: I shall come to the FSEC computer programme. I agree that it has serious flaws and that it does not give a robust enough analysis. Fire and rescue services in some parts of the country do not use it because they know from local knowledge that it underestimates some risks and puts some areas at high risk when they are not. Waltham retained fire station covers the more rural and suburban southern part of north-east Lincolnshire. Many of the right hon. Gentleman's concerns—for example, about Howden—are also experienced in places such as Waltham.

I raised the matter in the House in the Christmas recess Adjournment debate on 18 December. Following that, I met firefighters to discuss their concerns and objections to the changes. What struck me as odd was that I had not received an official communication from the fire authority. In fact, I am not aware of any of the area's MPs receiving anything official from the fire authority about the proposals. On investigation, I found that other key stakeholders—for example, the port health authority—were not included in the discussions at an early stage.

However, to be fair, after Christmas I received a letter dated 21 December from the chief fire officer, Frank Duffield, who said:

"I write to inform you that in concluding a three and a half year study across Humberside, proposals were put before the Fire Authority as outlined on the attached press statement."

What I was given was the statement that was made on 14 December. Those dates are important, because there are time limits within which to raise objections. When key stakeholders were made aware of the plans is pertinent to the argument.

Following the announcement, I kept checking the Humberside fire and rescue service's website. The proposals were not posted on it until about the second week of January—almost a month after the initial announcement. The printed document came out about the second or third week of January, which is fine if someone can see what the proposals are because they have access to the internet, but many residents do not. Those people have been denied a chance to have the full time to air their views on the changes.

I know that MPs met the chief fire officer, members of the Fire Brigades Union and others in the new year. However, at the same time news also broke that Humberside fire and rescue service will receive a 5.8 per cent. increase in its funding, which was much more than it expected and much more than neighbouring fire and rescue services. I refer hon. Members back to the comments made in the breaking news stories of 15 December, which state that the cutbacks were part of an effort to save an overspend. At that stage, given the additional funding available, many of us hoped that there would be a rethink. Sadly, that did not happen.

I have concerns about the data—the FSEC issue. A lot of jargon and acronyms will be used in the debate, and FSEC is the computer programme used to predict risk. Before we received the official documents, I examined the background to how fire authorities make their decisions. I discovered that FSEC is not universally applied across the country. On the fire service emergency cover toolkit, a document from a neighbouring authority—West Yorkshire fire and rescue service—states that the "outputs from the model do not accurately reflect the known risk to the community of West Yorkshire, therefore the Toolkit is deemed to be insufficiently robust to be utilised in the development of valid and reliable risk reduction and resource reallocation strategies."

Despite a neighbouring authority saying that any decisions based on that programme will not be robust, an enormous emphasis has been placed on the programme in Humberside.

I have compared the statistics on the previous round of cuts in 2005 with what has been presented to us, and the maps that were produced for both rounds of cuts vary enormously. Areas that were previously high risk before FSEC was relied on so heavily, are now deemed low risk. To someone with knowledge of those areas, that seems to be totally counter-intuitive, and therefore I am worried about the robustness of the data.

In addition, FSEC is used only—or mainly—for predicting dwelling fatality rates. There seems little in the programme that considers, for example, road traffic collisions. We all know that we are far more likely to be involved in or lose our life in a road traffic accident than in a dwelling fire. Again, that leads me to worry about the proposed cuts.

David Davis: I could not find an age profile in the FSEC model. When dealing with the ageing population of rural areas—I think that many hon. Members here represent rural areas—it seems sensible to provide such information because age profile indicates a higher risk of being unable to escape once a fire starts.

Shona McIsaac: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I cannot consider that matter in too much detail because the debate is not entirely about FSEC. However, the analysis of West Yorkshire fire and rescue service states that "the narrow indicators of risk…skew the output of the model as no account has been taken of the population groups within these areas."

An example is given in relation to rented accommodation as that is one of the criteria used. In two areas with the same percentage of rented accommodation, one area may have detached houses and another may have terraced housing, which has a higher risk. However, FSEC would put those areas in the same category.

As I said, the chief fire officer consulted the various councils in the area and people everywhere told him that they were opposed to the cuts. Prior to last Saturday's march, I conducted a survey of residents in the affected areas in my constituency. About 1,000 people said that they opposed the cuts, and such responses were not based simply on emotion—the chief fire office sometimes accuses us of being emotional about the matter. People were given very good statistical reasons for the cuts and facts about why they would put communities at risk. In fact, only 45 people in some way supported the plans.

I find it worrying that I recently heard that a PR firm has been hired to run consultation forums on the proposals and that people are being paid £25 to attend those meetings. The process is meant to be terribly independent and involve people selected at random, but when it was discovered that someone was the wife of a firefighter, she was rejected and not included in the discussion forums. Those involved are trying to stack the so-called independent forums in their favour and skew the results.

As far as I am aware, apart from the meetings with local authorities and the forums, there have been no official public meetings to date. On behalf of my constituents, I want the plans to be rejected, and I am sure that other hon. Members feel the same. The entire process is flawed. There are concerns about the FSEC computer modelling programme and there have been serious delays in making details publicly available. A whole month passed before the supporting documentation was put into the public domain, and therefore the proposals should be thrown out. Key stakeholders were not involved in the discussions and the consultation document does not stand up to detailed scrutiny. For example, although we have heard that many proposals were made for cost reasons, there are no costings in the document. How can we compare and contrast the proposals, therefore, and ask whether a certain project can be brought in under budget so that we can invest more money in another area? My background is in local government and we certainly did not produce documents that did not have costings.

Statistics in the document are given only for one year. There are no historic data or predictions. It is difficult to make a decision when there are no predictions of trends. I have obtained historic data for Waltham and Immingham. They show that the number of incidents has gone up rather than declined. Despite that, we are considering closing fire stations, which puts the FSEC model in question. For example, the incident data that I have for Waltham station state that the number of incidents in 2005 was 91. In 2006—the data used in the document—there were 116 incidents, and in 2007 there were 134. The number of incidents over the same three years at the Immingham West fire station were 147 in 2005, 158 in 2006, and 200 in 2007. Therefore, the risk is increasing.

There is also a lack of information in the document about road traffic accidents. As I said, people are more likely to die in a road traffic accident than in a house fire. When I asked the chief fire officer about that, he said that Waltham station had covered only four road traffic incidents. The answer was slightly disingenuous because that figure relates only to cases in which specialist cutting equipment was used to free people. That figure, therefore, underplays the level of road traffic accidents. My information about road traffic accidents covers north-east Lincolnshire, north Lincoln and Hull. For those three areas, traffic accident rates are well above the regional and national average, according to data from the Humberside police collision unit. I am afraid that I do not have detailed information about the East Riding of Yorkshire.

The number of collisions in north-east Lincolnshire resulting in death or serious injury in 2002 was 114, of which 21 involved young drivers, which equates to about 18 per cent. of the total. In 2006, there were 123 fatalities and serious injuries, of which 31 were young people, which is 25 per cent. of the total. Again, the trends show an increased risk. It is well recognised that our area has made poor progress towards achieving the 2010 target of a 40 per cent. reduction in road deaths and serious injuries. Any improvement was due to the reduction in child pedestrian casualties.

The collision data also suggest that young drivers living in the more rural areas are at particularly high risk. They tend to come from the more leafy suburbs in which incomes tend to be higher. It is quite normal for a household to have two or three cars, especially in the newly built estates. Young people tend to have cars and use them to get around. Certainly, Waltham fits that bill. Also, because of the rural nature of such areas, it takes fire and rescue services longer to get there, and those minutes are vital if we are to save lives.

I want to focus on how the proposals will impact on my constituents. I know that other hon. Members will focus on their own particular areas. The outcry over the closure at Waltham has been deafening. To date, there have been 18,000 signatures on a petition objecting to it. Some 12,000 letters of objection have been sent in as well. Yet the station costs just £123,000 to run. That is why it was important for the consultation document to include financial information. That £123,000 is partly paid by Lincolnshire county council because the station is on the border between the two authorities; Waltham's costs often go into that county. Therefore, the cost to Humberside fire and rescue is just over £100,000 a year. The town of Waltham pays far more than that in its precept to the fire authority.

I want to focus on an issue that appeared in the Hull Daily Mail on 4 January. The article states:

"Fire officials have announced a £5 million plan to redevelop the Hull Fire Station. Humberside Fire Authority has given backing for the major redevelopment of North Hull Fire Station at Clough Road. Officials at HFRS say that the revamp of this site is necessary because it now serves part of the city which has seen large amounts of development since it first opened in 1959."

Waltham was more or less a hamlet in 1959; now it is a suburb of Grimsby. It has seen very fast growth in recent decades and it has had a housing boom, yet those residents are being told that the growth in their area means that their fire station has to close. In Hull, on the other hand, residents are told that they are getting a £5 million investment because of housing growth there. I am not complaining about that, but I want consistency across the board. If there is growth in an area, that should be recognised.

The chief fire officer has told me that the Grimsby-based fire station of Peaks Lane will be able to take on the workload if Waltham closes. That is not what the firefighters at Peaks Lane tell me. Such a statement also assumes that the two engines at Peaks Lane will be there if an incident occurs in the area that Waltham covers. It is highly likely that they will be out somewhere else, which means that the time to reach that vast southern part of north-east Lincolnshire will increase, and that will put lives at risk. Also, Peaks Lane deals with chemical incidents that occur in the factories on the south bank of the Humber. Again, that leaves a huge gap in coverage in our area.

A previous review of fire services moved Immingham's fire cover from the centre of the town to the outskirts. That was done because of the huge amount of industry that is located in Immingham. Immingham West and East fire stations were opened by me and my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey). Four engines are based there because of the huge concentration of COMAH—control of major accident hazards—sites. Anyone who knows that part of the world just needs to look at the flare stacks of the two oil refineries to understand the risk that exists on the south bank of the Humber. We have to exercise a precautionary principle. The reason why we have a lot of fire stations is because if something happens it will be serious and we need to have firefighters in place. The risks are real.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) will confirm that there are people who remember the Flixborough explosion, which was not that far away from Immingham. A few years ago, there was a serious explosion at one of the refineries. Luckily, it was Easter and there were not many people on site and no loss of life. If people had been working, the incident could have been very serious. That is why I want to see the plans rejected. I want every member of the fire authority to receive copies of the debate to see the strength of feeling among the communities that we represent. If it is a genuine consultation, I hope that it will listen—I hope that it is not a foregone conclusion. However, I am worried about the verb tense in the original press release, which said:

"Closed and taken out of service".

rather than "a proposal to close and take out of service". I say to the fire authority and to its chief, "Prove to us that the consultation has been genuine. Go away, look at the proposals and throw them out, because if you don't, lives will be lost."

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Joan Humble (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) to speak, may I say that other hon. Members wish to contribute? I alert them to the fact that I anticipate calling the first Front-Bench spokesperson at about 12 o'clock. Will hon. Members limit their contributions to ensure that everyone who wishes to speak can do so?

11.28 am

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole) (Lab): This is the first time that I have spoken under your chairmanship, Mrs. Humble, and I am delighted to have the opportunity to do so this morning. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on her contribution and on securing the debate, which is important to all Members of Parliament in the Humberside area and all the area's residents as well.

I share the general concerns that my hon. Friend has already outlined about the whole review and the way in which the chief fire officer and the authority seek to change our fire cover in the area. I want to concentrate most of my remarks on Goole, because proposals for that area are causing enormous concern in the locality. Concern, however, is not restricted to Goole. As the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said, the measures have a knock-on effect on all rural areas around the town as well. I, and many other people, do not believe that the proposals are sound or sensible for that part of the East Riding.

For me, this all started back on 14 December. I was driving home from the Goole and District Mariners Association's annual Christmas party, so I was full of festive cheer—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman has had the honour of attending, so he knows what a good night it is. I heard about the proposal on Radio Humberside in my car. I could not believe what I was being told, or the fact that, if it were true, we had had no notification of it and nothing had been said to local authorities. The whole thing came as a bolt from the blue just before everything closed down for the Christmas period. That created a number of concerns, because we were unable to get to the bottom of what was being said and done.

On 3 January, I was able to organise a meeting with the chief fire officer and his team, and with Councillors Doreen Engall and Darrell Barkworth, the chair and vice-chair of the fire authority. Before that, I met the Fire Brigades Union in its office in Hull to get the perspective of the firefighters themselves. At the meeting with the chief fire officer, it was put to me that the proposals were about changing how the fire service was operated in the Humberside area. We spoke about funding, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes has pointed out, the Humberside fire service has received a 5.8 per cent. increase in its Government funding this year. That is a generous allocation that compares favourably with the national average of 3.3 per cent. I am indebted to the Library, as always, for helping me to obtain the figures.

Since 1997, the Government contribution to the Humberside fire service has risen from £18 million. It will stand at £27 million under the latest comprehensive spending review announcement. Significant extra cash has been put into the service, so funding does not appear to be a driving factor behind the proposed changes. Indeed, the fire authority confirmed at our meeting that it did not intend to use all its precepting powers to raise money from the council tax and increase the overall budget. That, too, indicates that the authority was not really feeling under great financial pressure. In fairness to the chief fire officer, when I asked him whether the proposals were about money and whether the authority needed more money, wherever it might come from, he said that his driving force was how the service should operate in future, and that it was not a financial thing at all.

So, the consultation began. I should say one thing in favour of the fire authority: a consultation that effectively started in the middle of December and will run until the end of March at least gives people a generous amount of time to get involved. That has allowed local authorities, town and parish councils, port and health authorities, and all sorts of other organisations to have a say, and it has allowed the fire authority, the chief fire officer, the FBU and others to speak to people. At least we have had decent time for the consultation, but the simple truth is that the more people have heard about the proposal, the less they have liked it. They are extremely concerned about what will happen if the proposals go ahead.

Goole is a town that is changing enormously and quickly. It currently has a full-time fire station and two fire engines, both staffed with full-time firefighters. The plan is that one of the two engines will be changed to retained status and will back up the remaining full-time pump. Goole's growth in recent years has been in both population, through people moving into the town, and new development. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden will remember when Goole had a lot of derelict buildings, but now there are many homes in multiple occupation, which I think present a greater fire risk in many respects.

New houses are being built, new people are coming in and there are big industrial developments. The Capitol Park development, formerly known as Centreport, at junction 36 of the M62, has already had two major developments—the Guardian Industries glass factory and a large Tesco distribution site—and will continue to grow. More and more development is coming into Goole. It is on the edge of a motorway and it has a port, and there are risks associated with both. It seems to me, and I think to most local people, that when the town is going through unprecedented growth in such a time scale, the idea of reducing its fire cover is bizarre.

The idea is that the second fire engine will become retained, with firefighters who will be called out. We are told that they will be able to be deployed five minutes after the initial pump. I understand how retained fire stations work—there is one in Winterton, where I live. I know that they recruit more people than they need and call them up when there is an emergency. The first four or five to arrive get into the engine and off they go. That works well in many places all over the country.

In Goole, however, I asked the fire officer where those people would come from. He had a map of Goole, and someone had simply drawn a circle covering the theoretical five-minute travel time. To anyone who knows Goole, that beggars belief. There is a major road through the centre—Boothferry road—which comes to a level crossing straight through the centre of the town. The level crossing is regularly closed because of the amount of rail traffic through the town. It is not at all uncommon for the centre of the town to be completely gridlocked for long periods, particularly during the day. Nearly all the housing in Goole is the other side of that road and railway line from the fire station, and the idea that people from there could reach Goole fire station in five minutes beggars belief. That might be true for people in the small number of houses on the other side of Boothferry road and off Rawcliffe road, but it is unlikely that the station could recruit all the retained firefighters that it needed from such a small part of the town.

The chief fire officer gave me the idea that the only cut that we were being asked to accept in Goole was that the second fire engine would arrive five minutes after the first. I do not believe that that is the case, but even if it were, how desirable is that? There have been some serious house fires in the area, and we all know what happens: the first firefighters to arrive go inside the property as quickly as they can if they think that lives are at risk. We know from previous reviews of fire services that they have to backed up by the services of another fire engine. In theory, any delay could mean that people would be put at greater risk, because firefighters might not go into a building. In reality, firefighters will still go in, but without the proper back-up.

David Davis: I support the hon. Gentleman's case because I, too, depend on that fire station. One reason why my area of Howden depends on Goole fire station is the difficulty of recruiting retained firefighters. There are gaps in cover during the day, particularly from noon to late afternoon. It is already difficult to recruit, but there proposal for Goole is, in many ways, a much tougher contract than the one that operates in Howden. How difficult will it be to provide the second fire engine, for both his area of the world and mine?

Mr. Cawsey: I agree entirely with the right hon. Gentleman. On local issues, I always think of him as a right hon. Friend, because they are important to both of us.

Another matter to consider is what will happen if people are recruited in the first place, but the staffing cannot be maintained later. There was a time when Howden was properly staffed all day with retained crew, but now it cannot be. What will happen if Goole goes down that route and finds at some future point that it cannot keep the right number of retained firefighters? From that point on, everything would be connected to everything. If Goole fire station were not there, we would rely on Howden. If Howden could not act, we would rely on Snaith. In the other direction,

[Mr. Cawsey]

Old Goole would have to rely on Crowle in north Lincolnshire. If Crowle had to cover Old Goole, Epworth would have to cover Crowle. There would be a knock-on effect, and what started off with a simple decision in Goole would affect fire cover all over the place. That can be avoided by the simple decision to keep both fire tenders in Goole full time.

I have mentioned the fact that Goole is on the edge of the M62. There was debate earlier about what FSEC includes. It certainly does not include road traffic accidents, which is of great concern to me. There are any number of road traffic accidents on the M62 every year. I do not know whether right hon. and hon. Members listen out for reports in the same way as me and the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden, but I frequently hear the words, "In the vicinity of junction 36," which is the Goole turn off. The Goole fire station is frequently called out. For that not to be thrown into the equation for calculating future risk is bizarre in the extreme, and local firefighters have told me that it is a big concern to them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes mentioned Flixborough, which I now represent. People will not forget the impact of that incident. When we look at the south bank, we will see similar chemical industries to those that were based at Flixborough, which is another concern about the proposals.

East Riding of Yorkshire council's scrutiny team is looking into the proposals and has set up a review panel to take evidence and to make recommendations to the council. I spoke to the panel at the Goole leisure centre. I hasten to add that there were only a small number of members of the scrutiny committee present, rather than the whole committee. Sadly, there are not that many Labour members of the council, and the panel was made up of Tories and Lib Dems—none of my Goole colleagues were on it. I thought that we had had a sympathetic hearing, so I was flabbergasted when the panel said that it supported the chief fire officer's proposals for Goole. However, I was pleased that the full scrutiny committee of the council threw that recommendation out. The council itself is supportive of everything that has been said here today.

North Lincolnshire council, which is the other local authority in my constituency, is meeting tomorrow night to consider a motion from the ruling Labour group—that gives me some hope—to oppose the proposed fire service cuts. As far as I have seen, that is in step with the local response. The number of people who have responded is simply amazing. The Fire Brigades Union has shown me copies of its polling and the slips that it has sent to local people to fill in. There were thousands of responses, even after I had sifted through to find only those from my constituents. The Goole–Howden Courier and the Goole Times have run articles and campaigns to try to change the Goole decision, and the Scunthorpe Telegraph has run a campaign for the Kirton fire station in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), which I am sure he will say something about later. The public are saying no. As I said, the more they hear, the less they like.

When the chief spoke to me, he told me that his aspirations were for better kit for road traffic accidents and floods, and more fire prevention work. Nobody, including the FBU, disagrees with that agenda. The FBU told me simply, "We can do those things without cuts," and said that it would work with the chief fire officer and the authority to advise them on how to do so. That being the case, there is no better reason why we should not go back to the drawing board and start again to ensure that we have the best protected and best equipped fire service for our communities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak for the first time under your chairmanship, Mrs. Humble, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on securing a debate on this important issue. She is a dogged fighter for her constituents' interests, and her contribution was another example of the fight that she puts up to protect them. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) brought a great deal of expertise on local government and its reactions to the proposals, but I should like to speak more generally about the issue.

The essence of the union's case against the fire authority's strategic plan is that it would lead to 110 job losses for firefighters, some at Waltham and some at Immingham, and others scattered around the south Humberside area. We can see the serried ranks of south Humberside firefighters facing us in the debate.

Cuts in personnel are always called efficiency savings. I deprecate such a mindless Gershon process—it drives on, even though in this instance it is cutting right to the bone rather than at flesh. This is the latest in a long salami-slicing process of cutting the number of firefighters in the area and it must stop, because the area has one of the highest risk levels in the country. It is a chemical production and oil refining centre. There are 32 industrial sites in the Humberside area that are at the highest risk level, as defined under Control of Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1999.

The motorways bring their problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole mentioned the M62, but the M180 and the A180 are in a disgraceful state of repair. We have made representations about the traffic pressures that are building on the A160 and about the A46, which is perhaps one of the most murderous roads in the country. The Grimsby Telegraph contains a litany of reports of crashes and cases in which the fire brigade is called out for rescue work.

There are two sets of docks in the area: at Immingham, which has the busiest docks in the country, and Grimsby, and a busy estuary, around which huge traffic and shipping pressures are building. We have had floods—they were worse on the north bank than on the south—that were a problem for the fire brigade, and we have now had an earthquake. I always wanted Grimsby to be the epicentre of something, but I did not envisage that it would be the epicentre of an earthquake. Nevertheless, that is another hazard to add to the litany.

Most importantly, we have a legacy of old houses and some of the poorest super output areas—I do not know why they are called that when the statistics are so depressing. The area has some of the worst statistics on the decline of housing and on poverty in the country. In 1980, I lectured in America for the English-Speaking Union, which provided me with a driver to take me around Harlem. He would not let me get out of the car to take photographs, fearing an assault, but the burnt-out houses that I saw paralleled, to a degree, what can be seen in the East Marsh area. There is much less of a problem than in Harlem, but burnt-out houses in older areas are a problem, and it is the result of houses getting older and inadequate landlords.

The development of the strategic plan, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes said, is in many ways an excellent exercise, certainly for what it proposes on fire prevention work, training, new gear for flooding and rescue and new platforms. The fire brigade in my area has also done an enormous and successful job in providing free smoke detectors. It no longer gets money from the Government to do that work—it must do so through alternative means—but the work could not be done through cuts, and it must go on.

The strategic plan, which was launched suddenly in December, as other right hon. and hon. Members said, has its virtues. However, there are several reservations. First, the unions, the firemen and local authorities were not involved in its development, which has been going on for more than three years, so it should have been possible to involve the people who deal with fires and the councils that face the problems. Secondly, the proposals are based on risk and the arrival time of the first engine. However, the arrival time of the second engine is crucial, without which firemen would plunge into situations in which they must either wait until a safe number of firefighters arrive, thus risking the lives of the public, or act without waiting for the second engine. The more stations we close, the longer it will take the second engine to arrive, particularly when numerous call-outs are putting a strain on Peaks Lane, but the strategic plan neglects that problem.

The strategic plan was done over three years, but the financial implications and the impact on the number of jobs are not spelled out. It is striking that there are no costings, given that the area got a better settlement than most, as my colleagues have said. We got a 5 per cent. increase in our allocation, and the national average was 3.3 per cent., as my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole said. We got the fifth-highest settlement for a combined fire authority, so the need to make cuts on such a scale has been undercut. The fire authority cannot justify making the cuts in the strategic plan, given the settlement that it received.

The proposed cuts are not paralleled elsewhere. The only station closure I know of is in Cleveland, and two of the proposed closures in Cornwall have actually been reversed. We do not see the justification for making cuts now when Humberside has done better than most. It is a shame that the proportion of Government funding is falling—it has fallen from 80 to 70 per cent. since 1997—and that local authority support is falling as a proportion of local authority spending. That is unfortunate, but we are talking today about a local issue, and my point is that the problem is not as serious in our area, which again undermines the case made in the document.

The proposals increase insecurity in all the areas that we are concerned about, not just Waltham. Clearly, given the demonstration on Saturday, people there feel insecure about the closure of their station, even though it is a retained fire station. However, the closure will have an impact on the whole area, because it will affect the arrival time of the second appliance and increase the strain on the Peaks Lane station in Grimsby.

The result of the proposals is a feeling of insecurity, which is now stirring people to action. The consultation ends on 31 March, and as will be clear from the debate, my colleagues and I will be making very strong representations. My plea to the fire authority is, "Now that you've got more money than you expected, please think again."

Mr. Elliot Morley (Scunthorpe) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on obtaining the debate. As you can see, Mrs. Humble, all the MPs from the south bank are here as part of a united front, which illustrates how strongly people feel about this issue and how important it is for us to reflect our constituents' concerns. I want to focus particularly on the threat to Kirton in Lindsey fire station, which, as my hon. Friend said, is one of the stations earmarked for complete closure.

As my hon. Friend has said, we have heard about this issue in various ways. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) said that he heard about it on Radio Humberside, and I heard about it from a constituent who engaged me in conversation on the train back to my constituency, as constituents often do. He was a firefighter, which was helpful because he was very knowledgeable about the issue, and we discussed the ins and outs and the impacts of the proposed closure. I immediately arranged a meeting with the chief fire officer of the Humberside fire authority to express my concerns and to talk to him personally about the justification for the closure of the Kirton in Lindsey fire station.

This is not just about the increased risk to the people of Kirton in Lindsey, although that is, of course, an issue because, whatever changes are introduced, response times will be slower if the community loses its fire station. However, the closure is also an issue for both urban and rural areas in the whole of my constituency. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes said, the number of pumps on the south bank will be reduced from nine to seven, which means a slower response, particularly in terms of back-up from a second pump. That must be taken into account, because the Kirton pump provides back-up in other parts of my constituency and north Lincolnshire.

When I met the chief fire officer, he was at great pains to stress that the proposals were not about cutting the budget, but about responding to independent reports on providing good fire cover for the whole area. He said, as my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) noted, that the savings will be ploughed back into the fire service in the form of equipment for dealing with floods, for example. I am sure that such things are desirable, but we must take into account the overall impact of removing these machines.

[Mr. Greg Pope in the Chair]

I am concerned about the maximum 20-minute response time that the fire authority recommends for low-risk areas, because Kirton in Lindsey is on the very edge of the area covered by that response time. I am also concerned about the figures that have been used to justify the closure of the Kirton in Lindsey fire station. We have heard about road traffic accidents, and I would add the A15 to the litany of roads that are regarded as very high risk. The A15 has been classified as one of the most dangerous roads in Britain, because of its accident rate. I raised the issue with the chief fire officer, who said that Scunthorpe has a dedicated machine to deal with road traffic accidents, which can get out in an average of 15 minutes. That is fine, if it is correct.

Although there are arguments about availability and about how busy individual fire stations in the Humberside fire authority are, there is no argument about the fact that Scunthorpe is one of the busiest in the whole fire authority area. I therefore return to the point that we must look at the role of the Kirton in Lindsey fire station not only in terms of Kirton in Lindsey, but strategically, in terms of the back-up that the machine there provides as part of overall availability in an area that is full of COMAH sites, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes said. In Scunthorpe, for example, we have the steelworks and a range of other high-risk industries, and that needs to be taken into account.

A number of issues of detail have been raised with me. What, for example, would be the net savings from closing the Kirton in Lindsey fire station? There is quite a large gulf between the FBU's calculations and those of the fire authority. I have written to the chief fire officer to take up a range of issues that relate to the calculation of costs and times. There are arguments about the availability of the Kirton in Lindsey fire station. As my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole said, it is not unusual for machines at retained fire stations to be unavailable for parts of the day, which is not surprising given the nature of such fire stations. However, there are arguments about the length of such periods at the Kirton in Lindsey station, and we must compare what the fire authority says about them with what the firefighters say. Those issues require answers, and I have some very serious concerns about them.

My major concern is about the level of risk and fire cover, and the fire authority needs to answer some legitimate points. I share my hon. Friends' concerns about the overall recommendations on the level of fire cover, and I can certainly confirm the level of concern among members of the public.

The Scunthorpe Telegraph has been running a campaign that has had thousands of responses from people expressing concern about the proposals. As for the consultation, I appreciate the fact that the fire authority has met representatives of North Lincolnshire council and that, at my request, it also sent representatives to hear at first hand the concerns of Kirton in Lindsey town council. That is nature of consultation, but the consultation has clearly thrown up serious issues in relation to the proposals, which call them into question.

12 noon

Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on securing the debate. One of the fascinating things about Westminster Hall is that hon. Members like me, from Cornwall at one end of the country, can find out what is different about other areas, as well as the similarities about issues that are being raised, the challenges that local authorities face and the decisions that they take to deal with them. I was particularly interested to hear about the great impact that the proposals will have on the hon. Lady's constituency in particular, with regard to both whole-time fire stations and the retained service. I shall talk later about the retained service and the important contribution that retained firefighters make.

The hon. Lady referred to concentrations of industry and the ports sector in her constituency and the wider area of Humberside. That is a crucial concern. I attended a debate in Westminster Hall some time ago about what happened at Buncefield, and the lessons that are being learned from it. I think that it has been referred to in coverage locally in the hon. Lady's area.

Shona McIsaac: In fact it was firefighters, including retained firefighters, from Waltham who were flown down to Buncefield to advise on how to deal with the fire.

Dan Rogerson: I continue to learn about firefighting expertise in the hon. Lady's area. Of course the cuts are not just to bricks and mortar—fire stations—but to the number of firefighters. That has been shown to be a matter of great concern to her constituents. She also discussed additional funding, to which I may return when I respond briefly to the remarks made by hon. Members during the debate, and risk assessment. Her detailed analysis of the facts and figures relating to incidents in her constituency was useful and illuminating.

As well as briefing us on the highlights of the social calendar in the run-up to Christmas in his constituency, the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) talked about how significant the consultation has been. That is to be welcomed. Hon. Members in all parties are in favour of local decision making and of locally elected representatives having the power to examine issues in detail and act accordingly. If that is to happen, proper consultation is crucial and those responsible should show how they will take comments on board. Given the time allowed for the consultation and the engagement with the public, I am reassured that that is happening, and I am glad to hear of it.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) discussed the impact of the cuts in terms of job losses. Of course that is a matter of concern, and the FBU has been vocal in fighting for its members in the light of the contribution that they make, and of professional concerns about changes to fire and rescue cover throughout the country. The hon. Gentleman also raised the issue of pressure from above—efficiency targets, the general culture in which people are working at all levels in local authorities, and the pressure to modernise, to use a word that is probably over-used. The right hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) talked about the wider role of every station and the knock-on impact of what is happening. Again, he referred to the operation of the retained service.

I shall focus on some of the factors influencing the decision to make changes in the Humberside area. It seems to me that there is relevance to the wider debate about efficiency, to which the hon. Member for Great Grimsby alluded—the question of a culture that requires every local authority, or, indeed, fire and rescue authority, to show that it is changing all the time. That process is not necessarily always helpful. It must be based on evidence. Rather than involving purely local decisions taken in a vacuum, the process takes place within a culture of messages about what Whitehall wants local authorities to do. I hope that the Minister will talk about the statements and policies that the Government are putting into practice, which are leading to some of the changes that local authorities must make.

As for the Government's contribution, although I am sure it is true that there has been some increase in funding and that it compares favourably with the national average for central funding for fire and rescue, local government overall is struggling to deliver the services that it is asked to provide, given the tight financial constraints. It may be that in the case that we are discussing the precept has not been set as high as it could have been, but I suppose that one eye must be kept on the future. Perhaps the changes are being made on the basis of efficiency savings that may be asked for in future and are intended as an early attempt to allow for that.

It is interesting that other fire authorities elsewhere are having to act in a similar way. If the decision is purely local, why is that happening? The hon. Member for Great Grimsby referred to my area, Cornwall, where consultation is taking place on the number of whole-time fire stations that are to be in operation. Indeed, I went with some of my hon. Friends to discuss with the Minister both that issue and the funding pressures on Cornwall county council. I know that the situation is the same for the new neighbouring Devon and Somerset fire and rescue authority and for authorities in many other parts of the country.

The Government are also pushing through regional control centres, which will have a cost overall. There will certainly be an up-front cost, although it remains to be seen whether efficiencies will be demonstrated in the longer term. The FBU in particular has been vocal about that change, and it is important to put it in context. I understand that one of the aspirations for the process was to help to fund more technology, particularly for retained firefighters. The aim was to provide them with better technology, such as satnav, with which to respond to incidents. I hope that that materialises as part of the Government's leadership in bringing about change.

I hope that as the Minister considers the issues that are local to Humberside, he will also consider the issues for the whole country. I also hope that he will see that Humberside's review of cover and of the number of whole-time and retained firefighters is not an isolated incident, and that he will consider the effect of messages from Whitehall and Westminster, through discussions with local authorities of the reasons for their decisions.

One of the downsides of debates such as this emerges when a case of a station changing from whole-time to retained is raised in the media. I completely understand why people want to discuss whether that is right for their area, but sometimes a negative message goes out about the retained service, suggesting that it is in some way second class. I do not say that the Labour Members who have spoken meant to make that point, merely that it is sometimes the mood music in the background because of people's concern about how the retained service operates. I represent an area where the vast majority of cover is provided by retained firefighters, and they provide an excellent service. I should hate it if the message were to go out from this or any debate that we in Westminster do not appreciate the job that they do, or that we are unaware that they display just as much professionalism as whole-time firefighters. The two groups working together usually provide an excellent team in every area.

I hope that the Minister will examine ways of modernising retained firefighting systems, to ensure that response to call-out is more effective. Given that patterns of working have changed, and that people often no longer work close to the fire station where they are on call, but further afield, perhaps more resources can be put in by the Government to support local authorities in pursuing new ways of operation, including pilot schemes, for the retained fire service, at least in the short term. In that way, we can ensure that retained as well as whole-time fire services change with the times.

To return to local services in Humberside in particular, what we want ultimately is to know that the consultation, which has attracted a huge number of responses from local people, will be taken into account by the local fire authority, and that the authority will re-examine everything that it proposes to do in view of the additional points that will undoubtedly have come to light in the consultation, so that the final decision, when it is reached, will be a local decision that takes into account all the factors. However, we must recognise that the local fire authority operates within a climate set by the Government.

12.10 pm

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve for the first time under your chairmanship, Mr. Pope. I congratulate the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on securing this debate, as well as her fellow local Members of Parliament.

The proposals have generated considerable concern locally, not least because of allegations that they are all about saving £4 million over three years and because they will involve more than 100 job losses and affect four stations. However, we should not forget that the campaign is an all-party effort—it is a campaign not just by Labour councillors and Members of Parliament but by people across the party spectrum. It is timely to pay tribute to local newspapers such as the Scunthorpe Telegraph, whose "stop the fire cuts" campaign has been very helpful.

Members have covered the issues comprehensively, so I shall try not to repeat what they have said, but one of the specific issues that I shall address is the efficacy of spending £36,000 of public money on a consultation undertaken by a Swansea-based public research company. The fire service prays in aid Cabinet Office guidelines. I do not think that that is necessarily an excuse for spending so much money while considering service reductions. Perhaps I am old fashioned, but I take the view that elected officials should take executive decisions rather than trying to offload responsibility through consultation processes, which are not always as genuine as they might seem.

[Mr. Stewart Jackson]

The fire service has claimed that the planned reductions are not financially driven. Hon. Members have made the point clearly that the service has been given a generous 5.8 per cent. increase in the grant allocation for 2008-09—although the percentage increase will be reduced provisionally over the next two financial years—despite a 2005 Audit Commission comprehensive performance assessment rating of only fair and a declining direction of travel rating between 2006 and 2007.

There are other areas of specific concern. As hon. Members have mentioned, an inconsistent approach has been taken to development. In a recent presentation to Hull city council, the fire service conceded that development patterns in Hull had informed its decision, particularly with respect to Hull central station, but that factor has been disregarded in respect of north Lincolnshire and north-east Lincolnshire, where future development is not considered an appropriate issue. Significant industrial development is occurring in the Goole area, particularly in Centreport and Capitol Park, and proposals are in the offing to build a straw-burning power station there.

As the hon. Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey) said, there seems to be no recognition of the proximity of transport infrastructure. Goole is the busiest inland port in England. It receives a huge amount of timber, for example, through its docks, and is adjacent to the busy M18 and M62 motorways. As I understand it, the service conveniently focuses on road traffic accidents only in the Goole area, rather than in the wider area, which would include those major roads. Mention has also been made of the level crossing and traffic in Goole. In Kirton in Lindsey, as the right hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) mentioned, road traffic accidents on the A15 are increasing, and that must be taken into account.

There is also the question of the methodology used in the fire service emergency cover risk assessment, which was mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and the hon. Member for Cleethorpes. The East Riding of Yorkshire and north Lincolnshire seem to be dismissed as a low-risk area by reducing the standard response time to 20 minutes. In my opinion, that is based on a narrow interpretation of urban deprivation indices. As my right hon. Friend said, it ignores the growing elderly population, particularly in the East Riding.

The proposals also disregard the consequential changes to other fire stations in the area. As we have heard, the changes to Goole will have an impact on Howden, which already has problems recruiting retained firefighters, as well as on Crowle, Snaith and other stations. The downgrading proposals will therefore mean that a significant rural proportion of the East Riding of Yorkshire and north Lincolnshire will be covered by just one pump for much of the day. Similarly, the proposal to close the Kirton in Lindsey station will affect the retained pump in Brigg, necessitating cover overstretch in Barnetby, Brigg and other areas.

However, that is where the consensus must end. Hon. Members cannot expect me not to mention that every action has a reaction. Each hon. Member who has spoken supported the Fire and Rescue Services Bill in 2004, which forced on local authorities a local integrated risk management plan. Hon. Members have prayed in aid the Fire Brigades Union, but the FBU said in a press release in 2004 that the Bill and its proposals would "downgrade the rescue role of the fire service and produce cuts across the service under the guise of local Integrated Risk Management Plans."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden, who at that time was shadowing the Deputy Prime Minister, challenged the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), asking:

"Will the Deputy Prime Minister also pledge that rural communities...will not be penalised as a result of the integrated risk management approach?"—[Official Report, 30 June 2003, Vol. 408, c. 24.]

Hon. Members must also admit that it is inconceivable that the Government's regionalisation programme for the fire and rescue service, which is three years late and perhaps as much as 14 times over the budget in the outline business plan of October 2005, has had no impact on the proposals. The hon. Member for Brigg and Goole, for whom I have a great deal of respect, has publicly defended the decision to relocate control facilities to Wakefield in West Yorkshire. In that respect, he is out of step with the FBU. Surely all Members must now see a causal link between the Government's flawed reorganisation agenda and service reductions in their constituencies.

Mr. Cawsey: The Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 ensures that risk to human life is the first priority for each fire service. If the Conservatives are saying that they disagree with that, I am surprised. As far as local opinion is concerned, if the situation was caused by a national Act, why is it not happening everywhere in the country? It is happening in Humberside, not elsewhere. How could it be linked to a national Act of Parliament?

Mr. Jackson: I spoke earlier to my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who cannot be here because he has other engagements. He made the point that in 18 years of Conservative Government, there were no proposals for cuts of this size in Humberside. That is pertinent.

Mr. Cawsey: I was a Humberside county councillor during the period of Conservative Government. We had regular demonstrations about attempts to cut fire services in the area. Peakes Lane station in Grimsby is not being affected now, but it was then. This is not new at all.

Mr. Jackson: I take the hon. Gentleman's comments on board, but I must press on to allow the Minister to respond.

The Humberside fire and rescue service is about to receive an above-inflation grant increase, so the reasons for the reductions must be non-financial. They are being contemplated—I address this to the Minister—only because the Government refuse, even when faced with a significant risk of flooding like last year's, to reconsider resilience funding for uniforms and equipment for the Humberside fire service or, as hon. Members will know, for proactive work on smoke alarms, at a cost of £180,000 a year.

Even after three years of study and research, the proposals have not been thought out fully; they are incoherent, opaque and, potentially, a threat to life and property. They have arisen out of the centralising agenda of this Labour Government. To blame the fire service alone is disingenuous and wrong. I trust that the Minister will accept some of the blame for the situation and reassure the Chamber that he is aware of that fact and intends to do something about it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Parmjit Dhanda): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) on her very effective and cogent argument. I also congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey), my right hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and, indeed, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). The latter is not here now, but got his point across effectively without being distracted, like the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson), by talking about funding in such a party political way. The right hon. Gentleman knows that, at 5.8 per cent., the settlement for the region is one of the best in the country, with a further 3.5 and 3.3 per cent. in subsequent years. It is quite sad that the hon. Gentleman tried to play party politics in the debate. My right hon. and hon. Friends and their local papers—the Hull Daily Mail, the Grimsby Evening Telegraph and the Scunthorpe Evening Telegraph—did not. That was an unfortunate contribution to the debate.

As well as the settlement of 5.8 per cent. over the next year, the Government have supported national fire and rescue services with about £200 million of new dimension equipment, which for Humberside has meant an incident response unit for mass decontamination, a mass decontamination disrobe module, a detection, identification and monitoring team and a high-volume pump, which proved very helpful during the summer floods.

Mr. Morley: I was discussing that with a firefighter on the train home recently. He said that, as a firefighter in Humberside for many years, he has seen a huge improvement in the quality of equipment and machines under this Government, compared with the previous one.

Mr. Dhanda: My right hon. Friend is correct. That is one of reasons why the number of fire deaths has been reduced to the lowest figure since the 1950s, including in my hon. Friends' region. That is also in part the result of legislation and changes in the fire service introduced in the past five years by this Labour Government, such as the Regulatory Reform (Fire Safety) Order 2005 and the local integrated risk management plans. We should congratulate the fire and rescue service on the way in which it has remodelled and changed itself in recent years.

My right hon. and hon. Friends made cogent points about the dangers at local level if people are not consulted adequately on the detail of the changes. I do not think that they expect me to enter into the detail of those local decisions, because the whole point of IRMPs and the RRO is to allow local communities, authorities and fire and rescue services to make the decisions. From what the hon. Member for Peterborough said, it struck me that the Conservative party is not in favour of IRMPs and the RRO—measures that have reduced the number of fire deaths, ensured that the fire service has had far more time to carry out preventive work in local communities and, with funding from my Department, enabled more than 1 million smoke alarms to be placed in people's homes. I am therefore surprised by his apparent stance.

My right hon. and hon. Friends made points about local changes proposed by the local fire and rescue authority, which has a different opinion, as would be expected. As my right hon. Friend explained, the chief fire officer told him that he feels, based on independent reports, that the changes would result in better local provision. It is not my duty to make the case for the local fire and rescue authority; it must do that to convince local people. I appreciate that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole said, it has extended its consultation period to the end of this month. The fact that local Members of Parliament have been engaged with that process, and have had an opportunity to raise their concerns, is important. I hope that all factors are taken into consideration when those local decisions are made in the coming weeks.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden mentioned FSEC and the criteria used. It is important to get across the fact that FSEC is merely a tool created in 2004 and is not binding on local authorities, which can find their own methodologies, if they have their own views on how decisions should be made locally. I hope that I have made that clear. Furthermore, I can tell the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Dan Rogerson), who made comments about the retained duty service with which I agree, that our retained firefighters provide a very valuable service to our country. However, the Government need to do more to support their recruitment and I am very keen to do more with their employers to ensure that they feel valued for allowing retained duty staff to serve their local communities.

The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Peterborough also mentioned—this was a slight distraction—the FiReControl project, which will deliver further savings for fire and rescue authorities on their control rooms to the tune of about 25 per cent. It will also provide the best technological solution that this country has ever had. Last week, I visited a similar version up and running in Sweden. Ours will provide an even better technological solution and service, ensuring that it protects and saves people's lives and provides our firefighters with the best system that we have ever had. That is probably part of the reason why colleagues of the hon. Member for Peterborough, such as Conservative Councillors Jerry Wilmott and Pete Roffey, and the chair of the Local Government Association's fire committee, Councillor Les Byron, are doing such sterling work in helping to support the project and to deliver it across the country. They are mature enough to accept that that will make a real difference and save people's lives.

Mr. Jackson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Dhanda: I shall not. The hon. Gentleman has had his say.

[Mr. Dhanda]

My hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes mentioned the fact that her constituency has a significant amount of coast line, which, along with poverty and the ability to raise council tax, is one of the measures used to calculate our formulas. That is one reason why Cleethorpes and the Humberside authority received a 5.8 per cent. increase this year as well as likely above-inflation increases for years 2 and 3 of the settlement. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole talked about the changes not being finance driven, which probably came as something of a disappointment to the hon. Member for Peterborough and, perhaps the hon. Member for North Cornwall, although I thought that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden—a local Member—was far more mature in his approach.

Mr. Jackson: I am delighted that the Minister is rising above party politics. If things are so wonderful in the FiReControl project, why has he failed to persuade virtually all the local councillors and authorities and other key stakeholders in his own constituency that it is right?

Mr. Dhanda: Obviously the hon. Gentleman has not been following events very closely. If he had, he would be aware that last week the Conservatives on Gloucestershire county council put out a press release saying that they would join the regional management board on the project. Actually, the local authority has been working very closely on the project for a significant period and the chief fire officer is a member of the test board. Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman tried to turn this into a political debate, when it is in fact a very important local debate, which is a point that my right hon. and hon. Friends got across. The points they made in this valuable debate will be listened to in this House and back in their constituencies, and I hope that they will be considered very carefully when the fire authority makes its decisions.

Bovine Tuberculosis

12.30 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Pope, for calling me in what I consider to be a very important debate about bovine tuberculosis. I am chairman of the all-party group on dairy farmers, one of the largest all-party groups with more than 170 members from all political parties. I am very encouraged by the widespread support for the group, not just from Conservative Members, but from many Labour Members as well.

We have focused until now on the price that farmers are paid for their herds' milk, and I hope that the Office of Fair Trading takes on board our concerns and takes action against the supermarkets. However, our group's second most important concern is bovine TB. In Shropshire, the bovine TB situation is absolutely dire. I have visited many farms in my constituency to see at first hand the terrible suffering and misery that the disease has caused. There is a farmer, Mr. Chris Balmer, in the village of Snailbeach, who throughout the year as well as repeatedly not receiving his Rural Payments Agency payments, has had bovine TB on his farm, which almost drove him to bankruptcy.

Many farms in that part of Shropshire, between the Welsh border and the villages of Minsterley and Pontesbury, have seen a massive increase in bovine TB in the past few years. I have a list of questions from one farmer, Mr. Stuart Jones, of Asterley, which I sent today to the Minister and ask her to answer, if she would be so good enough. The situation in Shropshire is such that whereas in 1998 45 animals were slaughtered under bovine TB control measures, in 2006 the figure was 915. On a year-to-year basis there has been massive incremental growth. I say again to the Minister that Shropshire alone has seen the number of slaughtered animals increase from 45 to 915. I want almost to repeat that statistic over and over again, because it is absolutely breathtaking—from 45 cases to 915. It is an outrage that the situation is allowed to continue. In that period, there has been an increase of 500 per cent. in the confirmed reactors in Shropshire, from a total of seven in 1998 to 278 in 2006.

One of the most serious and damning critical assessments of the Prime Minister by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition is his description of the Prime Minister as "dithering". That is a serious allegation, because in politics one cannot afford to dither. People expect one to make decisions: no matter how controversial they are or how many people one is likely to upset, one has to show courage and make tough decisions. I perceive the lack of action that has allowed the massive increase in animal slaughter in Shropshire to be nothing short of dithering by the Government.

The cross-party Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs issued a report on 26 February, which I want to raise with the Minister, because it is an important part of my speech. Lord Rooker referred to the report as "excellent". It says:

> "The Government's current method of controlling cattle TB, that of surveillance, testing and slaughter, is not working effectively."

It continues:

"The Committee's conclusion is that there is no simple solution that will control cattle TB. The Government must adopt a multi-faceted approach to tackling the disease, using all methods available. The Government's strategy for cattle TB should include: more frequent cattle testing, with more frequent and targeted combined use of the tuberculin skin test and the gamma interferon test; the evaluation of post-movement cattle testing; greater communication with farmers on the benefits of biosecurity measures; the deployment of badger and cattle vaccines when they become available in the future".

It also asks for the consideration of a limited cull in hotspot areas. Interestingly, the report continues:

"The measures the Committee has recommended will require an increase in financial support from Defra. However, this is necessary if the Government want to avoid ever-increasing expenditure forecast in future years, which could total as much as £1 billion between now and 2013. Ministerial assertions driven by Defra's budgetary control problems, that the budget for cattle TB will be reduced are unrealistic."

The report then makes its most important point:

"Defra is now justified in making a case to HM Treasury for a 'spend to save' policy. But in so doing it will once and for all have to commit itself to a strategy with clear goals against which progress can be measured."

The Committee's Chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), said:

"This is a complex issue and there is no simple solution. But I am pleased that the Report represents the unanimous view of the Committee."

I know some of the Committee's members. They include Labour Members who represent cities and towns with very few farmers. Some of those Members are, as I perceive them, on the left wing of the Labour party, but even they are happy to put their names to the report, which is quite damning of the Government's policy on tackling TB and calls for the important measures to which I have referred to be implemented.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on calling this vital debate. I serve on the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, and one of the most interesting things about the report is that it has been welcomed by the Badger Trust on the one hand, and by the National Farmers Union on the other, which is not bad going. Does he agree that one of the most important outcomes of today's debate would be for the Minister to do what the Secretary of State suggested he might be ready to do when he spoke in Oxford earlier this year, which is accept the report's recommendations, including those on badger culling?

Daniel Kawczynski: I totally agree, and I should like the Minister to respond to the Committee on which my hon. Friend sits. What is her response? When will the recommendations be implemented? And when will she be able to announce the necessary extra funding that those vital recommendations need to go ahead?

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend on obtaining the debate. The farms in my Gloucestershire constituency are in one of the worst affected areas. Does he agree that not only should the Government stop dithering and announce a cull in hard boundary areas as the report recommends, but that owing to the figure that he gave of £1 billion in possible costs by 2013, it would be absolute folly for DEFRA to reduce in any way its research on a vaccine? As the report makes clear, a vaccine is likely to be the best long-term solution to the disease.

Daniel Kawczynski: I totally agree, and I look forward to the Minister's reply to my hon. Friends' comments.

I realise that, for the Minister, the situation is difficult. Interestingly, the largest group in Shropshire is the Shropshire Wildlife Trust, which has almost 8,000 members, and its symbol is a badger. I went to see the trust, whose representatives said to me, "Mr. Kawczynski, why do you want to kill badgers? Why do you want a cull of badgers?" I spoke last night to the trust's development manager, Mr. John Hughes, who made very much the point that my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) just made. Mr. Hughes said that even the trust looks to the Government for a rapid decision. The trust realises that the badgers are suffering terribly as a result of this appalling disease, and it also realises that the damage being done to our agricultural sector is of such a magnitude that ultimately it will affect wildlife groups such as the trust, wildlife itself, and the stability of our countryside, both in Shropshire and throughout the country. If the Minister spoke to Mr. Hughes, he would say that he feels as frustrated as I do at the lack of action by the Government on this matter.

I would like to make a point on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey), who is not able to be here because of the arrival of his baby girl, on which I congratulate him. He has asked me to say that he has been fighting hard for his constituents Daphne and Pat Saunders and their son, Miles. The Saunders own an organic farm near Faringdon, which was one of the first organic farms in the country. Last year, many of their pedigree cattle were culled after testing positive under the new test. Quite apart from the fact that many more cattle were culled than was necessary, the further huge injustice is that the compensation that they have received has been so low. They have lost top-grade pedigree cattle but they have been compensated for ordinary cattle. As my hon. Friend put it to me:

"It is like seeing your Ferrari go into the crusher and only getting compensation for a Skoda."

The Government have promised to look at the compensation scheme, but nothing has happened. I would not use quite the same phrase as my hon. Friend did, but he is far more extrovert and colourful than I am. None the less, he makes a very important point: certain cattle—high pedigree cattle—are being slaughtered, but farmers are receiving compensation for ordinary cattle. I would very much like the Minister to respond to that point as well.

I would like to say just one last thing, because I want to give the Minister as much time as possible to answer the questions that I have put to her. In my estimation, the long-term success of a Government stems from their ability and determination to help all sections of society, no matter how distant they are from their immediate priorities. We hear very little from the Labour Government about their priorities for farmers and the countryside. There is a great deal of talk about the inner cities, education and the national health service, which are all very important issues. However, I, for one, feel very passionately about agriculture, because I represent a very agricultural constituency. It frustrates me greatly that the Government spend so little time talking about the huge damage—the crisis—that farming communities such as those in the Shrewsbury area are facing.

I want to look the Minister in the eyes and say to her that I met Chris Balmer, the farmer from Snailbeach I mentioned earlier, when I had to intervene on his behalf to get his single farm payments on no less than seven occasions last year, and one of those occasions was the first time that I have seen a grown man cry, because of the situation that he has been put in with bovine TB. He is one of the most honourable people that I have ever come across. He works very hard to make a living and shows immense fortitude and courage, no matter what is thrown at him. I want the Minister to assure me that Mr. Balmer will receive his payments on time next year and, more importantly, that she is going to do something that shows that she really understands the terrible suffering of my community, which is so dependent on the vibrancy of the agricultural sector. Furthermore, I want her to assure me that she will take on board the recommendations of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee and use her many talents and skills to convince the Treasury that the time has come for the extra investment that is needed to sort out bovine TB in this country once and for all, so that we can save the hundreds of millions of pounds that we will otherwise have to spend if the crisis is not dealt with.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Joan Ruddock): First of all, I want to apologise for the fact that the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw), who has the topic of bovine TB in his brief, is unable to be here today and that I am therefore addressing hon. Members instead of him.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on securing this debate on what is clearly a very important matter. I also congratulate his hon. Friends the Members for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) and for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) on their interventions.

Bovine TB is a very difficult issue. As the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham says, it is ever present in the minds of farmers and vets, but I must tell him that it is also ever present in the minds of Ministers. It is also never far from the headlines. The hon. Gentleman has today described the terrible suffering, as he put it, of some of his constituents. I say to him that we recognise the difficulties, stress and financial hardship that individual farmers have faced and still face as a result of bovine TB. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs recently held meetings with farmers, wildlife and conservation groups and vets to ensure that he understands the views of all those who are affected in one way or another by bovine TB.

The hon. Gentleman said that we have spent too little time on bovine TB, but I must tell him that, sadly, because of the raft of animal diseases that have affected this country in the past year, a huge amount of time has been spent and many visits have been made by my colleagues to farms across the country. I may be an "inner-city" Member, as I represent the constituency of Lewisham, Deptford, but I was the first person to bring the Organic Food and Farming Targets Bill to this House, so I think that he should realise that I have some personal interest, if not a constituency interest, in agricultural issues.

The hon. Gentleman charged the Government with a lack of action on bovine TB. I am delighted to have the opportunity to rebut that charge absolutely. Not only do we recognise that the incidence of the disease is unacceptably high, but we recognise that it is particularly high in areas such as those represented by the hon. Members here today. As the hon. Gentleman said, Shropshire has seen a rise in the number of animals slaughtered because of bovine TB from 45 to 915 and is therefore a severe case in point. However, I remind the House that 91 per cent. of GB cattle herds are TB-free. We must remember that statistic when it is suggested that bovine TB is a scourge that is affecting the whole of the farming community. Bovine TB is definitively not affecting the whole of the farming community. That is why we have the strategic framework for the sustainable control of TB, why we emphasise that we should keep the clean areas clean and why we have introduced measures to help us to achieve that aim.

Let me describe some of those measures. We have spent more than £110 million on TB research in the past 10 years and about £8.5 million in the last financial year alone. We have spent about £17.8 million over the last 10 years on vaccine research. Since the 1950s, there has been in place an extensive system of TB testing and surveillance. Last year, the Government paid for 5.9 million tests on 51,000 cattle herds in Britain. We have also introduced new cattle controls, which are helping to prevent new cases of the disease. Between March 2006 and January 2008, there was pre-movement testing of cattle more than 42 days old moving out of high-risk herds, which detected 664 reactors in 363 herds in England. Those reactors might otherwise have spread disease within buyers' herds.

We have also introduced the gamma interferon test, which is being used to improve the sensitivity of the testing regime that has been in place for many years. The gamma interferon test identifies animals that are missed by the skin test and it is part of our efforts to clean up disease in herds more quickly. It is also designed to prevent the disease becoming established in otherwise clean areas. 3,590 animals of 37,604 animals that were sampled between October 2006 and the end of January 2008 tested positive. Most of those animals were not being identified through the standard testing approach. Although the hon. Gentleman accuses the Government of taking little action, it is obvious that we are taking new actions and getting new results that are extremely important.

The number of reactors identified by pre-movement and gamma interferon tests shows the worth of these tests, and we are grateful to the farming community for the commitment and responsibility that it has shown in relation to the TB testing programme. We have worked hard with many stakeholders, including the Wildlife Trusts group, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, to raise awareness about the simple biosecurity measures that can be employed to keep cattle and badgers apart.

The hon. Gentleman asked about compensation, particularly in relation to constituents who are organic farmers. There is extensive evidence of significant overvaluation under the previous scheme, which used individual valuations rather than the table valuations used today. The Government must be conscious of the need to protect the taxpayer as well as the farmer. The hon. Gentleman's party usually trumpets the protection of the taxpayer, so perhaps he should bear that in mind. We have not ruled out changing the current compensation system, but any changes would have to be justified and to take into account the needs and protection of all the parties concerned, and that will always include the taxpayer. We are confident that table valuations generally provide a fair balance between the costs that taxpayers and farmers are expected to carry. That is not a new idea; it is used in other parts of the world where TB affects cattle, and it has been used in Britain in the past.

The role that culling badgers could play in tackling TB has been a matter of continuous debate since the 1970s, and the issue is undoubtedly complex and controversial. The Independent Scientific Group on Cattle TB showed in its report, which took 10 years to complete, that there is a cycle of disease between cattle and badgers. It also concluded that culling badgers is unlikely to make a significant contribution to tackling the disease. Indeed, the study showed that there was a risk that it might make the situation worse. We must have regard to that report.

Mr. Gray: That was the report's conclusion, but it was drawn up within the constraints set by the Government and it involved a very small cull. How does the Minister explain the fact that the Government's chief scientific adviser, Sir David King, overturned that report and said that there was a place for culling badgers?

Joan Ruddock: I was about to say that we referred the matter to the Government's chief scientific adviser, who then expressed his view. I wanted to put it on the record that that work took 10 years to complete, and that we cannot simply set it aside. We have not yet made a decision on culling. We must make a sensible and informed decision, and it must be the right decision rather than the quick one that the hon. Gentleman would have me make.

Mr. Gray: After 10 years?

Joan Ruddock: No, the study took 10 years, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no question of the decision taking that long.

We have the report of the Independent Scientific Group on Cattle TB following those 10 years of research, and we have the assessment of the evidence on badger culling provided by the former chief scientific adviser, Sir David King. As the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said, we also have the report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee following its inquiry on the issue. He quoted the Select Committee, which did not make any outright damning criticism of the Government and their actions. It produced an extremely considered report and made many important points, some of which he referred to. He said that there is no simple solution and that a multifaceted approach must be adopted. That underpins what the Government are doing: the issue is multifaceted and we acknowledge that there is no simple solution. We are trying to work across several fronts to tackle this serious problem. That the Badger Trust and the National Farmers Union both applauded the report is probably unique in the experience of those who have dealt with this controversial topic, and he is right to point out the significance of that.

The report made recommendations on frequent testing, biosecurity, work on vaccines and the consideration of a limited cull. All those recommendations are either already being pursued by the Government or are under consideration. As the hon. Gentleman is undoubtedly aware, it is not appropriate for a Minister to respond to that report in this debate. There is a proper procedure to follow in which the Government consider in depth what the report says. We will make an appropriate written response in the allotted time.

Daniel Kawczynski: On culling, I appreciate that there will have to be a detailed analysis of the report before feedback is given, but can the Minister give us any idea of how long the process will take? She said that it will not take 10 years to decide whether a limited cull is appropriate, but can she give me any comfort by letting me know how long it is likely to take?

Joan Ruddock: I can only repeat that it will take as long as it takes to get the right decision. That is crucial, as the decision must be the right one. This is a matter of deep concern. Ministers appreciate the issues and the need for a decision. The decision will be taken, and the report will be responded to appropriately.

Mr. Gray: When?

Joan Ruddock: I am not going to guess when. I am not one of the Ministers studying the report, so that would be inappropriate.

There will be three key aspects to the Secretary of State's decision: what impact the proposed measure would have on the disease, what the science tells us and how practical the solution is. We must also consider public acceptability. We need to proceed carefully. We have already given some information in response to questions that have been asked. For example, we have been asked how culling would be carried out, if it were used. We have ruled out gassing and snaring—it is important to put that on the record. Research on methods of culling will be published when the reports have been peer reviewed and when we have decided whether badger culling should take place.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the TB vaccine and whether its use should continue. I assure him that work on that continues, although unfortunately it is some years off it being a final solution. We think that an oral badger vaccine will be ready by 2014 and that an injectable badger vaccine will be ready by 2010, although we would not expect that to be widely used.

[Joan Ruddock]

The best estimate for cattle vaccines is 2015. The test must allow differentiation of vaccinated cattle and those infected with disease.

Our ultimate aim has to be the eradication of bovine TB, but that cannot be a realistic short-term goal, given the incidence of the disease. Our first priority is therefore to focus on the GB strategic framework on TB to control the disease and prevent further spread. Once the disease is under control—that must be our hope for the future—the aim will become eradication. TB is a scourge; it has caused enormous hardship and places a huge financial burden on both the farming community and the taxpayer. We share the hon. Gentleman's desire to end the problem and to increase the comfort of his farming community.

HIV/AIDS (Developing Countries)

1 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): I believe that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that the Government have a good record on promoting the interests of the developing world. Under the comprehensive spending review settlement published in October, the aid budget will have increased by more than three times in real terms between 1997 and 2010. In that time, the UK will have more than doubled the proportion of gross national income spent on overseas development assistance, and we are on track to meet the United Nations gold standard of 0.7 per cent. by 2013. Hon. Members will be aware that what I call the gold standard has existed for 30-odd years. When Labour was in power before, UK expenditure was lifted virtually right up to 0.7 per cent., but, of course, it fell and fell under the Conservatives. To our credit, we are raising it again to the 0.7 per cent. target, which the whole House should support.

However, all the evidence shows that the fight against HIV and AIDS is crucial to the prospects for any significant economic advance in the developing world. Unlike many of the diseases that claim lives in our country, AIDS is largely a young person's disease. That means that it has robbed developing countries of many of the people to whom we would normally look to contribute to the economy and to raise living standards. As the World Health Organisation pointed out in 1999, in the worst affected countries of southern Africa, the development gains of the past 50 years are being reversed by the epidemic. We will not see advancement of any significance in those countries until serious progress is made to end the AIDS epidemic in them.

The latest estimate by UNAIDS is that 33 million people now live with HIV, including 2.5 million children. Two and a half million people were newly infected last year, and 2.1 million people died, including 290,000 children. The developing world is hardest hit: 68 per cent. of the new infections and 76 per cent. of the deaths last year were in sub-Saharan Africa, where AIDS is the primary cause of death. Estimated HIV prevalence has more than doubled in eastern Europe and central Asia since 2001, and the declining trends in some countries such as Burundi are reversing.

In the past eight years, the international community has made a series of commitments to address HIV/AIDS. In September 2000, Heads of State and Government at the UN millennium summit issued the millennium declaration—a powerful statement of pledges to address the major challenges facing humanity. Under its provisions, the international community is committed to halting and beginning to reverse the spread of HIV/AIDS by 2015.

Further progress was made in 2005, and the UK Government can take pride in the Gleneagles commitment by G8 Governments to ensuring universal access to treatment by 2010. Many hon. Members will remember the Gleneagles summit. I well remember the run-up to it, all the work that was done by non-governmental organisations to build it up, and the huge march and demonstration in Edinburgh—colossal!—as part of the build-up to what was achieved by our Government. A climate was created at the summit for getting some real decisions on targets. That pledge was broadened at the UN world summit later that year and became an international commitment to ensure, as nearly as possible, universal access to prevention, treatment, care and support by 2010.

As the world has belatedly come round to the urgency of the HIV/AIDS crisis, there has been some progress on the ground. In 2001, the world spent just $1.6 billion on fighting AIDS. In 2007, total available resources reached $10 billion. The number of people in low and middle-income countries receiving antiretroviral treatment increased fivefold between 2003 and 2006, reaching 2 million by the end of that year. There has been a reduction in HIV-associated deaths, which is thought to be partly attributable to the recent improvement in access to treatment. In addition, preliminary data suggest that there has been a reduction in risky sexual behaviour in a number of countries including Cameroon, Haiti and Kenya.

As I have outlined, the international community has geared up its response to HIV/AIDS in terms of both political and financial commitment, but the global effort is still nowhere near the scale that is needed if we are to get to grips with the AIDS crisis. We are still falling far behind on treatment and prevention. Despite recent increases, the WHO estimated last April that only 28 per cent. of people needing antiretrovirals get them and only 11 per cent. of HIV-positive pregnant women in Africa are getting drugs to prevent transmission to their unborn children. My hon. Friend the Minister will be well aware of the efficacy of that treatment, which is available in hospitals.

The effort to increase access to treatment has not been matched in the field of prevention. Just one person in five has access to basic prevention services, and surveys indicate that just 12 per cent. of men and 10 per cent. of women in sub-Saharan Africa had been tested for HIV and received the results. Moreover, all those efforts continue to be hampered by stigma and discrimination.

Hilary Armstrong (North-West Durham) (Lab): I am concerned that one of the consequences of the way in which HIV/AIDS has spread, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa, is that 75 per cent. of the young people who live with the disease in that area are female. The effect of HIV/AIDS on women and girls is absolutely phenomenal. That is why I am proud to be associated with Voluntary Service Overseas and its campaign with ActionAid this year to highlight the effect of HIV/AIDS on women. It says to Governments that when they intervene, they need to support and empower women in communities, because those women will then be able to take steps to stop others getting HIV/AIDS. I say that because I know that many girls are, for example, frightened to ask partners to use condoms because of violence, rape and so on, and the whole situation is being made worse.

Dr. Strang: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's intervention. I shall touch on the gender issue, although not as much as I would like. I am grateful to her for raising that important issue. That is where we are: women and, of course, children are involved. I am pleased that she was able to put that point on the record.

It is clear that a far greater acceleration of financing is required. UNAIDS estimates that even last year's resources were more than $8 billion short of what should have been spent if the world were on track to meet its commitments. Even if donor countries continue to increase spending at the current pace, the funding gap will widen, we will not achieve universal access by 2010, and our 2015 commitments will be jeopardised.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that we should not be starting from this point. Had the world responded to the emerging AIDS crisis on the scale required 20 years or so ago, the scale of today's problem and the cost of the necessary action to address it would be far smaller. We face the same choice today. For every patient who began antiretroviral therapy in 2006, six other individuals became infected with HIV. Failure to act on a proper scale now will mean still greater expense in the decades to come.

To meet the goal of universal access around the globe by 2010, UNAIDS estimates that we must spend some $92 billion over the next three years, more than quadrupling the annual funding available to more than $42 billion by 2010. Obviously, that makes assumptions about the build-up in inflation during the time needed to achieve that, but those are the sums.

My hon. Friend will be aware of the Stop AIDS Campaign, which brings together many of the United Kingdom's leading groups in this field. Stop AIDS has calculated the UK's fair share of that $92 billion, in line with our relative wealth and population. On that basis, it suggests that its fair share of the world's HIV/AIDS expenditure is just over $5 billion, or £2.5 billion sterling, over the next three years. We should seek to achieve that target.

The establishment of the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria in 2001 was a landmark in the fight against HIV and AIDS. Resources available to the global fund are now considerably better. When I initiated a debate in November 2004, there was real concern that the fund could become an irrelevance. The eighth round of proposals, which was launched this month, is well financed compared to previous rounds, and the global fund already has $9.7 billion in pledges for the three years from 2008 to 2010. However, my hon. Friend will be aware that the fund needs between $6 billion and $8 billion every year to meet its objectives, and the UK Government back that figure, for which we are grateful. There is still a shortfall of between $5 billion and $8 billion for the 2008-10 period. I hope that the Government will continue to push for global fund resources to reach the levels that we need to see if the organisation is to fulfil its remit. We are all agreed on that. The global fund is working well and bringing in more resources, and we must do all that we can in terms of cash and by using the influence that my hon. Friend, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and others bring to bear, to make the global fund one of the great landmarks in the history of this century.

As I have mentioned, progress has been made in getting treatment to people who need it. A significant reason for that is the fall in the price of first-line drugs from around $10,000 per patient per year to $130. However, still more people are needing second and third-line therapies as their first-line treatments cease to be effective. Patenting restrictions are tighter on these newer drugs. The WHO has found that the prices paid for such treatments are often unaffordably high in countries lacking generic alternatives. As my hon. Friend's ministerial colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for International Development, my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) advised last year, second-line treatments can cost as much as 10 times more than other treatments.

We know that the Government support the right of developing countries to use the flexibilities in respect of trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights to ensure affordable access to drugs, including the use of compulsory licensing provisions. In addition, they have expressed interest in patent pooling. I would be grateful if the Minister gave an indication of the progress that has been made. Clearly, we will be looking to the new strategy on HIV/AIDS to bring forward action to help developing countries to make affordable medicines available.

Of course, the affordability of drugs is only part of the picture. Efforts to secure universal access by 2010 can succeed only where there is a supporting infrastructure accessible to people in need. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, average health spending in sub-Saharan Africa is just £5 per person per year—less than a third of the WHO's recommended minimum of £17.

As the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West told the House, there is an estimated shortage of more than 4 million health care workers worldwide. Last May, Médecins Sans Frontières reported that the rate at which people could start treatment was slowing and treatment waiting lists were growing due to a shortage of health care workers in southern Africa. In this context, my hon. Friend who is responding to the debate may want to mention the UK's involvement in the new international health partnership, which aims to improve co-ordination among donors to deliver improved health systems. I know that he takes a considerable interest in that and recognises what a challenge it is for our Government and his Department.

In many countries, we look to the state to provide the necessary infrastructure, through state-run services such as health and education. However, we should not lose sight of the fact that it is not just the state that has an important role to play. The voluntary sector, including faith groups, does vital work. It is also in the interests of the private sector, such as mining companies in South Africa, to ensure that their work force, with their families, have access to the prevention and treatment services that they need. Every effort should be made to encourage those companies—and some of those big, major companies have British head offices—to do all they can for their employees and their employees' families, and for the wider population.

On the point raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), gender inequalities continue to leave women and girls in developing countries disproportionately vulnerable to HIV and AIDS. The Department for International Development is recognised for its groundbreaking work on HIV and gender. I understand that a commitment has been made to put women's rights at the heart of the new strategy. All hon. Members welcome and support that. My hon. Friend the Minister will know that organisations working in this field will be keen to see that commitment reflected in a range of targets and indicators in the strategy. Both he and my right hon. Friend have experience in this area and I do not doubt their determination and the importance that they attach to making progress for women and children. We know about the gender issue. My hon. Friend also knows that there is concern about the position of children. The availability of paediatric treatment remains low.

The international community has some notable opportunities in the coming months to accelerate efforts to tackle HIV/AIDS. My hon. Friend will be aware of meetings in Japan of G8 Development Ministers and Finance Ministers and that the G8 summit will be held in July. As I said, it was the G8 at Gleneagles that initiated the commitment to universal access by 2010. That is worth repeating: universal access by 2010. With just two years to go until 2010, HIV/AIDS must not be allowed to lose its priority. I hope that he will do all he can to ensure that delivery of universal access is again on the agenda and that we secure concrete, timed pledges from the G8.

In addition, the United Nations will be conducting a comprehensive review of the progress achieved in realising the 2001 declaration of commitment and the 2006 political declaration. To undertake that review, the UN will hold a high-level meeting on 10 and 11 June. Again, we look to my hon. Friend and his colleagues to secure from their international counterparts the political and financial commitment necessary to meet their pledge of universal access by 2010.

I am very grateful to have had the opportunity to raise this important issue. Last May, when I initiated a debate on HIV/AIDS in the developing world, we were anticipating the publication of the interim evaluation of DFID's "Taking Action" strategy. Now we await the publication of the Department's new strategy. It is clear that the world needs to amplify greatly its efforts to tackle the global HIV/AIDS crisis. I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend has to say.

1.19 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I shall be extremely brief, because I want the Minister to have a lot of time to reply. I shall speak perhaps for one minute, just to reinforce what the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) has said. I welcome his securing this debate; he has done the House a service in doing so. Along with the other killer diseases of polio, tuberculosis and malaria, HIV/AIDS is an important matter in which the global fund has played a huge part. The British Government, through DFID, have done an enormously good job of work.

I should like Minister to comment on just one or two other things. Does he agree that intermediate targets should be set, so that we begin to look as though we will meet the universal access target by 2010? Does he also agree that, as the right hon. Gentleman said, some countries do far better than others in tackling AIDS? For example, Thailand has a much better record than Swaziland. The solution must be country-owned if it is to be most effective.

Does the Minister agree that the rate of maternal transmission of HIV/AIDS from mother to child in poor countries is shocking, given that it is just 2 per cent. in the richer western countries? Will he comment on what the Department for International Development is doing to increase research and development, because we must find more effective treatments for HIV/AIDS? Does he also agree that we should measure outcomes rather than solely the amount of money spent? Will he continually evaluate the effectiveness of DFID's programmes to find out what works and what does not, and shift money towards those programmes?

I was greatly honoured to be present when the Secretary of State for International Development made a speech on College green on world AIDS day. One or two representatives of the NGOs present told me that, given the changes at DFID's headquarters, they were concerned that it would not be able to operate its world health programme effectively. Will the Minister assure hon. Members today that those changes will be able to deliver that programme?

1.21 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Shahid Malik): It is a pleasure to engage in this debate under your stewardship, Mr. Pope.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), who has an admirable track record of raising the issue of HIV/AIDS in the developing world, for introducing this important issue and for his concern about the impact of HIV/AIDS in developing countries.

My right hon. Friend will be aware that UNAIDS, the joint UN programme on HIV/AIDS, recently announced that global HIV prevalence—the percentage of people living with HIV—has levelled off and that the number of new infections has fallen. However, we must not be complacent. Globally, an estimated 33.2 million people are living with HIV. Every day, more than 6,800, people are newly infected with HIV. For each person who starts on a much-needed course of treatment for AIDS, another three or four people are newly infected with HIV. That is the size of the challenge, and there is much more to do before we can say that we have tackled AIDS.

Tackling the needs and rights of children affected by AIDS remains at the heart of DFID's response. DFID is committed to spending £150 million to meet the needs of such children over three years to 2008. Achievements so far include work in 13 African countries with UNICEF to support national plans for orphans and vulnerable children. Those plans will ensure that vulnerable children have access to basic services and are protected from abuse.

The UK has played a leading role in the adoption of the universal access targets, both at the G8 Gleneagles summit and in subsequent years. Achieving universal access to prevention, treatment, care and support will be a huge challenge, but we remain committed to that target. In the last few years, unprecedented amounts of money have been pledged to finance programmes to tackle HIV and AIDS. The UK is now the second largest Government funder for AIDS programmes, and we have called upon other funding agencies to move forward and to turn funding pledges into reality. I know that my right hon. Friend subscribes to that sentiment.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong) made a powerful intervention about the feminisation of the AIDS epidemic and the inherent inequality that arises from that. She is aware that there is increasing concern about that feminisation, especially in sub-Saharan Africa, where women account for 61 per cent. of all adults living with HIV and young women aged 15 to 24 are more than three times more likely to be infected than young men. That speaks for itself. There are many reasons for that, but a key issue is gender inequality. In many cultures, many young women face difficulties in negotiating whether to have sex. They have limited control of the circumstances in which they have sex, and they lack the means to protect themselves from infection.

Gender violence is another major issue to which my right hon. Friends alluded. For example, one in six women in rural Ethiopia report that their first sexual experience was coerced. That is why the UK Government have a strong focus on promoting sexual and reproductive health and rights, as an integral part of programmes to prevent HIV. In countries where the epidemic is concentrated among known high-risk groups, it is vital to ensure that prevention and treatment services are accessible to those who most need them.

Sex workers, injecting drug users, men who have sex with men, and prisoners cannot be reached through normal health services, because they are excluded or feel uncomfortable in such settings. The Government have played a leading role in developing innovative ways to provide services for those groups and helped to design programmes to reduce stigma and discrimination. That is important, difficult and sometimes controversial work, but we must support our partners in developing those innovative services if they are to have an impact on the epidemic in their countries.

When HIV and AIDS funding is provided in a way that actively strengthens health systems, there are benefits all round, particularly because long-term and sustainable AIDS programmes need a functioning and effective health service. However, providing AIDS funding in an entirely separate or vertical way can undermine the health system and even take away scarce health personnel from other important areas of work. We must work with all our partners to develop joined-up approaches that effectively build up the health service's capacity.

Two initiatives demonstrate the importance of supporting countries to improve their health systems. In Malawi, DFID has committed some £100 million to support the health sector over a six-year period to 2011. That will enable better HIV and AIDS services to be delivered, and the aim is to double the number of nurses and triple the number of doctors that Malawi is able to recruit and, importantly, retain.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East mentioned antiretroviral therapy. In Malawi in 2003, some 3,000 individuals had started on that treatment, and some four to five years later, 130,000 people have started on it. That indicates what can be done if there is vision and a real commitment to ensuring that things happen.

[Mr. Shahid Malik]

The international health partnership was also mentioned. It was launched recently, and only today, I met the High Commissioner of Nepal who told me that user fees in health services in Nepal have been lifted as part of that partnership. Some eight countries are engaged in the partnership, which was launched by the Prime Minister in September and is a joint initiative with eight major funding agencies in the health sector.

In the time available, I shall not be able to get through all that I want to say. We will encourage programmes that work collaboratively in line with donor harmonisation principles and focus on the needs of those who are excluded and vulnerable, especially the high-risk groups. It is important to support the work of multilateral agencies and particularly a joined-up approach by United Nations agencies.

The UK Government have already pledged £1 billion to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria from 2008 to 2015. My right hon. Friend raised that issue, and at the replenishment round for the global fund conference in September 2007, we raised more than $6 billion, and a further pledge of $9 billion allowed the global fund board to fund all projects deemed suitable for funding. New spending will be required, but we must all make greater efforts to make existing money work more effectively. We must also encourage those who have pledged funding for HIV and AIDS, but not yet moved forward, to allocate that funding.

This has been an important opportunity to discuss these issues. A number of questions remain outstanding, and I will write to my right hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) about them. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East for raising the matter. It is a timely debate, and I fear that it will remain timely for the foreseeable future.

Post Office Closures (Highlands and Islands)

1.30 pm

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I am grateful to the Speaker for selecting this subject for debate, particularly because it is only a week since the Post Office announced its final proposals for post office closures in the highland area, under the euphemistically entitled "network change" programme. Across the highlands as a whole, the Post Office plans to close 28 post office branches, 11 of which will be replaced with new outreach services. That means a net loss of 17 branches, although obviously in many cases outreach services will result in a significant reduction in hours. Of course, there will also be additional closures in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid).

I wish to draw attention to three points. First, there were flaws in the consultation process. Secondly, there is a matter on which I still have not had a clear answer: the status of branches that were temporarily closed and ignored in the consultation process, which is effectively additional closures by stealth. Thirdly, what are the Government's plans for the future of the network? How will they ensure that we are not back in four or five years' time debating yet another round of closures?

In my constituency, three post offices will be completely closed, and five will be closed and replaced with more limited outreach services. In addition, two areas that had post offices that were temporarily closed will now have limited outreach services. Given the strong public feeling in the communities involved, there are a number of particularly unfortunate examples in my constituency. I wish to draw attention to the fate of the Harbour street branch in Nairn, which is a very well used post office that serves a distinct part of the Nairn community—the harbour and Fishertown area. It also serves the part of Nairn most likely to be exposed to future growth. As my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent constituencies in the highlands and islands will know, the Inverness-Nairn corridor is likely to experience significant population growth. Over the next few years, the town of Nairn itself is also likely to experience significant population growth, as has happened in recent years. That forecast for growth was not taken into account either in relation to the closure of the branch in Nairn or in relation to the other branches in the Inverness-Nairn corridor affected by the programme—Farr, Croy, Cawdor, Ardersier and Balloch. Branches in all of those places have been either downgraded or closed. In the case of Balloch, to which I will return, there has been a failure to reopen the branch.

To the north of Inverness in Kirkhill there is a strong desire in the community to retain the existing post office. The Post Office has proposed that an outreach service should operate in that community for six hours a week. Strong representations were made by members of the community about the post office in Kirkhill, but again no change was made to the proposal as a result of the consultation. Anyone who has read the Post Office Ltd network change programme area plan decision booklet for the highlands and islands—I have a copy here if anyone is interested—will know that the public consultation on the initial closure programme in the highlands had 1,900 responses. Despite the consultation being conducted in the depths of winter in January and February, which many in the highlands would regard as the least propitious time for a consultation, there was a significant response from communities across the area.

In addition, several hundred people took to the streets of Nairn to protest against the closure of the Harbour street branch in a demonstration organised by the local community council. Yet the only decision changed in the programme was that relating the Pulteneytown branch in Wick. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) on his work on that and congratulate the community on having successfully saved its post office. However, there is no difference between the strength of feeling and power of representation made in that community and that made in the other communities I have mentioned. I am delighted that that branch has been saved; but the closures that will go ahead could have been reversed if the same account had been taken of the views of local communities.

In the city of Inverness, innovative ideas for extending the outreach model to an urban setting were made to replace the proposed closure of the Kingsmills branch in the Crown area. Again, the fact that outreach was proposed is mentioned in the booklet, but no reason is given by the Post Office for why it was rejected. I would be interested to hear whether the Minister thinks that the idea of the outreach model, which has largely been confined to rural areas, could be used in an urban setting if appropriate. Although geographically that community is within a mile or so of the city centre, there is a steep hill people must go up to get to the city centre and back, which is where people would be expected to go instead. Many elderly people live in the vicinity of that post office and feel strongly that it should be retained. The ideas put forward were not even responded to.

A concern expressed strongly by constituents who made representations is whether there was any point to the consultation. Except in the case of Wick, was it a real consultation? Was there a point to the huge effort that people went to not just to make representations, but to think through alternatives for the communities affected? What was the point in people doing all that when to all intents and purposes those views have been ignored? That also relates to a separate point about Postwatch because if it wished to it could have conducted a further review of some of the decisions. Given that 1,900 people in the highlands responded to the consultation process, I would have hoped that Postwatch at least sought to review some parts of the decision on the basis of the strength of feeling and the alternative ideas proposed. Postwatch will be abolished in October and replaced by a larger regulator that will cover a range of issues. At this stage, perhaps members of Postwatch have more of an eye to the new body than to carrying out their responsibilities to the full.

The experience in the highlands serves only to illustrate the entirely arbitrary nature of the consultation process under the closure programme. The Government picked the figure of 2,500 closures out of the air. It seems to have been based not on an assessment of the needs of communities across the country, but on financial demands from the Treasury that Post Office Ltd is then forced to meet. To that extent, one must have some sympathy for the process that the Post Office is going through as it is forced to ignore many of the strongly held views and needs at community level. It is a disgraceful situation, for which Ministers will have to take the blame in the end.

The process in the highlands raises a major new issue that has not been debated and is of wider significance. In my constituency, over the 12 months before the closure programme started, five post offices were subjected to temporary closures: those in Tomatin and Laggan, which because of the postcode criterion will have outreach services, and those in Cromdale, Glenurquhart, and Balloch. A large number of similar cases exist in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Lochaber (Mr. Kennedy). Four of the temporary closures were outstanding at the beginning of the consultation period. In most cases, those branches had not been through the permanent closure procedure as they should have and were not included in the consultation process. Effectively, those branches have been airbrushed from history.

When I first raised that matter, the confused responses from both the Post Office and Postwatch would have been laughable had the issue not been so serious. First, a spokesman for the Post Office told The Press and Journal:

"It is not true that these three branches were closed without public consultation. Each was subject to a public consultation when they closed temporarily and"

this is the crucial point—

"also at the end of the 12-month period, before being designated as permanently closed."

As someone who should have been consulted; I was able to explain that that had not happened. I also provided evidence that no consultation on a permanent closure had taken place in those cases. Community councils had also not received any consultation on the permanent closure. To clarify the matter for the House, there are supposed to be two stages—temporary and permanent closure—both of which are consulted on separately.

Next I was told that perhaps all the procedures had not been taken into account and that any representations would be considered in the consultation. I have read the report, and there is no mention of any of the branches to which I referred, despite a large number of public submissions regarding them being received during the public consultation process. My right hon. Friend and I took up the matter with Postwatch. We were told—this was the third line in a matter of weeks—that Post Office Ltd

"agreed a Memorandum of Understanding with Postwatch which governs the process for shaping the Network Change Programme including closures...The approach agreed with Postwatch at the beginning of the Programme to reflect the reality of the situation was that the starting point should be the 'open and trading' network as it stood at the end of March 2007."

The reality of the situation was quite different. The affected communities had been told that Post Office Ltd was actively seeking new people to run those post offices and were given no notification of the change in policy. The matter was taken up with Post Office Ltd, Postwatch and the Government and all three replied in identical terms, suggesting that a formal agreement was made behind closed doors to remove all temporarily closed branches at an arbitrary date in 2007 without telling the affected communities and without any regard to the assurances that had been made to those communities. Will the Minister confirm whether that was the case?

There is more than a suggestion of collusion in the fact that the Post Office's supposedly independent regulator and the Government now use the same words to describe a position that had not previously been made public. Neither of them has produced any evidence to suggest that the agreement referred to was reached or publicised at the time. It was certainly not mentioned in any of the debates that we had in the House. That is a clear breach of the Post Office code of practice. Parliament was never told that more than 2,500 branches were to be closed under the heading of the network change programme.

In some correspondence, Post Office Ltd has suggested that the code of practice no longer applies. However, it seems clear that the code of practice does apply. Perhaps the Minister can also confirm that. It is referred to on page 41 of the Government's consultation document. Thanks to this agreement to close extra post offices, seemingly by stealth, an extra three closures have taken place in my constituency and an extra four in my right hon. Friend's constituency.

I do not know what the position is across the country. It seems reasonable to conclude that hundreds of other communities may well be in the same position. I cannot give the exact figure. I have asked Post Office Ltd for the figure, and it says that it does not hold information on temporary closures. It has given me some figures—although it did not explain how they were calculated—that suggested that about 250 branches had been closed between March 2006 and September 2007. However, it is not clear whether those relate to temporary closures or not. The way in which requests for information on this matter have been dealt with has been a model of obfuscation. A modest estimate, based on the highland experience, suggests that, in addition to the 2,500 closures, an extra 100, 200 or even up to 500 temporarily closed post offices have been airbrushed from history under this process. Clearly, we are getting a good deal more than the 2,500 closures that were proposed.

I ask the Minister to reconsider the temporary closures and instruct the Post Office to reconsider its closure programme. I specifically include those branches that have been temporarily closed on the basis that communities were given to understand that if a branch was temporarily closed, the Post Office would actively seek someone to take over that branch and continue with it. I wish to press the case strongly for the restoration of the post office in Balloch, outside Inverness. The post office is desperately needed in a growing community. The previous one closed not because of lack of interest or support from the community, but because the Somerfield supermarket, in which the post office was housed, closed. After a long delay, the premises have been taken on by another supermarket, which I understand is enthusiastic about reopening the post office. It would be truly astonishing if the closure programme forced Post Office Ltd to look that particular gift horse in the mouth. It would be a huge let down for a community that wants and needs that service. I hope that the Minister will take on board that point in relation to that particular community and undertake to go away and consider the matter further. I hope that the Post Office will reconsider its decision.

In addition to those specific points about the closure programme in the highlands, there are wider points that directly affect the highlands, including the way in which the future health of the network is to be guaranteed. I do not wish to be back here in four or five years' time having a similar debate if there is another round of closures. To prevent that from happening, the Government must set out what they will do to turn the tide in the Post Office. I am talking not about a guaranteed programme of keeping post offices open—I know what the Minister will say about that in relation to the funding that has been provided—but about extending the range of services that post offices are able to offer, such as Government and banking services. I know that the Post Office is continually trying to join the Link network to enable a greater range of banking services to be provided by post offices. The question of the Post Office card account is still unresolved. Post offices derive a great deal of business from people using them to collect their pensions, benefits and so on. Yet it is still not clear from the Department for Work and Pensions whether that new contract for the Post Office card account will even be awarded to the Post Office.

Constituents report to me changes in the practices of some commercial organisations in using post offices. For example, electricity companies use post offices for the sale of tokens for pre-payment electricity meters. That has been of some interest to the House under another guise. Yet it seems that some of those companies are withdrawing the sale of those products in some post offices, which will have an impact on the post offices' ability to be sustainable in the long term.

Post offices provide an essential outlet for the sustainability of communities. Post offices and shops go together. In rural areas especially, vulnerable groups, pensioners and people without access to transport need the post office for access to cash and to services. It is often the only way in which people in such communities can get a face-to-face service. The Government should see all those attributes as a huge opportunity. We have seen the state increasingly withdraw from the provision of face-to-face services. Post offices offer a huge opportunity for the Government to return to that way of delivering policy. I hope that the new Minister—I think that this is the first time we have debated matters relating to post offices since he took office—will have a more innovative approach to developing and supporting new services to go through post offices so that the network in the highlands and elsewhere has a sustainable future for many years to come.

1.46 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on securing the debate on this important subject in the highlands and islands and on presenting the case so well and thoroughly.

I want to raise a couple of points. In response to the consultation, the Government said that they wanted to encourage more community-run post offices. In my constituency a local environment group, EnviroKirn, approached the Post Office about taking over Kirn post office, which was threatened with closure. The group was given three months by the Post Office to come up with a business plan, but it has not been offered any encouragement. Three months is not long enough.

The Essex county council initiative in which councils participate and take over post offices is certainly a welcome opportunity to save more post offices. The Government should give local councils and community groups more time, encouragement and back-up when they show an interest in taking over their local post offices. I appeal to the Government to suspend the closure programme for post offices, such as the one in Kirn, when a local community group or a council is interested in taking it over, and to give time and back-up for such a takeover to be achieved. Kirn is due to close on 9 April, so I hope that the Government will move quite quickly.

Another concern that was raised by my hon. Friend is the long-term viability of post offices that have escaped the axe, particularly those in the many small communities throughout the highlands and islands. A post office at St. Catherines was temporarily closed a few weeks ago. The Post Office says that it is actively seeking someone to take it over, but in view of the revelation by my hon. Friend about other post offices throughout the highlands and islands being in a similar position for a long time, I am very concerned about the future of the post office at St. Catherines.

I ask the Minister to give us an assurance that the post offices that have escaped the axe this time will have a secure future and that they will be given enough Government business and support to ensure that they remain open in the long term.

1.49 pm

The Minister for Employment Relations and Postal Affairs (Mr. Pat McFadden): I congratulate the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) on securing the debate. Whatever else may come between us, he certainly has one of the most beautiful constituency names in the House, although his highland colleagues might disagree.

The hon. Gentleman said that this was the first time that we have debated the matter. It might be the first time for him, but I assure the House that it is certainly not for me. He mentioned several post offices in his constituency, and I shall try to respond. However, I start by saying, as I do frequently, that, as a Minister, I do not play a role in decisions about whether to close individual post offices. Quite rightly, that is a matter for Post Office Ltd, following a local process involving Postwatch, which is the consumer voice, MPs and other local representatives. I am sure that Post Office Ltd will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about how unpopular the current process is and the concern in his constituency and others in the highlands. That is natural, and I understand it. He did not touch on why it is happening or the challenges that the Post Office faces, the extent of which we should not underestimate. It is going through the difficult process of reducing the size of the network by just under a fifth. I understand that that is an unpopular process even though, as I shall explain, we as a society use the Post Office a lot less than we did because of a number of lifestyle changes. It operates today in a technological and competitive environment very different from that which once existed.

The hon. Gentleman did not mention competition at all. To take one example, the BBC licensing contract was lost partly because a competitor bid for it and won. I am afraid that that is the environment in which the Post Office operates, and it cannot be wished away. Difficult and unpopular though the current process is, there is a context to it. The Government's response has not been to stand back and leave the network to stand or fall on its own devices. Before the Government came to power, there used to be no subsidy for the Post Office, but that is not the case today. In fact, we are in the midst of a programme of support for the Post Office that will be worth up to £1.7 billion by 2011. It contains a number of measures, including an annual subsidy of £150 million, which never existed under the previous Government and without which thousands more post offices would be under threat. There is talk of a Government-inspired closure programme, but greater Government support on behalf of the taxpayer than has ever existed should be taken into account.

We do not view the Post Office as a purely commercial network, which is why we give it such support. In fact, there are just over 14,000 branches in the network. If it were run as a purely commercial concern, the number would be about 4,000. That gives some idea of the importance of the subsidy and the number of branches that are being prevented from closing by the Government's action to support the network.

Even with such public subsidy and with other funds in that £1.7 billion to cover losses over and above what the subsidy can bear and to invest in the modernisation of the Crown network and so on, the network is not sustainable at its current size. It simply does not have the customers that it used to. Some 4 million fewer customers go through the doors of our post offices each week than just a few years ago. That has been accepted, although reluctantly, by the National Federation of SubPostmasters, whose general secretary recently said:

> "Although regrettable we believe that closures are necessary to ensure the remaining Post Offices are able to thrive in the future."

Across the country, that means a reduction of about 18 per cent. in the size of the network. Precisely because we recognise the important social and community role of post offices, however, and because we have access criteria to ensure a coherent network in both rural and urban areas, the reduction in the size of the network in the highlands is significantly smaller, at about 9 per cent. Of course, the situation is still difficult for those who are affected by the closures. I accept that, but the reduction is smaller than elsewhere in the UK. That reflects the nature of such a large, sparsely populated area with significant distances involved.

Some parts of the highlands and islands are also affected by one of the requirements of the access criteria, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned: to ensure post office provision in postal districts where none previously existed. In addition, alongside the closure programme, some 500 new outreach services are being introduced, many of which were pioneered in rural Scotland. They include part-time services hosted by local shops for a set number of hours a week and mobile vans that visit particular locations at set times. In the hon. Gentleman's constituency, as he said, three of the 38 post offices are scheduled to close. There will be five new outreach services, and two new branches will be introduced.

The hon. Gentleman asked about temporary closures, closures by stealth and so on. One of the post offices that he mentioned closed in August 2006—more than a year before the programme began. As I understand it, Post Office Ltd has made significant efforts to find a sub-postmaster to run it. The hon. Gentleman will know that, following the announcement by the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform last May, Post Office Ltd agreed a position with Postwatch that meant that post offices temporarily closed would not be considered in the new plan unless they were about to be reopened and that those temporarily closed after March 2007 would be reviewed against the access criteria and considered on a case-by-case basis. I understand that Post Office Ltd has written to the hon. Gentleman setting out that position.

Even somewhere as sparsely populated as the highlands, after the completion of the programme, more than 99 per cent. of the population will have seen no change to their local post office or will remain within 1 mile by road of an alternative branch. The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) talked about post offices that escape the axe, but we need to bear that figure in mind even though we accept the difficulty of the process.

I turn to some of the challenges that have led to the process. The Post Office is losing some £3.5 million a week—half a million pounds for every day that it is open. In some of the least used post offices, which might include some in the highlands, the subsidy per transaction has risen to £17. In others, some of which have fewer than 20 customers a day—those are not just a few that are used the least, but the 1,600 least used—the average subsidy is £8 a transaction. A significant subsidy helps to keep those post offices open in the smallest and most sparsely populated communities.

There have been significant lifestyle changes, such as benefits being paid directly into bank accounts. Eight out of 10 pensioners and nine out of 10 new retirees now choose that as their preferred method of payment. I suspect that those figures will not change.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey asked me about the Post Office card account and its successor, and I understand how important it is to the network's future. I understand that he has tabled questions on the matter to my colleagues at the Department for Work and Pensions. He will know that there is a competitive tendering process, and tenders have to be judged against proper criteria. That is legally necessary, and I am sure that he would not want me to say anything that prejudiced the Post Office's chances of winning the contract. Perhaps he will understand if I leave it at that.

The process is difficult, and I understand the points that hon. Gentleman made. However, the highlands have been less affected than other parts of the country, precisely because of the special nature of that part of the UK. In future, we want a viable and sustainable network that is supported by the subsidies that I have mentioned.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

Neighbourhood Policing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Blizzard.]

9.30 am

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Good morning, Mr. Hood. It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, and we are privileged indeed to have you in firm but fair-minded command of our proceedings.

When I heard that I had secured the debate, I was tickled to learn—hon. Members will be able to tell that I had not planned things this way—that this is the first week of a two-week national campaign to promote neighbourhood policing and enable people to learn the names and identities of their local police officers and how to contact them. The debate has turned out to be very well timed, but that was entirely accidental.

By April, every community in England and Wales will have in place neighbourhood policing teams of police officers and police community support officers. As it happens, Staffordshire anticipated that requirement and set up its neighbourhood policing teams more than 12 months early. Such teams—whether in Staffordshire or nationally—are dedicated to working with their local communities, agreeing priorities for action and informing the public of their progress.

It should now be possible for residents everywhere to find out the identities of the members of their neighbourhood policing teams. They need only ask their local police or local council, inquire at a local library or look on the internet, including on a new national website which has the names and numbers of members of their local teams. There has been some debate about giving out the mobile phone numbers of individual police officers, but all I can say is that there has been no reticence among community police officers and PCSOs in my constituency about giving them to local residents. In Staffordshire, we are certainly interested in sharing best practice on neighbourhood policing. We want to learn from what police services elsewhere are doing well and we are happy to share our successes with them.

In his final report on the review of policing, Sir Ronnie Flanagan speaks of a vision of successful 21st-century policing. He says that its components include having

"the right people in the right places at the right times, doing the right things, in partnership, for the public."

Specifically addressing neighbourhood policing, he speaks of the need for effective partnerships, flexibility and innovation and what he calls "citizen-focused policing". Like Sir Ronnie, I believe that neighbourhood policing is effective in cutting crime and popular with the public because it provides reassurance.

Let me illustrate that belief using some recent experiences in my constituency. Last summer, I walked a beat with a community police officer and another beat with two PCSOs. I also joined a whole neighbourhood policing team to try to solve a specific problem in a particular community. Community engagement and the accessibility of officers are given high priority in Staffordshire, and I have worked with the police and their partners in establishing a number of police surgeries in various public premises. Members of the public can now approach police officers in confidence in settings as diverse as a converted shop, a charity drop-in centre, a university campus and a children's centre, to give just a few examples.

In the year in which neighbourhood policing is being rolled out in my constituency, I joined the police to present a roadshow. Together, the police and I explained at a series of public meetings how neighbourhood policing will work. Additionally, I encouraged residents to join existing neighbourhood watch schemes or to start new ones in areas where none existed before.

The message that I put very strongly to the public was that if the police are to put in this extra effort to be visible and up front in the community, it is time for members of the public to respond positively to support them—as eyes and ears, as providers of information and by putting peer pressure on people in their localities to behave in an acceptable way.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend on obtaining the debate. I was pleased to hear him mention neighbourhood watch, which is very successfully organised and exists in strength in several areas of Leicestershire. Does he agree that such activities would benefit from more central funding? Much of what such schemes do depends on the money that they raise at charitable and other fundraising events. That seems a little hit and miss, and we need a bit more central support if such schemes are to continue to develop and work with the neighbourhood policing teams.

Mr. Kidney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that comment. Like him, I am a keen supporter of neighbourhood watch. He will recall, as I do, the kerfuffle a couple of years ago at the national level about the organisation of neighbourhood watch. That was partly a dispute within the organisation itself and it has now been resolved. At the local level, I would say that the best way to secure funding to support neighbourhood watch activities is through the safer communities partnerships and local area agreements. Certainly in Staffordshire there are good relationships between police, councils and other partners. Our neighbourhood watch annual conference is an effective and well-attended event.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): This is an important matter. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the four objectives of the Government's neighbourhood policing initiative, which was very necessary. One was to increase accessibility to the police for the public. Does he therefore agree that it is important to ensure that we protect those police stations in small communities which many hon. Members from all parties have fought to keep open—small stations such as Benfleet in Canvey island, for instance?

Mr. Kidney: I would not want to intrude on matters relating to the hon. Gentleman's constituency by saying where his constituents should or should not have police stations. I am a little hesitant about supporting the maintenance of bricks and mortar as the place where the service should be delivered. As I said, there have been some innovative ideas in my constituency, where the police can gather and meet the public out on their patrols, and that has proved highly successful. Perhaps it is a case of horses for courses. One solution may be appropriate for one place, but a different one may apply elsewhere.

It is too early to say whether neighbourhood policing is specifically responsible for falling crime, but we have had neighbourhood policing teams for more than a year in Staffordshire and there have been reductions in acquisitive crime, violent crime and antisocial behaviour. Details from the police in my constituency for the period from April 2006 to February 2007 and the equivalent 11-month period for 2007 to 2008 show that total crime has fallen by more than 14 per cent. The figure for criminal damage cases in the earlier period is 22,897 crimes, but it is 18,842 in the later period, which is a fall of more than the average—by more than 17 per cent. For antisocial behaviour incidents, only some of which will be crimes, the police gave me a figure of 58,195 reported incidents in the earlier period, with 56,897 in the later period, which is a fall of more than 2 per cent.

I frequently hear from constituents that they want to see police patrols on their streets, and they are increasingly seeing those patrols. They can often recognise the individual officers as their regular police officers, and I know that they are engaging with their local police teams to tackle local problems. Back in 1997, constituents' concerns in Staffordshire and elsewhere in the country would have been about high levels of burglary and theft of and from motor vehicles.

Nationally, we have made vast improvements in reducing such crimes. However, on the whole, people feel no safer despite those achievements. The complaint that I hear more often than any other is that antisocial behaviour is ruining people's daily lives. I also hear of older residents worrying about gatherings of young people, whether or not there is any overt sign of unlawful or unruly behaviour.

In cases of antisocial behaviour and intergenerational mistrust, neighbourhood policing is ideally placed to intervene and be part of the solution. Close working with the public, effective partnerships with councils, social landlords and others, and decisive action taken together can offer communities a successful end to problems of antisocial behaviour.

It would be wrong, however, to label neighbourhood policing as narrowly focused. It offers visible reassurance to communities and promises speedier responses to local matters. Trusted local police teams pick up intelligence from residents that contributes to the more effective operation of intelligence-led policing more generally. Further, the evidence, which admittedly is early, shows that neighbourhood policing contributes to crime reduction across a broad range of offences. It also offers a better quality of police service to the public. In Staffordshire, every victim of criminal damage or antisocial behaviour has contact with their local PCSO. The new chief constable, Chris Sims, intends to take the emphasis on quality of service much further still.

In taking up Sir Ronnie's recommendations on reducing the bureaucratic burden on police officers, Chris Sims and his police force are at the forefront with a number of initiatives, including reducing the amount of information routinely recorded for many crimes while retaining extensive recording for serious crimes. Staffordshire police is one of four police services trialling a new streamlined crime recording process. The adoption of standardised forms based on minimum appropriate reporting requirements, as recommended in Sir Ronnie's report, has also reduced the size of many forms by half.

The Staffordshire police force has offered to pilot the implementation of mobile data technology across the entire front line. The chief constable has the backing of officers and police staff for his bold offer to the Staffordshire public to home in on quality of policing even where it conflicts with centralised targets based on quantity. I know that that is what local communities want. I can give a recent example from a public meeting that I convened of all the relevant agencies last Friday in the village of Wheaton Aston. At the end of the meeting, the chair of the local parish council said to me, "David, will you tell Parliament that we want to see more police officers on the beat in our village?" I said, "Yes, I'll do it next Wednesday morning," which was very impressive for the audience to hear.

I suggest that if we follow the line of Sir Ronnie's recommendations and the offer being made by Staffordshire police and their chief constable, we can free up more resources so that more police officers are seen more of the time in communities such as Wheaton Aston. The prize that many judge to be worth pursuing, myself included, is more time for police officers to spend on front-line policing. The commitment made to communities in Staffordshire about patrols and responses to some crimes, thanks to successful neighbourhood policing, can be amplified and extended to a wider range of crimes and situations. The Prime Minister visited Staffordshire police on 3 February. He listened attentively as police officers and PCSOs spoke of the work that they are doing to cut the bureaucracy faced by front-line officers.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): The hon. Gentleman speaks with a great deal of passion, and he is obviously well informed. I am somewhat sceptical in my researches into claims to cut paperwork, but I cannot speak for Staffordshire. Will he enlighten us by giving specific examples that he has seen? He gave one example of a form that had been halved in size.

Mr. Kidney: I was there as the officers made their presentations to the Prime Minister, and I felt proud of their professionalism as they did so and answered the Prime Minister's searching questions, which were rather like the hon. Gentleman's. The officers gave the Prime Minister this kind of example: the domestic investigation arrest log, which collects information on domestic violence cases, was once a 20-page form but has now been reduced to 10 pages; a 16-page traffic collision form is now eight pages; and the usual recording form for what police regard as non-serious crimes, which they reckon make up 80 per cent. of the total, has been reduced from 16 pages to one.

As I said, Staffordshire police have also been trialling hand-held mobile data computers at Longton, which is not in my constituency but in Stoke-on-Trent, and have found that they reduce the need to fill in paper forms by enabling officers to make direct contact with the police national computer and the police station. Those are all examples of how police officers on the beat have more time to do their proper work as a result of spending less time filling in pieces of paper. As the hon. Gentleman asked about it, another presentation that the police made to the Prime Minister involved a Staffordshire pilot of a speedy justice initiative. When evidence is collected, if a guilty plea is anticipated, the police officer responsible for the case can submit minimal evidence on paper to the Crown Prosecution Service instead of a raft of paper prepared specially in case of a not guilty plea.

Those are the examples given to the Prime Minister in Stafford just a month ago. I was there, and the police and I made the point together that neighbourhood policing and reducing bureaucracy are intrinsically linked. After the visit, the chief constable said:

"By tackling the culture of form-filling, we want to free up extra time and space for our officers and staff to deliver a better service, engage with communities and change public opinion".

That is what is at stake in Staffordshire's offer to implement the Flanagan report's recommendations locally and early. I accept that offer willingly, and I urge the Minister to do the same. Will he say today that the Home Office will back Staffordshire's plans with money for the investment needed, especially in new technology? We are currently using 175 mobile data devices in the pilot at Longton. The police say that with the money, they will roll out 1,200 devices to front-line police officers by September. How quick is that? Is it not an offer worth accepting?

Nationally, as in Staffordshire, Home Office policy on neighbourhood policing should focus, as Sir Ronnie observed, on supporting and sustaining the model being set up. Like Sir Ronnie, I welcome the decision to ring-fence PCSO funding for a further year. Overall, the funding this year for neighbourhood policing, including PCSOs, will be £324 million, a 2.7 per cent. increase from last year. The settlement shows that the Home Office is committed to making a success of neighbourhood policing, and I thank the Minister for that.

I acknowledge the other good work that all police services carry out alongside neighbourhood policing. Response policing bears the brunt of public service and crime detection. The last time I had cause to call the police personally—I thought that I was witnessing a possible burglary—the response was excellent, but others report mixed response times to me. The drive to reduce bureaucratic burdens promises the best gains for response policing. However, when I met representatives of manufacturing businesses recently, they warned me against over-reliance on neighbourhood policing and response policing. They were concerned about organised criminal gangs' targeted thefts of their metal stocks as a result of huge rises in the price of metals. The manufacturers made the point—valid, I am sure—that between neighbourhood policing and response policing, there lies a wide range of complex and inter-related police services to be delivered.

In focusing on neighbourhood policing, I would not want anyone to think that I do not appreciate all the other police services. I have a high regard for the expertise and professionalism of detectives, scene of crime officers, domestic violence and prolific and persistent offender teams, scientists, intelligence officers and special branch officers—I met many of them during my recent tour of the new offices at Weston road in Stafford, and I met 999 and other call handlers with the Prime Minister on the day that he came—reception and support staff, cadets, traffic police, members of specialist services such as fraud and internet investigation, and those involved in crime prevention and neighbourhood watch. Even with that long list, I am sure that I have missed many.

Let us all work together to make neighbourhood policing an effective operation for modern police services. Let us ensure that we embed it for the long term. We in Staffordshire certainly embrace the Flanagan reform agenda, including cutting form lengths and reducing record-keeping to free up more time for front-line policing. We are willing to roll out mobile data across the whole police service in Staffordshire. We just need the money, Minister; let's have it.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on obtaining this debate, and on how he presented his case. It was gleefully unpartisan, and he made some important points. He will recognise that, historically, this country has always had citizen-based police organisations; we have had special constables, of course, for some years. In many ways it is regrettable that in recent decades—the situation certainly predates 1997—that practice seems to have diminished. That is why many of the new initiatives are very positive. Our policing model, in contrast with that of European nations, has always been firmly drilled into local communities.

Much as I think that neighbourhood policing is important, a visible police presence alone should not be the be-all and end-all of the policing challenge. I find that to be the case particularly in central London, where intelligence-led policing has great import, not least in fields such as counter-terrorism. The Metropolitan police and a range of other agencies, including the City of London police in the eastern part of my constituency, do painstaking work, but that approach has a less high profile. I appreciate that the villages in the hon. Gentleman's constituency regard policing as being about bobbies on the beat and a visible presence, but it is important that we give as much credit as possible to a lot of the other work that goes on behind the scenes. In my constituency—in Westminster at least—the local authorities are at the forefront of a partnership with the Home Office and the Metropolitan Police Service over PCSOs and a range of other initiatives, some of which I shall discuss in my brief contribution.

Many of the new initiatives were key to restoring public confidence in the aftermath of 9/11. At the outset, the concern in London was that too much of the PCSO initiative was driven by a campaign to keep numbers high. PCSOs are added routinely to overall police numbers; no doubt Ken Livingstone and his mayoral campaign will make much of that. However, I have always supported the idea of PCSOs, even in the immediate aftermath of 2001, when such support was not terribly fashionable in the Conservative party. To be fair, they have worked well, although if there is one slight criticism it is that there is a risk that they have helped to crowd out special constables. From my work with the City of London police, it seems that the cadre of special constables feel that they are now third-class citizens compared with PCSOs. Becoming a PCSO is now an alternative career route in policing.

In Westminster, we have an initiative called CivicWatch, the key to which is that the police safer neighbourhood sergeant is partnered with a local government officer, which ensures effective liaison between the police and the local authority. I hope that the same applies throughout the country. We have found that one of the few positive by-products of the early retirement rule in the police is that some very talented ex-superintendents can come on board and work at City hall in Westminster. We currently have a retired superintendent, Dean Ingledew, who headed up the west end police service, and before him we had Bob Currie. That arrangement has worked extremely well in developing those partnerships.

The only potential flaw in the safer neighbourhoods initiative is that most community aspirations are not within the gift of the police but down to local authorities, which means that the strength of the partnership, which hopefully extends beyond the political divide, is key. For as long as there is increased pressure on local government financing arrangements—I am sure that there will be for the foreseeable future—it will be all too easy for such innovative programmes to fall by the wayside. It is therefore crucial to keep that relationship as strong as possible.

Crime and antisocial behaviour are as big a problem in my constituency as they obviously are in Stafford, but community confidence and perceptions have improved, which stems from the ability to report incidents easily, to see a reaction within a reasonable time and to receive feedback from the responsible authority. That helps to build confidence through the reassurance cycle, through which we can reduce the fear of crime and improve many of the positive perceptions.

In central London, our innovative partnership initiative is between the council, the Metropolitan Police Service, the London fire brigade, which comes under the auspices of the Mayor of London, and CityWest Homes, our own arm's length management housing organisation—we have some large housing estates in Westminster. It was established five years ago as a pilot project in three areas, but has been such a success that it has been rolled out across Westminster, which is now divided into 26 distinct CivicWatch areas, closely aligned to ward and police boundaries.

Obviously the terrorist threat after September 2001 and July 2005 has resulted in more police on the streets of Westminster. I think that all hon. Members who walk around the streets of my constituency will be impressed by the number of PCSOs, although I suspect that that is in contrast with other parts of the capital. In part that is done to raise confidence. Although central London has a relatively small residential population, some 900,000 people come to work in the 7 square miles of my constituency every day. Behind CivicWatch are some specific ideas: to combat crime, antisocial behaviour and persistent environmental problems; to reduce the fear of crime and antisocial behaviour; to signpost young people to alternatives to poor behaviour, and broadly to improve community confidence in service delivery.

David Taylor: I am grateful to my MP—at least for four days a week—for giving way. The hon. Gentleman mentioned his positive attitude towards PCSOs, but does he agree that the initial reluctance and doubts about the value of PCSOs and co-operation with them, which was reasonably widespread among the police force, has virtually disappeared? It has certainly disappeared in Leicestershire. It would help if his party abandoned the tired old rhetoric about plastic police and became more enthusiastic about the role that they can play.

Mr. Field: There is no doubt that there was some hostility, not least from the Police Federation, which no doubt lobbied Labour Members as much as they did Opposition Members when the PCSO initiative began. In fairness, at the outset my party might have been slightly hostile to the idea of PCSOs, for public relations reasons as much as anything else, but we have now moved away from that hostility. I shall not take words out of the mouth of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), but I am sure that he will comment on that. However, where special constables, PCSOs and the police work together, they work extremely well. If there is a residual problem, it is with the Police Federation in certain parts of the country, which obviously is worried about terms and numbers. However, it has worked well and I am certainly a believer in neighbourhood policing and similar initiatives. PCSOs clearly have an extremely important day-to-day role in ensuring that that works.

I appreciate that many other hon. Members wish to contribute, so I shall end on one brief point. Without getting over-bureaucratic, the example of Westminster works extremely well. It has a three-tiered approach towards running the CivicWatch programme: local briefings and meetings occurring on a weekly basis in each CivicWatch area to enable local teams to share information and direct problem-solving activity on the ground; fortnightly meetings chaired by a chief inspector and a CivicWatch manager, which looks at best practice within the 26 areas; and an accountability meeting every six weeks, which is open to the public as well as the leader of the council and the police borough commander.

These are exciting times in policing. My main point is that, historically and rightly, policing in this country has been very much citizen-led, of which we should be very proud, instead of the police being a class apart, as they are in many countries in Europe and across the world. Some of the initiatives being discussed are very important as we look forward to 21st-century policing, because there was a sense among the public that the police had lost their way in relation to their neighbourhood responsibilities. I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr. Jim Hood (in the Chair): I have three Back-Bench Members on my list to speak, after which the three Front Benchers will sum up. I flag that up and ask Members to be brief.

9.57 am

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I congratulate Thames Valley police on completing the roll-out of neighbourhood policing across the Thames Valley police area this month—one month ahead of the deadline. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) for securing this debate in such a timely fashion and for opening it with such an excellent speech. I should like to say how much I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field). It is very good if neighbourhood policing can be entrenched on a cross-party basis, which is obviously best for community confidence.

Neighbourhood policing is a great success, popular with the public and effective in fighting crime. It is popular with the public because it puts more uniformed officers on the streets and, I am sure, because it links local policing to local priorities through the involvement of local people in neighbourhood action groups, which in Oxford pool the input of residents, neighbourhood watch, parish, city and county councillors, housing officers, youth services and schools, the city council crime and nuisance action team, city council street wardens and park rangers—all of whom address the problems of antisocial behaviour, about which my hon. Friend spoke. The use of consultations and surveys helps to keep policing focused on what people are most concerned about and ensures that it addresses the day-to-day issues of community safety.

At a time when many types of crime, perpetrated by highly organised criminals, must be combated with specialist units and sophisticated operations, which are often inevitably remote, neighbourhood policing makes policing visible at street level, thus enhancing confidence and security and garnering intelligence. I thank the neighbourhood specialist officers, the supporting special constabulary officers, the police community support officers, street wardens and park rangers for all their work in our community. Thanks to the innovation and resources provided by our Government, their work is just what modern policing often lacked before they came along: officers out on foot or on their bikes, with time to chat to pensioners and to youths hanging out, time to call round the shopping precincts and estates and time to engage actively in community events—all the time building trust and confidence and forging local links and friendships.

Bob Spink: Does the right hon. Gentleman welcome, as I do, the review of the police performance measurement systems, which may change the emphasis from the national crime recording standards to a new framework of policing and community safety assessment? Does he share my hope that the framework will introduce more common sense to neighbourhood policing decisions, such as when to arrest and charge people for minor offences?

Mr. Smith: I am certainly happy to endorse the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for common sense, which should inform all those matters. Neighbourhood policing is largely a matter of common sense. [Interruption.]

Mr. Jim Hood (in the Chair): Order. I am hearing a bit of chatter to my left. Perhaps we could have a wee bit better order for the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Smith: Oxford city currently has 48 community support officers—a number that will go up to 59 from this summer. Ten are part-funded by the city council and four by the university of Oxford. It is a pity that, after the police authority announced the expansion in numbers, the Liberal Democrat-controlled city council saw it as an opportunity to cut plans to expand further the city's contribution, even though it would have attracted additional match funding. I warmly welcome the expansion, and I know that my constituents do, too. The bottom line is that all those measures are making a real impact on fighting crime.

In the three priority Oxford areas where neighbourhood policing operates—Blackbird Leys, Rose Hill and Barton—there has been a measurable reduction both in all crime and in key categories. For example, if we compare April to December last year with the same period the year before, violence against the person was down 16, 13 and 18 per cent. in the three areas respectively. Coupled with the work of the Oxford safer communities partnership, neighbourhood policing is contributing to a significant fall in crime throughout our city and, moreover, in the crimes that people fear most.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am glad that my right hon. Friend also mentions safer community teams. Does he agree that one great advantage of neighbourhood policing is the way in which the police now work much better with other public services, principally health and social services, but also youth services and the rest? That is partly because we now give the police more time to undertake that more integrative role.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The inter-agency work and collaboration with other organisations through the neighbourhood action groups, to which I referred earlier, lie at the heart of that activity.

On the impact on crime throughout Oxford, if we compare the summer of 2007 with the summer of 2006, domestic burglary is down 34 per cent., personal robbery is down 11 per cent. and criminal damage is down 4.5 per cent. Our police—all of them—and all the community support officers and neighbourhood action groups deserve praise and thanks for that achievement. There is still, of course, far too much crime and too many nasty incidents—one crime is one too many—but let us celebrate the progress that is being made. Let us build on what so clearly works to achieve still more for the future. Let us do all that we can, so that people can enjoy the community safety that is a hallmark of any civilised society.

10.4 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): It is always a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood, not least because you and I have adjoining offices in the narrowest corridor in the Palace—appropriately known as the yellow submarine. Whichever Whip decided that you and I should have offices next door to each other in the narrowest corridor in the Palace clearly had their own particular sense of humour.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) has done the House a service by initiating this debate on neighbourhood policing, and I endorse everything that my colleague, constituency neighbour and friend, the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said about the achievements of Thames Valley police.

We usually have debates in Westminster Hall because there is a problem, but I do not think that there is a problem with neighbourhood policing—an issue to which I shall return. There are, however, a couple of problems with policing, and I should like to mention them briefly. First, the Minister must recognise that there is still considerable upset, dissatisfaction and frustration at the fact that the police pay award was not fully honoured this year, and that will rankle for a long time. If an independent police arbitration system says that a fair pay settlement is 2.5 per cent. and the figures are then massaged so that officers do not receive that settlement, it is simply unfair, bad personnel management and unjust for those people who provide an excellent public service.

Mr. Ruffley: Does my hon. Friend also welcome the announcement by the shadow Home Secretary, our right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) that a departure by a Home Secretary in any future Conservative Government from any independent award will only ever happen under the affirmative procedure in the House? That is an important safeguard for police officers.

Mr. Jim Hood (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) must not stand with his back to the Chair.

Tony Baldry: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Those in public service need to know that they will be treated fairly and that, if independent arbitration systems are put in place, they will be honoured except in the most exceptional circumstances, which would have to be demonstrated using the affirmative procedure in Parliament. I hope that we never reach that situation.

The second issue is a problem, and as the Minister is present, I should like to have another crack at it. I am sure that I shall be supported by Members with constituencies not only in the Thames valley but throughout south-east England. The issue is the haemorrhage of police officers from Thames Valley police to the Metropolitan police. Over the past five years, we have lost 388 police officers to the Met, but the problem is worse than that, because they tend to be firearms officers, detectives and road policing officers. The chief constable of Thames Valley police, Sara Thornton, says:

"This is a disproportionately high number of specialist officers, who are more experienced and highly trained. It seems likely that this proportion will rise in future years because of the high demand for specialist trained officers for the 2012 Olympics, the increased risk of terrorism, and other factors such as the opening of Terminal 5 at Heathrow.

The loss of specialist officers impact in two ways: it leaves a capability gap, and increases the recruitment and training costs to replace the lost officers."

In Thames Valley police, it costs £55,000 to train a patrol constable, £63,000 for a detective constable and £77,500 for a firearms constable—not insignificant figures. The chief constable observes:

"One of the factors cited by police officers who left or are thinking of leaving is the increased pay in the MPS"—

the Metropolitan Police Service—

"due to the London Allowance, compared to the South East England Allowance, and the difficulties of buying a house because of high property prices in the South East. Police officers are £4,393 p.a. better off by transferring to the MPS, in addition to free travel on public transport up to a radius of 70 miles.

A key point is that the South East England Allowance is frozen, while the London Allowance increases with inflation. When it was set in 2003 the differential was £4,000, it is now £4,393."

The situation is worsening.

Several hon. Members went to see the Home Secretary, and I am sure that we were all grateful to her, because she very courteously listened to what we had to say. We do not criticise police officers who move, as anyone who has skills must be allowed to transfer them, but the difficulty in the Thames valley is that we are spending money on training police officers and then losing our most experienced officers. It would be fairer if police officers in the Thames valley got the same kind of pay and settlement as those in the Met. It is difficult to see why police officers in Slough should get one rate of pay while those just across the border in Uxbridge should get so much more. It is also daft that a police officer who lives in Banbury can travel to work in London for free, as police officers have free travel, thus taking the benefit of their skills and knowledge away from the Thames valley and my constituents. That issue cannot rumble on; it must be addressed.

Let me turn from the matters that are of concern to neighbourhood policing. The other day, I spent a day with neighbourhood police officers in Bicester, and I was extremely impressed by what I saw. There are three groups—established police officers, police community support officers and street wardens—and I was impressed by the mutual respect that they have for one another. I was particularly impressed by the respect that regular police officers have for PCSOs, and vice versa, and by the way in which all three teams work together.

PCSOs focus on areas in which they can make a difference, such as neighbourhood environmental quality. They respond positively to the concerns and needs of young people, and they deal with litter, antisocial behaviour and graffiti. One young PCSO has shown great initiative. She took it upon herself to write to Network Rail to ask what it was doing about the homophobic graffiti under a bridge in an underpass through which many people walk between housing estates and Bicester town centre. She did not receive a satisfactory answer, so I took the matter up with the chief executive of Network Rail. We eventually got it sorted, and the underpass has been painted. Similarly, the district council has now put litter bins in an area where the PCSOs had picked up a lot of litter. I was impressed to hear that the same PCSO, when she realised that a derelict factory was being used as a refuse dump, tracked down the owner and told them to get it sorted. Regular police officers probably would not have time to do that, and the matter would not necessarily be picked up by street wardens.

My impression is that everyone works together positively in Bicester—I am sure that that happens in other towns—and that it is making a real difference. However, there are also concerns about PCSOs, such as their pay, which is not fantastic. It is fine for young, single people, but I suspect that it is not a great salary for married PCSOs whose pay is the only family income. Also, it is difficult to see what the promotional prospects will be for PCSOs, although I am glad that quite a lot of them in my patch eventually transfer into the regular police force. That creates a good opportunity for each side to evaluate the other and works well. However, there might be issues about the long-term career and pay structure for PCSOs. I do not see neighbourhood policing as a problem. In fact, it is very positive and everyone understands where it fits in. In my patch, it is a good news story.

The final issue that I want to discuss is neighbourhood watch. One advantage of being my own Member of Parliament is that, when I write to myself, I always agree with what I have to say, and I should like to share with the Chamber my views about neighbourhood watch. The traditional, old-fashioned neighbourhood watch scheme has something of Miss Marple about it and may have passed its sell-by date. Villagers think of themselves as living in villages, but people in towns do not think of themselves as living in neighbourhoods, except perhaps those in the Grimsbury area of Banbury. However, people recognise that the relationship between neighbours is important.

We could introduce variations on neighbourhood watch, such as neighbour schemes that invite people to act as neighbours. Given that most future policing will have to be intelligence-led, the police will frequently need information, so people should be encouraged to give relevant information. In addition to the telephone numbers that people can use to give information, we should make better use of websites. We could increase people's ability to send information, perhaps anonymously, by text or electronically to local websites, such as a Banbury neighbours site.

Keeping young people on side is also important to intelligence-led policing. A difficulty with neighbourhood policing is that, if we are not careful, we can give the impression that all young people are a problem. When I go out with my two children, my son says to me, "Look, dad, you've got to be very careful; if we meet another youngster and they join us, we will be a group of feral youth, and you will be associated with a group of feral youth." There is a danger that younger people will feel that way. They will often have intelligence and other information that they could send by text, so we need to have mechanisms by which they can do so.

Another variation of the neighbourhood watch scheme could be to use e-mail, which most people use. If we wrote to people locally to ask for their e-mail addresses for a positive purpose, most of them would respond. If the local police had the e-mail addresses of people in Banbury, they could send them updates about neighbourhood policing once a quarter. They could also send out instant alerts, for example, if the M40 is closed, which it is from time to time, or if they were looking for particular people. There is two-way traffic with information and intelligence, but how do we bring in the community? The community wants to be brought into neighbourhood policing, but the difficulty with neighbourhood watch is that it has depended very much on everything going through neighbourhood watch co-ordinators. With interactive websites and e-mail, the community could be more involved, especially if local authorities contributed, and the whole issue could be more positive.

I find it difficult to get Ministers to visit my constituency. I wanted the Secretary of State for Health to come, and I offered to lose two stone before Easter, but even that did not persuade him to visit Horton hospital. I should like the Minister for Security, Counter-Terrorism, Crime and Policing to come at some time. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Stafford laughs, but it is almost impossible to get Labour Ministers to visit our constituencies. That is bad policy, because they do not see what is happening in middle England.

What is happening in middle England on policing is good news, but I would welcome a visit to north Oxfordshire from the Minister for Security, Counter-Terrorism, Crime and Policing to see the good work that is being done by neighbourhood policing, and so that we can bend his ear about the outflow of officers from the Thames valley to the Met. I should also like the opportunity to suggest to him in person that we can make neighbourhood policing even more interactive and involve the community much more, not at the expense of police authorities' budgets, but in other ways. That would get everyone in the community involved in helping the police to tackle and reduce crime by providing them with intelligence.

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to take part in the debate as someone who also represents middle England. It is a pleasure to support and congratulate my near neighbour in Staffordshire, my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), on securing the debate, which is timely because we are at the beginning of the neighbourhood policing campaign.

In Staffordshire, there are 2,300 officers and 21 neighbourhood policing units, each of which is headed by an inspector with 251 police constables and 224 PCSOs. I congratulate all the officers in Staffordshire, but perhaps I will especially concentrate on the neighbourhood policing teams and the neighbourhood policing campaign. I join my hon. Friend in supporting Staffordshire's bid for the roll-out of hand-held computers. I also commend Staffordshire police authority for reducing bureaucracy.

I also congratulate Staffordshire police authority on being at the forefront of introducing neighbourhood policing. In Staffordshire, neighbourhood policing was introduced well over a year ago and Staffordshire has been a leading police force in guaranteeing named officers in every neighbourhood. Understandably, there is pride in the achievement of Staffordshire police. My old friend Mike Poulter, chair of Staffordshire police authority, is quoted on the authority's website as saying:

> "We were among just a handful of forces to be graded 'excellent' in the national Police Performance Assessments for how we've rolled out neighbourhood policing. We are passionately committed to maintaining a named officer in every neighbourhood."

When I spoke to a senior officer in my local division, he showed his enthusiasm and support for neighbourhood policing, describing the value of police community support officers. He told me how the PCSOs take ownership of their community and are able to provide intelligence and feedback about activities and problems in their area, and he described the value of the police consultation meetings, which involve partnership agencies and thus enable local people to raise not only policing issues but other matters that are of concern to them.

PCSOs bring with them a wealth of experience from their previous occupations. I have met many PCSOs who have had jobs in different sectors, gaining experience that is a considerable advantage when it comes to local neighbourhood policing. They also represent a wide range of ages, because they enter the PCSO family at different ages, and they are from various backgrounds. They are truly representative of the local communities that they serve. I am glad that our neighbourhood police officers work as a team with the PCSOs and in partnership with our local communities, including with local councillors and wardens. They know their communities and provide the reassurance that the public need.

We should also remember that, in the family of neighbourhood policing, we have the volunteers—our special constabulary that splendidly supports the regular police force. Indeed, in most ways it is indistinguishable from the regular police force. Reference has been made to the number of special constables. In the Burton neighbourhood policing unit, we have 14 police constables, 14 PCSOs and 25 special constables, and in the Uttoxeter NPU, we have six police constables, five PCSOs and six special constables. There are more special constables in those areas than full-time officers.

I thank all those involved in law enforcement in Staffordshire and congratulate Staffordshire police authority on the content of its website. Some hon. Members have already mentioned the importance of websites. The Staffordshire police authority website not only gives some of the history of the police force, but provides information on the policies and aspirations of Staffordshire police, neighbourhood watch schemes, Crimestoppers and PCSOs. Most importantly, the website gives full details of how people can contact their own neighbourhood police officer and their PCSOs, including by e-mail. The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) mentioned e-mail, and certainly in Staffordshire the website sets out how e-mail contact can be made with officers. My constituents can look at the details of the Burton and Uttoxeter NPUs; they can see how many officers we have and they can access their contact details, including their phone numbers; and they can obtain that information through the website.

Through local events, Staffordshire police authority is promoting awareness of neighbourhood policing fortnight and the importance of people learning the contact details of officers. I welcome that process. People can also get that information by visiting the local police station or by phoning 0845 330 2010, or from the Safer Staffs. newspapers. I urge people to find out who their local officers are, whether that is in Staffordshire, including in my constituency, or elsewhere in the country, because it is important to ensure that people are aware of their local police officers. We can make people feel safer in our communities by providing that knowledge of whom they can contact.

Having first declared an interest as a member of my local neighbourhood watch committee, I commend neighbourhood watch schemes for the support that they give to the police and the help that they give in protecting local communities. Earlier, there was mention of funding for neighbourhood watch co-ordinators. Certainly in my area there are some concerns about the long-term funding of those co-ordinators. In my patch, one officer is being funded through the borough council and the other through the county council, but because that funding is not long-term, we have certainly lost one of those officers. I am therefore concerned that we should ensure security of funding. If we lose those officers, we will lose the great service that local people have developed over the years to try to help the police to protect their communities.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford for raising this subject. As has been said before, it is opportune. We should raise the public's awareness that they have neighbourhood officers and encourage our constituents to attend the local consultation meetings, to talk to the police and to help to provide that safety, security and reduction in crime in our neighbourhoods that we all wish to see.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I too start by congratulating the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing this debate. He deployed a rare quality in a politician—frankness—in admitting that he secured this debate without knowing that it was opportune. It is indeed opportune and we are all grateful to him for securing it.

The debate has been consensual. All the parties that were represented here—the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) has left us now—agree that neighbourhood policing is a good thing and the Liberal Democrats certainly support it. As a party, we are very much in favour of "pavement politics", so it is no surprise that we are in favour of "pavement policing", which is what neighbourhood policing is largely about.

We have some concerns about the level of resources that are available. We know from research that in the period up to March 2007, 20 out of 43 police forces experienced a drop in the number of police officers. We can only hope that when the figures for the period up to March 2008 become available, we will see that that trend has been reversed in those forces. Of course, we know that the total number of community support officers who were going to be deployed was reduced from the 24,000 that the Government had pledged to 16,000. No doubt, when the Minister responds he will point out that that lower number was the number that the police thought they could work with. However, I think that all hon. Members who have spoken here today are aware of areas in their own constituencies where there is still a high level of antisocial behaviour, for example, and where additional resources, if they could be brought to bear, could make a significant difference.

There is one thing that is perhaps surprising about neighbourhood policing. I suppose I am slightly too young to have been brought up on "Dixon of Dock Green". None the less, I was under the impression that intelligence about individuals in a particular neighbourhood was something that was accessible to the police and that they had people on their force who knew who the local hoodlums were and so on. However, it is only as a result of neighbourhood policing that there are now sufficient police resources available to enable that very individual identification of potentially problem people or households

When that was revealed to me three or four years ago, it was a source of some surprise.

Like other Members, I am happy to endorse the activities of my own safer neighbourhood teams, and have joined several of them on patrol to witness first hand how they work. We did some canvassing in one road where one of the residents raised concerns with me about allegations of drug dealing going on close by. When I went out a few weeks later with the relevant safer neighbourhood team, I reported the matter to the lead officer, who raided the property a few weeks later and found that cannabis plants were being grown there. It is clear that safer neighbourhood teams are working, in that intelligence gets to the right people and can be acted on promptly at the right level. Like other Members, I attend the panel of my own safer neighbourhood team when I can, just to see how it and local councillors and leading members of the community identify what the priorities will be in their ward in the upcoming quarter. That works effectively.

That is not to say that bureaucracy, to which Members have referred, is not real; it needs to be tackled. The Liberal Democrat mayoral candidate, Brian Paddick, who has experience in the police force, will be looking carefully at it. Let me give the Minister one concrete example of bureaucracy, which was raised in the Home Affairs Committee yesterday, in the hope that he will be able to write to me and other Members about it.

I do not know whether the Minister has seen the Committee transcript, but Mr. Gargan, who is an assistant chief constable, raised a problem relating to CCTV cameras. He gave evidence that to change the direction that a CCTV is pointing—not to install a camera, but to change its direction—officers are required to fill in a 17-page form. That applies regardless of whether the surveillance is covert or overt. I questioned him further on that and asked whether the police were required to do that, or whether there is some scope for interpreting the law in one way or another. He said that it was probably because of the latter—interpretation of the law rather than a clear command—that the form had to be filled in to change the direction of a CCTV camera. If nothing else results from this debate, I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify for our benefit and for that officer's benefit whether that is, in fact, a requirement. If it is not, could it be made clear that it is not, so that if the police want to make such a change—perhaps to move a CCTV camera so that it focuses on a particular parade where there have been significant problems—they can deal with it more effectively and without the need to complete a 17-page form?

We need to tackle problems of bureaucracy, but neighbourhood policing requires other actions to be taken as well. Such actions are not necessarily about policing but to do with licensing, particularly licensing regimes and ensuring responsible behaviour on the part of off-licences, bars, clubs and so on, and ensuring that we design out crime in our town centres. Those matters need to be addressed before we come to the question of neighbourhood policing itself.

My party can happily sign up to the four key principles that the Government have set out for neighbourhood policing: having visible and accessible police, influencing community safety priorities, interventions that solve local problems, and answers that give solutions to problems and feedback on results. The hon. Member for Stafford said that police accessibility was not simply about bricks and mortar. I agree that it must not simply be about that, but making the police accessible often does boil down to bricks and mortar, or at least to there being a contact point that people know about. It could be a mobile police station as opposed to a permanent base; what is needed is a known location to which people can go to visit their police officers. That is why at local level and, indeed, in London and beyond, the idea of safer neighbourhood teams having their own permanent base in their ward is appropriate.

The police certainly are more visible and accessible. The surveys that we have done over many years confirm that to be true. When we put out surveys five or 10 years ago that asked, "When did you last see a police officer?", the responses that often came back were, "Never," or "Twelve months ago." Now it is almost not worth putting out such surveys because the responses tend to be much more positive.

Progress is being made on the key principles, and Liberal Democrats support that. It is clear from the statistics that community support officers and safer neighbourhood teams are increasing public confidence in the police through their extra visibility, and, as in the concrete example to which I referred, through ensuring that local intelligence is passed on to the appropriate people and acted on.

One of the key recommendations in Sir Ronnie Flanagan's review of policing was that partnership working between the police and local communities and councils should be prioritised. I commend the example of my own borough, the London borough of Sutton, which for several years has had joint working and a joint appointment. The person happens to be a police officer, but someone from the local authority or, indeed, from outside the local authority could have been appointed. One person is responsible for the parks police, the safer neighbourhood teams, the wardens and aspects of enforcement that the local authority takes on, so that all the resources can be brought to bear in an organised fashion when local problems are identified.

I conclude by drawing attention to concerns about neighbourhood policing that other Members have referred to and which have been raised by the Police Federation. The Minister will be familiar with the report that the federation produced in December 2006, "24/7 Response Policing in the Modern Police Organisation—Views from the Frontline". Things have moved on, and the level of resources is clearly now much more significant, but the concerns that the federation raised then—only 18 months ago—were about whether staffing would be sufficient to provide the safer neighbourhood teams, and whether 24/7 response officers would be drawn from their activities and put into safer neighbourhood teams. The federation was also concerned that safer neighbourhood teams would not reduce the work that 24/7 response officers had to do but might, in fact, increase it. I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm that discussions with the federation indicate that those issues have either gone away or are not as salient now as they were then.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker) indicated assent.

Tom Brake: I see that the Minister will be able to respond on that point, and I welcome that.

Neighbourhood policing is beginning to deliver results. Once it is bedded in, there will no doubt be a need for some fine tuning. That may mean looking at the balance of police officers and community support officers on safer neighbourhood teams. Undoubtedly, there will be discussion at some point about how we balance the real need for visible policing by officers who are known to the people in an area, with the real challenges that the police face in specific locations where they might want to deploy more resources. There will be discussions about how we get that balance right, but, broadly speaking, my party supports and welcomes the direction of travel. Subject to some fine tuning, it will deliver real benefit to communities up and down the country in years to come.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): I and my colleagues congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing this timely debate. Let me make it clear that Her Majesty's Opposition support the six broad goals set out in the Government's 2005 document on neighbourhood policing. We believe in the principle that local people should have more influence over setting local safety priorities. We believe in stronger partnership working not just between local authorities, neighbourhood watches and local citizens' groups, but between primary care trusts and the whole family of partnership workers in crime and disorder reduction partnerships and other groupings. We also believe that having a more visible presence on the streets is vital to neighbourhood policing. We need to cut the paperwork and get more officers and police community support officers back on the beat.

My concerns do not relate to the principle of neighbourhood policing, which we support, but its implementation. The Conservative-controlled borough of Hammersmith and Fulham, which I visited earlier this week, provides an excellent example of delivering 24/7 policing. Two wards are enjoying this piloted experiment, which involves working across 24-hour periods. They have, on average, 30 officers, rather than the London average of six. It is worth while focusing on the results, and I would like the Minister's views on them. In Shepherd's Bush, for example, robberies are down by 48 per cent. In Fulham Broadway, overall crime is down 10 per cent., with burglary down 27 per cent. and theft down 22 per cent. Those are real examples of a very aggressive 24/7 neighbourhood policing policy.

What is the evidence for crime reductions in non-24/7 areas—our average neighbourhood policing areas? The Home Office's report this February, "Neighbourhood policing: the impact of piloting and early national implementation", which I know the Minster will have studied with care, did not provide any numerical evidence for significant reductions in crime in the 16 wards that it studied. I wonder what the Minister's view is of the empirical evidence for crime reduction in neighbourhood policing areas.

PCSOs are important in the delivery of neighbourhood policing, which was sagely observed by my hon. Friends the Members for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) and for Banbury (Tony Baldry). I do not need to go into the argument about the Government's promise at the time of the last election to recruit 24,000 PCSOs by 2008. That target has been reduced to 16,000. Will the Minister give us an indication of his estimates for the number of PCSOs who will be available in England and Wales to support sworn officers in neighbourhood teams for next year and the year after?

I have an even more important question about sworn officer numbers, police strength and absent PCSOs. We all believe in neighbourhood policing, but one does not have to be a rocket scientist to understand that the number of sworn officers needs to be kept up. I have one simple question, to which the House deserves an answer, and I am not making a party political point, because every hon. Member who cares about the problem will want the answer. On page 45 of Sir Ronnie Flanagan's final report on the independent review of policing, published in February, he said that "maintaining police numbers at their current level"— which was about 141,000 in January—

"is not sustainable over the course of the next three years...we would not be making the most effective use of the resources dedicated to the police if police officer numbers were sustained at their current level."

I would dearly like to hear whether the Minister and the Government support Sir Ronnie Flanagan's proposition. Until we know what their intentions are over the next three years and whether 141,000 officers is a sustainable number, we cannot have an intelligent debate about the effectiveness of neighbourhood policing.

Mr. Mark Field: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Ruffley: I will not, because we are very short of time and I want the Minister to have a proper crack at answering these questions. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House spoke about reducing red tape. One proposal has been de-emphasised by Sir Ronnie. In his interim report on 11 September, he strongly recommended that the Association of Chief Police Officers and the National Policing Improvement Agency draft a national suite of streamlined forms containing minimum reporting requirements by summer 2008. Conservatives support that, but we do not seem to be having much success. If anyone speaks to ACPO and the NPIA, as I did yesterday, there is not much evidence of a national suite of forms with minimum reporting requirements being produced by the summer of this year, as Sir Ronnie originally wished to see. Perhaps the Minister can comment on that. We are not going to have better and more effective neighbourhood policing unless the Government get serious at a national level on cutting red tape and reducing bureaucracy.

I want to give the Minister enough time to answer those questions, so I shall just make the following points. He will agree that it is not acceptable that the proportion of time spent by patrol officers on patrol fell from 18 to 17.1 per cent between 2003-04 and 2006-07, based on the Government's own figures up to 2007. Unless those figures are reversed, they cast doubt on the effectiveness of the neighbourhood policing programme in the next year and beyond. There are also some rather depressing figures about police station closures in the past 10 years. Freedom of information requests reveal that, to date, 550 have shut their doors.

We also need clarity on the single non-emergency number. In his final review in February, Sir Ronnie Flanagan highlighted the importance of the 101 non-emergency number in acting as a catalyst for improved partnership working between the police and other agencies. Will the Minister tell us about funding for the 101 number, because there are question marks over that?

Finally, proper implementation of the neighbourhood policing programme requires proper and stable funding. That is the view of all who have looked at the matter. Will the Minister accept recommendation No. 30 of Sir Ronnie Flanagan's report, which states:

"The NPIA should, by April 2008 have agreed a funded programme for the next three years to continue to support forces to embed Neighbourhood Policing"?

Is that something that we will see in April 2008? If not, why not?

10.48 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker): It is a privilege to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing the debate. If he does not mind me embarrassing him, may I also say that, as normal, he introduced his subject in an intelligent and thoughtful way? That gives enormous power to his arguments. I know that he works assiduously for his constituents, not only in respect of neighbourhood policing, but on a whole range of different matters, and I congratulate him on that.

Before I respond to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), I shall deal with some of the other points raised. This was a very intelligent debate and discussion, and hon. Members raised matters of importance. They were concerned with how to improve the delivery of neighbourhood policing in every area. The debate was not about the principle of it, because we all know that what people want is a visible uniformed presence on the street, but about how we can make that as effective as possible and how we ensure that local people can influence those officers in a proportionate way.

The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) was right to say that issues other than neighbourhood policing are important. It is for local police forces to achieve a balance in relation to that, which is something that we should not lose sight of. I was pleased that he and others highlighted the role of PCSOs. Given some of the publicity about them, it is important to say again that the Government and the vast majority of hon. Members think that they do an outstanding job in our communities. The introduction of PCSOs has been a major reform and has led to considerable improvements. We should consistently acknowledge that. When I and many other hon. Members travel around the country or are in our constituencies, we pay tribute to the role of PCSOs. I am grateful for his support on that.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the role of specials, and it is right and proper that we recognise their role in delivering neighbourhood policing. It is not just the number of specials that is important, but the number who are active in communities, which is a point that is often lost. A change was made in the past few years and the police work hard to ensure that specials are properly integrated into neighbourhood policing teams, and that they are active and working hard in those teams, rather than simply being numbers in a book. There has been considerable improvement in that and integration has been an important factor.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) talked about neighbourhood management, which is a particularly important point—in fact, it is crucial. Neighbourhood policing cannot be delivered without being part of neighbourhood management. He made that point when he talked about the reduction in crime in his area, brought about by a neighbourhood management approach. The role of PCSOs was also important and, again, he highlighted the difference that they have made.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) talked about a subway in his area where a tremendous difference has been made by the local authority—or Network Rail or whoever was responsible—painting out some graffiti. That is not a policing function. In many respects, it is the function of the local authority or whoever is responsible. Painting out graffiti containing homophobic hatred or other types of graffiti means that when people walk down the subway, they will feel the benefit of the actions of those who take a pride in the community. Sometimes the simple measures that people think should be done—and they cannot understand why they are not done—make a real difference. In all our constituencies, fixing a broken streetlight or sign makes a huge difference. That is not part of a policing response, but part of neighbourhood management, in which the police play an important role. I think it would be a shock if I—a Labour Minister—turned up in the middle of Banbury, and we would perhaps have some fun if I did so, but, on a serious note, I will consider visiting.

Mr. Andrew Smith rose—

Mr. Coaker: Of course, I will go to Oxford at the same time.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend could come to Oxford, East on the way to Banbury. The hon. Gentleman made a point about the career structure for PCSOs and the opportunities for progression. Does my hon. Friend have that matter under review or have further proposals on it?

Mr. Coaker: The next thing I have written on my notes is not to forget to say that on the way to Banbury, or on the way back from Banbury, I will, of course, call in at Oxford. Just in case I have missed anyone out geographically, I should say that it is important for Ministers to go to different constituencies and parts of the country. I have been to Burton, Stafford, Copland in Cumbria and other places to see the work that is going on.

Hon. Members will know that the Association of Chief Police Officers has asked the National Policing Improvement Agency to review PCSOs and career development will be considered as part of that. On the transfer or movement of officers from Thames Valley and, indeed, other forces into the Metropolitan force, officers recruited after 1 April 1994 in south-east forces receive an additional allowance of £2,000 per annum and £1,000 per annum in Bedfordshire and Hampshire. We have been asked to revisit that allowance and to uprate it to deal with inflation. We recently heard the views of Sara Thornton, the chief constable of Thames Valley, who has made representations on that issue. It is a matter for the Police Negotiating Board, but I know that it is under consideration.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burton (Mrs. Dean) made an important point about neighbourhood management and the role of neighbourhood watch. There is a need for neighbourhood watch to extend its role and to develop the way in which it works in a modern police setting. There is certainly an important role for neighbourhood watch.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) talked about local priorities and the points he made were right. One of the tasks for neighbourhood policing is to ensure that local people feel that they can influence the priorities and have a real say. That should not mean that police operational independence is compromised, but if there is to be true neighbourhood policing in an area, surely it is only right and necessary for people to have some influence.

On CCTV and accessibility, when I have been to different parts of the country, including the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Mr. Reed), I have visited control rooms where they change the direction of CCTV cameras all the time. However, I will consider the hon. Gentleman's point. If it is appropriate, I will write to every hon. Member present with the answer to his question so that it is on the record. As I have said, it is not something that I have heard before, but I will take up the point.

I genuinely welcome the support of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) for neighbourhood policing. I also welcome the other points that he made. We are trying to get empirical evidence on neighbourhood policing. However, it is fair to say that every police force that we have spoken to says that neighbourhood policing has led to a reduction in crime—and importantly a reduction in the fear of crime—as happened in Hammersmith and Fulham, to which he referred.

The hon. Gentleman will also know that all the Flanagan review's recommendations are being considered by the Government, including those that he highlighted. Part of that is about reducing bureaucracy. We know that forms are being reduced in size across the country and my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford gave examples of that. As I say, we will push that matter forward. One of the ways in which we will do that is through mobile data sets, although I cannot give him a commitment on that this morning.

Mr. Kidney: Really.

Mr. Coaker: I am sure my hon. Friend is not surprised. I cannot give the commitment because it would drive a coach and horses through the bidding system. We have heard his plea for Staffordshire in relation to the funding for that and we will consider it.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned maintaining police numbers and referred to the point made by the Flanagan review. Obviously, we intend to maintain police numbers. We have invested record amounts in the police service and there has been a huge increase in police numbers. PCSOs have been introduced and there has been a massive increase in the number of police staff who have taken on roles previously undertaken by warranted officers.

Obviously, the Government must consider the Flanagan report, but we have not come to a conclusion on it. However, the point that Sir Ronnie makes is whether the mix of staff numbers is right. That links to the point made by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington. Clearly, one of the reasons we reduced the funding for PCSOs from last April was because the Association of Chief Police Officers asked us to. Similarly, surely the mix of police staffing, staff numbers, PCSOs and uniformed officers is a matter for local police chiefs. Sooner or later, Parliament will have to make up its mind across the board about whether it wants to issue national diktats to local police forces or have local decision making, even if that sometimes means taking an easy political hit. With respect to the police, we must decide whether we want effective policing determined locally or yah-boo politics dictating what is an appropriate public policy. That is something on which we need to reflect. The Flanagan review has made its recommendation, which the Government will consider in due course.

Housing (Warrington)

11 am

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood. I am glad to have secured a debate on housing need in Warrington and to see my hon. Friend the Minister in his place—he takes a serious interest in such matters.

I am not here as a nimby. Warrington is not a town of nimbys. For many years, it was part of the Warrington-Runcorn new town area, and the town expanded rapidly. We have a thriving economy, and under this Government, people in my constituency have seen a change: vast numbers of people were unemployed, but now more people are in employment than Beveridge defined as full employment. As a result, my constituency contains a surprising mix of people, including families who have lived in the town for generations, people who have come from Manchester and Liverpool, and people who, like me, have come from further afield and who are proud to live in the town even though they were not born there. Nevertheless, we have a serious housing problem, and my constituents are concerned about the kind of housing that is being built and that is planned for the future.

Our problem can be summed up very simply. Warrington has exceeded its house building targets for years, yet we do not have the kind of housing that we need. At the last count, 11,320 people were on the housing waiting list; yet between 2002-03 and 2006-07, only 142 units of social housing were built. We have the additional problem that house prices in the town are much higher than in the surrounding areas. The average cost of a semi-detached house in Warrington is more than £175,000 and the average cost of a terraced house is more than £130,000, but many people in the area are on low wages, despite the Government's efforts to get people back to work. The town as a whole does not score high in the indexes of deprivation, but seven wards, many of which are in my constituency, are in the bottom 25 per cent. of the most deprived areas in the country. As a result, the average house price in Warrington is nine times the average wage and, to get a typical mortgage, it is estimated that someone needs to earn about £50,000, which is twice the average wage.

We have a joint problem. People who need social housing cannot obtain it, and young couples who want to get a foot on the ladder cannot afford to buy. The problem is not exclusive to Warrington. When the Government office for the north-west held a meeting to brief MPs on housing growth point status bids—it was rather late in the day, if I may say—the problem was raised by many hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Minister will have seen at his surgeries families who live in such overcrowded conditions that people sleep in living rooms and boys and girls share bedrooms, sometimes when one is in their teenage years, and young couples who are desperate to buy but simply cannot find anything that they can afford. At the briefing meeting, I hope that it was conveyed to him that many of us who unfortunately have Liberal Democrat or Tory-controlled councils—or, as in my area, an alliance of both, which we call the "ConDems"—have no faith in the willingness of those councils to supply affordable housing even when they have put in growth point status bids. I have no doubt of the Government's commitment, but I have grave doubts about the ability and willingness of Warrington borough council to deliver.

Warrington's bid gives all the appearance of having been cobbled together. Originally, it was a stand-alone bid from Warrington, but at the suggestion of the Government office for the north-west, it was linked with the bids from Halton and St. Helens. I am concerned about that because those areas have different housing problems, and they are in a different situation from Warrington. For instance, the bid says that the council can deal with the traffic problems, but anyone who lives in Warrington knows that the town is frequently gridlocked. It also says that there is no flooding problem, which is interesting, because I received a letter from the strategic director of environment and regeneration that says,

"as you know, the town is vulnerable to flooding from a number of sources".

It goes on to say that I should lobby the Government for more money to deal with flooding, stating:

"I remain concerned however that such increased funding remains insufficient to permit spending on flood defences in Warrington".

The bid has not been thought through. When my hon. Friend the Minister looks at it, he will not need a crystal ball, but simply to read the book. The last big planning permission granted by the council was for a site on Loushers lane. Some 178 houses will be built, only 17 of which will be affordable. Frankly, that is scandalous given that the council holds the whip hand in granting planning permission, because it has exceeded its housing targets. In its bid, the council says that it will require about 419 units of affordable housing a year to meet the need, despite "having a considerable over-supply of housing in relation to the regional requirement".

That is exactly right, but only because we have been building the wrong sort of housing for people's needs. I fear that the bid will continue that.

My hon. Friend the Minister should not be fooled by some of what is said in the bid; the key is in the front, where the council talks about building on "previously developed and under-used land in the town centre and its waterfront–transforming the area as the platform for the town's economic growth".

The bid document returns to that, but it does not sound much like affordable housing to me. Planners and some Warrington councillors have long held the ambition of developing the waterfront in the same way as they have been developed in Manchester and Liverpool. However, if people want to buy waterfront flats in a big city, they would normally go to a big city; yet the council has allowed such flats to be built there and in other areas in the town. Anyone can pick them out not only because they stand out like a sore thumb from the rest of the town, but because they are festooned with "To let" signs. They have been bought and put into the buy-to-let market at prices that most of my constituents cannot afford. When I asked the chief executive whether there would be affordable housing along the river, she looked sheepish and said, "Well, some."

The real intentions could be deduced at a meeting that was held when my right hon. Friend the Minister for the North West visited Warrington last year. The meeting was set up by the Government office for the north-west, which is why I do not have much faith in its ability to assess the bid. It invited big developers and even the principal of the local college, but not the town's MPs. If it had done so, we might have had something to say on aspects of the bids. For instance, the bid states:

"Many...urban sites lend themselves to high density developments in the form of flats or apartments".

Perhaps the difference between a flat and an apartment is how much someone pays for it, but that is not what my constituents or the people who are looking for housing want; they want houses in which they can bring up their families decently.

The bid talks about "building a new image" for Warrington. Frankly, I would rather the council builds some affordable housing. I hope that, when looking at such bids, my hon. Friend the Minister will not allow a situation in which families who have lived in an area for generations are priced out because of the kind of buildings that are being developed.

Even when there is affordable housing, the council cannot be relied upon to keep it in the affordable sector. Many allegations about properties built as affordable homes being sold to the wrong people have been made. For example, a lady who was previously a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Helen Southworth) was renting a house for £550 a month. The house was built as affordable housing and was sold for £79,000 to someone who already had a property. When my hon. Friend raised the matter with the council, it told her that there was "insufficient evidence to prove that there is a breach of the S106 agreement."

When the case was passed to me, I pointed out that the council had admitted that there were flaws in the section 106 agreement and asked what it was doing to strengthen it. I got a reply from the strategic director of community services, who shows neither any strategy nor any regard for the community. I was told that the council could not strengthen the agreement because

"S106 agreements are precisely that, an agreement between signatories."

Well, knock me down with a feather. In this case, one of the signatories holds most of the cards and is not using them.

I was also told that, although affordable housing should not be sold to someone who owned a property or had sold one in the past three years,

"this is not stipulated in the S106 agreement, so it would not necessarily be applied by a developer in the event that the council did not find a nominee."

There we have it: the council is still negotiating a pitiful amount of affordable housing on developments. It is not strengthening the section 106 agreements to allow it to find nominees in the event that a sale falls through, as a proportion always will, and it does not seem concerned when affordable housing ends up in the buy-to-let sector. Yet it told my hon. Friend that it would deliver 50 per cent. affordable housing if it were allowed to be a housing growth point.

The council makes great play of inward movement to Warrington. We are not nimbys, but the first duty of a council is to cater for its own population. At the moment, people are moving in to buy the more expensive housing, which is still less expensive than in some of the big cities, whereas young couples who have grown up in the town are having to move out to find somewhere affordable to buy. I hope that, when my hon. Friend the Minister examines the bid, he will take steps to stop that happening.

There are fears about sites that are coming on stream, such as the site of the old Bruche police training centre in my constituency. English Partnerships has bought it and wants to develop it for housing. A lot of consultation is still needed with the local community about what community facilities there should be and so on, but I understand from my discussions that the council is already trying to impose conditions that would reduce the amount of affordable housing that could be built there. The fear is that the same thing will happen if the council closes Woolston high school, in the centre of my constituency, as it scandalously wants to, and that the site will be sold to the highest bidder and developed without regard to the housing needs of the community and without proper community facilities, thus enabling the council to bank large capital receipts, which it will no doubt spend south of the river in the town, so my constituents will not benefit.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can reassure me and my constituents on a number of matters: first, that the bid will be properly appraised, despite being lumped in with two other councils that have very different circumstances at the instigation of the Government office for the north-west. I hope that the bid will be examined, so that if it is allowed, the council provides 50 per cent. affordable housing on different sites around the area, instead of pricing local people out of an area.

Secondly, my constituents will want to be reassured that the housing that is built will be of good quality, with the right community facilities. They do not want more high-rise flats, and they do not want what one lady described to me as "cheap and nasty" affordable housing. That is not the Government's intention, and my hon. Friend is committed to providing good-quality housing for hard-working people, but I should like to know how he will ensure that the council does that.

Thirdly, my constituents are keen for affordable housing to be built for the sons and daughters of Warrington people. I have done a lot of surveys all around my constituency, and that message has come out loud and clear. We must ensure that we do not just have expensive houses that local people cannot afford to buy.

Fourthly, we must tackle the shortage of rented housing in the borough. Building affordable housing will help to tackle the waiting list that I mentioned, but there will always be people who want or need to rent. There is also a hidden need among people who want to move, for various reasons, but know that they have no chance of doing so at the moment.

I want my hon. Friend to reassure my constituents that we will get the kind of housing that we need. He and the Government are committed to that, but the real question is how we can get local authorities, which might not be as committed to it as we are, to deliver for the people whom I represent. Hard-working families in my constituency are fed up of being priced out of their own area. I do not want to see any more people in my surgery crying because they cannot move into rented housing or because they are desperate to get a start in life and find somewhere to buy but cannot do so in the area where they have grown up. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to reassure me on the matters that I have mentioned.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Mr. Iain Wright): I think that this is the first time that I have served under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood. May I say what an absolute pleasure it is to do so?

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) on securing this important debate soon after securing an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall on knife crime, I believe.

Helen Jones: Alcohol-related crime.

Mr. Wright: It was alcohol-related crime—I am sorry. My hon. Friend works assiduously on behalf of her constituents on a range of matters, not least the need for more affordable housing in Warrington. She has been particularly strong in ensuring that her constituents are heard here in the House, in Whitehall and throughout the north-west region, particularly with regard to housing. Hansard demonstrates her persistence on that subject. Both I and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing can personally testify to the representations that she has made on behalf of those seeking affordable housing in the borough.

If you and my hon. Friend will allow me, Mr. Hood, I wish to mention the national housing picture and then apply it to the circumstances in Warrington. My hon. Friend will welcome the fact, as I do, that housing is back at the top of the political agenda, and that the Government are determined to provide better, greener and more affordable housing. To be frank, this country has not been building enough homes since the early 1970s, which means that concerted effort is needed. Rising prosperity and a thriving economy over the past decade have meant that more people want to get on the property ladder—particularly, as she said, hard-working families. Equally, more people are living alone as a result of social change, and people are living longer, with the result that we need more homes that are suitable for older people, perhaps with provision for their grandchildren to stay with them to maintain a family network.

The Government published the housing Green Paper, "Homes for the future: more affordable, more sustainable", in July 2007. It set a target of 2 million new homes by 2016 and 3 million by 2020. Within that total, we have set a target of providing at least 70,000 new affordable homes a year by 2010-11, of which 45,000 should be for rent. The Government expect at least 30 per cent. of new socially rented provision by the Housing Corporation to be family accommodation, to ease the overcrowding pressures that my hon. Friend so eloquently mentioned.

With the renewed political priority have come substantially increased resources. The Government have pledged about £8.4 billion over the next three years to tackle the problem of affordable housing. There has been a substantial increase in the resources available for providing new and affordable homes in the north-west region. About £526 million has been allocated to the national affordable housing programme for the next three years, with the aim of aiding the completion of about 6,500 socially rented homes and up to 3,000 affordable properties for sale.

The regional housing strategy in the north-west is currently being refreshed to better reflect the affordability agenda, and I understand that Warrington should be better placed to attract support in future years because of it. I understand also that the borough has so far secured £4.7 million, in strategic partnership with a number of registered social landlords, to fund the development of 94 new homes for rent in the current bidding round. Further bids will be developed for the Housing Corporation's regular market engagement in the coming months.

Like my hon. Friend, I represent a northern seat and I am conscious of the fact that pressures on housing and affordability are not confined to London and the south-east. As she so excellently said, there are concerns about affordability in every region, which is why the Green Paper extended the growth points programme to the north for the first time. Growth point status is not a statutory designation, but represents a relationship between central Government and local partners. It is built on four principles: early delivery of housing as part of growth plans; supporting local partners to achieve sustainable growth; working with local partners to ensure that infrastructure and service provision keep pace with growth; and ensuring effective delivery. Levels of growth will be subject to comprehensive testing and public consultation through the regional and local planning processes, and I hope that that reassures my hon. Friend. The aim is to ensure that individual proposals are sustainable, environmentally acceptable and realistic in terms of infrastructure.

As my hon. Friend said, Warrington, in conjunction with neighbouring authorities, submitted an expression of interest for growth point status in October 2007. In December, the Government office for the north-west held an informal briefing for the region's MPs, at which my hon. Friend expressed her views—in a somewhat forthright manner, as she said—about the priority that affordable housing should be given in the delivery of new housing in her patch. The Government office for the north-west passed on her views in writing to the chief executive of Warrington borough council. Again, my hon. Friend is to be commended for her interest in this emerging agenda, which will impact greatly on the level of affordable housing available to her constituents. I fundamentally agree that MPs should be at the heart of this process representing their constituents. At this point, however, I should make it clear that we are still considering all applications for new growth point status, and no decisions have been made, but I cannot say more on that.

As I have mentioned, and as my hon. Friend said, affordability has emerged as the single most important issue in housing almost everywhere. Warrington is one of many areas suffering the consequences of the market's historical failure to supply enough housing to meet rising demand. Average lower-quartile house prices in Warrington have risen by about 179 per cent.

[Mr. Iain Wright]

in the past 10 years, which is much faster than comparable incomes. Between 2001 and 2006, the average property price in Warrington rose by 83.7 per cent., compared with an increase of 74.7 per cent. for England and Wales as a whole. As my hon. Friend suggested, the ratio of lower-quartile house prices to income was 3.26 in 1997 and 6.72 by 2007, although it has come down slightly from a peak last year. Taken together, those figures make Warrington the 15th least affordable borough in the north-west.

Warrington's history of new town development and subsequent strong economic growth, as well as the investment that has been put into education, of which my hon. Friend is a massive champion in her area, have attracted many workers to the town, and that, in turn, has fostered significant housing development. However, my hon. Friend is right that we must do more to encourage and enable young families who were born in Warrington and who want to stay there to do so. I am anxious that we do not price them out of their home town. My hon. Friend has often expressed concern—she has done so in an excellent fashion this morning—at the apparent disconnect between the rising number of homes in Warrington and the growing number of people looking for social and affordable housing in the borough. My comments on that will form the main part of my response.

My hon. Friend made the important argument that we are talking not simply about housing numbers, but about the type and mix of new housing that is created in the borough. Again, the figures bear out her analysis. Access to social housing has become more difficult:- there were about 10,400 households on Warrington's housing waiting list on 1 April 2007, and that has increased. That compares with 2,516 in 1997. The number of new social lettings has also declined in recent years, from 1,311 in 2003-04 to just 1,112 in 2006-07—a fall of about 15 per cent. The number of new houses built, as opposed to other properties, such as maisonettes or flats, is slowing more markedly, falling from 421 in 2003-04 to 311 in 2006-07, and I fully understand—I think that my hon. Friend will share this concern—that that needs to be tackled. Finally, 90 households were accepted as homeless in Warrington between October and December 2007, which is a 14.5 per cent. increase over the same period the previous year. Bringing those figures together, there is no doubt that housing supply and affordability are crucial issues for the town.

The council has a key role to play in addressing those challenges, as my hon. Friend has said. It must ensure that it stands up for mixed developments that provide a range of buildings, tenures and, crucially, community facilities. Planning policy statement 3 should help to achieve that. To illustrate my point, I will quote from the letter that my Department sent to local planning authorities when PPS3 was released. The letter states:

"PPS 3 puts in place a national policy framework for planning for housing at the local and regional level. It provides an enabling framework for local planning authorities, working with their stakeholders,"

—MPs are crucial stakeholders in this respect—

"including developers, to deliver both the right quantity of housing to address need and demand in their area, and the right quality and mix of housing for their communities."

That last point is crucial. I know that my hon. Friend agrees that we do not wish to see the physical polarisation of the poor and the affluent. We do not wish to see gated communities on the canal in Warrington, away from ghettos elsewhere in the borough. Such an approach is not conducive to sustainable, prosperous and thriving communities. The local authority needs to aim to create vibrant, mixed-tenure communities by ensuring that the right housing of the highest quality is in the right place.

Our housing Green Paper announced various measures to help councils to carry out their strategic housing role and deliver such communities, such as a new housing and planning delivery grant totalling £510 million to direct extra resources to councils; new approaches to help councils provide more social housing; joint venture vehicles that councils can establish to work in partnership with the newly created Homes and Communities Agency to deliver affordable housing on council land; and encouragement for councils to bring long-term empty homes back into use, making better use of existing stock and partnerships with a wider range of housing providers.

Our recent efforts have focused particularly on attempts to encourage local authorities to make better use of their statutory planning powers to improve the supply of affordable housing through section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990, which I understand has played a particular role in Warrington in the recent past. Some 420 affordable units were completed in the six years up to 2005-06, and the local authority has reported to me that an additional 667 units have already been secured for future delivery. The council also expects to receive more than £5.6 million in section 106 commuted sums to be spent solely on future affordable housing projects, move-on accommodation and tackling long-term voids. However, I take on board precisely what my hon. Friend was saying on the matter and I will look closely at it.

Helen Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree—I am sure he does—that councils should not accept those payments when they are a way for a developer to wriggle out of their obligation to provide affordable housing, thus making it more difficult to provide mixed communities?

Mr. Wright: That is an important point. We need to ensure that the agreements that have been made under section 106 are followed through absolutely and complied with.

At this point, I should say that my hon. Friend has pushed this agenda in Warrington and made the council address the issues we are talking about. Warrington has also completed a strategic housing market assessment, which has identified a shortfall in smaller one and two-bedroomed houses, particularly in the social sector, a shortfall in larger family housing across all sectors, and the potential for intermediate housing. I commend my hon. Friend for taking that agenda forward in Warrington and highlighting to the council and others precisely what is needed.

Let me briefly mention the regional spatial strategy to give a more regional perspective. The RSS panel report refers to the delivery of an average of 380 dwellings per annum in the borough, and I understand that Warrington is pushing forward with a clear ambition to deliver substantially more, although I recognise that we are talking not only about housing numbers, but about ensuring that we have the right mix of tenure in the right place. I would be honoured if my hon. Friend invited me to Warrington to have a look around, to address the issues and to ensure that the principles of having housing developments in the right place with the right mix and the right community facilities are engaged on the ground. If Warrington is to realise its ambition to deliver half of the new growth as affordable housing, that would represent a step change in performance.

I hope that I have demonstrated that we are fully aware of the affordability problems in Warrington. The Government have provided the borough council with the strategic framework, the powers and the funding and partnership opportunities to make a real impact on this issue in the future. Furthermore, we are committed, through our agencies and Government offices, to working with the local authority, elected representatives and all partners to help Warrington deliver the right kind and mix of housing in the right place as quickly as possible. I hope that the local authority in Warrington, as well as other agencies, is as bold, clear minded, determined and ambitious as my hon. Friend is on behalf of the hard-working, decent families and people of Warrington.

Safe Water (Developing Countries)

2.30 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to be here under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood. I look forward to an interesting debate. I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this topic. I thank in particular the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who cannot be here this afternoon, and the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron) for co-signing my letter asking Mr. Speaker for the chance to debate access to safe water in developing countries.

For us, it is the simplest thing in the world: if we want a drink, we go to a tap or pick up a bottle. It takes only a fraction of a second, and we are all very used to it. Water is one of the handful of substances essential to life—not a convenience, a whim, a habit or a trend, but a necessity. Without water we die, so we need a regular, easily accessible supply of water. If water is not immediately accessible, we must go to find it. None of us in this room has to go far. This debate aims to draw attention to the fact that too many people worldwide do not have that ease and convenience of access, and that what we take for granted is far from being taken for granted all over the world.

World water day, 22 March, is being marked in this place by this debate and an early-day motion tabled by the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore), who is in his place on the Liberal Democrat Benches. This debate and the early-day motion underline some uncomfortable facts. Half the developing world lacks basic sanitation. Nearly 2.5 billion people in the world, roughly two in five of all of us, do not have proper drains or toilets, and 1.1 billion, roughly one in six, do not have access to safe drinking water. Some 1.8 million people, 90 per cent. of whom are children under the age of five, mostly in developing countries, die every year from diseases related to diarrhoea caused by unsafe water and poor sanitation. Water-related disease is the second biggest killer of children worldwide. The average person in the developing world uses 10 litres of water every day—the same amount that we use every time we flush the toilet.

The world's recognition of those uncomfortable truths prompted one of the UN millennium development goals, which is to halve by 2015 the proportion of the world's population without sustainable access to safe drinking water and basic sanitation. However, the UN millennium development goal progress report of 2007 stated that "if trends...continue, the world is likely to miss the target by almost 600 million people. Only Eastern, South-Eastern and Western Asia, Northern Africa and Latin America and the Caribbean are on track to halve the proportion of people without basic sanitation by 2015. All other developing regions have made insufficient progress towards this target. In sub-Saharan Africa, the absolute number of people without access to sanitation actually increased—from 335 million in 1990 to 440 million people by the end of 2004. This number may increase even further if trends do not improve."

For those of us who have been fortunate enough to visit countries in the developing world and work with extraordinary people who cope daily with burdens that we can scarcely comprehend, one of the abiding memories of such a visit is the women and children who line the roads every day as they carry jerry cans and other containers significant distances to find the water that they need for their families for the day. In some circumstances, that parade of graceful, incredibly resourceful people can appear rather romantic—a traditional pattern of life being carried on in the modern world—but in reality it is the face of a disaster. Lack of water is one of the single greatest factors restraining developing nations from fulfilling their true potential, as women and children's time and effort are diverted from other activities to the daily grind of securing water—an act that all of us take for granted. The average distance that women in Africa and Asia walk to collect water is four miles, and the average weight of the water that they carry on their heads is some 20 kg, roughly the same as our baggage allowance in a United Kingdom airport.

That is why, yesterday morning, a collection of hon. Members, religious leaders and some 30 wonderful children from All Souls Church of England primary school in Foley street, London, led by their head teacher, Miss Alex Ascough, assembled in Parliament square to undertake a symbolic four-mile journey to collect water from a fountain in Hyde park, fill some containers and return. We carried nothing like the amount of water that we would actually need for the day.

I asked the House of Commons Library to estimate how much water is used each day on the parliamentary estate, and the Library kindly put together some figures for me. In 2006-07, the estate used 178,084 cu m of water. In working out what that comes to for each of us, one can do various calculations: per Member and peer, per working day or per sitting day. Our best minimum estimate was that all of us—MPs, peers, parliamentary staff, political staff and visitors—use 23 gallons of water every day, 365 days a year. Imagine if we had to carry that every day—fetching it, carrying it, bringing it into our offices—before starting work and getting on with the day.

I commend those who walked with us yesterday, particularly the children. Their behaviour was impeccable, their interest in what we were doing was remarkable and their sense of solidarity with their brothers and sisters in so many places around the world who do the same for real every day was palpable. I thank them and the school for their efforts. The walk was, we hope, the first of hundreds in the "Turn on the Tap" campaign of challenge walks being organised nationwide by the Christian international development organisation, Samaritan's Purse. Churches, community organisations, schools, clubs and individuals are being encouraged to organise similar four-mile walks on or around 10 May this year. The charity hopes that the simple symbolism captured by the walk will encourage more people to direct their aid efforts towards water provision, and it has prepared aids for schools, including lesson plans and charts, to encourage those who wish to organise a walk. I commend Samaritan's Purse for what it is doing and for its efforts to bring it to the attention of the House.

Samaritan's Purse is far from being the only charity involved with water provision. WaterAid, World Vision and a series of leading non-governmental organisations and charities working in development recognise the importance of the provision of water and provide opportunities for people to donate to support such projects. I am sure that the whole House would commend such work and urge individuals and communities to continue to do what they can to support it. Although government has its role in development—I shall come to that shortly—it should not be forgotten that each of us owes an individual responsibility to our neighbours in a rapidly shrinking world. We cannot expect all the burdens to be shouldered by others or by Government. By supporting individual projects and the work of charities and NGOs such as Samaritan's Purse, and by taking part in the "Turn on the Tap" challenge, we are all playing our part.

I should like to say a word about one aspect of the importance of access to water in the developing world, apart from the obvious connection with disease or health, which I think others might cover. The developing world knows that its future does not rely on aid donations, nor has it done so for many years. It relies on countries and their peoples developing their full potential, but if the basics of life are inaccessible, the time spent acquiring them takes people away from the very processes needed to help a country develop in the best possible way.

For children in particular, the absence of water makes a substantial difference to their schooling. Last year, I had the honour of visiting Rwanda with colleagues, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), as part of a substantial project. As we travelled through the country, we saw children taking water to and from places and we visited children in village schools. We saw the quality of some of those schools and of the toilets and sanitation in them. As a result of that, we recognised how important the process of fetching water is.

WELL, the resource centre for water, sanitation and environment health at Loughborough university, says that in Madagascar, for example, 3.5 million school days are lost each year owing to ill health related to poor sanitation, and that children frequently miss school owing to domestic and water-carrying duties. It reports a 12 per cent. increase in Tanzanian school attendance when water is 15 minutes away rather than an hour. Of the 120 million school-age children not in school around the world, the majority are girls. Some 41 per cent. of primary-age girls worldwide not enrolled in school are in south Asia and 35 per cent. are in sub-Saharan Africa. When women and girls have access to water and sanitation, less school time is lost. Where there are working and well maintained separate sanitation facilities for girls, school enrolment increases. In rural Pakistan more than 50 per cent. of girls drop out of school in grades 2 and 3 because the schools do not have toilets.

Many questions surround the provision of water, which cannot and will not always be supplied in exactly the same way. The needs of urban and rural communities are different. There are complex questions about how water is supplied; about the role of non-governmental organisations, charities, Governments and the private sector; about ensuring that a country's resources are best used to provide water; about how utilities are provided all over the world and how those services can be liberalised—that has been raised in world trade talks—and about the extent to which communities can, or should, be required to make a financial contribution towards the water that they need in order to help to provide investment for others. Those are all questions with which Governments and others must wrestle, but the basic underlying facts remain undeniable and must challenge us all.

The debate in this country, which centres on questions such as the provision of bottled or tap water, what we ask for in a restaurant, whether water comes with bubbles or without, and so on, is one of luxury and must seem a world away from the roads lined with women and children as they carry their cans to some hole in the rock from which water is flowing, or to a polluted well where water is not flowing at all. By accidents of birth, they are where they are, and we are here. We cannot put everything right that we would wish to through the stroke of a pen, or the signing of a cheque, but we can individually make a difference by remembering, each time we reach for a bottle or a tap, the difficulties experienced by those who can do neither.

I hope that the "Turn on the Tap" walks will be well supported around the country. I commend Barbara Farquhar, who is promoting the walk for Churches Together in Biggleswade in my constituency on 10 May. I urge my constituents to join her and me in this and similar walks.

Will the Minister provide the Government's assessment of progress towards the millennium goals on water and explain the priority given to promoting water access in the aid and development schemes that we support? This debate has aroused interest already, both inside and outside the House, and I know from conversations with my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) that he takes it very seriously. By and large, the subject unites the House. It is a question of how we, as politicians, as a nation and as individuals, can best deliver. The subject might be complex in the detail of how water is supplied, but in essence it is a simple matter of justice and equity and of ensuring that people all over the world have what we take for granted and have so easily available at the turn of a tap.

2.44 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on securing the debate on what is undoubtedly one of the most important and pressing issues facing the world. I commend him on his speech, his evident commitment and the way in which he set out his arguments. I always listen carefully to arguments in the Chamber, from whomever they come, but it is rare that I agree with every word of an argument made by an Opposition Member—this is one of those occasions. I endorse what he said about the importance of pulling together across the House and other political divisions. I join him in praising all of those seeking to raise awareness and to prompt action on this vital matter.

I shall focus on two things: the work of Oxfam and the catastrophic situation in Gaza. Last week, I was very pleased to welcome the Secretary of State for International Development to Oxford. As part of that visit, we went to Oxfam and discussed with staff their excellent work focusing specifically on the challenge of water distribution. We saw the water distributor that Oxfam sends out to areas in need. It is simple to erect and operate, with buckets designed to be as easy for people to carry on their heads as possible and with tamper-proof lids. As the hon. Gentleman said, that was a humbling reminder of how arduous it is for the women and children who do much of the water collection in poor countries, and of how, in zones of disaster and war, very simple devices to allow people to get the basic essential of water can make an enormous difference to their lives, and indeed to whether they have a life.

The scale of the challenge confronting us is truly enormous, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out. According to UNICEF, more than 1 billion people drink unsafe water and more than 2.6 billion lack basic sanitation facilities. Those factors alone are the world's single biggest cause of disease. Disruption of water supplies in disaster and conflict zones, or because of climate change, is the most immediate and dangerous aftermath of catastrophe, and is a real killer, especially of children and older people.

It is greatly to Oxfam's credit, and to that of all who support it, that its single most distinctive competence in disaster relief and emergency assistance—of course, it has experience in a wide range of areas—is its expertise in assessing and addressing risks to public health, where clean water supply, along with sanitation and hand washing, is absolutely crucial. Of course, to wash hands, enough water is needed to drink first. Oxfam rapid deployment kits—with water tanks, tap stands, buckets and latrine kits, all designed for rapid distribution and easy construction—are saving hundreds of thousands of lives by getting quick help on water and sanitation to the victims of disaster. I congratulate all those involved in that vital work and the public support that makes it possible.

The big challenge for the future is to make better and faster progress towards the millennium development goal—I know that Department for International Development programmes are working on that—and towards installing, improving and replacing permanent water supply systems in poor countries, so that the revolution in public health that Britain enjoyed thanks to Victorian engineers can at last reach everybody.

What assessment have the Minister and his Department made of the effectiveness of aid and loans on infrastructure investment in water supply in poor countries? I was minded to ask that question in light of recent news about the disastrous electricity supply in Nigeria and the way in which investment there seems to have disappeared—some of it through fraud and corruption, no doubt. Are there similar problems elsewhere? Situations will vary enormously from country to country, of course, and we are all aware of instances in which it has proved much more effective to give direct assistance at a Community level or through NGOs, rather than through incompetent or corrupt Governments or local administrations. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend responds to that because we must ensure that the aid and loans which are intended to provide that most basic essential of clean water do so.

One of the worst aspects of the vulnerability of poor people to an absence of water supply is when water and sanitation, which would otherwise be available, are denied as a consequence of conflict. It is one of the most awful manifestations of the impact of military or terrorist activity on civilians, because it could hardly be more calculated to have the worst effects on the most vulnerable—elderly people and children.

I shall focus part of my remarks on the catastrophic situation in Gaza. Before I go any further, however, let me underline that yes, those people responsible should stop firing rockets or deploying suicide bombers against Israel, but that is not the issue in this debate. Before Hamas took over control of Gaza in June last year, Israel had already stopped spare parts for water and sanitation networks entering Gaza. Import restrictions on fuel and water equipment are leaving water-well and sewerage systems in a desperate state. Oxfam staff have visited communities that are flooded knee deep in sewage, with people marooned in upstairs rooms without water or sanitation. Although the overall situation fluctuates, in recent months the Palestinian water authority has estimated that at times as many as 40 per cent. of Gaza's population has been without a water supply.

That effective collective punishment is in breach of the Geneva convention and Israel's obligations under the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend, whom I was also pleased to accompany to Oxfam recently, could tell us what action the Government are taking to relieve that humanitarian catastrophe in Gaza, and specifically whether he and his colleagues in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are intervening to secure entry for £10,000 worth of electrical and mechanical equipment that Oxfam has been trying to get into Gaza for several weeks as a first instalment on hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of water and sanitation equipment, which Oxfam, the World Bank, UNICEF and other humanitarian agencies are desperate to supply. Despite the equipment having been presented for transfer by the Israeli authorities, and apparently having met the transfer requirements, I am told that it keeps getting turned back by the Israeli forces at the border. I ask him and our Government to do all they can to help get that equipment through, and more generally—whether in Gaza, Darfur or anywhere else—to make it clear that water and sanitation must not be deployed as weapons of war.

We face an enormous challenge, but as the hon. Gentleman said, the supply of water is not a matter for political division. As a nation, we—the Government, the people, charities, faith groups and everyone who is concerned about the problem—must pull together to ensure that what really is a basic necessity of life reaches all citizens throughout the world, whatever their circumstances or situation.

2.53 pm

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood, and I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on securing a very important debate. I want to say some things that are, I suppose, political, vaguely negative and possibly even critical of the situation, but in no way do I wish to break the all-party consensus. The challenges are serious and we face them together.

Every good student of British social history knows about the Rev. Thomas Malthus, who famously predicted in the late 18th century that we would all starve and run out of clean water by the mid-19th century, because, from his standpoint, we were growing geometrically population-wise, but, I think, growing arithmetically in terms of our ability to provide additional food, clean water and sanitation. The poor guy has been held up as a laughing stock for the past 230 years by A-level tutors throughout the country, and with no offence to the memory of Mr. Malthus, I should not like to see him rehabilitated in the coming years on the subject of access to clean water throughout the world. I want him to continue to be proved wrong, but I have my fears, because over the next 40 years, the world's population will increase by 50 per cent. and demand for water will increase by more than that. The sad fact is that Malthus may be proven right if we cannot find ways to ensure that all the world's people have access to that basic human right—clean and safe water.

Currently, more than 1 billion people do not have access to enough clean water to meet those basic needs—not the extravagances that we assume we need, but their basic needs. The consequences are dire, because as the hon. Gentleman said, there are 5 billion cases of diarrhoea each year among children in developing countries. That sickness is the second-biggest killer of children in those countries, and in total 2 million people, predominantly young children under five years old, die each year because they do not have access to clean water.

In this country, however, according to a recent BBC "Panorama" study, we spend £2 billion a year on bottled water, despite having access to perfectly clean and safe water—tap water. Dare I say it that in western society we have become so prissy and gullible that now we will buy water only in bottles? Although I am pleased to say that the bottled water before me is not imported, some is, and often it is even imported from developing countries. According to the BBC survey for "Panorama", those countries include Fiji, where one third of the population do not have access to clean and safe drinking water. There is something obscene about that, as I am sure we all agree.

The situation should make us ashamed. It made the world's leaders so ashamed that the millennium development goals were agreed to, including goal 7.3, which aims to halve by 2015 the proportion of people without sustainable access to safe drinking water and basic sanitation. Sadly, as the hon. Gentleman said, current trends show that we are off target in large parts of the world. Indeed, as things stand, we will miss it by a staggering 600 million people, and the tragedy is that in some parts of the developing world, we may even be going backwards. The United Nations millennium development goals report 2007 states that in the largest part of Africa, the absolute number of people without access to sanitation increased from 335 million at the beginning of the 1990s to 440 million just three years ago. That is outrageous, but it is not the only threat that we face, because climate change threatens access to clean water, too.

The UN estimates that as things stand, by 2080 an additional 1.8 billion could live in a water-scarce environment. The challenge is huge and it is not getting any easier. Of the 1.1 billion people who do not have access to clean water, most cannot reach it because the provision simply does not exist. However, there is evidence, sadly, that a large minority of those 1.1 billion people do not have access to clean water because of financial constraints, and they are entirely avoidable.

To support the development of water infrastructure, many private companies have taken advantage of aid from western countries as water supplies have been extensively privatised. Hon. Members will, I hope, be reassured that I am not trying to make a gratuitously ideological point, merely a practical one. I contend that the privatisation of supply has on the whole been a failure. It has been a waste of aid money and a means of making profit from impoverished societies while denying the very poorest people access to clean and safe water.

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, when he was the Secretary of State for International Development, made important steps forward last year when he ensured that additional support was given to enable public utilities to develop water and sanitation infrastructure on a not-for-profit basis in developing countries. However, the European Union continues to promote unfair market solutions, which can hardly be described as either fair trade or free trade. I say so as a strong supporter of that body. The Minister knows about the economic partnership agreements that would allow EU countries to have bilateral arrangements with countries that are essentially their former colonies, and which would formalise a trade-for-aid package that obligated the developing country in the partnership to open its markets to its rich European partner in return for aid. In many cases, the part of the developing country's economy that is of most interest to powerful European companies is its utilities. Therefore, water gets controlled by those aiming to make a profit from it and it is not supplied freely and safely to everybody in need.

To raise the spectre of Malthus again, the great fear is that increased world population will place even greater pressure on this precious resource, especially if it is controlled by self-interested bodies whose motivation is primarily profit. The tensions over water rights will increase. However, the tensions over the ownership of this most natural of resources have been building for many years; it is not a new thing. I suggest that these tensions are going to become worse unless we can ensure fair trade in water supply.

A story was related to me recently of the old farmer from Colorado who, just after world war two, spoke about the local private water company that had effectively removed his water rights and the rights of others in his rural community. I will not attempt the accent, but the farmer said, "Them folks in Denver, they've reversed the laws of nature: they've made water run uphill towards money."

Although we have heard that the current situation, in which a sixth of the world's population is in water need, is dire, my fear is that, without radical change and political will, which includes understanding that water is a public resource—if we do not understand that, things will only get worse—the situation will deteriorate. That is why, in redoubling efforts to meet millennium development goal 7.3, we must face up to some uncomfortable truths and powerful vested interests that lie behind our failure as a world community to meet those targets for access to safe, clean water.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): May I be the latest in the line to congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on his impressive leadership on this issue and the fact that he has secured this debate today? In doing so, he has allowed us the opportunity to reflect on one of the biggest challenges that the world faces and one of the most important issues that we, as a rich developed country, must tackle, and we must help others to tackle it, too.

The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire set out at great length the underlying problems that many people face; I hope that I do not repeat too many of the statistics that he quoted, but some of them bear repeating. He was right to remind us of the gulf between the privileged position that we enjoy in the Palace of Westminster, where water is literally on tap to us for every need and every whim, and the harsh realities of the everyday lives of millions of people around the world.

I also pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who rightly highlighted the work that Oxfam has done. Many other organisations, including NGOs, are also active in this field, but we understand why Oxfam plays such an important part in his view. Like the Ministers to whom he referred, about a year or so ago, I visited Oxfam's headquarters, which is a truly spectacular set-up. It is a symbol, I suppose, of Oxfam's breadth and reach and, as the right hon. Member pointed out, of the important contribution that Oxfam makes in so many different areas.

Without getting sidetracked, may I also endorse the observations of the right hon. Member for Oxford, East about Gaza? Although most of the comments today will be focused on the crisis in sub-Saharan Africa, the situation in Gaza is truly appalling, as we have said in so many debates in the House recently. It seems likely that the Minister will have a generous amount of time to reply to this debate, and I hope that he will take some time to address the points that have been made about Gaza. I have been pressing the Secretary of State for International Development and other Ministers in correspondence about the extent to which they regard Israel's response to the issues in Gaza as proportionate. I invite the Minister today to address that subject, including the comments of the right hon. Member for Oxford, East.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron) has put things in very dramatic terms, and he is right to do so. For all the intellectual humour that there may have been at Mr. Malthus's expense over the centuries, my hon. Friend is right to remind us of the basic prediction that Malthus was making and the problems that we may yet have to laugh on the other side of our face about.

Although I do not accept every aspect of what my hon. Friend said about the role of the private sector, he is right to highlight some of the dangers of private sector involvement. It is important that we strike the right balance. We must get the private sector expertise, initiative and input into tackling problems like the lack of access to safe water and sanitation, but we must not tie developing countries in such a way that they are beholden to the profit motive rather than what is absolutely their first priority: ensuring that they get the access to the water and other resources that they need.

Like the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire, I pay tribute to the staff of Samaritan's Purse, particularly Simon Barrington, Matt Bird and the many others who have been instrumental in bringing Parliament's attention to this issue. As you will know, Mr. Hood, MPs are inundated by invitations to meet groups and organisations, both small and large, from constituents and many others. It takes a special kind of organisation and a special kind of issue to create a stand-out moment that one remembers. Meeting the guys from Samaritan's Purse a few weeks ago, I was immediately impressed both by what they are trying to do as an organisation and, even more crucially, by the fact that they were not puffing their own organisation but focusing on this issue. Through speaking to them and subsequent research, I, for one, have learned a great deal more about the issue, and I am absolutely sure that they are right to expend so much energy on it.

Again like the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire, I pay tribute to those who joined us yesterday on what was thankfully a fairly modest walk. It took place in reasonably clement conditions; they were a bit chillier than we might have expected and a world away from the temperature that the people of sub-Saharan Africa must cope with day in, day out. The walk, from Parliament square to Hyde park, was a good opportunity for us to reflect on what is a daily responsibility for people in many parts of the world.

MPs and Church leaders went on the walk, but I, too, was very impressed by the teachers and particularly the children of All Souls primary school. It is clearly a school that has a very outward-looking focus. I asked the children about what was exciting them at the moment, and they were still full of happy memories of a recent visit to a farm in Wales, which had obviously opened their eyes to very early starts in the morning and to some different realities of life here in Britain. More broadly, however, they were very seized of the issue that we were highlighting yesterday by that walk. We were all grateful when we reached Hyde park that, although there were quite a lot of water containers, there was not one each, so we were able to understand a little of the issue without having to endure all the discomfort and physical pain that would go with making such a walk regularly. Perish the thought that we might have to carry what we as individuals use on this estate every day.

"Turn on the Tap", Samaritan's Purse and many other organisations and campaigns are focusing on this issue and drawing particular attention to the walks that will take place around the country on 10 May. I hope that there will be a lot of support then for the different Church organisations and other organisations across the United Kingdom that are participating in this year's efforts. It is fundamentally important that we, in all our communities across the United Kingdom, are conscious of this issue and do our bit, both to raise awareness and to make a material difference to the lives of people across the world.

We have already heard many of the statistics. None the less, the fact that 1.1 billion people live without access to safe water is something that we should not tolerate. Parliamentary convention requires us to be moderate in our tone in how we conduct these debates, and quite right too, Mr. Hood; I do not intend to challenge that convention. However, the "Turn on the Tap" website quite rightly says that the fact that 1.1 billion people do not have access to safe water is an outrage. We need to get an element of that outrage into the way that we think about the problem that we are trying to tackle.

Hon. Members have already mentioned the millennium development goal, and I am sure that the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster), who is the Conservative shadow Minister for International Development, and the Minister himself will reflect on that goal, too, in due course. Although, as others have said, we are in danger of failing to meet that target, we must remember that it is not to eradicate the problem or to ensure that everyone has access to clean water, but to halve the number of people without access to it. Even if we meet that target, therefore, we will still be only part of the way towards eradicating this terrible problem, and we must not lose sight of that. Not meeting that relatively modest target would therefore be a real failure.

We are talking not just about one development goal; it is interlinked with many others. Indeed, I am sure that a case can be made for each of the millennium development goals to be linked to this issue, because if we are serious about reducing child mortality, promoting better maternal health and achieving universal primary education, we must ensure that people have access to safe water—the issue must be right up there and it needs to be ticked off as having been achieved. As the kids yesterday showed us, taking a few hours out of the day to go and collect water means that people are in no position to study or to lift themselves out of poverty. We must therefore see the issue in the round.

At the same time that we are trying to tackle these issues, we are also fighting the huge problem of climate change. As we try to mitigate the worst effects of bad sanitation and poor access to water, global warming is making the problem more acute—not just in the obvious sense that it is warmer, but because the weather is being disrupted, thus threatening what predictable sources exist. Sadly, water and access to it are increasingly a source of conflict, as we see in Gaza and parts of Africa. We can quickly get into a vicious spiral, moving further away from our goals, rather than closer to them.

The developed world has of course pledged to meet the millennium development goals, which are a wonderful focus for us all, as we seek to reach a point where we are no longer ashamed by the fact that so many people go hungry and do without water and so much else. The European Union has had its water initiative in previous years, and the World Bank has been financing a huge range of projects across the globe through the International Development Association. In recognising the need to speed up our achievement of the development goals that we are talking about, the Government have been central to the call for action, and I hope that the Minister will continue to use that call as a focal point for all countries in the European Union and elsewhere to encourage them to recognise the centrality of those goals.

DFID has increased its funding in this area, and I, like others, pay tribute to the Government for that. How have they used the increased funding during the current year and how will they achieve their target of doubling expenditure by the end of 2011? Increasingly, particularly on health—we debated the international health partnerships in this Chamber a couple of weeks ago—we are looking at how we can focus different channels of aid and assistance through one programme or another to minimise the bureaucracy and ineffectiveness of some of the existing methods of delivery. Does the Minister see some scope for greater co-ordination and focus on the issue?

The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire talked about how much we learned from yesterday's walk, and I repeat his point that it was a humbling experience not only to learn so much from the children who took part, but to reflect on why we were taking the trouble to walk four miles on just one day, as opposed to every day of our lives, and not in the conditions that so many others experience. Like the hon. Gentleman, I urge people in my constituency and in others up and down the land to support the "Turn on the Tap" initiative, not only on 10 May, but in the following weeks, months and years. We should never lose sight of the fact there is an outrage at the root of this issue, and we must do something about it.

3.14 pm

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): It is a pleasure to be able to contribute to this important debate. If I achieve nothing else in my few remarks, I hope that I will underline the fact that sanitation and clean water must go hand in hand. All too often sanitation has been very much an afterthought, and it is vital that the two issues are considered in partnership.

I start, however, by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on securing this important debate. He did a marvellous job of outlining the issues and opening the debate. I also compliment the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on his excellent speech, which highlighted not only the good work of Oxfam in his constituency, but the contribution that other non-governmental organisations make. In addition, I congratulate the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron) on his informed speech, which highlighted the impact that not dealing with this problem can have on health. He also made some interesting remarks about the role of the private sector, to which I intend to return. Finally, the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) once again made a very good speech, and I take this opportunity to commend him on tabling early-day motion 897, which in recent weeks and in the run-up to today's debate has done much to highlight the concern about the issue.

This is a timely debate, not least because 2008 is the United Nations international year of sanitation. As we heard, yesterday saw the "Turn on the Tap" four-mile walk, with my hon. Friend leading the way. That event highlighted the average distance that people have to walk every day to fetch clean water so that they and their families can drink that day. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members highlighted the fact that the distance travelled by such people—the majority of them women—is just one of the many negative impacts that the lack of access to clean water has on people in developing countries. Indeed, the impact on health of the lack of access to clean water and basic sanitation is staggering. Various statistics have been quoted, but the fact that every 20 seconds a child dies because of the lack of clean water and sanitation is frightening. That amounts to 1.6 million children under the age of five dying each year because of unsafe water and inadequate hygiene.

It could be argued that when the international community signed up to the millennium development goals, clean water and sanitation were not seen as sufficiently important to appear as one of the eight main headline goals. The issues before us are covered in MDG 7 on ensuring environmental stability—in MDG 7.3 to be precise. Following the 2002 world summit on sustainable development, however, the world woke up to the crucial role that access to clean water and sanitation can play in helping us to reach the MDGs. In the same year, at the UN special summit on children and the second and third world water forums, three new goals were set for the international community. The first was to halve the proportion of people without sustainable access to safe drinking water by 2015. The second was to halve the proportion of people who do not have direct access to basic sanitation by 2015. The final goal was to equip all schools with sanitation and hand-washing facilities, also by 2015.

Unfortunately, it has been widely recognised, and DFID has been candid in admitting—I therefore hope that the Minister will take this criticism on the chin; I assure him that it is the only criticism that I shall make of his Department today—that just as the world was waking up to the importance of water and sanitation, DFID was, unfortunately, restructured and has been criticised for either taking its eye off the ball. Dr. Darren Saywell of the International Water Association said:

> "A major watershed, in my opinion, in 2002 occurred just after the World Summit on Sustainable Development when DFiD restructured itself and a lot of the impetus and momentum that went into water and sanitation was lost at that time."

To be fair and balanced, however, it is clear from the 2006 White Paper that, having identified sanitation as one of the four essential public services for the MDGs, and having recently increased its financial commitment to water and sanitation, the Department has attempted, and continues to attempt, to re-establish its lead on this issue. I am convinced that, with continued effort, it will do that.

Despite DFID's renewed interest, which I commend, progress towards the goals remains painfully slow. A recently published World Health Organisation report estimated that the sanitation component of the MDG sanitation targets faces

> "a projected shortfall of 550 million people in 2015 from target achievement."

As of today—the figures are worth repeating—an estimated 1.1 billion people still do not have access to improved water supplies, and 2.4 billion do not have access to any type of improved sanitation. I am sure that the Minister agrees that that simply is not good enough.

It would cost an estimated $42 billion to achieve the goal of providing clean water to half of those who currently go without it, and $322 billion to maintain the current clean water system. Likewise, it would cost $142 billion to halve the number of people who do not have access to basic sanitation, and $216 billion to maintain the current sanitation systems in developing nations. That adds up to spending a staggering $72 billion a year up to 2015 to achieve those goals. Although I commend DFID's uplift in spending, with figures like those, it will take a combined effort from all the nations that have signed up to achieve those important goals. I hope that whichever party is in power, the UK will continue to take the lead.

Last year's report by the Select Committee on International Development, however, highlighted the fact that money alone will neither provide toilets and taps for the billions of people who currently lack access, nor drive the demand and change of behaviour that are required to provide sustainable uptake. The rush to spend money can have unintended consequences, of which I have personal experience. In 2006, I spent some time as a military engineer in Helmand, where I worked alongside DFID to deliver quick impact projects. In our desire to deliver those projects, to show people on the ground how the Government were beginning to make a difference to their lives, we made mistakes. I have raised this issue before in the House. We dug so many new wells in Helmand province without conducting proper water surveys that we ended up lowering the water table, and as a result the ancient karazes that brought water off the mountains no longer flowed. That is a clear example of how we can rush in and spend money to help a community, but instead have a long-lasting negative impact on that community. I hope that we have learned from such lessons.

Last week, I was in Guatemala—as an aside, I must tell the Minister that many non-governmental organisations there fear that DFID is turning its back on that country—where I was fascinated by a water project there. A local community managed to raise enough money to bring a 35 km pipeline into its village. Unfortunately, however, it was forced to bring the water through surrounding communities, many of whom were jealous that the pipeline was going through their communities but not serving them. The project took three years to be established because communities along the pipeline were simply smashing the pipe out of jealousy because they were angry that they had no access to the water it carried, while other communities did.

What have we done and what should we be doing? DFID's website states that the targets

> "are central to DFID's approach to poverty reduction and sustainable development."

It also recognises that, on current trends, the > "sanitation target will be missed in both Africa and Asia by almost one billion people."

To be fair, the rhetoric is good, but actions and global leadership are needed if we are to achieve what we set out to do. DFID is taking steps in the right direction: it has committed to increase its spending on essential public services such as water, sanitation, health, education and social protection in at least half of the UK's direct support programmes in developing countries. In addition, as I have said, it will double its support for the provision of water and sanitation in sub-Saharan Africa to £95 million a year by 2007-08, and more than double funding again to £200 million by 2010-11. Perhaps the Minister will confirm those figures and give an update on our progress toward the 2010-11 figure.

We must also consider carefully how the private sector can help in delivering essential services such as water. I return to the point that the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale made. It might well be damaging for water supply to remain a monopoly of the state in countries where the state is manifestly failing to deliver adequate services to its citizens. Well managed privatisation could help to expand access to clean water and to save lives if—I emphasise "if"—there is proper supervision, regulatory bodies and contract enforcement. What is the Minister's assessment of the merits of greater private sector participation in service delivery in developing countries?

Aid predictability is one concern that is repeatedly raised with me when I visit NGOs in the field, as in Guatemala last week. Of course, political situations change in countries, and that may affect funding streams. In Nepal, which I hope to visit next month to monitor the elections, the Department has cut its water and sanitation budget from £4 million in 2003 to just £1.9 million in 2007-08. Its failure to provide long-term, predictable and co-ordinated finance in those sectors is clearly detrimental to achieving success in such projects. What steps is the Minister taking to meet the criticisms of his Department in that regard?

The Select Committee has made it clear that we must do more than improve the predictability of funding streams. The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale highlighted some of the problems of tackling killer diseases. Spending money effectively can achieve disproportionate results in the provision of access to clean water and sanitation in developing nations, but, as I have highlighted, money is not the solution to everything. Unfortunately there remain significant barriers to progress on sanitation. For example, access to clean water and basic sanitation seldom features prominently on national political agendas, and people still attach a higher priority to water than to sanitation, even though the two go hand in hand. Unfortunately, factors such as prestige and convenience rank above health as a motivation for people seeking improved sanitation.

The interconnecting nature of the MDGs has been highlighted, not least by the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk, but by helping to provide clean water and basic sanitation, we can provide a catalyst unlike any other to build a platform from which to achieve other MDGs. For example, we can do a huge amount towards MDGs 2 and 3—achieving universal primary education and promoting gender equality and empowering women. If young girls and women do not have to walk four miles every day, they are more likely to have the opportunity to partake in some sort of educational programme. In turn, as the Select Committee points out, girls who have been educated have improved maternal health, which relates to MDG 5, and are twice as likely to stay safe from AIDS, which relates to MDG 6. Of course, improved access to clean water would also help to reduce diarrhoea and water-borne diseases, thus reducing child mortality by an estimated 30 per cent., which relates to MDG 4.

Finally, I want to touch on the links between water and agriculture, which is the biggest consumer of water in developing countries, accounting for 70 to 90 per cent. of water consumption. As water availability becomes increasingly constrained, perhaps as a result of climate change or population growth, countries will have to make increasingly difficult decisions on how much water they can afford to use for agriculture. However, as several NGOs have pointed out, this appears to be the one area that DFID's water strategy still does not address adequately. When he winds up the debate, will the Minister touch on that important matter and, in particular, say how his Department's water strategy links with helping to achieving MDG 1, which seeks to halve the number of people who suffer from hunger?

In conclusion, it is clear from today's debate that there is consensus across the House that although we are definitely moving in the right direction, there is slight frustration at the pace of progress. More can—indeed, must—be done if our aim of meeting all the MDGs by 2015 is to be a realistic one. I end with a quote from the former South African Development Minister, Ronnie Kasrils, who said:

"Water is the source of life. We cannot think about developing our people if we fail to provide them with a basic supply of water".

3.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I join others in congratulating the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on securing the debate in tandem with the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Tim Farron) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). It is helpful that in the run-up to world water day on 22 March we have the opportunity to debate water and sanitation.

I join the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire in congratulating those who organised the walk and those who took part in it—the religious leaders, parliamentarians and the children and teachers of All Souls school. I regret that I was not able to take part, but I join him in commending the work of Samaritan's Purse in organising the "Turn on the Tap" walks. I join others in encouraging the many different walks that will be organised on 10 May and hope that they have as much support as possible from our constituents.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who has the Oxfam headquarters in his constituency, rightly highlighted the excellent work that Oxfam does on water and sanitation. He raised a series of other points that I will return to.

The hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale rightly noted the huge significance of making progress in this area for improving health and achieving millennium development goals. He also rightly raised the issue of population growth. I had a sense of the dramatic relationship between population growth and a lack of access to water when I visited Yemen and talked to Ministers in the capital, Sana'a, about the huge challenges that they face. The population of Sana'a continues to grow ever greater and engineers are having to dig ever deeper to find water resources for the people of the capital. Such is the pressure on water resources that some in Yemen are starting to wonder whether the capital will have to be moved to the coast.

The hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) raised a series of questions that I will come to, some of which echoed those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East.

The hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) raised two issues that I want to address at the beginning of my remarks. He spoke of the importance of making progress on water and sanitation if we are to ensure that much of the discrimination that girls and women face in developing countries is addressed so that girls, for example, get access to school. From one of my visits to northern Malawi, I remember the experience of a grandmother who looked after a series of AIDS orphans in her village. She had to walk or organise the children to walk over a mile each way to get water from the nearest river. He also rightly raised the importance of the international year of sanitation in giving focus to the need for change to the current shocking lack of access to good sanitation for people in developing countries.

My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for International Development, now Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, sought in November 2006 to galvanise the international community to give greater attention to water and sanitation when he published the case for a global action plan on it. He set out five key targets for progress on water and sanitation across the developing world. I will come on to say where we have got to on those five elements.

In seeking to reassure the House that the Department for International Development continues to take this issue seriously, I draw attention to the water resources forum that we held yesterday, with not only our own staff, but academic experts, civil society representatives who are working on these issues, UN organisations and a variety of other stakeholders. We share the view of all hon. Members who have spoken of the essential truth that access to safe, affordable water is a human right. We share the outrage of the House that in this day and age, more than 1 billion people still do not have safe water to drink. Indeed, half of the populations in developing countries do not have access to even a basic toilet. I share the resolve of hon. Members that we simply cannot allow that to continue.

We believe that we will meet our existing promises on spending and the future promises that have been made going forward to 2010-11. To recap, in March 2005, we announced that we would double spending on water and sanitation in Africa from £47.5 million to £95 million by 2007-08. Based on current estimates, we will meet that target. The hon. Gentleman alluded to the fact that we also said that we would double that spending by 2010-11 to achieve a figure of £200 million. It is early days for spending in Africa, but I am confident that we will meet that target.

Alistair Burt: I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which he is dealing with the issues that have been raised. However, no one is querying the amount of money that is being spent; that is not the issue. The issue is whether there is evidence—bearing in mind the progress report on the millennium development goals—that the money is being spent effectively and whether we are moving towards our targets. The good will and the intentions of the world community cannot be doubted, but we must ensure that progress is made, and in view of the progress report, there is a query about that. For all the money being spent, is the Minister confident that enough change has been made in how it is being spent and in the processes of providing water, so that there will be better progress towards meeting the target and we do not fall short of it?

Mr. Thomas: I cannot currently give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. We are barely on track to meet the millennium development goal on water and we are certainly off track in achieving the target on sanitation. As the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes alluded to, sub-Saharan Africa is seriously off track against the water and sanitation targets. It is that lack of progress that my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State sought to challenge in setting out the case for more global action on water and sanitation.

To give the House hope that the situation will continue to change, I give the example that in the 15 years from 1990 to 2005, more than 1.2 billion people gained access to water supply and sanitation services. We know that progress has happened and that it is achievable when the Governments of developing countries, international donors and a variety of other players in developing countries work together to accelerate progress. I hope to say a little about how some of the resources that we are spending in developing countries have made progress and will make further progress.

I will briefly dwell on some of the broader points that have been raised by hon. Members in noting that simply providing safe drinking water and better sanitation would drastically cut the needless loss of life in poor countries. As I said, the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale was right to highlight that poor people are the least able to deal with the ill health that is caused by unsafe water and how a vicious circle is often created. The water used by poor people is too often contaminated or polluted. That can result in sickness and the medical costs increase the level of debt that they experience, making them less likely to be able to work or send their children to school. Improved access to water and sanitation breaks that cycle. Indeed, hon. Members alluded to the huge economic benefits of access to safe water. Millions of working days are saved and can be achieved, and millions of children, particularly girls, can attend school, with all the resulting economic benefits for the country, as well as the individual. As I said, it is women and girls who have the biggest responsibilities for providing water for drinking and cooking, and for ensuring family hygiene. We need to continue to tackle that implicit discrimination.

It is worth noting a point which I do not believe has surfaced in the debate thus far. By 2025, more than two thirds of the world's population will live in water-stressed countries, so the way in which water is shared and used will be critical. The importance of that will be further heightened by an increasing population, by the urbanisation that is taking place, by the increased economic growth that is needed and by the growing challenge of climate change. All those factors will combine to make stress around access to water all the more important. Therefore, we must work with countries to help them strike the right balance between water for growth, for people to live healthy and productive lives, and, crucially, for keeping ecosystems in good shape. If people cannot do that, their long-term development will be threatened.

In order to do that, change is needed, not just within the international community but within developing countries as well. Some developing country Governments, but by no means all, do not pay enough attention to what poor people in their country say, or respond to their needs. As a result, they do not provide enough finance for water or ensure that it is not just the wealthy, the influential and the privileged who are well served in respect of access to water and good sanitation. All too often, we see in some developing countries that the funds to maintain water and sanitation systems and to keep them operating are simply not in place. Forty per cent. of the boreholes in Africa are not working simply because they need to be repaired. They could provide access to water, but they do not because they have not been repaired. That speaks to a broader point about the lack of good governance in water sectors in developing countries. That is a key point on which we are working.

I alluded to the call that my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State made in November 2006. In essence, he called for five key elements—five "ones"—to change. At the international level, he called for one international monitoring report and for one international meeting to chart progress on access to water and sanitation, and to explore what else needed doing. In developing countries, he called for one national water and sanitation plan—not a plan for how each donor would spend their money, but one clear national water and sanitation plan that everybody would get behind.

My right hon. Friend also made clear the need for all the different donors in country to come behind the leadership of one clearly designated UN agency, be it UNICEF, the World Health Organisation or something else, and support the water plan. One UN agency would take the lead.

In country, there should be one water and sanitation monitoring group of donors—not groups of donors deciding what they thought needed to happen, but all donors coming together. That may seem like common sense to hon. Members, but the sad reality is that it has not happened in many countries to date. There has often been a series of international meetings and a series of reports, and, in some years, no report. We are funding the first international monitoring report, which should be published shortly. We expect to have an opportunity to debate its implications at an international meeting that will take place in September.

In respect of the three ones principle, we are working in Ethiopia, Sierra Leone, Tanzania, Mozambique and Bangladesh in supporting one national water and sanitation plan, seeking one UN agency to take the lead and ensuring that there is only one meeting of donors in country. In addition, we have identified three critical areas for progress over the next 12 months.

Sanitation has been a taboo issue for too long. That point was made by the UN Secretary-General and was repeated yesterday at the water resources forum. International donors need to do more about sanitation both internationally and in developing countries directly. We are directly supporting the international year of sanitation to make that happen.

We need to do more to manage water resources better, and we will prioritise resources and time to achieve that purpose. We must consider how we can ensure that water services are better delivered to the poor. That will be done partly through the three ones principle that I alluded to, but also by ensuring that money goes directly to where it is needed.

I shall give some examples of the progress that we are making and the benefits that are being achieved with British development assistance, provided by my Department. We have approved new funding of some £75 million over five years for water and sanitation in Ethiopia. We are confident that some 3.2 million Ethiopians will benefit from that spend, but between now and 2015, 300,000 more people need to get clean water and 450,000 more people need to get basic sanitation every day if we are to meet the millennium development goals. That is a huge challenge for the international community, and it is why, when the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire intervened on me, I could not give him complete confidence that we would meet the targets. However, we seek to do everything that we can to raise the importance of these issues.

A new global sanitation fund has been launched, in part as a result of the leadership of the WHO, to try to help communities build toilets and improve hygiene, and we have committed £1.5 million over the next three years to that fund. Other donors have pledged funding as well, and we will work on maximising the impact of the fund.

I mentioned that we need to do more about water resources. Yesterday, at the water resources forum, I was able to confirm our continuing support for the Nile basin initiative, which is an example of co-operation to manage shared waters, and to encourage the peace and stability that underpin economic growth in the region. The countries that are part of the Nile basin have a combined population of some 300 million, and they are among the poorest and most water-starved people in the world.

Hon. Members who know a little about the Nile basin will recognise that there is a history of tension between the countries in the area and that water has been the source of some of that tension. Good water-basin management in the region is essential, given the importance of climate change, to ensure that those countries continue to work together. We have committed £6 million to date to the Nile basin initiative, and yesterday, I was able to pledge a further £8 million to ensure that the initiative continues.

Similarly, many hon. Members will have seen the weekend coverage of the pace of change in the melting of Himalayan glaciers. They provide water for 1.6 billion people, and it is estimated that climate change could cause them to disappear in as little as 25 years, which is within the lifetime of most of us in the Chamber. Countries must work together to determine how they can manage and better share the water resources in those areas. It is a volatile region, and we want to ensure that water is not a source of conflict or volatility. A south Asia water initiative has been launched to catalyse greater co-operation between countries, and we have pledged £500,000 to that initiative.

Alistair Burt: May I pick up a matter that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Milton Keynes and the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale raised? Do the Government have an ideological position on the privatisation and liberalisation of water resources, or do they take a pragmatic view? I am aware that there are ideological extremes on both sides. Some NGOs and others categorically refuse to accept any privatisation, and some on the free market side propound that at every step. I have been convinced by neither political extreme, and I hope that the Minister takes a practical view. Do the Government have an ideological position on the increasingly important question of how, with all the money and projects, those resources are managed between the public and private sectors to deliver supplies?

Mr. Thomas: No, the Government do not have an ideological position on whether the private, public or third sector delivers water access. We work with all three sectors in different forums, from NGOs and public utilities to private water providers, as well as international and, much more at the moment, local private bodies. I perhaps take issue with the hon. Gentleman's question, because I believe that there is not enough financing for water supply and sanitation at the moment. We must galvanise much more interest from private and third sector organisations, such as NGOs and international organisations, as well as aid donors generally, if we are to maintain progress to achieve the target.

Where public utilities are in place and Governments decide to bring in the private sector, the quality of regulation by Governments directly in country will determine the effectiveness of those responses. That relates to my point about the importance of our continuing to focus on the governance of the water sector, how regulation is achieved and ensuring that it is delivered effectively in the interests of the poorest people.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East asked about the water supply in Gaza. I confirm that we have committed some £1.5 million to the rehabilitation of Palestinian water and sanitation services through the temporary international mechanism. We estimate that that will benefit up to 1.5 million people by funding essential operations, maintenance and repair work.

My right hon. Friend highlighted a specific difficulty that Oxfam is having with the delivery of water-related equipment to the Palestinian territories. I hope that he understands that I must look into the matter. I will take it up with my Foreign Office colleagues, and write to him to explain the steps that we are taking to address Oxfam's problems.

I hope that I have addressed the points made by the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale about population growth. I recognise that it is a huge issue.

On the role of the private sector, as I indicated to the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire, the Government do not have an ideological view. There are examples of the international private sector being a considerable force for good, but there are also examples of it going wrong. The lesson that I draw from that is that we must look at what works, understand the lessons when things have gone wrong and ensure that they do not happen again. This is about the quality of regulation in country, which is why delivering better governance of the water sector through our aid is important.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the role of economic partnership agreements. They will be a force for good in helping to achieve economic growth. I spent a considerable amount of time talking to trade Ministers from the four African regions and the Caribbean region about how EPAs are being implemented in practice and how the negotiations are going. All the trade Ministers to whom I spoke wanted to sign an economic partnership agreement. Some had specific concerns about particular issues, and we and the Commission are seeking to address those concerns in the run-up to the 31 December deadline. I believe that EPAs for those countries that do not have least developed country status will deliver significant benefits by allowing duty and quota-free access for goods from those countries into European markets, and the simplified rules of origin will make a substantial difference.

The hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk asked whether I thought that Israel's response was proportionate. He will have noted the response of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to his questions last week, and the joint work of the Secretary of State and the Foreign Secretary in highlighting to Israel when we have thought that their actions were not proportionate.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the EU water facility, which, after some initial problems, is now working effectively and bringing greater attention to water and sanitation. It has considerable potential further down the line.

The Prime Minister has described the situation this year—half way to the millennium development goals—as an MDG emergency. We face huge challenges on water and sanitation, but we are making progress in achieving all the millennium development goals. We are seeking to work with a range of countries internationally to reignite interest and momentum in the efforts to achieve those goals. That effort will climax at a meeting at the UN General Assembly in September, and we are working with a substantial number of European colleagues.

The hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes raised the important issue of the predictability of funding streams. That is one reason why, in the right circumstances, budget support is essential. NGOs, such as WaterAid, Oxfam and Samaritan's Purse, are a huge force for good in the areas in which they work; but if we want every area in country to have good access to water and sanitation, good schools and good health care facilities, we must build up the ability and capacity of Governments in developing countries to deliver that. That is why budget support is important, albeit in the right circumstances.

This has been an important debate, given the proximity of world water day. I hope that, with our water policy update, which we published yesterday, right hon. and hon. Members will be confident that we are continuing to deliver on our promises.

Forestry Commission

4 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): This debate is taking place at the same time as the major debate in the main Chamber on post office closures. Both debates have a common theme: the perceived unwillingness of public corporations—in the main Chamber debate the Post Office and in this Chamber's debate the Forestry Commission—to listen to and respond to public concerns and to be properly accountable. I have initiated this debate to seek the intervention of the Minster, whom I welcome to her place, on a local issue of vital importance to my constituents which, if left unaddressed, will undermine the good relationship between the Forestry Commission and the people of east Dorset.

I start with a quote from the Forestry Commission's website. The Forestry Commission states that in its remit it has "a commitment to make local communities a priority in the way public forests are managed... England's Forestry Minister pledged that local people will have an even greater involvement in decisions which affect their community."

When the Minister has heard what I have to say, I hope that she will reach the same conclusion as I have that that pledge, made in her name, is not being delivered.

Last summer, the Forestry Commission invited tenders for a contractor to extend the annual programme of forest concerts. It included reference to a potential new site in Moors valley in east Dorset. At Moors valley there is a very successful country park, run by the district council in partnership with the Forestry Commission. In January, however, it became apparent that the proposal was not to use the existing country park, but to create a completely new, purpose-built concert venue for 5,000 spectators and 2,000 cars by cutting down 15 acres of woodland in the heart of Ringwood forest.

Ringwood forest, unlike a lot of other concert venues used by the Forestry Commission, is surprisingly close to a residential neighbourhood. That is probably why there has been such reaction to the proposal, which is rather different to the reaction to similar Forestry Commission proposals. When local people heard about the proposal through their parish council, their reaction was one of horror and stunned disbelief. Lots of questions were asked, such as "Why does the Forestry Commission wish to destroy the peace and tranquillity of Ringwood forest at summer weekends and subject local residents to the noise and nuisance generated by rock concerts?"

The initial justification, gleaned from the Forestry Commission website, was a desire "to take the importance of woodlands to new audiences and make them relevant to people in new ways."

In the vicinity of Moors valley, Ringwood forest, Avon heath country park and the New Forest, there is no need to invite people to the forest to find new relevance in the importance of woodlands. People are already aware of that, and they have plenty of opportunities for public access and recreation. That comment on the website as a justification for the proposal was greeted with a lot of scepticism. Local people pointed out that Somerley park, which is less than two miles from the proposed venue, is an existing privately owned facility at which concerts have been successfully held. It also has the advantage of better and safer vehicle access, without the need to cut down 15 acres of woodland.

In the past few weeks, the horror, disbelief and scepticism has turned to intense anger. It is impossible to overstate the extent to which local people are incensed by the proposed intrusion into their treasured local forest environment. The St. Leonards and St. Ives parish council convened an extraordinary general meeting, which was packed to overflowing, with more than 300 people inside the hall and others standing outside in the rain. The Forestry Commission representative failed to answer the concerns raised. At the end of the meeting, a vote was taken that overwhelmingly rejected the proposals. By overwhelming, I mean that two people supported the Forestry Commission proposal.

The Forestry Commission has manifestly failed to address the inconsistencies inherent in its proposal—for example, the incompatibility of removing 15 acres of forest to create a car park for 2,000 cars with the Forestry Commission's climate change credentials. I am sure that the Minister is as concerned about that as I am. The Forestry Commission has said that no alternative venues are available, but we know that there are. The Forestry Commission has asserted that it wants to work closely with local people, yet it has made such an unpopular proposal.

On 6 March, the chairman of the Forestry Commission responded to a letter that I sent to him on 13 February. He delayed his response to enable him to report the outcome of the meeting. However, it will not surprise you, Mr. Hood, to learn that I had already received an extensive report on that meeting. The chairman said that the public meeting

"did confirm that there was considerable opposition to the proposal, but the issues raised were not unexpected."

He said that other possible sites for a concert venue had been considered, but land tenure, among other things, was a problem. The problem was that the other sites for concerts, including ones to which I have already referred, were not owned by the Forestry Commission—in other words, the Forestry Commission would not be able to profit from the activities that took place on those sites. The Minister smiles knowingly. Perhaps she recalls a time when, under a Conservative Government, there was discussion about the possibility of privatising the Forestry Commission. The strongest argument against such a privatisation was that it would lead to all sorts of undesirable commercial activities if the forests were taken into private ownership. Ironically, that is exactly what seems to be happening under the Forestry Commission while it still remains a nationalised body.

On the number of concerts, which was mentioned in my letter, the chairman of the Forestry Commission offered some reassurance, saying:

"Even on our most popular and longest established venues, they only host two weekends of concert events each year."

He omitted to say that three venues—Delamere, Thetford and Cannock Chase—now have weekend festivals that go on for three days: Friday, Saturday and Sunday. That may not be so bad when people do not live close to a venue—some of those forests, Thetford in particular, are very large and dense—but a three-day festival at the Ringwood forest site would give local residents the prospect of a long weekend of hell.

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

The chairman of the Forestry Commission went on to say:

"At the present time we have not heard any overriding reason why we should not continue with our plans in view of the benefits that the wider community stands to derive from the project including the reinvestment of the revenue generated back into improving the land we manage."

On examination, however, it appears that the only benefit to the wider community is the profit that the Forestry Commission will make. There is no benefit to the local people in providing them with a concert venue when they already have one. I do not know how familiar the Minister is with the location, but it is not too far to the Bournemouth International Centre, which hosts the largest rock concerts in the country, and it is very close to a lot of other open-air stadiums.

If the only issue for the Forestry Commission is profit, how much will it make? Yesterday, a Forestry Commission staff member told a meeting in Verwood that for just one concert the gross income would be £150,000—from selling 5,000 tickets at £30 each—and that the net profit would be £15,000. My constituents are not spoilsports. They are proud to host round 1 of the Pirelli Motor Sports Association National Gravel Rally championship, which took place over 40 miles of Forestry Commission roads largely in my constituency in February this year, as it has for the past 20 years. The commission benefits from the event because it charges £600 per mile for the use of its forest roads, making a profit of £24,000. The event is called the Rallye Sunseeker—it is sponsored by Dorset's largest employer—but it takes place in the winter and, in contrast to the proposal for Ringwood forest, it is designed to work with the needs and desires of local people. The money raised by the commission from the event is meant to be reinvested in the locality, although I have been unable to find any hard evidence that that has happened.

The commission also profits from the Moors valley car park, the income from which is shared with East Dorset district council, so it is already making profits or income from commercial activities in my constituency, if indeed money is the root of the problem. At a meeting, Mr. Rothnie of the Forestry Commission said that it is all about money. He said that if he could not raise the money from the proposed project, he would have to raise it from somewhere else. The question is, is it worth alienating local people for the sake of £10,000 or £15,000 per concert? I think not.

A letter sent to Mr. Rothnie by a local resident, Dr. Jonathan Edwards, who is a member of the parish council, asks:

"Is it worth alienating the local community for such a sum? I have also indicated that should the Forestry Commission listen to the local residents and take their feelings into account and withdraw their proposal, I would be prepared"— as I am sure others would—

"to get together...and form a local residents group in order to find ways of generating income from activities which do not involve concerts...I hope we can bring this matter to a satisfactory conclusion for all concerned and move on in a constructive manner rather than compound the divisions between us in a long and protracted fight through the licensing and appeals process".

The Minister may be aware that such a long and bitter dispute involving licensing is exactly what happened in Cannock Chase. In the end, it cost the Forestry Commission £50,000 and the local council £25,000 in fees and generated a lot of animosity. We do not want that to happen in this case; instead, we want to get people talking to each other to find a common way forward.

The commission has discovered that there is a lot more money to be made out of promoting rock concerts than from planting and managing woodland. I am not surprised or concerned about that. However, one of the pop concerts being organised is Status Quo, and I was concerned to read that tickets for the Cannock Chase concert that were put on sale for around £30 in January and February are now on sale on the web black market for £80 or £90. That sort of activity causes my constituents a lot of concern. If there is a concert that is so popular and over-subscribed that people will do anything to get into it, what is the point of having a concert in a venue that is not self-contained, as many venues are, and that will generate an enormous amount of traffic from all over the country, to the detriment of local amenities?

There is stunned disbelief at the proposal and intense anger and frustration at the seeming intransigence of the Forestry Commission. I am going to see Mr. Seddon, the deputy surveyor of the New Forest next week. I hope, in the light of what the Minister says, that the meeting will be held in a constructive spirit and that there will be a desire to find an alternative way to raise funds for the commission locally, in addition to what it already raises. Otherwise, I fear that the prospects of the people of east Dorset working as closely with the commission in future as they have in past will be damaged. I look forward to hearing what the Minister is able to say to pour oil on troubled waters.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Joan Ruddock): I congratulate the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) on obtaining the debate, which is on an important subject and of great concern to his constituents. The picture he painted was so grim that I have difficulty promising to pour oil on troubled waters, but I shall attempt to put the rock concert proposal, as he called it, into some context.

The management of a 260,000 hectare public forest estate is a significant part of the commission's work. It aims to manage that on behalf of the nation sustainably, to contribute to the economic, social and environmental objectives of the Government's strategy for England's trees, woods and forests. It is not primarily a commercial enterprise; it carries out commercial activities, but it is also required to provide a wide range of public benefits. It might be helpful if I mention some examples of those benefits.

The commission is England's largest provider of countryside recreational opportunities. Almost the entire forest estate is dedicated for public access on foot in perpetuity under the provisions of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. It has a significant role in enhancing biodiversity by working to bring into and maintain in a favourable condition more than 64,000 hectares of sites of special scientific interest on the estates. It makes great efforts to improve the ancient woodland—one of our most valuable habitats—through the removal of non-native conifers and the regeneration of native broadleaf trees. It restores open habitats, including lowland heath and upland mires, where that can make a greater contribution to enhancing biodiversity than the plantations that are being removed.

Over the years, the commission has changed, as have its funding sources, which include Government funding, commercial activities, partnerships and the sale of surplus assets, the proceeds of which have been reinvested. As the hon. Gentleman knows, all Departments are required to maximise the return on their assets, consistent with their objectives. The commission is allowed to sell areas for development when that is in the public interest, the pursuit of which objective has resulted in income of £30 million over the past 10 years, which is significant. The sale of sustainably harvested, independently certified timber, for example, is running at around 1.5 million cu m per year, which makes up around half of the commission's operational income, so it is not true that it has decided that it is more profitable to organise rock concerts than to deal with the proper business of the woodlands.

The remainder of the commercial income comes from a wide variety of sources, as we would expect of any major landowner that seeks to make good use of the assets at its disposal. There are some recreational activities that have a commercial element, including mountain biking for which bike hire franchises are let. In addition, there are catering franchises, shops at visitor centres and, of course, an annual series of live music concerts.

That brings me to the heart of the debate: the proposal to create an events area in Ringwood forest, which is planned to be used on one weekend a year for live music and for the occasional community event. I reassure the hon. Gentleman that there are no weekend festivals such as he described at Forestry Commission venues. No facilities are provided for people staying overnight at any of the venues at which it holds concerts. In fact, the sites that he mentioned have three separate events; there is no continuous festival, and there are no plans for one.

Mr. Chope: Does the Minister accept that although there may not be a festival similar to the Glastonbury or Isle of Wight festivals, having three rock concerts on successive evenings means that the weekend becomes a festival? That means that people come to the area, camp out overnight and cause nuisance. Is that not the problem?

Joan Ruddock: I have absolutely no evidence that that is what happens or of any complaints, but I shall check, and if there is any information that I can usefully share with the hon. Gentleman on that point, I shall be happy to do so.

Live music in the forest is not new. The commission has been hosting concerts for the past seven years and has a good record of understanding how to do so in a way that is compatible with the interests of the forest and with being a good neighbour. Last year, more than 120,000 people enjoyed a concert programme spread over seven Forestry Commission venues around the country.

It is not right to claim that Ringwood forest was chosen at random, as though proper consideration were not given to the decision. As the hon. Gentleman said, other sites were examined, including Moors valley. I understand that the decision about Moors valley was based on two factors: the country park is already extremely busy, so it would have been difficult to accommodate additional events, and it would be difficult to separate a concert event from the users going about their normal visits to the country park. For that reason, the consideration ended in the decision that that would not be an appropriate venue.

Ringwood forest, however, is entirely appropriate for many reasons. The final choice took into account the experiences of other venues and the planned future management of the forest. That is an important point, because there is always change in forests, and there are always management considerations. In the case of Ringwood, that includes moving from the existing plantations to a more diverse mixture of pines and native woodland, interspersed with open space, including swathes of heathland. In that forest, as in many others, trees are cut down for proper management reasons, to improve the status and condition of the forest.

The site also has particularly good road access, adequate drainage and natural orientation that will allow the stage to face away from the main residential areas. As the hon. Gentleman said, there is also space to accommodate the short-term parking of up to 2,000 cars. I examined the proposal carefully and had a map so that I could examine the major roads and connections in the area and consider how people arriving on the major roads would connect with roads into the forest. The vision is not of hundreds or thousands of cars passing through small villages. If people come from the neighbouring cities, as we anticipate, they will be able to come on a main road and enter the forest in ways that should be perfectly acceptable to people in the neighbourhood.

Mr. Chope: Does the Minister realise that in the summer, when it is proposed to hold the concerts, the A31 between Southampton and Ringwood is normally completely chock-a-block, as are most of the roads in the New Forest—so much so that the New Forest show is not held at the weekend? What might look perfectly alright on the map is very different in reality. Why do we have to have a rock concert venue in Ringwood forest, given that the local people are so strongly against it?

Joan Ruddock: Any forest cannot be the concern only of the people most local to it. Throughout the whole country, forests are available to people from beyond the local area. It is essential that people from further afield, particularly from cities, have the opportunity to visit our forests.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): It is a great pleasure for me to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood.

My hon. Friend the Minister's point is surely obvious. In the north-east, we have Kielder forest and Hamsterley forest, which are being run commercially through activities such as mountain biking. We are also trying to develop a Great North forest. The Forestry Commission's role is to provide funds to supplement such developments, so clearly what is happening in Ringwood is positive for the rest of the country.

Joan Ruddock: I am grateful for that intervention, which fits well with what I have said to the hon. Member for Christchurch. We have to see the forest as a resource for people beyond the local area. Of course, we do not want the Forestry Commission to be a bad neighbour, and we want to talk to local people and try to convince them of what we have become convinced of through careful consideration: that the proposal will not cause the chaos and noise that the hon. Gentleman talked about when he referred to a long weekend of hell and to horror and stunned disbelief. Those are exaggerated expressions. Yes, live music causes noise, but woodland helps to absorb the noise, and sophisticated sound systems are used to minimise the risk of disturbance away from the site. The nearest homes, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, are actually 1 km away from where the stage will be sited.

The hon. Gentleman talked about chaos on the roads, but people in this country travel to venues and make visits throughout the summer. Yes, roads are congested, but that is not a reason not to have one event on one weekend. There is congestion throughout the country for many reasons, and it should not be an overriding reason for saying that the concerts should not take place. From the Forestry Commission's experience of running such events, we know that it has generally been able to clear the traffic within one hour of the event closing. As for the timing of the event, that will be a decision for the local authority.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister give way?

Joan Ruddock: I will, but I am running out of time.

Mr. Chope: The Minister has pledged that local people will have ever greater involvement in decisions that affect their community. How is what she has said consistent with that?

Joan Ruddock: We are more than open to involving local people, and of course I will re-examine the extent to which they can be involved, but as I have said, we cannot say that the decision is only for local people to take. "Local" must mean wider than the immediate vicinity, such as the people from the cities that surround the area, who might want to come. One of the most important things that we can do—I ask the hon. Gentleman to take it seriously—is bring in the people who do not know about the forest and have not lived locally and had the benefit of seeing the trees not too distant from where they live. The Forestry Commission's experience is that, where concerts have been held, they have brought in people who have not previously visited the forest, who may then make return visits. That is incredibly important and an added bonus.

Once the land is cleared and the facility placed there, local people will have even more opportunities to get involved and have local events. I hope that the hon. Gentleman and the parish council will see that that is how we can engage people and ensure that, even if the concerts are not what they would most want on that one weekend, they will have a facility that could bring more involvement and joy to their lives and to their use of the forest throughout the year.

Licensing Act 2003 (Durham)

4.30 pm

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this debate on an issue that is so important to my constituency. I am grateful to the Minister for meeting me recently to discuss licensing issues in Durham. I found the meeting helpful and reassure him that the purpose of the debate is not necessarily to criticise the Licensing Act 2003 but to explore with him those instances in which the Act is perhaps not as effective as it could be and in which local communities are not being protected from inappropriate late licences. It is particularly an issue for Durham because the night-time economy area and local residents are in close proximity.

It might be helpful for me to start with some history of my communication on the issue with constituents and Ministers. I held an initial public meeting last year and invited my constituents to have their say on pub and club licensing in Durham. I raised many of the issues that emerged from that meeting with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker), and he agreed to visit Durham to meet local people to discuss their concerns further. He also wrote me a detailed letter in response to many of the matters raised. Some of the outstanding issues were matters for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and were referred to my hon. Friend the Minister, who also offered to meet me and respond in writing.

I am grateful to both my hon. Friends for their helpfulness and willingness to listen to the problems that we have had in Durham. It has moved us on enormously, and some issues that involve local misunderstandings about the Act have been cleared up, but four issues remain. First, local authorities need better guidance, so that they feel confident monitoring and turning down licences that prevent them from promoting the four key licensing objectives. Secondly, is the current appeals system the right one, given its many challenges for local residents? Is the system not too onerous to allow local views to be heard and adequately represented? Thirdly, is better notification needed for residents of what comes before the licensing committee for licensing determination? Fourthly, the general view is that the Act contains a presumption in favour of allowing applications.

On the first issue, Durham city centre has many late licences. I cannot state the exact number, because the city council has been unable to provide me with that information; it does not have it to hand. How can the council judge the effect of applications on the city overall if it does not monitor daily or weekly the number of late licences granted? I want to put it on record that this is not meant simply as a criticism of the council, but it clearly needs help and further guidance on how to turn down applications or operate the Act better. An example is the interpretation of the word "vicinity" in determining the effect of a licence and the area from which interested parties can be drawn. Current guidance under section 182 of the Act directs licensing committees to consider the vicinity to be about 100 m, but depending on local terrain, that can be too close. Local authorities should be able to set their own definition of the vicinity. The Act allows that, but the guidance directs the use of 100 m. The issue should be considered.

How can one small city cope with the extensive night-time economy, so that it does not have a negative impact on city centre residents? No one is arguing that no late licences should be given; it is merely that the licensing committee does not adequately consider or reflect in its decisions the impact on public nuisance. People are woken up late at night—or, more usually now, early in the morning—or have their doors kicked in, their cars damaged and so on. It is my view that too many 2.30 am late licenses are being granted, but I do not have the exact numbers.

It appears that more late licenses have been granted in Durham than in Westminster. Surely, that cannot be right. The local authority, Durham city council, brought in consultants—no doubt, because of the bad publicity that it has received—to consider a cumulative impact policy for the city, but I understand that they are likely to argue against the city's adopting one. I am not sure why, although it appears that they feel that it might simply push the problem of granting licences elsewhere in the city. Again, giving local authorities more information about the matter would be helpful.

I wish to put on record that the statement of local licensing policy produced by Durham city council is good. If it were used properly, it would probably give the city reasonable protection. For example, the policy acknowledges that patrons leaving licensed premises at 2 am are likely to have an impact on residents' sleep, and policy 8 seeks "to strike a fair balance between the benefit to a community and the risk of disturbance to local residents of a licensed venue."

Policy 15 states that

"the licensing authority will give careful consideration to licence applications that may result in adverse impact upon the amenity of the neighbouring population in the late evening/early morning".

The problem is that those and other licensing policies are not being used sufficiently in determining licence applications. In fact, at times, it seems almost as though they are being completely ignored. What can the Government do to ensure that local policy is adhered to, given greater weight and linked specifically to the promotion of the licensing objectives? One simple modification to the 2003 Act that would give greater powers to reach decisions in keeping with local requirements would be the addition of a fifth licensing objective requiring that the granting of a licence must be consistent with locally determined policy, which must in turn reflect the local interpretation and application of the four licensing objectives.

Another issue is lap dancing. I contend that lap dancing clubs should not be licensed under the Act at all but, like sex shops, under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982. I am working with the organisation Object, which seeks to achieve that end. We contend that the Licensing Act 2003 is not the appropriate measure for granting licences to lap dancing clubs. My experience of Durham in that respect highlights the Act's weaknesses most clearly. Durham received an application for a lap dancing licence to 2.30 am for a premises called the Loft. It is located on a street that acts as the main gateway to the city, adjacent to the bus station and on a main route to the city centre from the railway station. It is also in close proximity to the world heritage site and city centre, across the road from a youth club and in the vicinity of three churches. Some 1,000 residents live within a 500 m radius. In the views of local people, the application contravened not only local licensing policies but a number of Government licensing objectives.

Again, the council's licensing policy 14 appears to be helpful. It states that the council "will discourage applications for licenses which involve a sex related element near schools, places of worship, hospitals, youth clubs".

In my submission to the council, I expressed clearly how local licensing policies 6, 8, 10, 11, 14 and 15, and no doubt others should prevent the licence from being granted. The application was heard at the beginning of August, when everyone was on holiday, and it was approved, despite policy 14 and other local policies.

Thanks to some very brave residents, including Mrs. Kirsty Thomas and Dr. and Mrs. Evans, an appeal was launched with the magistrates courts. The group of local residents had to fundraise to employ a barrister, organise meetings, gather a lot of information and co-ordinate a large number of objectors. I cannot emphasise enough to the Minister the work required from local people, staff in my office and me in preparing for that appeal. It was disproportionate to the ease with which the decision was made in the first place.

I am sure that the Minister can imagine our delight when, in December, the magistrates court found in favour of the appeal. It had concerns about the application in respect of all four licensing objectives and serious concerns with three of them. It found that there was a serious risk of exacerbating problems of crime and disorder and compelling evidence that a lap dancing club on North road would aggravate existing public nuisance problems and, in respect of the protection of children, that the club could hardly be worse sited.

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. I agree with what she said about the use of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 in relation to lap dancing clubs. I would welcome the Minister's comments on the fact that, in my local authority, we have controlled the number of sex shops by using that Act. The type of entertainment about which my hon. Friend has been talking should be included within the same remit.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention; that was exactly my point.

Our jubilation at winning the appeal was short-lived, because we learnt to our great sadness last week that Vimac, the company involved, has completely disregarded the views of local people and asked for permission to launch a judicial review application in the High Court. If that is granted, residents will once again be plunged into a legal process with no resources with which to argue their case. Our experience is totally at odds, therefore, with information sent to us by the Home Office in December 2007, when the Minister stated:

"while the applicant would be a party to the appeal it is not the case that the residents would be taking on the industry."

[Dr. Blackman-Woods]

In Durham, we very much feel as though we are taking on the industry.

The Minister will say that he cannot comment on individual cases. I use that dreadful example simply to demonstrate a fundamental flaw in the Licensing Act. If local authorities make a wrong decision, it is terribly onerous for local residents to put it right. The whole system needs to be looked at, so that residents and other interested parties can object to the granting of a licence without becoming involved in onerous legal challenges.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): With previous legislation under the 2003 Act, it was possible for local authorities to cover a degree of sex and nudity. Does my hon. Friend see that as a possible way forward? For instance, could secondary legislation to the 2003 Act be an alternative?

Dr. Blackman-Woods: My hon. Friend makes a very interesting point, and I am sure that that could be considered.

One possible solution would be to fund an organisation such as Planning Aid, which exists to help residents with planning licences. However, some of my constituents have suggested what might be a better way forward: in other cases where it is felt that a costly legal process is inappropriate, such as in industrial relations disputes, a tribunal system has worked well. Perhaps such a system is needed in this case.

My third point is that much better notification and advertising of licensing applications is needed, so that local people, other interested parties and responsible authorities can get adequate notice. My fourth point is that both the city council and local residents say that the 2003 Act presumes in favour of the applicant. I do not necessarily agree, but there is a problem with licences being approved where no representations are made from interested parties and responsible authorities. There is also the contention—I should like the Minister to comment on this in particular—that a licence can be granted in the absence of objections regardless of the views of the licensing committee, which creates a climate where it is presumed that the 2003 Act operates in favour of licensing applicants.

I recently outlined to the Minister the case of a bus parking in a lay-by to sell alcohol. Other similar circumstances involve areas of transient populations where representations may not be made, but where the impact of the licence might be detrimental to the wider community, so that needs to be looked at. Some of the issues that we are dealing with do not primarily relate to licensing. The city council's decision to promote a night-time economy, at odds with the historical, spiritual and cultural heritage of the city, needs to be addressed. We need a proper plan for the city's development that seeks to achieve a more reasonable balance between the competing uses of the city centre. He will be relieved to hear that I do not think that it is his job to do that. However, it is something that I hope that the new unitary authority for Durham will take on board.

In the meantime, however, attention needs to be paid to the four areas that I have mentioned today. I should be very grateful for any input that the Minister can give to resolve those issues. I am grateful to him and the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling, for their very active interest in the problems being experienced in Durham—it really is appreciated—but we need action, and I would be most grateful if the Minister travelled to Durham to meet a delegation so that he can see, or at least hear about, the issues in Durham and explore with us how a more sensible licensing strategy could be achieved to enable people to have a good night out in Durham, while providing better protection for local residents and the city's heritage.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Hood. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) on giving the Chamber the opportunity to discuss the impact of licensing reform in her area. I also congratulate her on the way she has looked after her constituents. I know that she has put a great deal of effort into that.

I shall answer the specific concerns my hon. Friend raises shortly, but it is important to put them into the context of the 2003 Act. Despite predictions of doom from some quarters, the Act has been successfully implemented, and the consensus among people I talk to who are using it on the ground is that it is a useful tool and working well. Of course, one of the key aims of the reform was to bring licensing decisions, particularly those relating to alcohol licences, closer to the people. I am therefore pleased that one of the key positive messages to come out of our recent evaluation of the impact of the Act was that it had delivered benefits to local democracy.

The 10 scrutiny councils appointed to help to monitor the impact felt that > "Residents are much more aware of what they can do to resolve problems at a premises and licensees are much more aware of their responsibilities".

Researchers at the university of Westminster found that > "the changes in licensing had had a generally positive effect on community relations in the areas examined, with residents and local councillors alike feeling that they had more of a say in the process of granting and challenging licensing decisions".

Of course, that does not mean that problems are not occurring. As our evaluation noted, despite some positive signs, we have yet to see the benefits of licensing reform applied consistently across England and Wales, so it is timely to hear from my hon. Friend about experiences in her area.

My hon. Friend is particularly concerned about the control of a lap-dancing establishment in her constituency. My hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) also raised some important concerns about such establishments. However, as has been said, I cannot comment on individual licensing decisions, and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the ruling of a magistrates court or to speculate on the possibility of judicial review and its outcome. I understand the frustrations of my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham's constituents, but the matter has not yet been fully resolved. She will know that it is an established and fundamental part of our democratic and legal structure, not to mention human rights law, that there must be scope for independent review of court decisions. That must be the case no matter how much each party might think that it is in the right, and even if it is understandably frustrating to parties when appeals and reviews take time to be considered properly.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hove, whom I met yesterday to discuss the concerns about lap-dancing clubs in her constituency and similar issues that have arisen in other parts of the country. Having reflected on those points and on the matters that have been raised today, I believe that the Licensing Act 2003 is able to control such premises when problems relate to the four licensing objectives. The examples that my hon. Friend gave me yesterday show that the Act has successfully been used in some areas to control lap-dancing premises when there have been problems with the protection of children from harm or with illegal activities being carried on there. The Act can also be used to apply conditions to protect the safety of those working and performing at such premises.

Much can be legitimately done under the Licensing Act to control such premises, but I appreciate that there may be uncertainty among some local authorities, so I am happy to write to chief executives to clarify the position. It is important that we show some consistency and write to them about the position. The 2003 Act cannot, however, prevent such activities taking place because of concerns about public decency and obscenity, or the inappropriateness of that activity for a particular area. Although those may well be important and legitimate concerns, it is not appropriate to consider them under the Act. To do so would mean adding new licensing objectives that would then apply to all 200,000 premises licensed under the Act, and that would not be efficient or proportionate. It is also important to recognise that the Act is not about censorship and does not in itself regulate the content of entertainment. Those are much wider issues that relate to the balance between public sensibilities and freedom of speech and artistic expression.

I should add that the Court of Appeal has previously ruled that certain lewd sexual acts should not in any case be considered as public entertainment, so it is questionable whether entertainment licensing could ever cover all those activities. It is precisely because such exhibitions must be in tune with laws on indecency, obscenity, prostitution and pornography that the lead responsibility lies with the Home Office. If the regulation of those premises is inadequate, it might be that regulation akin to the licensing of sex shops under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 would be more appropriate, as my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham said. Alternatively, it might be something that planning law could cover.

I cannot make any commitment at this time, as my hon. Friend will understand, but I certainly shall raise those matters with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker), and ask him to consider those points in discussion with me and the relevant Communities and Local Government Minister with responsibility for planning policy. My hon. Friend visited Durham, and I shall certainly consider the opportunity to visit, if we have those meetings with ministerial colleagues, to see if we can come up with something positive.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham also cited areas where she felt that the Licensing Act may not operate in the best interests of her constituents. Without commenting on individual cases, it seems to me that in most instances a satisfactory conclusion has been reached. It is important to remember that the Licensing Act brought in an important additional safeguard: it is possible to seek a licence review if problems occur at a premises. I know from going around with the police in Bradford that they have been very happy to be able to deal through the review process with problems that arise once the licence has been approved.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Some of my constituents have made the following point. They know that the provision exists for a review, but just as it is very onerous for local residents to take an appeal through the magistrates courts, and the higher courts if necessary, they say that as local residents, it is difficult for them to get organised in order to get a review carried out. If the Minister could offer some advice, that would be very helpful.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful for that point. It is certainly not our intention to make the process more difficult for local people; in fact, the Licensing Act's objective was to make it easier for local people to take a view. That is why it is important to consider other legislation that might be able to assist the process.

One particular concern that has been raised is that the licensing authority has to grant a licence if no relevant representations are made against an application. That provision was fully discussed in Parliament during the passage of the Licensing Act, and I have seen no compelling evidence to warrant changing those arrangements, notwithstanding the examples that we have just discussed. It is difficult to argue that an application should be rejected if no relevant objections have been raised by local people, the police, the fire authority, trading standards, environmental health officers or other responsible authorities. Of course I realise that making representations and following them through can be, as my hon. Friend says, a daunting task to members of the public who are not familiar with the licensing process, but as the Licensing Act evaluation suggests, the new regime is much more accessible to the public, and as our guidance makes clear, there is no reason why a local resident cannot ask someone such as their local councillor or MP to make representations on their behalf.

We have also produced guidance to help local residents to participate in the licensing process, but I am very happy to review that guidance if there are points on which interested parties would appreciate more clarification. I do not want to comment on the performance of individual licensing authorities. Ultimately, the system is deliberately designed to be delegated to locally elected bodies. They have to take difficult decisions, balancing the sometimes conflicting interests of their local communities. A key finding of our evaluation was that some areas use the Licensing Act alongside other interventions much more effectively than other authorities. As a result, we will find ways of helping local authorities and their partners to ensure that they have effective measures in place to identify and tackle problem areas and premises. We have also made the management of the night-time economy a beacon council theme, which will help to identify and disseminate best practice.

I am sure that we all want thriving leisure and night-time economies that bring in visitor revenue and offer all local people a safe, diverse and accessible mix of premises and attractions. Today's debate has highlighted some tensions, but I hope that I have been able to respond to my hon. Friend with the positive measures that we can introduce.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Before the Minister finishes his comments, I wonder whether he will say something about giving advice or information to local authorities on best practice, because I fear that one difficult aspect of the Licensing Act is that some local authorities do not have the confidence to use it very well. If they were able to learn from the way it is used effectively in other local authorities and apply those lessons in areas such as Durham, that would be very helpful.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am happy to do what my hon. Friend suggests and give support to local authorities. Through the Local Government Association and the Local Authorities Co-ordinators of Regulatory Services, there are opportunities for us to continue to get the message out. As I said, beacon council status can be used, too, which then helps us to disseminate best practice. We continue to look at how we can improve. We are looking at how to improve the application processes and to ensure that we have clear rules about the advertising type of application that my hon. Friend has discussed, but we must get the right balance and make sure that we have the right costs and burdens, so that we do not prevent people from making applications. We must also consider the effects on village halls, charities and so on. When dealing with applications, it is a question of balance.

My hon. Friend talked about "vicinity" being an issue. Last July we were advised that that was not a key element, and that the impacts or the licensable activities were more important. We continue to review what can be done. We have made the right move in delegating the matter to local government, because it is right that local councillors and local government have the right to determine what goes on in their area. It is important that we look at the planning process and its objectives, and I am particularly concerned to hear that in Brighton, six lap-dancing clubs have been established in a very short time. That problem will start to spread throughout the country, so I appreciate my hon. Friend raising the matter today. I will be happy to meet colleagues again to consider what can be done to ensure that local people get what they want in their local area.

Question put and agreed to.

Creative Industries

[Relevant documents: Fifth Report from the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, Session 2006-07, on New Media and the Creative Industries, HC 509, and the Government's response, Cm 7186.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Michael Foster.]

2.30 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Culture, Media and Sport (Margaret Hodge): It is delightful to have this debate under your very good chairmanship, Mr. Weir. I am truly grateful to all hon. Members for listening and contributing to it.

The debate has been inspired by the Government's recently published strategy on the creative industries: "Creative Britain—New Talents for the New Economy." The creative industries are a key part of the UK economy. According to our latest figures, they contribute 7.3 per cent. of UK gross value added, and have been growing at 6 per cent., which is double that of the UK economy as a whole. They export £14.5 billion of goods and employ nearly 2 million people. They are a key part of our knowledge-based economy, on which our future prosperity as a nation depends. The Government's definition of the sector, and our specific work with it, is relatively new, but extremely important and constantly evolving.

Labour's first Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, now Lord Smith of Finsbury, created the Creative Industries Task Force, which produced the definition of the creative industries and the initial mapping document, which we published in 1998 with an update in 2001, and which set out the relative strengths of the 13 industries. We have retained that initial definition as the basis of our engagement and work with the sector, but no one in 1998 could have predicted the phenomena that are now part of that sector—YouTube, MySpace, Facebook and so on. As convergence increases, the gaps between the creative industries are blurring. Film, music, publishing and games can all be accessed and enjoyed on a range of platforms. The convergence of technologies creates new opportunities and new markets. Instead of referring to individual industries, it has become valid to see relevance in an overall creative economy, which recognises the economic potential of creative expression, whatever its form.

We launched the creative economy programme in November 2005, when the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions was Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. He saw it as the next stage in Government involvement in the creative sector. The first part of the programme was talking, investigating and consulting. We formed a number of working groups to look at the key drivers of the UK's creative economy, and ran a number of policy discussions and sector summits to obtain the views of industry stakeholders and others.

Those groups produced a series of documents, which became the basis of a further consultation exercise in the summer of 2006. Those reports were then published in November 2006 and provided the solid base for the next phase of the programme. Many of the ideas and recommendations in the document that we are debating have been translated into commitments. I pay a warm tribute to those who were part of the working groups, with special praise to those who chaired them.

In late 2006, we approached Will Hutton of the Work Foundation to write an economic underpinning analysis of the creative economy in the UK so that we had a good context in which to take the work forward. His thesis was discussed during a series of seminars covering the entire creative industries, which enabled the sectors to raise their concerns with us. His work was published in June 2007 in "Staying Ahead: the economic performance of the UK's creative industries". That set out the great performance of the UK's creative sector and attempted to capture the reasons for that success. Its publication is the basis on which we have taken forward the programme of work.

There is now growing recognition of the vital significance of the creative industries to the UK economy. Most recently, the Prime Minister recognised them as being in the premier league of the economy, and the Chancellor referred to their contribution in his Budget speech. Industry reaction to the creative economy programme has been extremely positive, and there has been no shortage of enthusiastic endorsers expressing their willingness to engage and give their views.

The creative industries share many features of other sectors of the economy, so what they ask of the Government in some ways is the same as other sectors. I shall give two examples. They depend, as does every other sector, on macro-economic stability.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that in the various stages that her Department has gone through to reach the current policy position on creative industries, the reference to ceramics and textiles on page 64 of the document "Unlocking Talent" means that the ceramics industry is at the core of her commitment to creative industries?

Margaret Hodge: My hon. Friend is a constant and terrific campaigner on behalf of her constituents, including those who represent the ceramics industry. Indeed, I had the privilege of making a visit there last summer. I accept that the industry plays an important role in the creative economy, and that we must do a lot of work with it to maintain its international competitiveness, particularly with cheaper production costs in China and the far east in general. We share that commitment, as she encourages us to do. We will do all we can to work together to ensure its continued significance in her regional economy and its contribution to the UK economy.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): Given the immensely cheaper labour and other costs in places such as China, how can we ensure that the creative industries, such as those in the Potteries, will be maintained? Is that just wishful thinking, or will there be some Government action?

Margaret Hodge: If the hon. Gentleman had read the report, he would know where the action is. In all sectors, we must analyse carefully where added value is and where the strengths are in the UK's contribution to the industry. Some production may be outsourced, but the creativity is here, as is the marketing and selling of goods. In some instances, depending on the sector, the transport costs of producing goods in Asia and bringing them here may be a factor that we can use to our advantage to maintain some productive capacity. The better our innovation and new productive techniques, the more likely we are to maintain productive capacity in the UK economy. That is not easy, but it is doable.

How is the creative sector as a whole like other sectors? First, one obvious way is dependence on macro-economic stability and ensuring that the Government provide the conditions in which businesses can prosper. Even in the current turbulent times, our record is second to none. We have provided stability, growth, low inflation and increasing job opportunities in every year of this Administration. Given the way in which we strongly manage the macro-economy, we are well placed to withstand the challenges, especially those to the financial markets, from the credit crunch.

The second issue facing the creative sector which also faces other sectors is the opportunities and challenges from globalisation and the new markets that have suddenly opened to us. The challenges come from new competition. Yesterday, I was at a conference on the film industry where we considered inward and outward investment. Again, where is the added value from the UK film industry that we can capture and build on to ensure that we realise the opportunities from globalisation and meet the challenges of competitive costs elsewhere?

Some challenges are also specific to the creative industries. I shall give a couple of examples. Rapidly changing technology puts existing business models in the creative industries in greater stress than elsewhere. In particular, the protection of intellectual property is at the heart of what the creative industries are about, although they are dependent on copyright protection rather than patent protection, which is more easily and closely defined.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): On that important point, the Minister will be aware that in response to a question asked by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), who is Chairman of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, she said that the Government continue to have an "open mind" on the issue of copyright. Despite having said that, she is well aware of the Gowers recommendation. Can she help us by being a little more forthright about her position and accepting once and for all that we need an extension of copyright with some additional protections?

Margaret Hodge: The hon. Gentleman refers to one copyright issue that is of particular importance to the music industry, which has done a lot of lobbying on extending copyright to 95 years, as it is in America. He will know that underpinning the Gowers recommendations not to extend copyright was Gowers' research suggesting that doing so would not substantially increase the value to the individual from the exercise of their copyright. The hon. Gentleman will also know that research in Europe—the name of the man who did it escapes me—demonstrated that an extension of copyright was perhaps not the best way of adding value to the copyright of the individual. However—

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con) rose—

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con) rose—

Margaret Hodge: If I may just finish this point, I will then give way.

Mr. Foster: It is the "however".

Margaret Hodge: That is why I thought that I had better finish my remarks.

However, we have listened to what the European Commissioner said. Clearly, we need to consider that matter. We are consulting to see how we should respond and what the Commission will do, because it is not 100 per cent. clear.

Mr. Whittingdale: Is the Minister aware of the analysis carried out by LECG into the economic model produced by the Gowers report? It shows that the model is based on a fundamental error and that the report's conclusions on the economic benefit of extending the copyright term could not be made?

Margaret Hodge: I am aware of that analysis, and I know it was considered by the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman is Chair. There is some dispute about the basis on which the various analyses have been undertaken. If we are to have further regulation, the research evidence on which we make policy must be properly underpinned and understood. I am aware of the report and we, too, are considering it.

We all accept that music in particular faces huge challenges from changes in technology. These days, about 90 per cent. of singles are downloaded, but in 2004 the figure was just 5 per cent. Research from the British Video Association puts the cost of piracy of audio-visual goods and the illegal downloading of those goods at around £460 million a year. There is a considerable challenge in relation to that.

Something that is specific to the creative industry sector is the emphasis on skills. The reason a creative industry prospers or does well is because of the creative and innovative skills of the individuals who are involved in the business. A disproportionate number of people with graduate skills are required by the industry. There are some interesting challenges in relation to higher education, such as the courses that are available and the extent to which the competences match the skills required by the industry. For example, 1,000 courses have the term "film" in the title and more than 350 have the word "television" in the title. Yet, we know from talking to industry colleagues that there are some questions about whether those courses provide the appropriate competences for people when they move into the industry.

Why does the OECD put us at the top of its list? It is because the UK is an exciting and innovative place for creative entrepreneurs to live and work in. The more I talk to people in the creative industry sector, the more I realise that the attractiveness of the UK is the key reason why they stay here. We must nurture that and hang onto it. We also have an open environment, in which we encourage innovation, and we have a talented, high-quality population. Businesses need those skills and we need to capture and use them.

That, in summary, gives the context, and that context led to the development and production of the document, "Creative Britain—New Talents for the New Economy", which I call the latest stage of the journey. The document has 26 specific commitments. They start with trying to ensure that children are given proper exposure to creative industries, and move on to ensuring that creative talent is used to its maximum potential, and to supporting the growth and development of creative businesses. Hon. Members will be pleased to hear that I will not mention every commitment, but I would like to draw their attention to what I think are the most important.

One of the most exciting commitments is the "Find Your Talent" programme. The best way to support the creative industries is to find and inspire the next generation of creative individuals. We are trying to build on the success of the programme for sport activities, which offers children two to five hours of sport a week. Around 80 per cent. of children now have two hours of sports activities a week, and we are using that as an example to ensure that they get experience in the cultural world. The programme is about experiencing and participating—going to a theatre as well as taking part in a piece of drama; listening to music as well as playing an instrument; visiting a gallery as well as creating a piece of visual art. This week we made an announcement about dance, and, from the investment that we are making nationally, we hope that dance will increase in importance in the life of schools and the curriculum.

Along with the other initiatives, we hope that the "Find Your Talent" programme will help young people to develop their creative talent, because it is that talent that is at the heart of the creative economy and will allow it to continue to thrive and prosper.

Mr. Don Foster: I share the view that that could be exciting. The various newspapers that have done an analysis in relation to it have pointed out that the funding proposed works out at £15 a pupil a year, or 29p a week. I did a further analysis, and at five hours a week, the funding works out at less than 6p an hour. Clearly, such figures are complete nonsense if the Minister is to deliver the sort of programmes to which she is referring. Can the she tell us where the newspapers have got their calculations wrong?

Margaret Hodge: The newspapers have got them wrong on the basis that they have assumed that those are the only resources available for that purpose. The hon. Gentleman will know that culture already forms an integral part of the experience of children in many schools—not in as ambitious a way as we would like, but it is an integral part of the school experience and the curriculum. He also knows that a number of programmes over recent years have encouraged that—for example, the investment of £320 million a year in the music programme. Friday before last, I was at a school in my constituency where I watched a whole class of nine-year-olds perform a concert for me. They had been learning their instruments once a week for about four months. It was terrific to see young, fairly tough lads playing their violins. It was great that they were moving in time to the music as well as playing together. That scheme captures all that is best about creativity. I thought that it was great, but to make a more serious point, there is an impact on standards generally, because involvement in music and other activities helps young people with team playing and helps them to think about shape and pattern, all of which are skills that they need to be successful learners.

Mr. Vaizey: I can see that the Minister is already benefiting from the Government's dance programme. I think that the £320 million that she mentioned covers three years, but that is not why I am intervening. Can she clarify that Creative Partnerships will become the youth culture trust and, if that is correct, how the work of Creative Partnerships will change as it becomes the youth culture trust?

Margaret Hodge: We have to work our way through that issue. We certainly think that the youth culture trust ought to be a non-departmental public body, which takes responsibility for supporting the delivery of these programmes in schools, in the same way as the Youth Sport Trust is successfully doing for sport. The creative partnerships are very different. They have evolved in different ways throughout the country and some of them take a different approach in the work that they do, understanding creativity in a rather wider context, as a skill that they want to build into the curriculum. We do not want to lose that work, because it has been very valuable, particularly with disadvantaged children and children who may have been alienated from school. We just have to work it through. The creative partnerships budget is separate—it is £120 million or £130 million—but we want the youth culture trust to take responsibility for this. I accept the issue raised by the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey). We have not yet found the full answer to it.

Following on from the "Find Your Talent" programme—I am glad hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber think that it is a good idea—we have to ensure that career choices are got right. We talk about that in our paper. One initiative being developed is the "Creative Choices" website, which Creative & Cultural Skills, the sector skills council, is about to launch. We know from all the work that we have done that getting that career advice is imperative.

I have talked about ensuring that the skill sets of graduates match the needs of industries. We are hoping that the university of Brighton can do a piece of work for us to map the competences that come out of current degree provision and to find out whether we can work with our higher education institutions, the conservatoires and others to ensure that they are giving an appropriate and relevant offer that will enable individuals to exploit that learning and experience in the world of work.

We all know that the biggest barrier to the UK's success in respect of jobs is the problem that we have in relation to skills. That was highlighted in the Leitch review of skills in the UK. There is a huge ambition throughout government to grow the number of apprenticeships to 500,000 by 2020. We want to play our part in that with the creative industries, and we have set ourselves an ambitious target of having 5,000 apprenticeships a year up and running by, I think, 2018. That is very important. We have talked to employers across all sectors who have welcomed that. Indeed, I have talked to a number of computer games employers who are already taking part in the pilots for those apprenticeships. If we want to meet the diversity challenge that we have in the creative industry sector with more opportunities for under-represented groups, the apprenticeships will help us to do that.

I come now to research and innovation. Four out of five creative firms are what are known as active innovators—innovation is at the heart of what they do. The way in which the industry works is changing fast. In the past, Government support for innovation has focused on work that leads to the establishment of patents, and I think that insufficient recognition has been given to the importance of the effort that leads to the development of a copyright. Computer games are the classic example that springs to mind.

We have achieved and committed ourselves to important innovations. First, the Technology Strategy Board will provide £10 million for new and collaborative research and development, with a package of measures specifically to engage small creative firms. The focus will be on the underlying technology challenges and opportunities facing the sector.

Secondly, last week, with the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts, I launched a £3 million creative innovators growth programme, which will be focused on bringing existing businesses through to that high growth status. The initiative that I launched involved the film industry, but NESTA is considering other sectors, too. That will involve examining new business models and how they can succeed. That is an important initiative.

Thirdly, we hope that a knowledge transfer network will shortly be up and running. That will provide an opportunity for businesses to interact with one another and with the universities sector, so that we can bring together all the expertise to try to deal with some of the challenges that they face.

Fourthly, the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills announced in its innovation strategy that it will commission research better to quantify the economic benefits of the creative industries, with special attention to the value added by innovation in those industries. I hope that that series of recommendations in the paper will allow us to unlock stronger research.

We also talk about the role that we can have in supporting businesses. This is an interesting part of the document that hon. Members may want to talk about. We have always said that the Arts Council's primary aim is to support artistic excellence—that has been confirmed by the Brian McMaster review—but public funding for the arts can be a powerful stimulus for the creative industries, not only because of the skills that it develops, but because of the networking spaces that are provided. Quite often, it can underwrite risk that the financial markets would not be willing to accept. We have therefore asked Arts Council England and other bodies to take account of the objectives of the creative economy programme in their corporate plans and strategies.

Mr. Don Foster: I am grateful to the Minister for being generous in giving way. I particularly applaud what she has just said. She will not be aware of this, but three years ago, I arranged a meeting of the Arts Council and the UK Film Council to ask them which of those two bodies had responsibility for the creative industries. Both denied that they had a key responsibility. There is an urgent need to have detailed discussions with all the lottery distributors about where their responsibility lies in respect of the creative industries. I am glad that the Minister is having those discussions.

Margaret Hodge: The hon. Gentleman and I agree about that. We have to get the balance right, so that it is not seen as us in any way undermining the excellence that we want those organisations to fund in the creative sector.

Mr. Vaizey: I am not sure that I share the enthusiasm of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). Perhaps he wants to copy the Scottish model, which has elided the Scottish Arts Council and the Scottish Film Council into Creative Scotland. It seems extraordinary in a such paper that the Minister could simply hand over responsibility for the creative industries to the Arts Council without a wider debate. Is it not time to have a proper debate about the role of the Arts Council now that it is 60 years old?

Margaret Hodge: Let me correct the hon. Gentleman: I am not handing over the role of sponsoring the creative industries to the Arts Council. I am saying that there is a synergy between the creativity that comes out of the funding in the Arts Council and the development of successful businesses in the creative industries sector. The Arts Council has come very successfully through a radical funding round—I applaud the way in which, on the whole, that has been managed—and it will clearly be taking time to reflect on how it makes progress. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman, I and other hon. Members will be engaged in discussions with it on its role in a fast-changing world.

Our enterprise capital funds are supposed to meet the gap in the equity market, which is a particular issue for the creative industry sector. The Chancellor announced an extra £150 million in three further rounds to establish more capital funds. I am really pleased that the UK Film Council will be submitting a bid in that round.

I will now touch on intellectual property, which is of key concern to the creative sector. To support those industries and others, we need a balanced IP framework, which is relevant to today's world. We need to encourage businesses to develop new business models—only they can do so—that recognise and exploit the changes in technology. We also need the right tools to tackle IP crime, and we should continue to improve the education and understanding of IP. We should also recognise that, with changes in technology, there is a massive democratisation of information, which is hugely powerful to the industry and to society. So we must strike a constant balance between those objectives in the public domain.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform will shortly consult on legislation that will require internet service providers and rights holders to co-operate in taking action on illegal file sharing, with a view to implementing that legislation by April 2009. That reflects a definite change of tone by the Government. Although, of course, we prefer a voluntary approach—we encourage all partners to seek one—we also have to underpin it with action if necessary. We will not hesitate to act if we need to.

The UK Intellectual Property Office has also put in place a plan of action on IP enforcement. The report mentions a range of things that it will do, including a fake-free London campaign in the run-up to 2012, a national centre of excellence on tackling IP crime, the establishment of a forum between Ministers and industry to keep the issues under review and voluntary enforcement funds to try to get more action on behalf of the police.

Mr. Mark Field: The Minister will be aware that some of the biggest concerns in the manufacturing sector are to do with patents and intellectual property rights and their breach in China, which is an important trading partner for the century ahead. She also refers to the 2012 Olympics. Clearly, an opportunity exists over the next four years to firm up relationships between our two capital cities. As the Minister refers to democratisation, what action will the Government take to ensure that we put intellectual property rights into some sort of framework? Will that be left to the companies that wish to ensure that their creative industry product is seen in China? Or will the Government consider working with the Chinese Government to put in place protocols to ensure, as far as possible, that our creative industry does not lose out because intellectual property rights are largely ignored in that part of the world?

Margaret Hodge: About 18 months ago, in my previous role as Minister at the old Department of Trade and Industry, I met Chinese Government officials and Minsters in China to discuss having a proper intellectual property rights regime. It was one of the key areas of debate and discussion. I am sure that my successors are continuing those particular debates. For me, getting internet service providers to manage their information properly is the best thing that we can do in the UK to protect the intellectual property rights of individuals. Beyond that, the way forward has to be through diplomatic negotiations and using the World Trade Organisation when that is appropriate as well

We are also considering how to do a better job in educating people in IP rights and IP frameworks. I do not know whether we will incorporate that issue in the new diplomas that are emerging or in the review of the primary curriculum.

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab): Before the Minister leaves the subject of intellectual property, may I, as chair of the all-party parliamentary group on intellectual property, thank her for her recognition of how serious a problem this is, particularly in the digital age? Does she agree that perhaps the Government should look at the resourcing of trading standards officers in local authorities to see whether their role can be strengthened in some way?

Margaret Hodge: I was pleased that we were able to find an initial sum of money to support the implementation of section 107A of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, as that has allowed the regime to start that work rolling. Our thinking now, subject to further negotiations, is to get industry to put in a bit of money to support the effort that we want the police and the officers in local authorities to undertake. My hon. Friend is right; the more resources that we have, the more successful we will be in that regard.

I want to talk a little about the roles of regional development agencies and local government in the creative industry sector. We know that the sector works best in clusters. We propose to pilot the development of a regional creative economy strategic framework—thinking about such industries in the region—both in the north-west and south-west. If those frameworks are successful as a mechanism for the regional development agencies to intervene and support the creative economy at regional level, we will try to roll it out across the country. We are working with the Local Government Association to develop advice for local authorities on how to improve their creative infrastructure, and that will include advice on things such as providing suitable business space, developing links with universities and colleges, and encouraging networking and local networks.

I turn to our international work. The UK is at the forefront of the world's creative economy. An OECD study showed that we have a higher percentage of our economy working with creative industries than any other country in the OECD family. A large part of that strength is down to our reputation for creativity and innovation. As incomes and aspirations rise in developing countries, there should be more opportunities for British companies to work abroad. However, we have to maintain that advantage and ensure that London and Britain continue to be seen as the best places to trade.

I am, therefore, pleased that UK Trade and Investment agreed a five-year strategy—we have put it into our document—to look at our international competitive position. The strategy has three themes: developing stronger messaging, which resonates with overseas buyers; ensuring promotional activities; and encouraging other new initiatives in target markets. We want to combine two of the UK's and London's key strengths in the creative industries and financial services to initiate what we have called a world creative business conference, which we want to become a regular feature in the calendar and which we aspire to have the same status as the Davos World Economic Forum. That would cement the UK as the world's creative hub and help to develop the ongoing and important dialogue between the creative and the financial sector, which is very important to get equity into the creative industries. The creative industries are extremely fast moving. They have changed massively in the past five years, and I have no doubt that they will change massively in the next five, which is why we have said that this is the next phase in an ongoing programme.

I want to establish a mechanism in which I can have a continuing and regular dialogue with industry representatives and other important stakeholders, so that they have an effective voice in shaping our agenda and programme as we move forward. Their contribution so far has been a major factor in the success of the creative economy programme. I hope that all parts of the industry will continue to engage with the Government.

The document "Creative Britain: New Talents for the New Economy" is the summation of nearly three years of work. It could not possibly articulate all the issues that we have investigated, debated and discussed; similarly, we could not discuss all the issues within the document now in this debate. I hope that I have given the Chamber a good taste of the challenges that face the creative industry, and I look forward to the contributions of other hon. Members.

3.9 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): I very much welcome the fact that we are debating the creative industries. The Minister gave us some statistics showing that their importance to the economy is growing, and I think that we all recognise that. Our manufacturing industry has slowly disappeared eastwards and has been followed by our service industries, which are now run from call centres in Bangalore or administered by migrant workers in this country. The one thing that we are left with that we are extremely good at is the creative industries, so it is extremely important that we give them every support.

There are many things in the documents that I welcome. The "Find Your Talent" programme certainly has a worthy objective, although I am little sceptical about it, given the figures that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) mentioned that show what the programme actually amounts to in financial terms, and given that already hard-pressed teachers will have to squeeze the programme into the school day. None the less, the objective is a noble one, and other measures, such as the growth in apprenticeships and the investment in research, are also admirable.

I shall, however, focus on one key issue. In supporting the creative industries, the Government have a fundamental role to play in respect of copyright, because that is the one thing that only they can enforce. Without copyright, the creative industries cannot survive, because they depend on being able to achieve a return on the creation of intellectual property.

Copyright enforcement has always been a challenge. A long time ago, I started life as a special adviser at the then Department of Trade and Industry; I remember the debates that took place about whether we should introduce a levy on blank digital cassette tapes. I could see why they were a problem because, as a teenager, I had always tuned into the top 20 on a Sunday evening, with my cassette tape recorder poised to record—

Mr. Vaizey: The Undertones.

Mr. Whittingdale: Indeed—and others. I did not realise at the time that what I was doing was illegal, and certainly not that it was doing such damage to the music industry. Although the music industry did not like blank tape copying, however, it accepted it, because the results were not particularly high quality and the DJ usually interrupted halfway through, so the recordings were not really a substitute for buying an album.

The problem now is that digitisation means that the quality of the music recording, which can be made available in digital format and easily pirated, is no different from that of a CD. Such recordings represent a far greater challenge because the quality has increased so dramatically and because of online distribution. Of course, online distribution is not the only problem; there has always been a problem of physical piracy. Indeed, the day before yesterday, I spent a couple of hours with film piracy unit of the Metropolitan police, whose officers were talking about the continuing problem of pirated DVDs and, to some extent, CDs, which are churned out in garages up and down the country by server towers that can produce 40 or 50 discs at a time. A lot of that is done by Chinese immigrants who have been trafficked into the country and who are then required to repay those who brought them here by undertaking criminal activity, which very often involves piracy.

That type of piracy is a challenge, but it is online piracy that is growing rapidly and that poses an even bigger threat. It is obviously important to update the law to take account of that threat. The Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport has looked at the challenges posed by new media to the creative industries, and we feel that the law is lagging behind. To give a specific example, almost every teenager—indeed, probably the vast majority of the population—owns an iPod, and such devices are becoming the preferred method of listening to music. However, it is still technically a breach of copyright for me to purchase a CD in a shop, take it home and put it on to my iPod, which is plainly ridiculous.

The record industry will say, "Well, of course, we never dreamed that anybody would try to enforce that provision," but the fact that copyright law has not taken account of format shifting and the way in which people now listen to music and, increasingly, watch video content, brings the law into disrepute to some extent. It is difficult to tell young people that one bit of copyright law is really important and that they must obey it, but that another bit does not matter too much so they can ignore it. I therefore welcome the discussions on putting in place a private copying exception. The industry has some concerns about it, and that exception will need to be narrowly drawn, but we need to amend the law so that home use is made legal and acceptable.

As the Minister said, the industry will also need to take account of consumer behaviour regarding online distribution when it develops new business models. The record industry was very slow in responding to online distribution. It started off by saying, "This is awful—it will be the end of the world. We must stop it." Latterly, it has accepted that online distribution could create whole new markets and that it is an opportunity, and legal downloads are now growing. We are seeing a gradual shift, whereby more and more music is being made available online very cheaply, and quite often for a single payment that gives access to a huge library of music. That will probably result in a decline in revenue streams, but there is an acceptance of the inevitable and of the fact that it is better to get some revenue than none at all, which is the consequence of illegal distribution. Another consequence of the shift may be that live music performance becomes more important and that it will represent a bigger return for artists, which I would also welcome.

The industry is waking up to the problem, but that problem is growing exponentially. In the past four years, the record industry has seen a 20 per cent. drop in its revenues, in large part due to piracy. The Minister mentioned the estimated £480 million loss by the TV and video industry in 2006. One survey in November 2007 revealed that 10 per cent. of the population had either home-copied a DVD or bought a counterfeit DVD, that 16 per cent. had illegally downloaded, streamed or burned discs and that 23 per cent. had borrowed and copied a disc, which, technically, is also illegal.

Mr. Don Foster: It is not the same.

Mr. Whittingdale: No, indeed—the hon. Gentleman is quite right. However, a huge amount of illegal activity is being undertaken by a large proportion of the population.

I have a 14-year-old son and he has a laptop. He and his friends share films on it. On his laptop at the moment, he has a number of films that are on show in the Odeon now; they are not on DVD because they have not yet been legally released. However, he has—[illegible] my wishes and, indeed, with my strong disapproval—downloaded those films from sites such as The Pirate Bay. My son has also told me how one of his friends at school will buy a computer game, which the students then crack, and it goes around the entire school. Every single laptop will have that game on it, and everyone will be playing it, but there will have been only one purchase.

Mr. Foster: May I ask the hon. Gentleman to advise his son that I had a meeting earlier today with the Internet Service Providers Association, which told me of the trial that it is about to start to identify his son and people like him and to take out criminal proceedings against them? I ask the hon. Gentleman to warn his son that that is about to happen. I, for one, welcome the action.

Mr. Whittingdale: I shall certainly convey that warning. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that I have done my best already, but the real problem is that it is not a small number of people who are doing this—it is the vast majority of the teenage population. We cannot lock up every teenager in the country.

Mr. Vaizey: Leaving aside the possibility of my hon. Friend turning himself and his son in at the end of the debate, there is a serious point. I cannot imagine my hon. Friend getting up and happily telling hon. Members, "My son goes shoplifting every day." However, he is happy to tell us that his son downloads films from pirate websites. Does that not illustrate graphically the gulf in public opinion on stealing a physical object from a shop and stealing intellectual property, and the huge journey that still has to be made?

Mr. Whittingdale: My hon. Friend anticipates precisely the point that I was coming to. He is of course entirely right. Young people do not see that there is anything wrong with the practice. They have grown up with it and they see it as perfectly normal behaviour. I have attempted to make the comparison with shoplifting that my hon. Friend made, but I have not been wholly successful. I shall continue to make the case because I strongly believe that the practice in question is theft, but it is an enormous challenge.

I welcome what the Minister said about greater education and the attempts that are being made to get the message across. British Music Rights, for example, has worked to introduce material into the curriculum to increase understanding of copyright. Such efforts are important, but, to return to a point I made earlier, the industry will just have to accept that behaviour is changing and will have to adapt its business models to take account of that fact. Something like a single payment subscription to an iTunes library, which would give access to a huge range of material, would be a far more productive way of addressing the problem. I simply do not think that we shall persuade people that the old business models are sustainable and that they must change their behaviour. Education is hugely important.

Mr. Mark Field: Does my Friend accept, following the exchange between him and my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey), that although there is no sense that the behaviour in question is wrongdoing or theft in the way that shoplifting is theft, one way in which Government, Parliament and the industry might appeal to young people is to make the case that he made in his earlier comments: that much piracy funds misery in the developing world and is part and parcel of people trafficking, drug running and the like? It is an area of business that is often in the hands of large-scale wrongdoers, who use the proceeds to cross-fertilise other aspects of their criminal activity. A case should perhaps be made, in robust terms, that every time someone downloads illegally or buys a counterfeit CD, they help to bring about a hell of a lot more misery. The crime is not a victimless one.

Mr. Whittingdale: I half agree with my hon. Friend. I think he is correct when he talks about physical product. There is a lot of evidence that the manufacture of counterfeit DVDs and CDs is being conducted by organised crime and feeds the misery that he has described. The problem with online illegal distribution is that it is free. That is why everyone does it; they get access to the material and pay nothing, so there is not any great financial motive. A famous instance is The Pirate Bay, which I think was created by two Swedish teenagers; they did it because it was fun. They did not believe in copyright, and they had the technology, so they sat in their bedroom and created The Pirate Bay. As a result, peer-to-peer file sharing is now taking place across the world. The two people in question deny responsibility and say that all they did was to create the access mechanisms. That is not so much organised crime, and in some ways it represents a bigger challenge.

There are things that the Government can do besides improving education, which is vital, and encouraging the industry to adapt its practices. Some of those actions, which I welcome, are set out in the White Paper. However, I hope that the Government will not consider hardware levies. I have not seen evidence that they are being considered by the Government, but there are some in the industry who are now talking about them, and of course they exist in one or two European countries. It seems to me that a tax on blank discs or iPods is not the way forward: it would clearly be unpopular, and it would be very difficult to work out how the proceeds of such a levy would be distributed back to the owners of rights, as some have suggested.

A small measure that could be taken, which the Select Committee recommended, and which might make a difference, concerns access to pirated films, which sometimes appear within hours of a film's release. Quite a lot of it is done by people sitting in cinemas with camcorders. When people go to the cinema they see all sorts of dire warnings on the screen about being expelled and subsequently banned from the cinema, prosecuted and fined, but the truth is that such filming is not a criminal offence. It is a civil offence. The industry has suggested that making it a criminal offence would send a strong signal, and the Select Committee supported that.

The most important element, as the Minister rightly mentioned, is to encourage the ISPs to accept that they must get involved and that they have a responsibility. For a long time, ISPs seemed to be saying, "We are no more than telecoms companies. We supply the copper down which data flow, but in the same way that British Telecom cannot be held accountable for what people say in telephone conversations, we cannot be held accountable for how people use our delivery mechanisms." That is now changing, and the Government are right to express the hope that a self-regulatory system can be created.

This morning, while the hon. Member for Bath was meeting the Internet Service Providers Association, I was meeting Yahoo! I was told that the discussions between the Music Publishers Association and the ISPs are very productive. There is a general willingness to accept that where the rights holder identifies a particular IP address as the source of a lot of material that is being uploaded, they can notify the ISP, which will identify which computer, if not which user, is responsible and serve a notice of warning that if the activity continues, they will be taken down. That is a real step forward and represents a change of attitude in the industry. I hope that others will join that move—for example, I think there is a role for search engines to play in trying to make it far harder for people to find out how to access illegal material.

We can be optimistic about such measures being introduced. I am told that in America the ISPs are discovering that the amount of video content that is being distributed is taking up a vast amount of bandwidth and slowing down the whole system. They know that the majority of that activity is illegal. Tackling the problem is therefore becoming something that is in the ISPs' interests. That may explain why they have suddenly become rather more enthusiastic about doing so.

I will finish on the issue of copyright extension, which was raised by the hon. Member for Bath and will no doubt be mentioned by the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart). There has been a long-standing campaign by the music industry, which points to the fact that composers, lyricists and designers all enjoy copyright on CDs until 70 years after their deaths, whereas the producers and performers have only a 50-year term. That is unfair.

The Gowers report suggested that the extension of copyright term might not produce much economic benefit. That has been questioned by the industry, as I mentioned earlier, but, at the end of the day, that does not seem to me to be the point at all. It is not about whether extension will generate more economic activity, but about morals and rights. Why should somebody who creates a work be allowed to benefit from it for only 50 years? Other countries across the world have far longer terms. The case for moving in that direction is very strong.

I cannot resist reading a letter that I received last year—one of the most exciting letters that I have received for a long time. It came from Mr. Eddie Clarke, also known as Fast Eddie, the lead guitarist of Motörhead. I must admit that I have seen them perform on several occasions. He wrote:

"You may think that as a rock musician I should not expect to live until 80. I can assure you I did not think this was going to happen but with modern technology and medicine, it certainly seems a possibility—even my old partner in crime Lemmy might make it.

My royalties will be my pension and something to pass on to my family, so to learn that they will be stripped away before my 80th birthday is frankly unacceptable."

I think that Fast Eddie speaks for a huge number of performers in the industry. It was for that reason that the Culture, Media and Sport Committee recommended an extension of the copyright term. We were extremely disappointed that the Government did not respond positively to that suggestion. However, things have since changed. Suddenly, out of the blue, Commissioner McCreevy saw the light and issued a statement that bears a remarkable resemblance to the wording of the Select Committee report. That may not be entirely coincidental, but the fact that the European Commission has accepted that there is a strong case for copyright term extension will, I hope, cause the Government to think again.

I welcome the Minister's comment to me at Question Time a few days ago when she said that she had an open mind. However, like those who have already contributed today, I hope that her open mind will allow her to reconsider the matter soon and to reach a firm decision. An indication that she is becoming more sympathetic to our case—I am sure that other hon. Members will express support for it—would be a welcome and major contribution to supporting the creative industries.

3.30 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to have you in Chair for the first time ever, Mr. Weir. I thought that Westminster Hall would be Havana Hall this afternoon and that I would be able to speak for two and half hours without interruption. However, much has already been said by others, and I do not wish to repeat it. The subject is important and I should like to accentuate one or two points that have not been made so far.

There is, as the Minister pointed out, a link between the creative industries and the economy that is becoming ever more important. As the country's financial services wobble—some of them might disappear—it is important to prevent similar problems in the creative industries and ensure that they continue. Our higher education facilities and universities are full of creativity—creation, too, in the odd academy—and innovation is rampant in most of our universities. There are problems, however, which have been highlighted by Mr. Will Hutton, whom the Minister mentioned.

The creative industries produce many millions of jobs and attendant jobs among people who help them to expand through exports and so on. I do not want to talk about the difference between innovation and creativity—we could have a great debate about that but, to me, they are mutually dependent: a bit of both goes into the production of any particular product. However, we are not getting enough from the higher education facilities in this country. Oxford and Cambridge are still the epicentre and have shown the way forward, and other places are catching up, but we are missing out on a lot of the creativity and bright ideas that flow in those places. As Lambert pointed out, business links with universities are pretty weak. We all know that they must happen, but nobody has come forward and told us how to make them happen or how to pick up ideas and turn them into products.

Hutton says that intellectual property from the UK university sector generated only £31 million in a sector valued at more than £10 billion, so there is a lot to do. Morgan Cole, a law firm, said that 90 per cent. universities still prefer to publish their ideas to boost their research standing in the academic realm rather than apply for patents. As Hutton says—I agree—that results in an enormous opportunity to make money from university research being forgone. The link with the economy is found in spin-out companies, which continue to be a great success in Oxford and Cambridge and elsewhere because of the creative, innovative, bright and sparky people that gravitate to those firms. We need to put business profits back into the academic heartland.

Mr. Mark Field: I am sorry to stop the hon. Gentleman—

Dr. Gibson: From winding-up?

Mr. Mark Field: I was going to say "in full flow"—I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not winding-up.

The hon. Gentleman talks about our two ancient universities, but it is fair to say that a number of other institutions do extremely well in that regard such as—I say this with a parochial interest in mind—Imperial college, which is in my constituency. It has been at the forefront of the commercial exploitation of many of its own ideas, which I hope will be a precursor to many other universities, old and new, doing the same.

Dr. Gibson: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. Of course Imperial, Manchester, Newcastle, Dundee, Edinburgh and other places have little pockets, but still, I think, universities concentrate on their academic work. I am not talking about Imperial, which has engineering and such like, but other universities in this country concentrate too much on the academic side. They have to do that, but they do it too much, and they miss a lot of opportunities.

As Hutton says:

"British business is full of complaint and seems only interested in tax breaks, avoidance and evasion. Now has come the time for it to start writing some cheques instead, to put its money and effort where its mouth is".

We need some kind of interaction, which I think can come only from political endeavour. Business should pay partly for universities and higher education colleges because that is where the innovation and creativity come from, and it should pay for the students who end up working for companies. In America, when new students go to a city such as Philadelphia, it is not simply left to the university to entertain and talk to them; instead, the city's community and commercial sector goes to talk to them to help in the recruitment process. From the beginning, students get the feeling that they have not gone to the city only to get degrees or to do all the other things that undergraduates do excitedly. They get the feeling that they will have jobs in the city if they wish. It is important to get such a culture going, but we have a long way to go.

I could try again to get top-up fees abolished—[Interruption.] I have not changed my mind on the matter—the Minister and I engaged in many debates on the issue in front of television cameras and so on. However, if business takes its responsibilities seriously, a lot of the hardship that has been generated by top-up fees for many students—working class students might not get in, but that is still to be shown—we would form a new kind of culture that brought lots more bright people into the higher education sector.

I also want to talk very briefly about the creative writing industry, which I know a lot about. At the university of East Anglia in Norwich, a friend of mine—sadly, he is no longer with us—Malcolm Bradbury set up a creative writing course. We arrived at the university at the same time: I was at one end of the campus, he at the other; I was doing boring, nerdy science, and he was doing exciting things with creative writing. Books such as "Eating People is Wrong" and "The History Man" came out of a bright idea from the bright young man who set the course up. That creative writers group produced Ian McEwan, Anne Enright, who won the Man Booker prize this year—McEwan has won it before—and Ishiguro. Talented people were attracted into a small department where they got the help and education to form them into a creative writing force.

Writing, be it books, pamphlets or whatever, is very important in our culture and in our lives. Interestingly, "Atonement", Ian McEwan's recent book, is about Oxford and Cambridge. I have had sharp words with him because he could write about a more provincial university than Oxford or Cambridge, but that is Ian. Throughout the whole of England, there is great potential for creativity in writing and music, about which we will hear more, and in science and mathematics. The fashion and clothing industry has also been mentioned. There is great creativity waiting to be used in many industries.

I do not wish to talk about Trevor Bayliss and his clockwork radio, because people who have never been to university invent and produce important things because their brain is ticking and because the receive support. It was not easy to get support for the clockwork radio, which is so important in the developing world, but it happened. He now argues for a bachelor of invention degree.

We heard a little about intellectual property and the primary curriculum review. That will be important. People do not have a clue what intellectual property really is. I know about it because I have had an insect named after me, so I have a really important patent. That is the first time that I have confessed that. It has been no use to me and I am not a multimillionaire. When people discover things, they go immediately to get patents. I did so because I was told to. A patent lawyer who moved in university circles told me that I must go and get a patent. I would be surprised if anything is named after the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey).

Mr. Vaizey: If the hon. Gentleman is going to share this information with the House, he could at least specify which insect is named after him.

Dr. Gibson: It is a very social insect. Does the hon. Gentleman understand what an ant is?

Mr. Vaizey: Yes.

Dr. Gibson: Well, it is a kind of ant. Now there is a confession for you.

Publishers and others should encourage young people to discover new ants, or whatever it is that might some day be useful in an experiment. Of course, at the other end, there is the drug industry with its patents, intellectual property rights and so on. The system seems to work. It generates a field where one can act to prevent other people from using the product of one's own endeavours. I think that the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills, created by the Prime Minister, will tackle a lot of the problems that I am talking about.

Patents are important. We judge the success of industries, universities and higher education centres by the number of patents they hold. It is a crude measure of success. I do not see why copyrights could not also be a crude measure of success in certain industries. It ought to be done much more avidly than it is.

We need to think not just about music when considering the problems of downloading. We need to think about the kinds of problem addressed by the new all-party writers' group that we have set up. People's writing is being exploited. An article that appeared in the Evening Standard appears in the Hong Kong Times under the same name, but nobody has been asked for permission to print it, and they certainly do not get paid for it. One might ask why they should be, to which the answer is: they should be paid for it because writing is their only source of income.

I spoke the other day to Maureen Freely, the famous president of the Authors Licensing and Collecting Society in this country. She is eminent and well known. When she writes a book, she gets £1,000 laid on the table, just like that. We talk about the minimum wage, but such a book takes her three years to produce, and she gets £1,000 from the publishers. That is not a problem for J.K. Rowling, Peter Mandelson, ex-Prime Ministers and such people, who get big money, but it is a problem for the majority of writers in this country whose products people enjoy.

We are moving into an age in which books, too, can be downloaded on to digital devices. I am not sure how many books can stored, but I think that somebody told me it was 30,000. There is nothing like curling up with a book. I am sure that the Minister enjoys it as much as the rest of us, but there is now the opportunity to read them on a digital screen. It may not be as cuddly, but it is certainly there, and it exploits a lot of the work that writers do. That is a problem.

We will hear more about the music industry. The all-party writers' group is supported by the ALCS, many of whose surveys have turned up interesting facts about public attitudes to copyright. Most people surveyed believe that artists should be recompensed for their work rather than having it purloined. They believe that a reasonable sum should be given them, because that is their sole income. As I have pointed out, many are not as successful as Ian Rankin, J.K. Rowling and so on. There is always a spread. Downloading can happen with the written word as well, and I think that it will increase.

Mr. Vaizey: Is it not also a problem for writers that the Government have cut the money available for the public lending right?

Dr. Gibson: That is another issue, of course. The ALCS owes the Prime Minister £60 for a book that he produced, and we are hoping to be able to present him with a cheque at an event here in the House of Commons in a few months' time. The hon. Gentleman has a point, but that comes from diminishing the amount of money that writers get from library loans and so on. Maybe we can persuade the Prime Minister that it would have been £160 if the Government had not reduced the amount of money that writers get from book borrowing from libraries.

Margaret Hodge: Although we have given a tough settlement this year—the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) is correct in saying that—does my hon. Friend agree that we have increased the amount of money that an author can get per copy in the past five years? I think that it has more than doubled. That is a massive increase, and it shows the support that we give writers, unlike the Conservatives, who never did anything but cut, cut, cut every year.

Dr. Gibson: I am not into sectarian violence in Havana Hall this afternoon, that is for sure. However, the point is well made. We have recognised the problem and produced a solution. Many people may find it a little severe, but I am sure that we can do something about it to encourage younger people starting their careers by giving them some recompense for the work that they produce.

We have heard about education. As always, it is half the battle. The DCMS report says that intellectual property rights are poorly understood, and the point has been made that many of the public love a bit of piracy here and there, as they are getting something for free. A large percentage of consumers have looked at pirated video content, and one cannot go to a cinema now without being extolled to report anybody who is holding up a camera and trying to record the film being shown.

Teenagers realise that they can download things for free instead of having to use their parents' credit card, which is the alternative. That that is illegal should be inculcated in them through the education system. Adults will download free books, so it is not just teenagers; adults will do it too if it is easy enough. Free music and free books may someday mean no music and no books. People may find it difficult to continue to produce if piracy continues to happen. DCMS says that reducing software piracy would generate 30,000 jobs and £11 billion into the official economy, so it is worth doing.

Another recommendation that we have heard about relates to the Strategic Advisory Board for Intellectual Property Policy. The board is doing fine, although its predecessor had a few problems—basically, it did not have people who knew what they were talking about. Feargal Sharkey of British Music Rights made that point:

> "If the Board on IP wants to contribute to Government thinking on Intellectual Property in a meaningful way, it has to involve people who make their living from their creativity and hence, understand the true value of copyright."

Everyone here will have read the magnificent report from the Select Committee on Innovation, Universities and Skills, which I chair, "The Work and Operation of the Copyright Tribunal". The Copyright Tribunal is basically one man and a dozen different types of lawyer. That one man runs it in his spare time. He sits around trying to unravel copyright disputes between the people who made a work and the people who use it, who may think that the fine imposed on them is too high. Members might be interested to know that even undertakers appear before the tribunal for having downloaded music to use during ceremonies. It is a strange organisation, and the Select Committee makes some stringent comments about it and what might be done to improve it, not the least of which is that we cannot have one senior QC running it in his spare time.

One case cost £12 million to resolve. That makes it difficult for the small person who cannot get into that kind of network or a game involving forensic lawyers and lawyers of other dimensions. It is not possible. We must have some new copyright tribunal system, so that when disputes arise—hopefully we can eliminate many of them by other mechanisms; we have heard about some of what is going on with the internet—writers as well as people from the musical world have a fair shot. Orphan works whose source is hard to trace are another problem. The cost of cases needs to be cut and the administration of the tribunal needs to be overhauled.

This is an exciting time when, for once, we will be looking seriously at creativity. There will always be problems, but copyright is a problem that has been around for a long time. I do not have immediate solutions to it in terms of catching and punishing those who abuse it. We do so a lot through Home Office functions and so on, if people are downloading information. We need to consider whether we want to give people credit for the work that they produce and pay for it in some way. Both writers and musicians in this country have been undervalued for years and years.

I am so pleased that people interested in intellectual property are now calling meetings, including in this House. The Westminster Forum too will be holding one. So something is stirring. I think that Parliament, Ministers and Departments now need to get stuck in and help creativity. The industries will not survive or hit their potential unless we allow the people involved the right to get paid and to own their work. That is the way to encourage many more people into the industry.

I am continually amazed by the talent in this small island—it seems endless. I just wonder how much we fail it sometimes with the kind of structures that we set up and the laws that we put in place. How many people get turned off and say, "Well, there is no living to be made out of this, so I might as well do something else."? There is a problem in higher education and if we do not watch out, we will lose much of that creativity.

3.50 pm

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Weir. I would like to refer to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. We are hoping that MP4's greatest hits, when it goes triple platinum, will also be put on the list, but that is probably a good while off.

The debate has been a long time coming. I cannot believe that, in the seven years that I have been in the House, we have not had a general debate about the creative industries. That is a total and utter surprise, given that the creative industries will probably overtake financial services as a major growth area of our economy. As the Minister said, there is £60 billion-worth of turnover and 1.9 million people work in the creative industries. Yet here we are, in the graveyard slot of Westminster Hall on a Thursday afternoon—the only time that we could secure for a debate on this really important part of our economy.

The Minister alluded to the fact that the UK's creative industries do particularly well. International comparators are always difficult in the creative industries, but the OECD found that, compared with countries such as France, Australia, Canada and even the United States, the UK comes out top in terms of its contribution. Exports are huge—4.5 per cent. of our export turnover is in the creative industries sector. It is a massive industry. I would have thought that the Government would want to crow about that. It is a huge UK success story. I do not think that anybody in the Chamber would disagree with the fact that we are incredible innovators; it is something that this country does well. I would have thought that they would want debates every week on the subject. Yet here we are on a Thursday afternoon in Westminster Hall. Nevertheless, I welcome this important opportunity to debate the subject.

The term "creative industries" probably did not even exist 20 years ago. There was a creative sector, in which all the activities went on, but the idea that it could come together and be streamlined was way off. Even 10 years ago, we would have found it difficult to think about strategies for the creative industries. Five years ago, who would have imagined that we would be talking about the creative industries being an engine for urban Britain, which is alluded to in the Government's strategy paper? We are where we are, and it is enormously important that we get things right.

The creative industries are in pretty good, robust health. However, they need to be sensitively handled. They are fragile industries and things could so easily go badly wrong. We saw that with the dotcom companies and a number of new technologies and media organisations. We must be careful in applying policies to the creative industries. They must be applied sensitively, with due care and attention and always in consultation with the industries.

We must be aware that there is always a healthy tension between the creators and artists, and the idea of industry. I welcome that. It is a good debate that we should kick about and explore a little—where that energy, dynamism, talent and artistry start and how the idea of business and industry fits in on top of that. It is important that we acknowledge and consider that when looking at the strategies and policies required for the development of our creative industries.

I am a little disappointed about how the Government look after our creative industries. What disappoints me more than anything else is that things seem to be haphazardly organised. For example, it is unfortunate that responsibility is split across a number of Departments. In the Select Committee report from the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), a number of stakeholders mentioned that we need more co-ordination within the Government when looking after the creative industries. It is not good enough that things such as intellectual property and copyright remain with the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform, but that cultural and artistic responsibilities reside with the Minister and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

[Pete Wishart]

What might be even more disappointing is the fact that the Treasury likes to stick its oar in occasionally. We must remember that the Andrew Gowers review on intellectual property was Treasury-driven and reported back during the Budget. I happen to think that that is not the best way to look after such an important sector of our economy in need of such care and attention. I humbly suggest that we appoint a dedicated creative industries Minister, who could work across Departments and ensure that there is co-ordination and that the right thing is done to look after this very important sector.

I do not know what to make of the Government's strategy. Do not get me wrong: there are lots of good things in it. It is a good start to trying to bring together such diverse and divergent industries. I welcome the ambition to make the UK the creative hub of the world. In fact, we are probably that already, although it is not down to anything that this or previous Governments have done; it is just something that we do well. I understand the ambition, although I think that we will need a little more than £70 million of investment if we are serious about meeting it.

A number of policy announcements seem to rehash things that have been said before. However, there is a lot of good stuff in the strategy. In particular, I welcome the measures for tackling internet crime and piracy, and we heard several significant and worthwhile contributions on that. I do not think that the problem will be resolved with a voluntary code. There is no chance of that happening, so I think that legislation will be required to tackle the problem. Again, it is critical that we get that right, particularly for our film and music industries.

Mr. Don Foster: The hon. Gentleman might be right that a voluntary approach will not work, but does he not at least applaud the fantastic work being done—rather belatedly—to develop such procedures? Is he aware that Apple is negotiating the possibility of a £10 top-up on the price of an iPod, which is the biggest downloading device, and free downloading, which could solve the problem overnight?

Pete Wishart: I recognise the efforts being made, although I am not sure that I would support Apple's intention of putting a surplus on the cost of an iPod. That needs proper consideration. However, there are a number of initiatives and endeavours by internet service providers to tackle the problem. I get frustrated when I hear some of the public announcements by those ISPs that will do all that they can to thwart such efforts. They do not seem to be interested in engaging with the debate and tackling the problem.

I think that the Minister will have to legislate to get things right. I hope that, when legislation comes, we will also address the Whittingdale Junior issue—let us call it that. We must seriously and clearly get the message across that that is real crime. Stealing someone's intellectual property is as serious and significant as stealing someone's toaster, video or car. Even though it does not exist in a physical reality, it is still a crime. In framing legislation, we could have that debate and challenge such assumptions.

It is not easy for the Government, and I recognise the Minister's difficulties. How do we properly legislate for creativity? At its heart and engine are imagination and talent. We must approach those things in the right way in our strategies. We would not have the creative industries without the musicians, authors, writers and inventors. It is impossible to conceive of the creative industries without them, so they should be at the heart of policy thinking and the first to be consulted when the Government develop strategies and approaches. It is unfortunate that sometimes they are the last people to whom we turn when looking at such issues.

It will not surprise the Chamber if I turn my attention exclusively to the music industry, which is particularly close to my heart and about which I have a few things to say. We must acknowledge what a success story the UK music industry is; it has decades of unparalleled success. The UK music industry has dominated charts on both sides of the Atlantic and worldwide. Again, it is something that we do spectacularly well. We must do all that we can to ensure that it retains its predominant status in the world. Everyone has their favourites, but there is something about the way in which we produce and look after artists that ensures that we have such fantastic products. That is very important and valuable to the way in which we look after the music industry.

The music industry is more than just general economics, the bands and the artists; music gives added value to all the creative industries, and even to the general economy. When people are asked why they have broadband access, for example, they say that it is to ensure that they can get the music downloads they want. That is one reason why people get involved in new media in the first place, and that is what the music industry can add to all those areas. The music industry, possibly more than any other creative industry, is a particularly fragile instrument and organisation. It exists on the front line of digital and technological innovation, and all the time it has to watch its back for pirates and all the other technological innovators who are doing all they can to ensure that they get something for nothing from the music industry. We must be ever-vigilant to ensure that the music industry is protected, and that is why I welcome the Minister's strong words today to ensure that such people will be tackled.

The UK music industry needs our support, and I hope that the Government recognise its contribution and its critical role on the front line of technological and digital innovation, and that they will work with the industry to ensure that it is protected from such things. We must do more to ensure that we respect our artists and performers. I shall come on to term extension, but beyond that, it is important to ensure that our artists and performers are properly respected, acknowledged and rewarded for the work that they secure and achieve.

There is a fortune to be made in the music industry, and we all know about rich pop stars. I was listening to the Paul McCartney divorce trial—was he worth £200 million or £800 million? It does not really matter to me; all I can say is that it is a hell of a lot of money. In the 15 years that I spent in the music industry, I met many more poor musicians than rich, and the Musicians Union reckons that the majority of musicians live on less than £15,000 a year. There is no such thing as a minimum wage for a jobbing and aspiring musician; it is tough out there and these are really tough times for musicians. When they get that break—that one hit single, which is played throughout the years and the decades—it must be right to ensure that they are properly rewarded for that contribution and do not have it taken away in their old age. It is absurd and silly that musicians and performers alone, among all artists, creators and performers, are subject to that unique discrimination. Why should authors, writers and all those other people who make such creative pieces of work be rewarded with lifetime plus 70 years, but musicians lose that reward after 50 years?

The situation is becoming critical. The late '50s and early '60s saw the first explosion of British music, when Cliff arrived, the Beatles were at the vanguard and Merseybeat dominated music, but their work is reaching the 50 years copyright cut off. At the launch of my private Member's Bill, I met Lonnie Donegan's widow, and she could not believe that American artists were protected and the copyright passed to their descendants, the next generation. She is subject to that cut off and does not receive a penny from her husband's estate.

Dr. Gibson: Is the hon. Gentleman familiar with the case in the United States whereby Cliff Richard increased the rights to his music to 95 years? Ninety-five years for Cliff Richard? It is unbelievable.

Pete Wishart: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's frustration, given Cliff Richard's great wealth, but the issue is not really about him, and sometimes it frustrates me when the argument becomes about the rich pop stars and artists whom we all like. They are mentioned, but it is not about them; it is about the guy who played bass guitar on "Move It", and the guy who played the drums on Cliff's first and second album. They will be receiving some royalties for their performance on the record, but in the next couple of years they will not receive any money for it.

Dr. Gibson: Will the hon. Gentleman add to that list the artists who, if they sell a picture, sculpture or whatever, receive only a small percentage? The agent takes most of it. It is like the situation on the football field.

Pete Wishart: I am not saying that some artists, creators or whoever should not be similarly rewarded. There is a very good point to be made on that, but I am talking about the music industry. I shall give the hon. Gentleman an example and refer to a single from that period again—the early 1950s. The writers, producer and the guy who designed the sleeve of that single will all get lifetime plus 70 years; the only people who will have the copyright cut off in their old age are the people who made the recording themselves—the musicians. That is clearly absurd and unfair, and I have never heard a reason why it could possibly be right. We heard from Andrew Gowers that it was all about the impact on the economy, and we have heard that that has been disputed. Charlie McCreevy, when he examined the issue in the European Union, disputed the idea that it would have an impact on the economy; in fact, he suggested that it would have a positive impact, because through the record companies, it would reward investment and artists. It would reward the companies for sticking with artists and ensuring that their work continued to be available.

I see no reason why musicians should not be properly rewarded for what they do, so I was immensely encouraged by Commissioner McCreevy's announcement a few weeks ago. It took us all by surprise, but he has clearly considered the issue and the best interests of the artists and the industry, and concluded that the best thing to do would be to increase copyright term for musicians and performers from 50 to 95 years. I do not want the Minister just to welcome and accept that conclusion; I want her to accept it enthusiastically, if that is not asking too much. I want her to get up and say, "This is the right thing by our industry and our artists, and we will do this." There is no good reason why the Government cannot pursue it, and with all due respect to her, she will probably have to do so anyway. It is not a red-line issue for the UK, so the Government will have to get behind it, and it would be best to get behind it now and say something positive to the music industry. We are looking for any acceptance of that conclusion by the Government, and she would earn great credit if she did so. She will not be able to do so this afternoon, but she should do so soon, because she will find herself being hailed as a great friend of the UK music industry.

We are, however, a million miles from the dark days of the Gowers review, and I do not want to spend too much time looking at what he said. I accept that there were a few good suggestions, but I have mentioned that it was Treasury-driven, and unfortunately he surrounded himself with economists and barely spoke to the artists and creators. Some of the consultations and submissions to his report were fine, excellent and first class, and his failure to acknowledge them in his recommendations was disappointing. He saw copyright as belonging not to the artists and the creator, but, almost perversely, to society and the consumer, and that it should be returned to the creator and artists only as a grudging concession and a pat on the back. It was an absurd way to start, but the review was full of it, and the section on term extension very much suggested and put across that viewpoint.

Gowers got it totally wrong. The music industry thinks he got it totally wrong, most hon. Members think he got it entirely wrong, and 36,000 musicians, from the high and mighty to the most humble who signed the petition, thought he got it wrong. It is time that we put it right, and we have the opportunity to do so with Commissioner McCreevy's appointment. I hope that we can do the right thing, put that historic wrong perpetuated against musicians right, and end the discrimination against performers and artists.

I like these debates because they always tend to be consensual and we do not fall out with each other. We are all veterans of these discussions.

Mr. Don Foster: I have the benefit of being able to see the hon. Gentleman's notes, to which he has hardly referred, and I see that he is coming to the end of them. Since he probably knows more than anyone else in this room about music and the music industry, may I urge him before he concludes to say a word or two about live music? He has concentrated heavily on recorded music, but I know that he knows a lot about live music, too.

Pete Wishart: I am grateful for that compliment. Live music is close to my heart, and in the creative industry strategy, there is, unfortunately, little mention of live music or its value. The big issue for me in live music is ticket touting and the secondary market of the internet. "T in the Park" takes place just outside my constituency.

[Pete Wishart]

It is the most successful European live festival and sells out in a matter of hours. However, most of it sells out to the secondary market on the internet, which, with live music, is what we should really be tackling. That is the real issue for live music, and I hope that the Government address it to ensure that music fans do not continue being ripped off.

I was about to conclude my remarks, as the hon. Gentleman noted, and I merely say that we are starting to get things right and I share the Government's ambition to make the UK a hub. Much of the strategy does not apply to Scotland, and Creative Scotland is being established in the next few months. We have our new culture Bill in Scotland, and we are doing very exciting and innovative work. However, we are interested in what is happening down here and particularly the idea of creative education. I would like to find out a bit more about that before I suggest to colleagues back in Scotland that we should be following that model. If creative education is just about taking kids to operas or museums without providing any real educational context, I do not think that there would be any great value in any of it. We must ensure that, when we are giving these experiences to children, it is set in a wider context so that real learning can be achieved.

These are good debates in Westminster Hall. We all tend to agree that this is the right thing to do and I think that we all support the creative industries. I very much hope that we can continue to develop them and I share the Minister's ambition that the UK becomes the world's hub for the creative industries.

4.10 pm

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to take part in this debate, particularly under your chairmanship, Mr. Weir, because I found out today what it is like to be sitting in the Chair with the referee's outfit on. I must say, echoing the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart), that this is clearly an immensely entertaining debate, and I have looked forward to it.

When we consider the creative industries, we hear a lot about music and entertainment. I represent Stoke-on-Trent, North, which includes the home town of Robbie Williams, and there are obviously huge issues about how we ensure that all our creative artists, whether they are recording music or performing live, are looked after, nurtured and encouraged, and how, in turn, they become the mentors for a new generation of people.

We have heard a lot from my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) about the creative writing group in the House of Commons. I must say, as an officer of the all-party group on jazz appreciation, that the issues that relate to music are really important. I hope that the copyright cut-off, which has largely been the subject of our discussion this afternoon, will be examined very closely by the Minister and that we will not have to wait and can go forward all guns blazing and emerge with a policy that does the right thing.

Given that this is a debate on the creative industries, I wanted to refer briefly to the "Creative Britain - New Talents for the New Economy" document and to flag up an issue that we have heard about, which is giving more children a creative education, including the "Find Your Talent" programme. I was interested to hear my right hon. Friend the Minister's comments about that programme. Having looked very briefly at the website and the criteria for the pilot projects that will be funded from the new money—I think that there will be 21 pilots in all—I should like to relay a message to my colleagues in Stoke-on-Trent, north Staffordshire, to urge them to put in a bid for some of that money.

As part of the regeneration exercise that we have under way in north Staffordshire, we are staging the second year of the Axis festival, which will encourage people across Stoke-on-Trent to take part in all kinds of music entertainment. At this point, I should declare an interest: my husband will be performing live in one of the festival's fringe events. I really believe that we should do everything that we can, particularly in deprived areas with a huge regeneration agenda, to encourage creative industries as part of a regeneration programme. I, for one, hope that I will have the opportunity to write letters in support of a bid that comes forward from my own constituency.

Perhaps not surprisingly, the main reason for my wanting to stay for this debate at the risk of not getting on one of the last Virgin trains before the work starts on the west coast main line—so entertaining is the debate that I am taking that risk—is to flag up the message that I have for my right hon. Friends the Minister and the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport that, when we talk about this issue, as well as talking about music and art, we must talk about ceramics as a creative industry. If I am able to get that message across today and as a result engage with my right hon. Friend the Minister and with the Minister for the West Midlands in a programme of pledges and follow-up activities that relate to all the details of the commitments in the White Paper, I shall be very pleased indeed. I must say, happily, that I have already met with officials and with the British Design Council, along with colleagues from north Staffordshire.

Mr. Vaizey: I wonder whether the hon. Lady, given her interest in ceramics and craft, would support our proposal to take the Crafts Council back out of the Arts Council, which would give the crafts and ceramic design a much higher profile as a result?

Joan Walley: As someone who has not served on the Select Committee and who has not followed all the detailed developments that have clearly taken place in relation to where the Crafts Council should be in future, I am very hesitant to give my view on what is clearly a contentious issue. However, such is my confidence in my right hon. Friend the Minister that, whatever decision is made about where those different bodies should sit, I am sure that they will be placed in a position where they can make the best possible contribution to the creative industries.

I should like to go back to a document that has been referred to, "Transforming North Staffordshire", which is by the Work Foundation and Mr. Will Hutton. It is important that this debate reflects the fact that not only did Mr. Hutton contribute to one of the earlier stages of thinking on the current strategy, but he was commissioned by the North Staffordshire Partnership to produce this regeneration document and to contribute towards the strategy for regenerating north Staffordshire. Obviously, creative industries featured in that document, and it is vital that we look at the synergies that exist. I have a very real sense that, unless we consistently put that message on the agenda, there will be a rash of activity that will relate to music or art, but ceramics will not be included in that activity.

I attended a festival where ceramics manufacturers were very much on the same side of the fence as those who are involved with the music industry and the record industry, and they have exactly the same issues about copyright. I say to my right hon. Friend the Minister that copyright is an idea that we must develop as part of the strategy.

I think that it would be worth while if I briefly gave some of the history of the ceramics industry, because there is a flawed argument that ceramics is all about heavy industrial pottery manufacturing. I just want to set out my concerns about the ceramics industry. As we face up to the challenges of a global economy, it is vital that we understand the industry and how it has developed from what was originally an arts and crafts movement to a heavy manufacturing industry, whereby drains and sanitary, refectory and hotel wares were its main means of going forward.

Today, the ceramics industry is about both heavy industry and the small and medium-sized enterprises, the design artists and craft-led artists. Very much in the tradition of people such as William Morris, Ruskin and so on, we now have a renaissance of artists, who perhaps have come through Staffordshire university and its wonderful departments. We have a large number of individuals who are now starting to generate a whole new economy; it is as though the whole ceramics industry has gone full circle.

It is, of course, important that we support the heavy industrial manufacturers and those in that sector who still have a huge contribution to make in terms of innovation, but it is just as important that we consider the smaller companies and the individual craftsmen and craftswomen who need the support of the creative industry strategy.

We have already had a commitment from the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport that he will visit north Staffordshire, and we have already had the opportunity to discuss the possibility of having a design-led exhibition. However, we really need to consider how we can take forward the strategy document from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and understand the detailed aspects of the ceramics industry, including its link to tourism, whereby a large number of people come to Stoke-on-Trent because of what they can buy or see there. We must use that as a basis for developing economic policy across the west midlands. I very much hope that the debate will mean that we can go full steam ahead and ensure that the ceramics industry is fully a part of the debate about creative industries.

4.20 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): The City of London is famously home to the UK's financial services industry. The hon. Members for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) and for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) have somewhat gleefully pointed out that its pre-eminence in the UK economy might not be quite so pronounced in the years ahead, but they are right to focus on the creative industries. In addition to financial services, central London has every reason to be very proud, as it is at the forefront of creative industry. I hope that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) will forgive me if I do not talk too much about ceramics, as I shall focus on areas that the public tend to associate with the creative industries, such as film and TV. That is not to downplay any of her comments, however, and I hope that the Minister takes on board the concerns that she voiced in this interesting debate.

English is now the universal language of business and the creative culture in London and the UK assists in reinforcing the global competitive advantage that we have with our creative industries. In my constituency, particularly in Soho and the west end, lies the heart of the British media, TV and film industry. We also have great success in design. Good design is ever more at the forefront of consumers' minds. That is a strong sign of a democratic—that word has been used by several hon. Members today—active society that values choice and consumerism. It also leads the whole debate on design, which requires active input from the public at large—from the old and young alike. We must consider not only what is esoteric, but what is significant, in relation to design issues. With those elements, the UK creative industry is at the forefront of many international developments.

We have great expertise in elements of information technology and much originality in the computer games industry. With Japan, we are world leaders in that area. I had the opportunity to visit such a company in Soho only a few months ago. Its offices, in a Soho back street, seem very unassuming from the outside, but inside it is enormously energetic. The offices are open plan, which is how those young, energetic businesses run themselves. They are not exclusively young, but given all the state-of-the-art technology, the people working there are generally in their 20s. There is a sense of energy in the midst of the roads that are made up of cafés, restaurants and seemingly faceless offices. It is amazing to think that those enormous, energetic, world-beating industries are just 2 or 3 miles from where we stand. When I met the people who work there and who run those businesses, I was struck by their passion and commitment to reaching the highest level of technical skill. They have a real determination to ensure that nothing is left to chance and that excellence is maintained. Without that excellence, our creative industries would suffer.

It is both positive and negative that many young people who are not UK citizens work in those industries. Clearly, we are a beacon for young computer programmers from the Indian sub-continent, in particular, and from eastern Europe, but the downside is that too many among our indigenous population have insufficient skills. I shall focus some of my comments on that issue, and I hope that the Minister will take them on board.

There is little doubt that the creative industries as a whole rank as the next most important economic driving force after our financial services industry. It would be wrong to exaggerate some of the problems that the financial services are suffering at the moment, but there is no doubt that in a world in which leisure will become ever more important, we have enormous potential. The middle classes in India and China are increasing enormously, by 20 million or 30 million people a year, and those people will be global consumers in the years ahead. That is not to say that Bollywood will not remain important—it will be an increasingly important film business in the decades ahead—but our advantages in areas such as computer gaming and many creative industries will ensure that we can export tremendous skills and passion to many overseas shores.

In the worlds of broadcast and new media, the tremendous combination of British flair and innovation plays a leading role in creating new products and exporting expertise to the developing world as a whole. We must ensure that the vibrancy in the creative industries is fully recognised at home and promoted to an outside world that is ever more hungry for developments in that field. To do that, we need to ensure that we have a rigorous education system in the creative arts and its allied subjects. A depressing element of life in the summer is the predicable reaction to the announcement of A-level and university results. Commentators who really should know better—some Conservative and some Labour—bemoan the emergence of media studies and film and TV courses at the expense of traditional, academic, higher education subjects.

It is important to encourage the uptake of demanding courses at our universities, but that should not be the whole story. We must also promote the best vocational courses. The flurry of disapproval of those who do media studies or other so-called soft courses is very disheartening, especially as that is where many of the employment opportunities and openings of the future will lie. Indeed, graduate employment statistics bear that out: unemployed media studies graduates are rather less in evidence than unemployed graduates of many more traditional degree subjects. The real issue is not the number of A-level or degree students doing media studies but ensuring that the courses on offer are rigorous enough. Far more needs to be done to involve companies and people who work in the creative industries to ensure that the courses being studied are practical and effective. As several hon. Members have commented, this is a fast-changing world, and such courses must change accordingly.

We should encourage our creative industries to work closely with our universities to make media studies, and other courses in the fast-growing roster of related courses, a fast track towards the skilled and creative industry openings that I have mentioned. That should not mean, however, that we forget the importance of energy, innovation and flair. It is important that we do not take an overly bureaucratic approach. Having worked in the creative industry, the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire is probably aware that it is taking a slightly schizophrenic approach to say that we want to have structures, because the very nature of working in the creative industries is that the lifestyle is unstructured. That is not to say that when such people get to their 50s and 60s, they do not regret having had an unstructured lifestyle which may mean that they do not have a pension. Nevertheless, we must avoid stifling the flair and innovation in the acting, music and other creative industries by being too rigorous. That inevitable tension and strain will surround any policy making in this area, because creativity, rather like entrepreneurialism, cannot simply be taught in the classroom. We can ensure, however, that the skills picked up during a degree or diploma course are made as practical as possible.

We must remember that most of those who work in our creative industries are employed in small businesses—often start-ups and one-man or one-woman shows. With that in mind, some of the changes to the capital gains tax regime are especially bad news for some small, start-up businesses. It makes a mockery of the warm words and positivity in the Government's creative industries document if, at the same time, young, innovative fashion designers and other artists face greater barriers to the development and expansion of their businesses under the capital gains tax regime that is in place. I support the simplicity of an 18 per cent. rate, but many start-up businesses that are going to be sold off in a relatively short time would have qualified for a taper relief down at 10 per cent. Again, in fairness to the Government, that taper relief has been in place only since 2002. It is not as though they are throwing away many years of tax advantages, but it is to be regretted that, in many ways, some of the biggest losers are not those whose voices are the loudest.

As the Member who represents the City of London, I have spoken openly of some of my concerns about vocal complaints from the non-domiciled community about changes to their tax, many of which I believe would be supported by the public at large. But in respect of small, start-up businesses, particularly in this important sphere, there will be many young, creative entrepreneurs who will have good reason to regret that the capital gains tax regime has been changed to their detriment.

Our nation has been at the heart of global trade and the financial and commercial services fields for some centuries. As I mentioned earlier, there is the rapid emergence of two enormous markets today, let alone in the decades ahead: India and China, with more than 2.5 billion consumers. They will undoubtedly be the economic superpowers of the future. For Stoke-on-Trent, North, certain elements of that will probably result in somewhat heavy hearts, but there could be tremendous advantages for the creative industries.

In answer to my earlier intervention, the Minister rightly pointed out that the real challenge for our creative industries is to ensure that they can add value by employing the highest skills possible. It is all the more important, therefore, that we promote spheres of excellence and comparative economic advantage. We need to maintain our place as one of the world's great innovators in film animation, computer games and all other parts of the creative industries. That will happen only if we encourage our young people towards creative university degree courses as well as the more academic options that are available. In that way, we will continue to compete with the growing capabilities in the Indian sub-continent and the far east, and I suspect that the benefits to our nation will be clear not just today but hopefully for generations to come.

4.31 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I am delighted that we have the opportunity to have this debate. As has been said, it is disappointing that a debate on something that everybody in the room has said is crucial for the future of this country is taking place at the fag end of the parliamentary week, just before a holiday. It deserves much greater prominence.

None the less, we are having a debate, and I am delighted to have an opportunity to join in. We have already had some fantastic contributions from both sides of the House. It has been a stimulating debate, and I have learned a great deal. I am grateful to hon. Members for the insights that they have shared.

I have only one criticism. It is of the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who, in a passing reference in his speech, referred to the excitement of the creative writers down the corridor. He said that he was at the other end of the corridor doing boring, nerdy science. Those were his precise words—I wrote them down. I am sure that he will reflect on those words and regret them. I know that he believes that science is extremely exciting. Indeed, the stories of why Tycho Brahe spent his life doing fantastic science with an amalgam nose, or of what James Prescott Joule did on his honeymoon and the contribution that that made to the development of science, are as exciting as some of the stories by the people at the other end of the corridor to whom he referred.

This is a very important debate. Sadly, nobody so far has used it as an opportunity to point out that this week we have seen the deaths of two important people who worked in the creative industries. The passing of Anthony Minghella at such an early age is a huge sadness, because he made a huge contribution, and Arthur C. Clarke, with his fantastic ideas about communication satellites, all his science fiction, the film "2001" and so on is also a great loss.

This debate is about ensuring that we can provide the framework to find, nurture and develop the talents of future Minghellas and Clarkes. I am therefore delighted that the Government, through their various Departments—I shall come back to that point shortly—have pulled together this document and shown that they believe that the creative industries are critical for our future. I shall criticise one or two of the proposals contained in it, but, broadly speaking, it is an important and exciting document that helps to chart the way forward.

I note with considerable interest Simon Hoggart's sketch in The Guardian on 11 March, in which he referred to the Minister. I note that he says that he is fond of her—we are delighted—but makes the point, with some validity, that some of the figures that are used by the Government are enormously precise for an industry that is incredibly diverse and difficult to get hold of. To be told that it makes up and contributes a value of £60.8 billion is probably going a little far with the gathering and analysis of statistics. None the less, that is the order of magnitude. Those figures illustrate just how important a part of the economy and the lifeblood of this country the creative industries are.

"7.3 per cent. of our national output"

Of course, we have a difficulty in defining creative industries. I listened to the important speech of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) about an issue that she, coming from the Potteries, understandably feels passionate about: ceramics. She will be disappointed to note that the definition of creative industries in the document features only as a tiny footnote—it is not in the main body of the document. There is a definition, but it does not include the word "ceramics". I assume that ceramics are included in crafts. The document points out that the list is not exclusive, so she can have hope that the word "ceramics" might be included.

Joan Walley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Foster: I give way to the hon. Lady, who has read the document even more diligently than I have.

Joan Walley: I am most grateful. I have indeed read the document with a toothcomb, and I take great heart from a comment on page 64, which I referred to earlier. It states that the ceramics movement is redefining itself

"as part of a new creative economy."

That is good enough for me, and good enough to ensure that the Government will work with me in that area.

Mr. Foster: Excellent. I am delighted that the hon. Lady is satisfied, but perhaps she could persuade the Government that, if they rewrite the document, the footnote to page 6 could say a little more about ceramics. None the less, she is right. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) from a sedentary position disagrees, but he will make his contribution in a few minutes, and all will be well.

It is important for anyone who speaks on behalf of a political party to reflect clearly their party's views. Therefore, I want to say that there are many areas in which we believe that this country is doing incredibly well. Music has already been mentioned. There is no doubt that this country is a global force in music. It is, arguably, the third in the world in terms of the music market, but it is probably No. 1 in the world for innovation and creativity, and that is crucial.

We discussed copyright, to which I shall briefly come in a few seconds. We have already heard about the importance of addressing illegal downloading and, of course, illegal uploading. I shall not repeat the comments that I made when I intervened in that discussion, but one of the difficulties is that while we can find the internet protocol address of those who are guilty, it is very hard to obtain their physical location. Mr. Whittingdale Junior must be worried: he is one of the few people for whom we do not know the IP address but do know his physical address, and that, of course, is what is needed for prosecutions to take place.

The design industry is worth some £10 billion a year. The fashion industry, which raises £100 million in fashion week alone for the London economy, is critical. Advertising, which has not yet been mentioned, is a critical part of the creative economy, funding 95 per cent. of our national press and 95 per cent. of commercial radio.

Film has rightly been mentioned. There have been fantastic successes in films, including those supported by FilmFour, such as that wonderful animation, "Peter and the Wolf", which is well worth seeing and won an Oscar. I strongly recommend it. There is a long list of Oscar winners, including Daniel Day-Lewis and Tilda Swinton. Tremendous work is being done to try, voluntarily—I accept the points made earlier—to tackle the uploading and downloading of film on the internet. That is as important an issue in respect of film as it is in the music industry.

[Mr. Don Foster]

Wonderful work is being done by all sorts of organisations. BBC Blast deserves a mention, because it is targeting disaffected teenagers and getting them involved in the creative industry. Tremendous work is being done by the British Council, which is rarely mentioned in debates about creativity. However, the British Council is increasingly focusing its work in this field, which is welcome. It has created a series of awards celebrating Britain's experience and expertise in the creative industry.

The video game industry has been mentioned briefly and only once in this debate, by the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), but we should not forget it, because it is the fourth largest in the world and, sadly, so often the all-purpose punchbag for politicians. Yet the vast majority of what it does should be applauded and celebrated by all of us in this Chamber.

We have touched only briefly, and rather oddly, on the tremendous success due to creative partnerships, a Government initiative that I was critical of in its early days that has now transformed itself so much that it deserves to get a plug for its work. Some fantastic things have come out of that. I am saddened that there is not more in the Government's document about how to build on that existing structure and develop it, rather than suggesting adding new structures.

The document mentions some fantastic things, which I welcome, including the development of 5,000 apprentices a year, the five new centres of excellence in creative skills and the world creative business conference. It will be worth considering how the latter can develop. Although I note the Minister's enthusiasm, I am not entirely convinced that that is the way forward. However, it is worth considering. I also welcome the creative choices careers scheme.

There are many good things, but is important to consider some of the concerns. The Chair of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), was right to say that intellectual property is central to this debate. We are talking about creative industries and wealth generation as well as everything else and, unless we address intellectual property rights effectively, the rest of it is pretty meaningless. It is critical that we get right some of the things that we currently do not get right. The most obvious example of that—I accept that it is by no means the only one—was raised with passion by the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) and by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford.

I shall place my cards clearly on the table. It is wonderful that the Commissioner is now talking about an extension of copyright to 95 years, because that is exactly what is required. However, were the Minister persuaded by the arguments to go ahead, eventually, there are two possible caveats that she might wish to consider. First, although nearly every item will be placed on the web, because there is a possibility of its generating at least some income, it may still be possible that some items, which are held with an extended copyright, will never see the light of day. There ought to be some sort of "use it or lose it" clause, saying that if an owner of a copyright is not going to use the item, somebody else could use it in some way. There ought to be a mechanism to ensure that that is possible.

Secondly, although modern technology is such that this caveat is not particularly necessary, it is important to recognise that the holders of copyright have an archival responsibility. In the past, master discs have been broken up, used as rubble to provide foundations for new buildings and lost forever. There should surely be a requirement for copyright holders to hold on to the material, bring it up to date in terms of new platforms and technologies and ensure that it is secure. There should be a historical, archival responsibility alongside copyright. I hope that, with those two small caveats in mind, the Minister will be willing to look at the 95-year extension.

The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford made a valuable contribution in talking about the fragmented responsibilities in respect of the creative industries. The document mentions DCMS, BERR and DIUS—I begin to lose track of all these acronyms—and refers specifically to other Departments with responsibility, including HMT, DCSF and DCLG. Frankly, most people working in the creative industries do not have the foggiest notion what all that lot means. They do not know who to see, what the point of contact is, where to look for support, how to find out what the legislation is, or anything else. A much tighter focus is vital. Of course, cross-departmental working is important. I welcome its being discussed—but it is unclear where the funding responsibility lies.

The document mentions precise figures. I love the way it is £70.5 million, not £70 million—although the £500,000 might be important to some projects. When I mentioned the 29p per week figure, the Minister said that a lot of other things were going on. However, the figure does not just come to £70.5 million. Why that figure is included is beyond me. Millions of pounds are being spent in this area. Why have we not brought all that together and attempted to show what the Government are spending, how it is spent and where they will be bringing in extra money?

I am delighted that the Minister agrees about the fragmented responsibilities. Lottery distributors also need to be examined. Excellent work is being done by the Arts Council, the UK Film Council and the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts, which is critical and I am delighted the Minister mentioned it. We need to look at their areas of responsibility.

There are some simple issues in respect of which the Government have not addressed properly some of their own failings. For instance, participation in the arts and attendance at arts events is essential—the Minister acknowledges that and it is mentioned in the document—yet, at the moment, the Government are failing. Their own figures show that before they cleverly abolished the targets, they were not meeting them. The former Secretary of State for Department for Culture, Media and Sport, now the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, said that the Government could get rid of those targets because they were no longer needed as the Government were achieving everything they wanted to achieve. The truth is that the Government's own report shows that we are not meeting those targets.

If anybody doubts what I am saying, the figures are in the DCMS report, which shows, for example, that in respect of attendance at arts events by priority groups the baseline figure expectation of 33.7 per cent. only got to 33 per cent. There was also a failure to achieve the targets for participation in arts activities. Although the Government have rightly been applauded for the effect of free entry to museums, they have failed to meet their own targets, even in respect of attendance at museums by the various interest areas, including black and minority and lower socioeconomic groups. There is work to be done on including people.

I know that there are big ideas and big issues in the document, but some of the basics are really important. There is no point in talking about a few extra million, welcome though it is, at a time when, for instance, the number of people going to museums and the funding available to them are decreasing. Many museums are funded by local government, whose funding is being heavily squeezed under the recent settlement. If the Government want to talk about cross-departmental working, the Minister should be talking to those responsible for the local government settlement, which affects matters of her responsibility.

Interestingly, the document mentions such things as studio provision. I am sure that the Minister will know that particularly in the east end of London, perhaps because of the build-up to the Olympics, there is no point in talking about additional studio provision, because existing studio provision is being reduced dramatically. There is a lot of work to be done, and in places the document fails to recognise the basic realities that are affecting the creative industries.

Earlier, the Minister cleverly elicited from Members in all parts of the Chamber an indication that we somehow totally supported her "Find Your Talent" scheme. She listened to the interventions very well, but then suggested that we all supported the scheme entirely. The principle is wonderful in many ways, with the additional focus on and attention to creativity and culture in education, which I welcome. She has done herself a huge disservice, however, by aligning herself with the initial announcement of five hours of culture a week. That implies that culture is somehow separated from everything else.

Margaret Hodge indicated dissent.

Mr. Foster: The Minister shakes her head, but I listened to the interview on the "Today" programme with the Secretary of State, and I have listened to the way in which people have understandably picked up on the five hours of culture, done their sums and worked out that the funding for each pupil will be less than 6p an hour. Why was everybody doing those sums, if we were not talking about a set number of hours? We should integrate cultural activities and creativity far more in the curriculum, rather than talk about add-ons. I am delighted that the Minister believes that I am right about that, but I say to her that the document does not say that—it gives a very different impression.

If the Government introduce the five hours of provision, they will get into a great argument with people like me, who point out that targets are not being met and that definitions are fiddled. The Government claim that they have met their commitment to two hours of physical education in school, but they have not. Some 1 million children lose out, and the two hours include changing time. What will be the fiddles in this case? Instead, let us have culture integrated.

The hon. Member for Wantage is desperate to make a long speech—he has indicated that to me twice. I hope that I have shown that my party and I feel passionately about the matter. We support the direction in which the Government are moving. There is much more work still to be done, but I am genuinely delighted that progress is being made and that the creative industries are beginning to be given the prominence that they deserve. I know that he is about to develop that point still further, and that he shares my views on it.

4.53 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): It is a delight to appear in this important debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Weir. I did not mean to cut off the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) in his prime. He is my parliamentary mentor; he has guided me for the past three years in this place and, indeed, for many years before. He is a man of passion and commitment, but I simply wished to indicate to him that he was approaching his allotted time and might wish to start to apply the brakes. I did not mean him to come to a juddering halt. I apologise if that was the result of my gesticulation. One problem that I have is that much of what the hon. Gentleman said was what I was going to say.

Dr. Gibson: Oh, good.

Mr. Vaizey: I am deeply offended by the hon. Gentleman. He has just taken over the role as my mentor, as he is now my boss as the chairman of the all-party writers group, of which I am the secretary. There we are—a slap in the face from my new mentor.

As the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) pointed out, this is the first time that we have debated the creative industries for many years. We are doing so in a poignant week, the day after the death of the extremely well known, Oscar-winning director Anthony Minghella. It is only right that we pay tribute to him for his achievements. In many ways, he personified the success that the creative industries in this country are capable of achieving: a domestic product with a global audience and global success.

We have kicked around the statistics about the creative industries. I do not propose to repeat them, but I share the wry amusement of the hon. Member for Bath that we have the absurdly accurate figure that the creative industries account for 7.3 per cent. of our national outputs. We know that the figure is large: as the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire pointed out, the OECD puts the contribution of our creative industries above those of many countries where we might think it would be higher, such as the United States, Canada and France. Those industries are incredibly important, and I join the Minister in paying tribute to Lord Smith of Finsbury, the former Secretary of State. He deserves credit for creating the creative industries mapping document and putting those industries firmly on the map.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bath that the video games sector is often the Cinderella of the creative industries, despite its enormous importance. It is responsible for 30 per cent. of our media exports and is the fourth largest video games sector in the world. The British film industry is also the fourth largest in the world. [Interruption.] It is the third largest in the world, with a global share of 8 per cent.

[Mr. Vaizey]

Our advertising industry contributes £5 billion a year, and our television programmes sell worldwide. No one has mentioned the huge success of Sky and ITV, as well as that of our much loved BBC. We have our contemporary arts and fine art trade, with the Frieze art fair alone contributing £100 million in sales. Ceramics have had a huge outing during this debate, and of course music contributes some £5 billion to the economy.

We are here, however, to debate the Minister's important strategy paper. I am afraid that I do not agree with the golden review that she gave it, along with the people who were strong-armed and half-Nelsoned into saying that it is the best thing since sliced bread. People who are not in the pay of the Government have given a slightly more realistic view of where the paper sits in the debate on the creative economies.

A creative consultancy called BOP Consulting, which was responsible for the recent cultural audit of London on behalf of the Mayor, makes the point that "the UK is no longer leading policy thinking on the creative economy".

It states that 16 developed and emerging economies

"have policies relating to the exploitation of their creative assets as part of broader industrial and economic strategies... Seen in this global competitive context, the Creative Economy Strategy is nowhere near ambitious enough. It lacks a larger future narrative, a big idea".

I think that that is how it has generally been received—as a lot of small, bitty announcements rather than a wider narrative.

Something that has perhaps not emerged in the debate is the fact that there is no room for complacency about the success of our creative industries. My hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), in particular, touched upon the threats and opportunities provided by globalisation, particularly from China and India. BOP Consulting points out that job numbers in the creative industry "seem to have peaked in the early years of this century and not moved much since".

We talk about the creative industries growing faster than the real economy, but a lot of that growth took place during the dotcom boom.

We have waited a long time for the strategy paper. It was first mooted some three years ago, since when we have had the creative industries discussion forum, the creative economy programme, the Work Foundation's "Staying Ahead" document and, finally, what was meant to be a Green Paper but was finally downgraded to a strategy paper. Its 80-odd pages contain six reannouncements, four reviews, five consultations and 12 uncosted promises. Most of it reads like a Stalinist five-year plan, with numerous micro-initiatives and additional bureaucracy where it is not needed or wanted. With the paper, the Government show that they fail to realise that the real way to help the creative economy is by breaking down the barriers created by over-regulation, excessive tax, poor infrastructure and low educational performance, rather than with unfunded, reannounced gimmicks.

Nevertheless, as the hon. Member for Bath indicated, the Government have not been shy about promoting the document. No less than two Under-Secretaries of State, one Minister of State, three Secretaries of State and the Prime Minister himself have their mugshots on it. My favourite part of the document is the Prime Minister's introduction, which was written by a ghost author with a gift for subtle satire. He starts:

"Britain is a creative country. You can feel it every time you visit one of our great museums, galleries or theatres. You can see it when you watch the best of our television or play our imaginative new computer games".

That conjures up the surreal sight of the Prime Minister in his garret at No. 10 Downing street playing a political version of Manhunt 1 or 2 with Tony Blair or Peter Mandelson as the quarry. Such hyperbole continues. The Prime Minister—perhaps I should refer to him as the great leader—wants to "give everyone the opportunity to unlock their creative talents."

Perhaps that is why he is filling Downing street with PR executives. He goes on to say that he is "proud of the talented people in this country."

The coup de grace is the video that can be downloaded from the Downing street website on which the Prime Minister is interviewed by Blur's drummer on the importance of the creative industries strategy paper. We have gone from Oasis under Tony Blair to Blur under the Prime Minister. Who said that "Cool Britannia" was dead, or that new Labour would turn away from celebrity endorsement?

The main announcement in the creative industries strategy paper is the "Find Your Talent" programme, which is otherwise known as the so-called cultural offer, but sounds a bit like a game show. It is a pilot programme of five hours' culture a week for every child in the country. The flagship announcement had already been announced twice: by the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families and by the Minister. It is a £25 million pilot programme over three years in 10 areas, but we do not know where it will go after that.

Other people have had similar ideas. The Association of British Orchestras has already announced that it would like every child in the country to go to a classical music concert. Our own arts taskforce—it cost absolutely nothing, as opposed to the huge expense behind the strategy paper—last year proposed a cultural offer and clear policy proposals, thus indicating joined-up thinking, including improved teacher training, a schools mark for organisations that participate in the cultural offer and pathways to sustainable training for young people.

The Minister asks us to have faith that the Government's cultural offer will work and take off, and she mentioned the huge success of the Government's sports programme, yet 1 million children a year are still denied two hours' sport a week. The Government's cultural offer was announced in the same week as the Arts Council, which the Minister applauded in her opening comments, cut £150,000 from the National Youth Theatre, thus demonstrating yet again their inability to follow-through on joined-up thinking.

The document refers to creative apprenticeships, which may be a good idea, but it was announced in the 2005 Labour party manifesto and last year. It is just another reheated announcement. The draft strategy paper referred to 1,000 apprenticeships, but now there are to be 5,000. The figures seem to be worked out on the back of an envelope.

NESTA's creative innovators growth programme was put in the strategy document, but is perhaps a rehash of its highly successful Creative Pioneer Academy. That Labour party manifesto commitment was wound up last year after only 80 people attended the academy. There was also a pledge to explore the benefits of a 14-to-25 academy for the creative industries, but that is an idea from the university of the Arts, not from the Government.

There was a commitment to champion London's festivals, but the ink was barely dry on that commitment when the Minister was putting it into practice by celebrating the success of the Proms and giving them two days of fantastic coverage. The reannounceme at to protect live music venues was made in the same week that Ken Livingstone announced that the Astoria will be knocked down to make way for Crossrail. Finally demonstrating the arm's length principle for the Arts Council, it was announced that it would be used to take forward the Government's creative industries strategy.

Other ideas have fallen by the wayside. Earlier drafts referred to a major inquiry, chaired by a vice-chancellor, into putting art and design colleges and conservatoires centre stage. Presumably, no vice-chancellor knew what that meant, so none has been found to chair the inquiry. I am sad that the wonderful proposal to support a study to produce greater coherence within the British fashion industry did not make it into the final strategy paper. The jokes would have been just too easy. Seventy million pounds may be a lot to money for hon. Members, but it is not a great deal in terms of the investment that might be needed to support the creative industries and to make a difference.

The hon. Member for Bath hit the nail on the head, as indeed did the speeches from other hon. Members, when discussing what links the creative industries. We are talking about the big ideas on piracy, intellectual property enforcement, copyright and the infrastructure for technology. In the document, the Government again gave a commitment to consult on enforcement against internet service providers, to promote better understanding of intellectual property law and to increase some of the penalties for infringement. The threat against ISPs has been around for more than a year, and the Government's first proposal was in the Gowers report, but there has been no action since.

It is frankly depressing that the second most important announcement in a creative industries strategy paper is effectively more than 14 months old. My prediction is that the Government will not legislate. It is much easier for them to say that they will legislate than to do so. Most people believe that they are looking at what the French are doing, but the French are finding it extremely difficult to draft appropriate legislation that would be effective. The Movie Producers and Distributors Association and other organisations are in talks with ISPs, and they will probably announce a voluntary code within the next few weeks or months. The Government, of course, are welcome to take credit for that, but there is unlikely to be serious legislation, although the intention to legislate will no doubt be reannounced in a creative industries document in the next two years or so.

I concur with hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), that when we talk about piracy and theft, the gulf between what we commonly understand as theft in terms of taking an object that we can see and theft in terms of taking a piece of intellectual property is huge. The real solutions will probably be driven by technology and new business models. Two or three hon. Members mentioned the idea that Apple is working to introduce a voluntary £50 charge to people who buy an iPod and want unlimited downloads from iTunes. It is pretty obvious that the vast majority of people want to buy films and music on the internet legitimately for what they perceive to be a reasonable cost. The more the industry can provide them with safe, secure and straightforward ways of doing that, the more it will be able to monetise the digital environment.

As hon. Members have discussed, we need an urgent review of our copyright laws. The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire made an overwhelming case, which has been endorsed by the leader of the Conservative party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who announced last year that the next Conservative Government will extend copyright for performers to 70 years, but it is obvious in the light of Commissioner McCreevy's announcement that the period must be carefully considered. I have told the hon. Gentleman that the Conservative party will consider the matter, but we have moved beyond Gowers and intend to extend copyright, although there will obviously be a debate about the specific period.

Broadband is another huge issue, and again the Government are considering a review on removing the barriers to next generation broadband. That is welcome, but the creative industries that depend on that important element of infrastructure would be forgiven for saying, "What will another review do? Let's have some real muscle behind getting next generation broadband, so that we can start to compete with city states such as Singapore and other countries that are putting in the infrastructure for very fast broadband very quickly."

The Minister has made it clear that the creative industries share characteristics with a range of other businesses. My hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster made the point that the creative industries, like any other industries in our country, depend on a stable economy, although it has to be said that creative businesses are predominantly small businesses and sole traders. Those are extremely important factors.

However, last week's Budget was not a Budget for the creative industries or for business. Capital gains tax for entrepreneurs increased by 80 per cent., and the 10p starting rate of income tax was abolished. As the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire pointed out, there may be rich rock stars, but there are also very poor musicians who are being hit by that tax. At the other end of the scale, the sustained assault by the Government on the venture capital industry and non-doms has resulted only today in Terra Firma announcing that it might well up sticks and move abroad. That might be the start of the flight of many venture capital companies that are involved in pump-priming and investing in early-stage companies in the creative sectors.

There is also huge concern about the extension of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations. Perhaps the Minister will address that specific point. I understand that the changes mean that the provisions will be extended to certain professional sectors such as advertising and other creative industries. That is causing huge concern in those industries.

[Mr. Vaizey]

The enormously important issue of education was ably covered by the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), my current mentor. I hope that he does not take it amiss that I regard him as my mentor. He said that there is too much of a focus on Oxford and Cambridge. It is true that only two of the top 20 universities in the world are British. America is home to 17 of the others, and California alone has three of the top 10. Obviously, there will be a huge issue about upskilling and upgrading our universities.

I cannot remember who talked about the fact that there are so many media studies courses in universities at the moment and so many courses whose titles include the word "film". I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford —[Interruption.] I have been corrected: it was my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster. He made a fair point, because people working in the video games industry employ graduates with maths qualifications and computer science qualifications, and the video games industry is one of the industries that points out that the number of graduates in those subjects has fallen by one quarter in just the past four years.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North has, with me, been engaged in lobbying the Government on the dramatic cuts in the Science and Technology Facilities Council. Again, that is putting people off going into careers in science. Science degrees and the creative industries might appear to be an odd combination to talk about, but the fact remains that a great many science graduates go on to work in what we regard as creative industries, so that is incredibly important.

Joined-up government—a subject not really touched on in the strategy paper—is vital in this field. The Minister's predecessor, who is now the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, proposed in an early draft of the document a creative industries ministry. That was a bold idea, which I am not sure I support, but I certainly think that there should be hard thinking about where responsibility lies for copyright and patent law and whether Departments should start to swap responsibilities so that, as the hon. Member for Bath said, people who work in the creative industries know where to go for a range of advice and the policy can be joined up. That said, the creative industries are so vast and so eclectic that we will never achieve a perfect solution.

One small point might be worth illustrating. Some artists in London have expressed anger against Ken Livingstone because of what they perceive as his bias in favour of developers. They make the point that many small spaces in London for artists are disappearing. The author of a book called "The Warhol Economy" makes the point about the New York economy depending on creativity and so many people in New York now being forced out into the suburbs. Here, joined-up thinking in planning is perhaps necessary. The Minister has a strategy for rehearsal spaces for live music, but the Visual Arts and Galleries Association wants a strategy for studio spaces for artists, too. There are always tiny issues—well, they are not tiny for the people involved. Perhaps I should say that there are always niche issues that cut across a range of Departments, but I certainly think that after the Minister has finished reviewing the role of the Arts Council, she should consider how we can get a proper organisational structure in place to deliver the most effective Government support for the creative industries.

5.15 pm

Margaret Hodge: I should have said this in my opening remarks, but I join other hon. Members in recognising the enormous contribution made by Anthony Minghella, and not just to the film industry, although I genuinely think that had it not been for him, we would not now be planning a new film centre on the south bank with £50 million in funding. He played an enormous role in persuading Government to introduce the film tax relief, which has hugely benefited film. In his work outside film, I recently saw his production of "Madam Butterfly" at the English National Opera—the direction was stunning—and he also helped the Labour party with an excellent party political broadcast.

Dr. Gibson: Sensible man.

Margaret Hodge: Absolutely. Nothing could be better than having the Minghella centre on the south bank. I think that that would be a huge tribute to his contribution.

This has been a great debate. I think that it was a little spoilt by the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey), who showed the usual cynicism and negative approach.

Mr. Vaizey: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Margaret Hodge: No, not at this point. The hon. Gentleman showed the usual negative approach and cynicism, facing both ways without showing any joined-up thinking.

Mr. Don Foster: Does the Minister suspect that the rather cynical view of the hon. Member for Wantage is a reflection of the fact that I have now apparently been dropped as his mentor? As a result, his tone has changed.

Margaret Hodge: I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) is absolutely exhilarated by the thought of becoming the mentor of the hon. Member for Wantage—he showed that by various gesticulations during the debate.

I shall respond as quickly as I can to the points made in the debate. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, that all the creative industries need to develop new business models. Everything that we have said about copyright protection will work only in part. The real way forward for all the creative sectors is to develop new business models. The music industry, although it came to the table late because it was hit first, is doing more work on new business models than others. I was at an interesting session with representatives of the BPI just before Christmas, at which they demonstrated to me not just the model that the hon. Gentleman talked about, but the way in which mobile phone technology will now be used. We can think of Radiohead and the way in which they have used technology.

The hon. Gentleman talked about live concerts. That is almost a new business model in its own right. The film industry has to do some catching up to the point that the music industry has reached. That is an important point.

I want to pick up on the hon. Gentleman's point about camcording in cinemas. In relation to his discussions with the film industry, I say to him that we need better evidence that a new offence would have the impact that it thinks it would have. As far as I can see from the evidence so far where that offence has been introduced, it has not made an enormous difference, so we have asked the industry for more evidence.

A number of hon. Members referred to copyright extension. I repeat what I have said in the main Chamber: we have an open mind. However, I hope that hon. Members will look at the evidence, because it was not an unthinking decision on the part of Gowers; he based it on the best evidence that he had. It was echoed—I have now found the reference—by the Hugenholtz report to the European Commission. Although Commissioner McCreevy seems to have had a change of heart, we certainly look forward to discussions with him. We need to get good research evidence, and the hon. Gentleman will know that the research that his Committee considered was questioned by some of those involved in the earlier research. Let us look at that research again in that context.

Mr. Whittingdale: Is the Minister saying that she will consider that question only on the basis of the economic impact, because in our view the argument goes way beyond the economic effect it will have?

Margaret Hodge: The impact that copyright extension would have on those who might benefit from it is enormously important. One of the points that Gowers made is that the contracts under which many of the musicians and performers exercise their copyright are such that they would not benefit from an extension. Considering the broad interpretation of economic impact, it is important that we consider that matter. I understood and heard the passion of the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) on those issues, but we need to ask who the beneficiary would be—Disney or the individual performer? We must investigate that.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North on being involved with such a range of organisations, particularly the all-party writers group. I have noted his comments on the Copyright Tribunal. I would like to take away my notes and puruse them. The issue is not at the top of my agenda, but he made some interesting comments. I take the point that although we measure success by patents, we do not do so with copyrights. That is because they have no legal status, and therefore it is difficult to measure them. However, an important and fundamental point has been made, and we need to address that across the Government. I hope that the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills will be able to consider that as part of its innovation review. I applaud the work of the creative writers group, founded by Malcolm Bradbury, which has been incredibly successful as part of the university of East Anglia.

The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire talked about the huge UK success story. I completely and utterly endorse what he said. Our music industry is also successful. I accept the fragility not just of that industry, but of many of our industries. Many hon. Members mentioned the games industry, which is successful but quite promiscuous. The Canadians have introduced a tax relief that is having an impact here. Clearly, we do not want to have a ping-pong situation in relation to competitive tax relief because that will not lead to long-term stability and growth. Nevertheless, it is worrying that some Governments at federal or regional level feel that they can pursue such a strategy. We are taking that problem up with the World Trade Organisation. It reflects the fragility of another industry.

If the hon. Gentleman looks at the document, "Creative Britain—New Talents for the New Economy", there are two big references to rehearsal spaces. He will know that we have given Fergal Sharkey the task of spending £500,000 to set up some good music rehearsal spaces in various localities. I accept that we must have the respect of the artists and the performers. In the work that I have been doing on the creative economy programme, artists and performers are at the heart of our thinking and our consultation, and they very much inform what we do.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) managed to get me to visit her constituency and she has now got the Secretary of State to visit it. I congratulate her on her determination to represent her constituents in Parliament. The only thing I would say—I think I have said this to her before—is that in trying to secure the future of the ceramics industry for her constituents, it is important that she engages with the regional development agency, as it should take on board the potential and future of that industry.

Joan Walley: Indeed, we are engaging with the regional development agency, but the ceramics industry is relevant to this debate because small art potteries continue to be driven by design, use of colour and finely tuned hand skills. Their principal defences against counterfeiting are copyright and trademark. As well as having a bigger debate about industrialised production and manufacturing, it is essential that we look at the issue from the art point of view; hence my concern and interest in the debate.

Margaret Hodge: I accept my hon. Friend's point, but the RDAs also have to capture the importance of those factors because they relate to the added value that the creative industries often bring.

The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) made two important points. One was the importance of vocational courses. I endorse his remarks on that. I referred to the fact that we must work to ensure that the competences offered in courses and the content of courses reflect the needs of people in the industry. The individuals who take those courses, and now often pay for them, could then move straight into the world of work. We have not dropped the piece of work relating to that, as the hon. Member for Wantage suggested. The university of Brighton is taking forward a piece of work precisely to look at course content across the university sector and the conservatoires. That will ensure the relevance of that work. I was pleased to hear him endorse the importance of vocational courses, but they must be of the right quality.

Small and medium-sized enterprises were also mentioned. It would be wrong to have a Minister for the creative industries because businesses in that sector share many of the characteristics and problems generally experienced by industry. The fact that there is a concentration of SMEs means that we must get the whole framework right to support them across all sectors. When I did business support simplification in my previous job, we tried to drive out many of the specific funding programmes that we had for individual industries so that we could view them in a more general way. If something is simple, businesses will take advantage of it; if it is complex, they will not find their way through the maze.

It is right to have cross-Government working. I work incredibly closely with the Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform and the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills. I also work closely with colleagues in the Treasury, in local government and elsewhere. The way in which we are dealing with the issue is right. On the whole, our work on deregulation supports the SME sector. The additional capital allowances that businesses have for investment after the Budget are important. We want businesses not simply to start up, but to grow. The incentivisation is now taken away from the capital gains tax relief and put into capital investment, which is important.

The hon. Members for Bath (Mr. Foster) and for Wantage mentioned statistics not being precise enough. We are trying to address the problem with information. When we put together the Will Hutton report, there was a lot of discussion about the basis on which he made his observations. The data are not comparable. There is an issue with information; it is always an investment, and we are considering that matter.

I agree about video games. Far too often, they are attacked, but they account for more than 50 per cent. of gross value added in the creative industries. Video games are hugely important to us and are increasingly enjoyed by a wide range of people. For example, more women now play them and the average age of those who play is 28, which is much higher than I thought. It is not only Whittingdale Junior, but many adults—men and increasingly women—who are enjoying such games.

I take on board the points made by the hon. Member for Bath about extending intellectual property and "use it or lose it." I agree that there are some simple, basic realities, which is why we turned the document from a Green or White Paper into a strategy document. The document is full of real action. It can be attacked by saying that some of the action has been trailed before, but this is real action that will make a difference to the industry. We could have had another strategy document, but I think that Will Hutton did his job pretty well. It is now down to us to take his work forward and to ask what the Government will do to ensure that we provide the economic conditions to enable the industries to prosper. That is what we have done in the document. I am proud of it, but I consider it a stage in the journey.

The creative industries sector is fragile and operates in fast-changing circumstances—whether that involves the introduction of broadband, the convergence of technology or the competition from globalisation. We have to respond quickly and we can do so only in partnership. The partnership we have established is broadly welcomed by most people with whom I converse and we want to preserve it for the future by working across the Government in the interests of the creative sector.

It being half-past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.
